ADDRESS.

IN closing the first volume of the Freemasons' Magazine in its present form, we cannot do otherwise than return our most grateful thanks to the brethren for the support we have received, and the favour with which the alteration has been greeted. That all should approve of the change, was not to be expected—old associations had led many to regard the octavo form as the most convenient; but those readers were probably unaware that there were mechanical difficulties connected with that form which rendered it unfitted for a weekly publication, and limited our power of bringing up the news to as late a period as we desired; whilst at the same time the book postage was so heavy as to be a great hindrance to our circulation in the colonies. These considerations determined us to make the change, and we are happy to feel that it has met with general approbation, as evidenced by our growing circulation—both at home and in the colonies.

Our career as Masonic Journalists has been from the commencement beset by difficulties—difficulties which, thanks to the kind and liberal support of our friends, are rapidly passing away; and we hope that when, at the close of 1860, we again address our readers, we shall be enabled to congratulate ourselves on the circumstance that the Freemasons' Magazine has become a commercial success, and confidently to look forward to receiving in the future a more solid reward of our labours than it has yet been our lot to secure.

To make the Magazine worthy of the extended support of the brethren will ever be our most earnest endeavour; and without making any promises with regard to the future, we think we may fairly refer to our present volume as a proof that we have not been wanting in our exertions to render the Magazine equal in literary excellence to its contemporaries; and whilst steadily keeping in view the main object of the Magazine—of supplying the fullest possible information on every point connected with the every day business of the Craft, we have neither lost sight of those scientific adjuncts of the Order which we are enjoined to study and disseminate; or neglected to vary our columns occasionally with articles belonging to the lighter branches of literature. This we can say without egotism—that there never was a period in the history of the Magazine when so large a staff of literary gentlemen was connected with it—each in his peculiar department aiding towards the general unity of design—the combining the Magazine and the Newspaper so as to interest the largest number of readers and render it a welcome visitor at every table.

Neither have we omitted to call into requisition the talent of the Artist; and we can fearlessly refer to the portrait of the Grand Master as a proof that we act upon the maxim—that what is worth doing at all is worthy of being done well. We hope in the future to be enabled to present to the brethren many other specimens of the Engraver's skill; whilst even the Photographer shall be called into our assistance so that we may place before our friends the very embodiment, so to speak, of some of the more distinguished members of the Craft in the very form in which they live and move and have their being.

We will not pursue the subject further, lest we should be led into suggestions which if not fulfilled might lay us open to the charge of breaking faith with our friends—but once more thank them for their kind support during the past year. We have now only to wish them most fraternally the compliments of the season, trusting that next week the first number of 1860 will be as favourably received as any of the numbers which have preceded it.

AND MASONIC MIRROR.

LONDON, SATURDAY, JULY 9, 1859.

TO THE CRAFT.

IN commencing a new and enlarged series of the Freemasons' Magazine, we feel that we may be expected to address a few words to the Craft as to our reasons for altering its form, and our intentions with regard to the future. Of the past we shall only say, that during the two years the Magazine has been under our sole control, we have endeavoured to elevate its tone and introduce to our readers writers on Freemasonry and the sciences with which it is, or ought to be, connected, whose united labours might place the Magazine on an equal footing with other first class metropolitan journals; whilst at the same time we have used every exertion to make the Masonic Mirror, or news department of the Magazine, as comprehensive and impartial as possible. How far we have succeeded, we shall not attempt, ourselves, to express an opinion; though we believe we might fairly point to our increased subscription list as a proof that our labours, though not so pecuniarily successful as we could have wished, have not been altogether unappreciated, and that we have succeeded in producing a more perfect Freemasons' Magazine than any Masonic publication which has preceded it.

As regards our reasons for altering the form, we may state that it has been frequently impressed upon us that our circulation in the colonies was impeded in consequence of the heavy rate of postage—3*d.* each number—which could only be reduced by our conforming to certain regulations of the Post Office, by which we could register the publication for transmission abroad, and secure the advantage of the newspaper postage of 1*d.*; and this our present form enables us to do, not only for the colonies but for America and other places of importance; whilst through the mechanical advantages offered by the change in form, we shall be enabled to bring up the news closer to the day of publication, which in future will be Saturday, thus laying before the brethren the proceedings at Grand Lodge and at the Masonic festivals in the same week in which they are held.

With respect to our intentions in the future, we shall endeavour to maintain, and if possible, improve, the character the Magazine has obtained in its literary department—adding to it the advantages of pictorial illustration.

The Magazine will continue to be conducted by Bro. Henry G. Warren, assisted by Bros. Hyde Clarke, Thomas Davidson, Rev. J. S. Sidebotham, J. How, Matthew Cooke, H. R. Sharman, E. J. Williams, and other well known brethren—irrespective of writers on art and science not which are immediately connected with the Craft.

Amongst the earlier illustrated works which will appear in the Magazine, is a series of "Lectures on Symbols," by Bro. R. Martin, late D. Prov. Grand Master for Suffolk, now in the hands of an experienced artist.

The Magazine will not be confined purely to Masonic subjects, but architecture, archæology, and other sciences will receive due attention, and the proceedings of the various scientific bodies of the kingdom will be briefly but succinctly recorded.

New books, new music, new engravings, will all, in their turn be brought under consideration, and treated with the utmost impartiality.

The charitable and provident institutions, of which England is so justly proud, will have their proceedings regularly recorded, and histories of their objects, progress, and position will, from time to time, be published.

A short digest of the news of the week, carefully prepared will, as hitherto, form a feature of the publication; and a record of public amusements will be duly attended to—in order, as far as possible, to render our Magazine acceptable throughout the Craft, and to readers generally.

In addition to other attractions, we purpose to present to our readers a series of highly finished engravings of distinguished Masons—commencing with the M.W. Grand Master the Earl of Zetland, full particulars of which will be duly announced.

TO OUR COLONIAL BRETHREN.

To the brethren in the colonies we especially appeal for support, and assure them we shall be at all times happy to receive from them notices of the progress of their Lodges. In order to facilitate the circulation of the Magazine in the colonies, we propose to forward it (postage free) at the publishing price of £1 6*s.* sterling, per annum, on the subscription being paid in advance; and Secretaries of Lodges, or others, forwarding orders for four copies or more, will be allowed the regular agent's profits, which they can deduct before forwarding the subscriptions.

OUR AMERICAN BRETHREN

subscribing for the Magazine, will also receive their copies for 26*s.* sterling, or about $6½ per annum (English postage paid); and we shall be happy to enter into arrangements for agencies throughout the Union and the Colonies.

TO ADVERTISERS

the Magazine in its present form offers peculiar advantages; its circulation being almost exclusively amongst the opulent classes, and from its being subscribed for by the different Lodges, possessing a larger body of regular readers than the great majority of class publications.

STAINED GLASS.

[The following paper "On some Characteristic Features in Stained Glass Figures," was read at the Birmingham Architectural Society, on Monday, March 7th, 1859, by Bro. W. WIGGINTON, F.R.I.B.A. (J.W., No. 819, and P.G.S.B. for Worcestershire), having been hastily got up, at two or three days' notice, to supply a vacancy caused by the illness of the gentleman who was on the list for that evening.]

In the days of the early Christians, when the schoolmaster was less abroad than he is now, and the masses were uneducated, it was the aim and object of the fathers to present to their flocks sacred historical subjects in such a manner as to be readily understood. This was effected in a variety of ways through the agency of painting and sculpture—but to painting principally must we look for the more perfect carrying out of this intention. The imitative art was thus supposed to perform, in our religious edifices, the combined offices of preacher and moralist, offering sermons for morality, and examples for edification. They thought that by such material objects, the weakest intellect and the feeblest intelligence could comprehend the truth.

Although I do not agree with the theory of these fathers of the early Christian church with reference to the beneficial effects to be derived from the material embodiment of these subjects—believing that the gospel plainly preached in the vulgar tongue is quite sufficient for the most illiterate—yet there have been many able defences made for the ancient practice, which are worth attention. John Damascenus, who lived in the year 700, contends that images are not mute. “They speak,” says he, “they are not lifeless blocks, like the idols of the Pagans. Every painting that meets our gaze in a church, relates, as if in words, the humiliation of Christ for his people, the miracles of the Mother of God, and the deeds and conflicts of his saints. Images open the heart and awaken the intellect, and, in a marvellous and indescribable manner, engage us to imitate the persons they represent.”

Writers of every age bear witness that this idea, and this idea only, prompted the execution and arrangement of the statues and figures which crowd the continental churches, and which, I may be pardoned for saying, disfigured our own up to the time of puritanical Cromwell, under whose authority the sacred buildings were not only purged of these remnants of the papacy, but defiled by base and unworthy usage.

In the seventh century, Benedict Biscop, abbot of Wearmouth, brought over some valuable paintings from Italy, with which he decorated his church. They were for the purpose of stimulating the spectator to meditate upon the divine incarnation, the last judgment, and the duty of self-examination. It was even thought necessary to have allegorical paintings, by which the priests themselves should be stirred up to their duty, and be reminded of their holy calling, and of the holy men who had faithfully fulfilled their duties therein. Thus in the eleventh century, Bishop Geoffrey caused fresco portraits of holy men to be painted on the walls of his chancel, to divert the eyes of the officiating priests from profane objects, and to prevent their being overcome by weakness and fatigue.

St. Paulinus gives us another reason for the adoption of stained glass and sculptures, and more especially for those wherewith he decorated his own church, dedicated to St. Felix. He says:—“Among the crowds attracted hither by the fame of St. Felix, there are peasants recently converted who had long been the slaves of profane usages, and had obeyed their senses as gods. They arrive here from far, pass the entire night in joyous watchings, drive away slumber by gaiety, and darkness by torches. They mingle festivities with prayers, and after singing hymns to God, abandon themselves to good cheer, and joyously stain the tombs of the saints with odoriferous wine.”

Such was the conduct of those ignorant converts to Christianity—conduct certainly not savouring of that gospel to which it is said they were converted. Their conversion being made upon a wrong principle, another wrong act was required to keep them up to the mark, and prevent them, through their drunken unchristian lips, “insulting St. Felix”—not God, but St. Felix. And to effect this St. Paulinus says:—“I have therefore thought it expedient to enliven with paintings the entire habitation of the holy saint. Images thus traced and coloured will perhaps inspire those rude minds with astonishment. Inscriptions are placed above the pictures, in order that the letter may explain what the hand has depicted.” In an earlier portion of his writings he contends that paintings are necessary to teach the truth to the illiterate, that they may contemplate in the lineaments of painting, what they could not discern in writing; but in this remark he demolishes his whole theory. “While showing them to each other,” says he, “and reading thus by turns these pictured objects, they do not think of eating till later than before; their eyes aid them to endure fasting. Painting beguiles their hunger, better habits govern these wondering men, and, studying these holy histories, charity and virtue are engendered by such examples of piety. These sober gazers are intoxicated with excitement, though they have ceased to indulge in wine. A great part of their time being spent in looking at these pictures (not by the way in hearing doctrinal points clearly put by the priest) they drink much less, for there remain but a few short minutes for their repast.”

This is the strangest apology for the presence of paintings in churches, that I have read—surely we may commend it to those of our temperance friends who wish the National Gallery opened on Sunday; they will see at all events that the idea they have of picture gazing stopping intemperance is not altogether a new one, and indeed it has been said there is nothing new under the sun, though there may be a slight difference in the intention and working of the two theories, both of which are, to my mind, fallacious.

In every cathedral we find remains of stained glass, but history in stone, by a series of figures, is not so easily to be met with. The most perfect is that in Chartres Cathedral, where the whole history of creation and of man is depicted in nearly 1,500 figures, most of which are at present in good preservation. Vincent de Beauvais describes this example with the greatest accuracy, and at considerable length, but the shortness of the time at my disposal will not allow me further to allude to it; I shall therefore pass on at once to the subject matter of this paper, and glance, though but briefly, at some of the attributes by which the three persons of the Trinity are characterised in ancient manuscripts and stained glass.

The most distinguishing feature in Christian iconography is that of the nimbus which surrounds the head of divinity, and the aureola in which occasionally we find the body contained. Both are called by some the glory, but one of the best of the French writers on Christian archaeology confines the latter term to an union of the nimbus and aureola, as will hereafter be alluded to.

It is a very common error on the part of artists to misapply this glory, through want of care with some and through ignorance with others. It is customary to attach the nimbus to the head of the three persons of the Trinity only, with certain peculiarities in the field of the nimbus, and to the Virgin Mary, apostles, &c., without those peculiarities. It is sometimes given to the personification of the virtues, but very seldom indeed to other allegorical figures, whether of natural or psychological subjects.

The allegorical personages to whom our Saviour in his parables gave a sort of rational existence are adorned with the nimbus—such, for example, as the wise and foolish virgins. The theological virtues, faith, hope, and charity, as well as the four cardinal virtues, temperance, strength, prudence, and justice, are also sometimes represented with a nimbus.

Artists, however, sometimes give to one of the three persons of the Trinity a nimbus belonging to mortals; and it has often occurred that a bishop or other high ecclesiastic has been adorned with a nimbus that, were it not for a better knowledge of the facts, would rank him as a god. In illustration of this, we may mention that some fifteen years since a painting on glass was exhibited, representing Christ and some of the saints of the Romish calendar. One of the canonized figures was painted with a cruciform nimbus, while the figure of the Deity was not in that way distinguished from that of an ordinary mortal.

The nimbus, as an attribute, serves to denote a holy person, as a crown does a king, and a crozier a bishop. It is therefore of very great importance that this peculiarity should be particularly noticed, as it bears the same relation to this branch of Christian art as the fingers, bones, mammals, &c., do in zoology. The nimbus proper, as I have said before, is confined solely to the head; the aureola is the vescia piscis, or other form, which surrounds the body; and the glory is the combination of both in one figure.

The word nimbus is of Greek derivation, and is to water—to wet. It also signifies (with the Latin word nubis) a cloud, and it is in this latter sense that we use the word; although some artists lose sight of that fact, and instead of surrounding the head with a cloud, or vapour, sometimes make it opaque, or luminous, or even transparent. The nimbus may be found used in pagan mythology, but the aureola may almost be said to be a Christian attribute, and was originally restricted almost exclusively to the Divine person and Virgin Mary. They are both intended for glorification or deification.

In all cases artists have selected the head, as the proper position for the nimbus—that being the chief point of attraction. In scripture the head is the part that receives most mention and honour. Christ is the head of the church—the man is the head of the woman, &c.—and one of the early fathers of the church has declared that “religious places are those within which the entire body of a man, or at least his head, is buried, because no man can have two sepulchres. But the body, or any member without the head, doth not make the place where it is buried religious.”* The spirit of Christianity seems therefore to give every honour to the head, making it the especial seat of the soul. To the head belong all the faculties of taste, smell, sight, &c., and, above all, “thought.” The lion owes his title of king of the forest, to his head—and man, from carrying erect his head, and directing his gaze freely and naturally towards heaven, is likewise said to derive his rank therefrom, as the chief of created beings. A fine head can ennoble an ugly form, but there can be no true beauty in a fine form, with an ugly head. Anatomically considered, in the head is concentrated the entire man—the seat of beauty and intelligence.

In ancient history we read of the rewards bestowed upon men who have benefited their country—upon heroes who have saved their country, or carried its arms successfully into that of its enemy; and the greatest of these rewards was that of the crown, be it of oak, laurel, or olive; it was by this decoration that they were made like unto their fabulous deities. These crowns may, in fact, be deemed to be the forerunners or types of the Christian nimbus. It is easy to fancy how, in the first rise of Christianity, when martyrs shed their blood in witness of the faith which they proclaimed, their fellow Christians should be anxious to render their names as illustrious as possible, and confer upon their memories the greatest honours; and being fully alive to the customs of their Pagan forefathers, the representations of their martyrs, rudely though they may have been executed, were adorned with crowns, suspended by the divine hand, or else by angels descending from heaven. And as the crown of the king is so much superior to that of his nobles, theirs decreasing in proportion and grandeur as their rank decreases, so is it with the nimbus in Christian archæology, representing the attributes of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost; then the Virgin, the angels, saints, and holy men. As the crown is the emblem of civil power, and used to distinguish the man who is placed at the head of his country—so is the nimbus of divine power and of religious and ecclesiastical authority.

During the first four centuries, however, the nimbus was but sparingly applied, and even the divinity itself was mostly represented divested of this attribute.* When however the church at Rome had attained to greatness, she took steps to organize her personalities and powers, and when once she freely adopted the nimbus as a characteristic of holiness, it was constantly applied, and so firm a hold did it take upon the delineators of sacred subjects, that even at the present day no artist would think of putting up stained glass windows representing the divinity or holy personages, without the distinguishing attribute consecrated to their use.

At first it was represented as a disk, very fine and attenuated, and mostly transparent. In the twelfth, thirteenth, and fourteenth centuries it became less in size, but much more opaque, more like a plate at the back of the head than any thing else, so that nothing could be seen through the body colours, so profusely were they applied. In the following century it became materialised, yet, nevertheless the artists never seemed to wish to lose sight of the fact that a ray of light was that which was required. With the nimbus, however, frequently applied to the Virgin, all light was abolished, and instead of the field being kept luminous, it was filled in with representations of precious stones, &c.

Subsequently the true idea of the nimbus was revived, and Italian artists in the sixteenth century painted the nimbus as of old, and completely expressive of the object which it was originally intended to convey. In the present day the transparent nimbus is correctly delineated, although antique forms and ideas are adopted, but confined solely to the circular form, with or without diverging rays of light.

The nimbus proper is of many forms and shapes, having depended much upon the taste of the artist producing it; but when it is of any other form than that of circular it is usually accompanied by rays of light from the head springing forth at the back, and extending beyond the line of circumference. The circular form is, however, that generally met with (fig. 1). In some instances the outer circle alone appears but in others the field of the nimbus, or the disk, is filled in plain, or with foliage or radiating lines.

This may often be met with in France and Germany, as also fig. 1 or the single line; the triangular shape, however (fig. 3), is but seldom seen there, although common enough in Italy and part of Greece. In Russia also it has been found; some of the figures in the iconoclasts, or rood screens, being so decorated. I have not heard of this form being adopted in this country; neither have I met with an example of this, or of the double triangle, which forms a star of six points (fig. 4), an emblem familiar to most members of the Masonic Craft. The lower point is hidden by the head. This is taken from a fresco at Mount Athos, forming part of a very interesting painting, in which the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost are delineated. In Antwerp there is a nimbus of five points (fig. 5), the lower part of which is likewise concealed.

1. Plain circular nimbus with single ring. Circa 900.

2. Plain circular nimbus, with double ring. Circa 1000.

3. Plain triangular nimbus. Circa 1400.

* The body may be buried anywhere, but the head nowhere, save in holy and consecrated ground, in the church or cemetery.

* Before the sixth century we have no well authenticated example of the nimbus, and it is never constantly figured until after the eleventh century.

4. Plain double triangle nimbus.
Circa 1400.

5. Star nimbus of 6 points.

6. Square nimbus. Ninth Century.

The square was held inferior to the circle by Pythagoras, and the neo-Platonists. According to them the square was a geometrical, symbolic figure, employed to designate the earth; the circle was the symbol of heaven. The circle, a square perfected; the square, a broken circle.

The square nimbus always implies the person to be living when the drawing was made. It was always kept to men celebrated for sanctity, and was of this shape in order to preserve the high position due to departed saints. The quadrature of the nimbus thus gives us a clue to the date of manuscripts and monuments of art, all which must have been executed during the lifetime of the person so represented.

The square nimbus has nevertheless been sometimes given to God, a matter very difficult to explain, for why should the Creator in any circumstance have an attribute which belongs solely to the living mortal, and this living mortal being held as inferior to a dead saint! In some of the few cases that may be met with, however, there is a slight, though a very slight distinction, inasmuch as the sides of the square are made concave, as in fig. 7, which is taken from an illuminated Italian manuscript of the fourteenth century, and representing the first of the three Persons of the Trinity. There is also another peculiarity which in some little measure distinguishes this from the ordinary square nimbus, and that is that it is placed at an angle instead of upon a base line, thereby somewhat resembling a nimbus formed entirely of rays of light, which will be noticed presently. In a mosaic of the thirteenth century, in the church of San Giovanni in Laterano, is a perfectly square nimbus round the head of God the Father; but this is placed angularly also. Raphael also, in the Vatican, has represented God in a square nimbus, with concave as well as straight sides. In Rome a mosaic still exists, in which the square nimbus is enclosed in a circular one, as shown in fig. 8. This union can be readily understood—the circle being emblematical of “eternity,” and the square signifying “life;” the result of the combination must therefore necessarily be that God is eternal, ever living, signifying the past as well as the present and the future—“Ego sum, qui est, et qui erat, et qui venturus est.”

7. Square nimbus with concave sides.

8. Square nimbus with concave sides within a ring.

The hexagon nimbus is peculiar also to the Italians, and is chiefly applied to the personification of the theological and cardinal virtues. The signification of this is purely allegorical, and it is employed to convey a mystical meaning. Among the figures distinguished by this form, may be mentioned those in the vaulting over the altar of the church of Assisi, the paintings in the choir of San Francesco at Pisa, and in the gates of the Baptistery at Florence. In Italy, where Christian monuments are so abundant, there were a great variety of forms given to this feature; but in the west alone did they keep to the circular form.

A very unusual nimbus is found in a Latin manuscript of the ninth century, attached to a bishop. It is that of a roll of parchment partly unfolded. This is peculiar to Italy; indeed, like the square nimbus, no example has yet been illustrated from any other country.

The whole of the examples of the nimbus above given (with the exception of the triangle and stars, which have of rays of light; but there are others which are peculiarly distinguished by these rays in fact, formed solely by them. They form in consequence a distinct species, and sometimes take the circular triangular, square, or cross shape.

In a thirteenth century miniature, we find an example of a circular nimbus, the field of which is ornamented by three rays of light, each ray consisting of three lines, and all projecting beyond the circumference of the circle, the centre line being the most elongated.

This figure (fig. 10) may be deemed a transitional one, being that in which the first attempt at radiation is made; and this with the evident intention of forming a cross, the emblem of the second person in the Trinity. These rays diverge from the centre, are contracted at the base, and become broad and open at the extremities.

In some examples the rays stop short of the circle, and thus lead to a different form of nimbus, which partakes more nearly the character of a Greek cross.

10. Transitional nimbus.

DAISIES.

“These flow’rs white and red,
Such that men callen Daisies in our town;
To them have I so great affection,
As I said erst, when comen is the May,
That in my bed there daweth me no day
That I n’am up and walking in the mead
To see this flow’r against the sunne sprcad,
When it upriseth early by the morrow;
That blissful sight softeneth all my sorrow;
So glad am I when that I have presencc
Of it, to doen it all reverence.”

MASONIC MISSIONS.

It is some encouragement to us to persevere in our task of describing the present state of Masonry, its merits and imperfections, that our pages do not go uncut, nor pass without notice; and they are not only read, but commented upon, and their errors corrected and deficiencies supplied. Our accounts are drawn up from what are considered authentic data, but such is the want of good material that it is very difficult to deal with the subjects with completeness. We are therefore much obliged to Ill. Bro. Charles John Vigne, 83°, to Bro. Thomas Cave, to a Bro. "P.M.," and to a correspondent, "J. O. E.," for various communications in extension and correction of our account of the province of Dorset, and we call the attention of our readers to these letters.

It is very difficult to begin a comprehensive survey of Masonry, but with such cooperation we shall trust to accomplish it.

We now propose to lay before our readers some particulars as to the province of Warwickshire. The county of that name includes 881 square miles, or 563,946 acres, with a population of 475,013. It is a great manufacturing district, and the midland metropolis of Birmingham embraces a large part of the population.

Its cities, towns, and boroughs, are as under, with Lodge towns marked *.

- * Birmingham, with a population of 232,841.
- * Coventry, with a population of 36,812.
- * Foleshill, with a population of 7,819.
- * } Warwick, with a population of 10,973.
- * } Leamington, with a population of 15,692.
- Stratford-upon-Avon, with a population of 3,372.
- Sutton Colefield, with a population of 4,574.
- * Alcester, with a population of 2,027.
- * Atherstone, with a population of 3,819.
- Coleshill, with a population of 1,980.
- Henley in Arden, with a population of 1,183.
- * Kenilworth and Stoneleigh, with a population of 1,289.
- Kington or Kineton, with a population of 1,270.
- * Nuneaton, with a population of 4,859.
- * Rugby, with a population of 6,317.
- Solihull, with a population of 3,277.
- Southam, with a population of 1,711.
- Bedworth, with a population of 3,012.
- Dunchurch, with a population of 1,135.
- Hampton-in-Arden, with a population of 3,094.

The following shows the chronology of these Lodges :—

Date.	Lodges.

1790 to 1794	2
1800 to 1810	0

1821 to 1830	1
1831 to 1840	3
1851 to 1859	2

There are thus two Lodges above one hundred years old, the St. Paul's Lodge being one of the oldest Lodges in the provinces, and three other Lodges about fifty years old. Thus, of the numerous Lodges existing in the last century, of antient and modern Masons, only five Lodges survive, seated in four Lodge towns; Birmingham, Coventry, Warwick and Alcester, having preserved their temples, but Stratford and other towns having allowed the light to be lost.

Then, from 1794 to 1829, thirty-five years, we have a woful blank; indeed of the Lodges of forty years, one alone remains. Then we get evidence of a revival, and within the last thirty years Masonry has extended, but its present condition is not adequate to the population.

The Howe has a Mark Master's Lodge attached to it.

The Royal Arch Chapters in the province are the following :—

The Grand Superintendent of Warwickshire is not returned in the official list.

There is a Rose Croix Chapter at Birmingham, the Vernon Chapter.

We regret to state that, except the distinguished Lodge in Birmingham, the Howe, with some others there, the Lodges of this province meet in taverns. There is only one Masonic Hall in the province, constituting the rooms of the Howe Lodge.

There is one local Masonic charity, called the Masonic Annuity Association.

The Provincial Grand Lodge is in regular working order.

Birmingham is naturally the Masonic capital; for a population of a quarter of a million it has six Lodges, one Mark Lodge, two Royal Arch Chapters, one Rose Croix Chapter, and a Masonic Hall, a provision seemingly large, sufficing for the zealous Mason, but not equivalent to the population and wealth of the town.

The whole number of subscribing members in Birmingham is not more than about two hundred, or less than one in a thousand population, while there are towns of 20,000 people with 120 subscribing members, or one in two hundred, and there are many small towns with one Mason for one hundred population. There must be something wrong therefore in the constitution of the Lodges in Birmingham. The number of initiations we do not know, but we presume they are between thirty and forty a year. A decent town of one tenth of the population will give ten initiations a year.

Birmingham is, however, an old Masonic capital, and has the rare distinction among provincial towns of having two Lodges above a hundred years old.

St. Paul's Lodge dates, as we have seen, from 1733. It has long maintained a high reputation in Birmingham, and keeps its standing fairly. The number of its members is forty-four. Bro. Dr. Hopkins, Past Prov. Senior Grand Warden, a very distinguished Mason of the province, was a member of this Lodge. There is a Royal Arch Chapter attached to the Lodge, which we presume to be maintained, but we know nothing regarding it.

The Athol Lodge, No. 88, likewise boasts the distinction of remote antiquity, but whether its records are well preserved we do not know. The number of members is thirty-six. It is considered a flourishing Lodge for Birmingham, but there are single Lodges elsewhere which have their hundred members. In 1854 and 1855, the Worshipful Master was Bro. J. Pursall, to whom a Past Master's jewel was presented for his services in those two years, at a meeting of the Lodge, on April 8th, 1856. In 1856, the Worshipful Master was Bro. Walker.

We should like much to know whether these Lodges have any ancient records, furniture, portraits, or objects of interest.

The Lodge of Light, No. 689, although dating only from 1840, is one of the most flourishing of the Birmingham Lodges, and counts fifty-four members. It was fortunate in initiating Bro. Lord Leigh, who has been its Master, and is now Provincial Grand Master. In 1856, Bro. Roberts was Worshipful Master; in 1857, Bro. James Tertius Collins; and, in 1858, Bro. Blake.

The Faithful Lodge, No. 696, used to meet in the Assembly Rooms, and adjourn to banquet to a respectable tavern. It dates from 1840, but is not so numerous as its contemporary, the Lodge of Light, for it has only twenty-five members. It has an Organist attached to it. In 1856, the Worshipful Master was Bro. Harry Lees; and, in 1857, Bro. T. Fisher. Bro. Thomas Perkins was the oldest Past Master.

Bro. J. A. Baker, the Secretary of No. 696, is the author of some Craft music, and on the occasion of the death of Bro. Solomon Weiss, No. 947, he composed suitable music, and performed it at the funeral service in the Lodge.

We now come to one of the youngest, but what may be justly styled one of the most distinguished Lodges in Birmingham—one known not only throughout the province, but the country—the Howe Lodge, named in honour of Bro. Earl Howe, the late Grand Master of the province, and founded only in 1850. Already, in 1856, its numbers were forty-five; in 1857, fifty-eight; and, in 1858, fifty-three. It was this Lodge which first took the useful step of providing itself with Masonic rooms, and which, by the energy and liberality of its members, now offers a safe asylum to the Lodges and Chapters of Birmingham. It was in 1856 that the Howe Lodge removed to the new premises in Newhall-street, the alterations of which were carried out by Bro. Frederick Empson, P.M., of No. 51. By the time it had been five years established, this Lodge had expended £300 in the purchase of furniture, and invested £200 more for Masonic purposes in the public funds. Bro. Bassett Smith is a Past Master, and, in 1856, delivered a funeral oration on Bro. Weiss. Bro. J. W. Lloyd, Treasurer, is a Past Master. The Secretary is Bro. Broughton. In 1856, Bro. Ross was Worshipful Master; in 1857, Bro. E. Marshall; and, in 1858, Bro. Hall.

Attached to the temple is a banquet room, capable of accommodating fifty guests, in which the banquets are served by a respectable hotelkeeper, a brother of the Lodge. The nucleus of a library has been formed by an eminent and enlightened Mason, Bro. Broughton, the Secretary of the Lodge, who presented in 1857 a complete set of the Freemasons' Magazine, with the Penny Cyclopaedia and supplement. This example has been followed by several brethren. This is, however, only one instance of the munificence of Bro. Broughton. The funds for the temple having been provided by a subscription in shares of £5, he presented no less than forty of these shares, or £200, to the Lodge, on the 9th of March, 1857. The grand principle on which this Lodge was established by its founders at the outset was, that the funds contributed for Masonic purposes should be applied to Masonic purposes alone—that Masonic rites shall not be celebrated in taverns, and that the expense of all banquets should be defrayed by those who partook of them. This has been fully carried out with the results we have related, and there can be little doubt that the Howe Lodge has had great influence in promoting the establishment of Masonic halls in the midland districts. It was to be expected that the Howe Lodge should pronounce a strong opinion on the question of purging the hall of the Craft from tavernkeeping, protesting against the continuance of such a course, and appealing to its own history as an example.

Attached to the Howe Lodge is a Lodge of Mark Masters. In 1858 Bro. A. McCracken was Worshipful Master.

There is also a Royal Arch Chapter, which is, we believe, in good working.

No. 1,051 is the last Lodge founded in Birmingham, dating from 1858. It is called the Temperance Lodge, the object of its founders being to conduct their banquets on the temperance system; one among many instances of the catholicity of Masonry, which gives full latitude to opinion, and places no restraint on conscience. The number of members of this new Lodge was, in 1858, twenty-one. Its Worshipful Master in 1858 was the Rev. T. W. Herbert, P. Prov. Grand Chaplain of Worcester; and in 1859, Bro. Thomas Mills. Of course this Lodge was amongst those which this year expressed its conscientious objections to the Grand Lodge of England keeping a tavern.

The high degrees of the Ancient and Accepted Rite, under the Supreme Council of England, are in Birmingham administered as far as the 18th degree, by the Vernon Chapter. In 1857, the M.W.S. was Bro. Dee, a distinguished Mason of the province, who has held the office of Prov. Senior Grand Warden. In 1858, the M.W.S. was Bro. Ward. The number of candidates admitted to the 18th degree in 1858 was about five. According to their custom of assisting in the working, the Birmingham Chapter has several times been visited by members of the Supreme Council; and Ill. Bro. Vernon is an affiliated member. Several zealous Masons of the province have been by the Supreme Council promoted to higher degrees as far as the 30°.

We shall now leave Birmingham and describe the other Lodge towns of the province, beginning with the antient city of Coventry. Here is the Trinity Lodge, No. 316, founded in 1784. This meets at a tavern in the city, though there must be many public buildings. We know very little about this Lodge, for we regret to say that it is the only Lodge in this considerable city and has only twenty-three members, being a slight increase over 1856. The proportion of Masons to the whole population is not one in 1,000, and has been nearly as low as one in 2,000. This shows something wrong, as it is even worse than Birmingham. There is a Royal Arch Chapter attached to No. 316, called the Cumberland Chapter, which meets in the same place. With from eighteen to twenty-three members in the Lodge it is not likely to be very considerable or very active. Many a smaller town has a hall and library. In 1856 Bro. Bursall was Worshipful Master, and in 1859 Bro. H. Matherson, and that is all we are able to state.

Warwick and Leamington are so close together that they may almost be considered as one town; Warwick is, however, a county and manufacturing town, and Leamington a watering place. They have between them three Lodges, and one Royal Arch Chapter. The total number of Masons who were members of Lodges in the two towns was, in 1856, one hundred and nine; in 1857, ninety-seven; and in 1858, ninety-one; so that the position of the town is retrograde, principally owing to the decline of the Leamington Lodge. The average in the two towns of Masons, to the population, has been as one to 300 and 200.

No. 356, the Shakspeare Lodge, at Warwick, meets at a tavern. It dates from 1791, and is the oldest Lodge now surviving in the towns. It has a Royal Arch Chapter. It is the most considerable Lodge in the province, having about sixty members. We have no further particulars regarding it.

No. 828, the Unity, at Warwick, is a new and small Lodge, dating from 1849, meeting in a tavern, and having about twenty members.

No. 556, Guy's Lodge, at Leamington, dates from 1829, and meets in a tavern. From some cause it appears to be rapidly declining. The return of its members, in 1856, was thirty-two; in 1857, twenty-two; and, in 1858, seventy-seven. In 1859, Bro. H. Bown was Worshipful Master.

The small town of Alcester is the seat of a Lodge, No. 378, the Apollo, of some standing, having been founded in 1794. It meets on the Monday near full moon, but at an inn. The Chapter attached to it, called the Chapter of Temperance, meets at the same place. The number of members of the Lodge is small, being only about a dozen, and the Chapter cannot be considerable. In 1857, Bro. Overbury was Worshipful Master; in 1858, Bro. J. W. Hance; and, in 1859, Bro. George Wyman. Although the Lodge is small, it has been conducted with vigour, and its hospitality is freely extended. On 28th April, 1858, the Worshipful Master, Bro. Hance, proposed a plan of giving essays or lectures on Masonry, which he began by an essay, which will be found in the Freemasons' Magazine, vol. iv., p. 851.

The Lodge at Nuneaton is No. 625, and is styled the Abbey Lodge, meeting at a tavern. It was founded in 1836. It is a Lodge with about twenty members. In 1856, Bro. E. Mason was Worshipful Master.

The Lodge at Rugby was only founded in 1844, and meets in a tavern. It is called the Lodge of Rectitude. In 1855, Bro. J. Bromwich, P. Prov. G.S.B., was Worshipful Master; and, in 1856, Bro. Raymond R. Smythies. In those years, the Lodge was actively conducted, and in 1856 six members were initiated, and the Lodge subscribed to the Freemasons' Magazine. The number of members is rather above twenty.

The Stoneleigh Lodge, at Kenilworth, is one of the creations of the new Provincial Grand Master, Lord Leigh. He became the first Worshipful Master for 1857-8, and was succeeded in 1858-9 by Bro. C. W. Elkington, P.G.S.B. and P. Prov. S.G.W. The Lodge was so supported that in 1858 it had already fifty-three members, being, therefore, a first class Lodge in the province. The consecration of this Lodge on the 10th of February, 1858, was naturally an event in the province, and will be found fully recorded in the Freemasons' Magazine, vol. iv., p. 322.

Of late years the province has been successively governed by the R.W. Bro. Earl Ferrers; by the R.W. Bro. Hall when G. Reg.; when R.W. Bro. Earl Howe was appointed Provincial Grand Master. Under his rule were founded the Howe Lodge and Chapter, which have done so much for Masonry in the province. During this time, and for ten years (from 1848 till 1858), the office of Deputy Provincial Grand Master was held by Bro. J. W. Boughton Leigh, and on his retirement, an address was presented to him by the Masons of the province in 1859. Dr. Bell Fletcher, a distinguished Mason, has likewise held this office. On his retirement to assume the Grand Mastership of Leicestershire, the R.W. Bro. Earl Howe's services were recognized by the subscription of a Howe Testimonial Fund, which was devoted to the Masonic charities.

The R.W. Bro. Earl Howe was succeeded in 1856 by the R.W. Bro. Lord Leigh, on the recommendation of the former. He had been initiated in the province in the First Lodge of Light, No. 689, and in which he served the office of Worshipful Master, in commemoration of which he received a Past Master's jewel. During his short rule he has displayed great zeal for his province. In 1858 he had the gratification of adding a new Lodge to Birmingham, and in the same year he consecrated what we may call his own Lodge, at Kenilworth, as just recited. In the present year he has added to the list of Lodges, a few weeks ago, another new one, the Bard of Avon. On the 12th of April, 1859, he laid the first stone of the Leamington Hall Schools, with Masonic ceremonial. Lord Leigh is Grand Master of the Mark Masons of England.

In 1858, the Prov. Grand Lodge was held at Alcester, it being the practice to hold it in inns in the several towns of the province. On the 23rd September, 1856, the R.W. Bro.

Lord Leigh, held the Prov. Grand Lodge at Rugby, Bro. Kettle being Prov. Grand Secretary; and Bro. C. W. Elkington, Prov. Grand Dir. of Cera. At this Grand Lodge it was resolved to form a Provincial Benevolent Fund. On the 28th October, 1857, the R.W. Bro. Lord Leigh held his Prov. Grand Lodge at Nuneaton. Of the proceedings of 1858, we have to record that the Prov. Grand Lodge was held October 13th, and for the first time was able to meet in a Masonic hall, being the noble foundation of the Howe Lodge at Birmingham. At this Grand Lodge, Bro. Chandos Wren Hoskyns, late high sheriff, was appointed Deputy Grand Master, in the place of Bro. Boughton Leigh; and a jewel presented to Bro. Dr. Henry Hopkins, of No. 51. About a hundred brethren sat down at the banquet.

Among the Prov. Senior Grand Wardens of late years have been Bros. Elkington, F. Dee, M. Newton, Kettle, Cohen, J. W. Lloyd, Bingham, Dr. Hopkins, and Blenkinsop. We shall now give a return of the members of the Kenilworth we exclude as exceptional.

From the above figures we arrive at these conclusions—that in a large town one in 1,000 is a low average for the number of Masons, and that in smaller towns it reaches one in 200, which ought to be the number in all towns.

On account of the large share the population of Birmingham forms of the province, we cannot institute a comparison of the present and possible condition of the province as we could desire; but we may observe that, in our opinion, there should be at least four more Lodge towns and a larger number of halls.

The following is the relative position of Warwickshire, as compared with the provinces already recorded :—

After deducting the population of Birmingham, and then placing Warwickshire alongside of districts of corresponding population, we consider this province decidedly backward, and it will require great exertions on the part of Bro. Lord Leigh to bring it to a state of efficiency.

With regard to former records of the province of Warwickshire, we may observe, that in a late number of the "Notes and Queries," it was stated that in 1794 a Prov. Grand Lodge was held, that Bro. James Timmins was D. Prov. G.M.; Bro. B. S. Heaton, S.G.W.; Bro. C. Downs, J.G.W.; Bro. Parker, G. Treasurer; and Bro. James Sketchley, G. Secretary.

In 1793, Bro. James Bisset was Prov. G. Secretary of Warwick, and Steward of St. Alban's Lodge, Birmingham. He wrote a song, "A Mason's life is the life for me."

The Apollo Lodge at Alcester was consecrated on 31st July, 1794.

In 1794, Bro. Toy was Principal of the Royal Arch Chapter of Fortitude, No. 51, at Birmingham, showing the antiquity of the Royal Arch practice there.

Of the old Lodge of St. John's, No. 492, at Henley-in-Arden, Bro. Samuel Porter was a Past Master in the last century, and author of Masonic songs. This Lodge is now extinct.

On the 4th June, 1793, the Shakspeare Lodge, No. 516, was consecrated at Stratford-on-Avon. In the same month of 1859, sixty-six years after, we chronicle the consecration of a new Lodge. Bro. Samuel Porter was first Worshipful Master, and wrote a song; Bro. James Bisset wrote another, worth very little; Bro. James Timmins, the D. Prov. G.M. of Warwickshire, delivered an address.

MASONIC NOTES AND QUERIES.

CEYLON LODGES.

THE Grand Orient of the Netherlands have been more careful of the propagation of the light of Masonry abroad than the Grand Lodge of England. It will be seen how in 1771 the Grand Orient founded one Lodge in Ceylon, and in the next year another; and they had at least four Lodges in Ceylon in the last century.

Such is the Masonic zeal of our worthy Netherlands brethren and kinsmen. What has been the conduct of the Grand Lodge of England? We are ashamed to say that the Grand Lodge of England has not one Lodge in a seaport of Ceylon; and has only one Lodge in the whole of that great island (of the dimensions of Ireland) and with a large population. That Lodge was founded in 1838, years after the conquest, and is called the St. John's Lodge of Colombo, at Kandy, No. 665.

For a miracle, there is no Prov. Grand Master. We do not see why there should not be, and a Prov. Grand Lodge too, although there might be no private Lodg. [The rule of the Grand Master is, not to appoint Prov. G.M.s. without there are three Lodges to rule over, but if there were something in the nature of missionary Prov. G.M.s, like missionary bishops, as in the last century, much good would be done. We are glad we have a Colonial Board, for we can recommend the above facts to their notice.]

CHICHESTER LODGE (Vol. v., p. 1120).

In the Magazine of the 15th inst., under the head of "Masonic Notes and Queries," there appears a statement that the Chichester Lodge of Union, No. 45, is the oldest in the county of Sussex, dating from 1731, and that you consider it entitled to an earlier date from the fact that a Duke of Richmond was W.M. of it in 1697. That this Lodge has been in existence since 1731, I believe there cannot be a doubt, but the Grand Lodge having ignored our application to adopt a centenary jewel, on the grounds of our not being able to show a continuous working during the past one hundred years; therefore, with reference to the statement before alluded to, I shall feel much obliged if you will kindly furnish any information which may assist the Lodge in establishing its claim to that which it conceives to be a right.—SEC. NO. 45. [We cannot give our brother any further information than the fact recorded in the common Masonic histories, but we have no doubt that No. 45 is the Lodge dating from 1697.]

MASONIC ANTIQUITIES (Vol. v., pp. 791, 891).

Our correspondent "R. E. X." has furnished us with the page of MS. from which he was led to state that Freemasonry was proscribed in 1461, and also in 1561. This MS. is of no value in reference to that statement, but it is one of considerable interest. It consists of pages 87 and 88 of a Lodge minute book or rough minute book of the year 1742, as the paper and writing show. There are other pages in the possession of the widow of an uninitiated lewis. There cannot be much doubt that it is one of the numerous records which have wandered from their proper custody, and Bro. "R. E. X." will do great service in reclaiming it. Were the hall plan carried out, and an effective library and museum formed, many of these documents would be recovered and their safe keeping provided for.

Our brother says, "You wished to see the MS. alluded to at p. 791, Freemasons' Magazine; I now send it, but hoped to have obtained a few more of the pages which are I believe in existence, in the possession of the widow of an uninitiated lewis. It appears I was incorrect in assuming that Masonic institutions were proscribed in 1425 and 1561. Bro. Hadley (p. 891) is entitled to my best thanks for his elucidation of the contents of the MSS.—R. E. X."

The minute appears to be kept by Richard Lechmere, whom we presume to have been the Secretary. It states that "At a full meeting of the Lodge held at the hostelry on the Monday, being the third day of the month of May, in the year 1742, and in the fifteenth year of the present reign" [of George 2nd], "a question was raised by Bro. Staniforth, whether Freemasonry was illegal on the ground of the alleged statute of 1425, &c. It was referred to Bro. Staniforth, Bro. Eldridge, and the Wardens to enquire into the law. Nathaniel Sparks was ordered to be paid 8s. 2d., as per bill, and 1s. 4d. for repairs to the Lodge lighting; and Richard Wood, 28s. 2d. for food for the brethren."

It is desirable to ascertain what Lodge this was, by means of the names of Lechmere, Staniforth, and Edrige. We believe these are Shropshire or Staffordshire names. Richard Wood is evidently the name of the keeper of the tavern where they met in 1742. The day of meeting was the first Monday.

The names are not southern names, but midland or northern.

The funds in hand, after paying Sparks and Wood, were £35 18s. 2d., so that the Lodge must have been in good condition.

POOLE LODGE.

Lodge of Amity, No. 160, Poole. Warrant granted 1st April, 1765. Signed John Salter, D.G.M. Chapter of Amity. Warrant signed 26th June, 5784. Thomas Dunkerly, Grand Superintendent for the West of England. In a late number of the Magazine, you will find, among other Lodges, there has been no return from the Sherborne Lodge for several years, and the Lodge at Blandford has not met for many years.—P.M., No. 160.

BIDEFORD LODGE.

Some years since I purchased an old copy of the Constitutions, by Dr. Anderson—a quarto edition, revised by John Entick, M.A., and published 1756. On the fly leaf, written in a bold hand, are these words—"This book belongs to the Faithful Lodge, No. 499, at Bideford, Devon."—J. R. STEBBING, P.M.

BIDEFORD LODGE (Vol. v., p. 922).

There is a memoir of Bro. James Watkins, LL.D., in the Freemasons' Magazine for 1794, p. 167. He was an author of some reputation in his day. Bro. Watkins was the founder of the Bideford Lodge, and it most likely dwindled after his death.

He was engaged in researches in Masonic history, but I am unaware whether his MSS. were completed or published.

HYDE CLARKE.

LODGE AT BIDEFORD, DEVONSHIRE.—(Vol. v. p. 922.)

A volume of miscellaneous Masonic MSS., in the writer's possession, contains a copy of the charge delivered by "John Watkins, LL.D., and R.W.M.," on the anniversary of St. John the Evangelist, 1792, referred to in a former number of the Freemasons' Magazine, from which it appears that the old Lodge in that town was named "The Faithful Lodge," and that its number on the register was 499.

The same volume contains, among other contemporary MSS., a copy of "The Prayer of Consecration performed at constituting the Faithful Lodge, No. 499, at Bideford, Devonshire, 23rd May, A.L., 5792."—WM. KELLY, D. Prov. G.M., Leicestershire.

REASONS FOR SILENCE.—Some one asked Fontaine, the celebrated geometer what he did in society, since he generally remained almost perfectly silent. "I study," replied he, "the vanity of men, in order to mortify it occasionally."

CORRESPONDENCE.

[THE EDITOR does not hold himself responsible for any opinions entertained by Correspondents.]

BRO. BINCKES'S FAREWELL.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE FREEMASONS' MAGAZINE AND MASONIC MIRROR.

SIR AND BROTHER,—So thoroughly and determinedly disingenuous is the treatment to which all who venture to differ from you and your august patrons are subjected, that I shall decline to employ either reason or argument in contravention of the malicious insinuations and malignant criticisms which form the staple of your two last numbers. The powers of the most acute logician avail nothing with those who stubbornly disregard proof and demonstration, and certainly in my weak hands such simple weapons as truth and fact are as nought when contending against arrogance and power.

I will admit, if you like, that by taking a prominent part in recent discussions, and by trespassing upon your columns from time to time with my "worthless lucubrations," I have rendered myself amenable to, if I have not invited, criticism and remark. "Those who play at bowls, must expect rubbers," and I should not for one moment complain if I had met with anything like fair play or common candour. In place of this, however, what is the course you have for some time past systematically adopted? I repeat, in spite of your disclaimer and that of "Your Reporter," whose contemptible effusion I dismiss altogether from further notice, as ere he penned it he must have partaken largely "of the insane root that takes the reason prisoner"—that you have wilfully perverted my meaning—that you have constantly attributed to me motives and intentions which never entered my mind—that you have endeavoured now and again to make me the butt of your harmless pleasantry and innocuous ridicule—that you have, whether intentionally or not I forbear to express an opinion, given unfair and partial reports of what I have said—that many things have been attributed to me which I never did say—that you have thought proper to denounce and abuse me in the most unmeasured terms, for simply wishing to set myself right when I have been misrepresented—and, in short, that you have in every respect acted as the unscrupulous agent of a powerful and unscrupulous "party"—and all this while professing to be governed by the principles of charity and brotherly love. Unfortunately my name has appeared too often in your pages; but it has been, because, while unable to keep silence under the continued provocation offered to that "party" (if you will have it so), of which I am a member, I could not "stab men i' the dark," nor coward-like shield myself under the refuge of an anonymer. I will, however, promise you one thing, and that is, that so long as matters remain as they are, my name shall be struck out of the list of your correspondents, and that if you have the honesty to insert this personal defence, and choose therefore to inflict a chastisement more severe than any preceding one, I will not retaliate. Briefly, then—thus to avoid misunderstanding, or the imputation that I have shirked any questions at issue between us—I have not a single assertion to withdraw, or one statement to qualify.

Well, indeed, may you wish to draw a veil over the latter portion of the proceedings of the Special Grand Lodge of 23rd ult. Rarely, indeed, has such an exhibition of petulance, ill-regulated temper, and offensive demeanour, been witnessed in Grand Lodge as that afforded by Bro. Havers on the occasion in question. What would have been the fate, under similar circumstances, of any member of the newly-denominated "Club party," one shudders to imagine. I suppose, however, that what in a cherished member of the executive is "but a choleric word," is in one of the obnoxious "faction," "downright blasphemy." Then, again, how pitiful were the accents in which the President of the Board of General Purposes narrated the martyrdom he had undergone, "I have been vilified, written against, spoken against," &c., &c. as if he had never himself meted out similar measure to others. Let your own pages bear witness to the systematic persecution with which Bro. Havers, in season and out of season, has visited all those who by opposing his policy have earned for themselves the title of "factious."

Without wishing exactly to apply the quotation, I could not help, while listening, being forcibly reminded of a quasi illustrious potentate, who is represented as taking a part in a somewhat important debate:—

"On the other side uprose — in act graceful and humane.

he seemed
In dignity composed and high exploit;
But all was false and hollow: tho' his tongue
Dropt manna, and could make the worse appear
The better reason, to perplex and dark
Maturest counsels;"

Suffer me to conclude with a quotation or two from a popular author, which appearing in the first number of your new, and I hope reformed, series, may afford some consolation to earnest, conscientious, and well-abused men:—

"It is a rare instance of virtue to despise censure which we do not deserve; and still more rare to despise praise, which we do."

"In the tortuous and crooked policy of public affairs, as well as in the less extensive, but perhaps more intricate labyrinth of private concerns there are two evils, which must continue to be as remediless as they are unfortunate; they have no end, and their only palliatives are diffidence and time. They are these—The most candid and enlightened must give their assent to a probable falsehood, rather than to an improbable truth; and their esteem to those who have a reputation in preference to those who only deserve it."

Recent events notwithstanding, I have to thank you for some courtesies in times past, which I now beg gratefully to acknowledge. And so I bid you heartily farewell,

I am, Sir and Brother, yours fraternally,
London, July 2nd, 1859. FREDK. BINCKES.

[We do not wish to quarrel with Bro. Binckes, but we might take exception to such terms as "malicious insinuations," "malignant criticisms," "unscrupulous agent," &c., &c., being used by one who takes us to task for want of brotherly love; but as irate brothers cannot help being abusive, we let it pass. There is one remark, however, which we must make; in our Number of the 22nd June, Bro. Binckes accused us of misreporting a certain speech of his, and he now repeats the charge. We have, since he first made the charge, had the opportunity of reading a report of Bro. Binckes's speech in the publication with which it is well known that he is connected; and we find that report corresponds, word for word, with that which we published. Surely if we were in error Bro. Binckes might have corrected his speech before allowing it to be republished in a journal of which he is acknowledged to be one of the conductors. We would also remind Bro. Binckes that in speaking of his "lucubrations," we did not prefix the adjective.—ED.]

FREEMASONRY AND ODD FELLOWSHIP.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE FREEMASONS' MAGAZINE AND MASONIC MIRROR.

DEAR SIR AND BROTHER,—I have this moment seen in your number of yesterday, the remarks in your Architectural Chapter in reply to Bro. Tweddell's letter, and further holding up to reprobation the conduct of those Leicester Freemasons who, as such, accepted an invitation to dine at the recent annual meeting of the Manchester Unity of Odd Fellows. Although I perceive that you have in your hands for publication a letter from Bro. Clephan, in reply to your former strictures on this subject, I cannot allow the departure of a single post without troubling you with a few remarks, and stating that the reprobation of the fraternity, if such be deserved, must fall upon myself and the Worshipful Master and brethren of St. John's Lodge, No. 348, as well as upon Bro. Clephan and the John of Gaunt Lodge; for, if guilt there be, we are all equally criminal. Indeed, Bro. Editor, I may be said to be "the very head and front of the offence," for, not only did I, like other members of the Order, accept this invitation, but it devolved on me officially to return thanks for the toast of "The Right Hon. Earl Howe, Prov. Grand Master, and the honourable Order of Freemasons."

If the censure you have passed upon us be deserved, we must bow to it and bear it with the best grace we can; but I conceive you have looked at the affair from a wrong point of view; at all events you have given a colouring to it very different to that in which it appeared to the Leicester brethren.

The facts of the case are simply these:—

upon the Worshipful Masters of St. John's and the John of Gaunt Lodges and myself, and letters were subsequently addressed by the Secretary of the district to the two Lodges, inviting the members, in most complimentary and respectful terms, to honour the annual banquet of the Moveable Committee of the Manchester Unity of Odd Fellows with their presence; and setting forth the extensive operations of their society, and the large amount of good done by it among the working classes, but not in any way claiming connection or affinity with the Masonic Order.

A similar invitation was given to the mayor and corporation of the borough, by whom it was accepted; and the mayor, some of the magistrates, and the greater portion of the town council, were present at the banquet, which was attended by upwards of a thousand Odd Fellows.

Now, sir, if the Leicester Masons had been guilty (to use your own words) "of appearing in such capacity at any dinner, procession, or meeting of Odd Fellows, or in company or co-operation with them, or responding to any toast" of a Masonic character, clothed in the badges of the Order, the provincial authorities and the brethren generally would have been justly amenable to censure and punishment. But I conceive, and I think every candid and unprejudiced person will admit, that it would have been an extremely ungracious act on the part of the local Masonic Lodges, and one quite contrary to the true spirit and principles of Freemasonry, if, through a narrow spirit of exclusiveness, they had refused to accept a polite and most respectful invitation, which was extended to them as an important public body, in company, and in company solely, with the municipal authorities of the town; and simply because it was possible that some of the popular world might ignorantly suppose "that Masonry and Odd Fellowship are identical, or, at least, that the forms, ceremonies, and regalia of Odd Fellowship are of equal value with those of Freemasonry."

Surely, Masonry need not fear comparison with Odd Fellowship or any other benefit society; but if so—I can only say—so much the worse for it and the practices of its members. I, for one, however, believe that the Order can afford to stand upon its own merits.

In accepting this invitation (clothed in ordinary costume) the Freemasons, as I conceive, were no more chargeable with debasing their Order to a level with Odd Fellowship or mock Masonry than could the mayor, and town council be chargeable with putting municipal institutions on a level with the institution of the Manchester Unity. It may, however, tend to allay the fears and satisfy the scruples of the writer of your "Architectural Chapter" to be informed, that the gentleman who proposed the toast above alluded to (Mr. Hardwick, the delegate from Preston, who stated that he and many others of the delegates were Freemasons), drew the distinction between Masonry and Odd Fellowship; stating, however, that Odd Fellowship might be termed the Freemasonry of the working classes. And in the very few remarks which I addressed to the meeting in acknowledging the toast, I took especial care to prevent any misunderstanding on the subject, by observing that the only similarity between Odd Fellowship and Freemasonry was, that both were founded on a philanthropic basis; that there was no connection between them, but that they differed widely in constitution and practice.

With these remarks I will take leave of the subject, and remain,

Dear Sir and Brother, yours fraternally,

WILLIAM KELLY,

Leicester, June 23rd, 1859. D. Prov. G.M. for Leicestershire.

P.S.—I may add that neither I, nor as far as I am aware, any member of either of the local Lodges, with the exception of Bro. the Earl Howe, Prov. G.M., is an Odd Fellow.

THE JOHN OF GAUNT LODGE AND THE ODD FELLOWS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE FREEMASONS' MAGAZINE AND MASONIC MIRROR.

DEAR SIR AND BROTHER,—In the "Architectural Chapter" of your valuable Magazine of the 8th June, you say—

"We cannot equally approve a resolution of that Lodge (the John of Gaunt), accepting an invitation for the Master and brethren to dine with the annual congress of the United Order of Odd Fellows. This countenance of mock Masonry by the constituted authorities of Masonry, is only calculated to confirm the public in the belief that there is no difference between them."

Many of our Masonic friends at a distance from Leicester—reading the above observations—might be led to suppose that the brethren here are not so watchful of the privileges and honour of our ancient Order as they ought to be. It is with the intention of removing any such unfavourable impression, that I venture to trouble you with some of the reasons that induced the Masonic Lodges here to accept the invitation of the members of the Manchester Unity of Odd Fellows.

You are doubtless aware that the delegates of that Order hold a meeting at some important place in the country once a year; the delegates sit at this congress every day for a week, to receive reports from their various districts, and to settle their general and local business. At the same time they have their annual banquet. It is their usual custom to invite the corporation of the town where they meet, and the members of other important societies. They invited the Masonic body here, not because they considered themselves an offshoot from it, but because the objects of both societies, though differently carried out, are identical. The invitation to the John of Gaunt Lodge distinctly states this. The secretary of the order here says:—

"Relying upon your courtesy and your desire to countenance every object which has for its aim the consolidation of brotherly love and the furtherance of the interests of our fellows, it is with considerable confidence that I venture to address you as secretary of the Leicester District of the Manchester Unity of Odd Fellows. I am desired respectfully to inform your honourable Lodge that the great annual meeting of the delegates of our Unity is fixed for Tuesday in Whitsun week. Our members number nearly 300,000, 2,000 of whom belong to this district; and the order is admitted by those most competent to form an opinion, to be based upon principles of stability; and the amount of charity dispensed, and suffering ameliorated, is incalculable. Lord Howe, a member of the order, has reluctantly declined presiding at the banquet in consequence of indisposition, but his Lordship has considerably written to Lord Curzon, who we have every reason to believe will take the chair."

You will see, from the above, also, that it would have been an act of discourtesy on the part of the brethren of the John of Gaunt Lodge, all other reasons apart, to have refused an invitation to dine at the banquet of an order, of which their Prov. Grand Master is a member, and where he might be expected to preside.

Apart from personal considerations, the order has a strong claim for sympathy and countenance from every well regulated society. We are told that it numbers 300,000 members, in above 3,000 Lodges; and that the amount received and disbursed for purposes of charity every year is very considerable; and that its members are amongst the best conducted and respectable of the working classes.

The public, I have reason to believe, do not identify the Odd Fellows with the Freemasons. If any comparison is made by the public between the two societies, I am afraid that it is at times somewhat to our disparagement, so far as public usefulness and active charity are concerned. It is well known, and generally understood by intelligent persons, that Masonic Lodges are composed of men of the middle and upper ranks of life, to whom benefit societies and burial clubs would be of no assistance; whose traditions and ceremonies are of remote dates; and whose principles are those of brotherly love, relief, and truth. With those ceremonies unsullied, and those principles held steadfastly, the Masonic body need fear no alarm, if the Odd Fellows or any other society occasionally display a slight imitation of the symbolism of their order. We can afford to smile at such innocent imitations and, at the same time, to sympathize with all such societies, having for their rule of conduct the moral and charitable principles that we profess.

I remain, dear Sir and Brother,

Yours respectfully and fraternally,

Leicester, June 17th, 1859.

E. CLEPHAN, W.M., No. 766.

ODD FELLOWSHIP.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE FREEMASONS' MAGAZINE AND MASONIC MIRROR.

DEAR SIR AND BROTHER,—I have read "Our Architectural Chapter" in your last number with much interest. I can assure you that I was not "angry" so much as pained, at the unqualified censure previously cast on such societies as the Odd Fellows; and I feel certain that had you seen me as I wrote the letter, you would rather have described me, as Horatio does the ghost of Hamlet's father, as having "A countenance more in sorrow than in anger." Believing, as a literary friend of mine well expresses it, that "Hate is a fearful thing—a deadly weapon to handle," I would fain "bury it with the Indian tomahawk, and smoke the pipe of peace in the great wigwam of the world." Had our worthy brother qualified his sweeping censures on former occasions, by bearing his generous testimony to the great good done by Odd Fellows, Foresters, Druids, &c., as benefit societies, I for one might have allowed him to tilt as he thought proper at whatever he might conceive to bear the slightest appearance of mock Masonry; though I confess that I cannot see why I should be considered to approve of every society that may take part in a public procession in which I may form a unit. I believe that it would be bad in principle and bad in policy to refuse, as Freemasons, to form part of a public procession at laying the foundation stone of an infirmary, or of a town hall, simply because the Odd Fellows, the Foresters, and other well organized benevolent benefit societies are to form part of the company. These various Orders always allow the Freemasons the undisputed privilege of laying the stone, as well as the most honourable place in the procession, and if we, as Freemasons, are not content with this pre-eminence, we shall richly deserve the fate that will await us,—that of not being allowed the honour of laying the foundation stone with Masonic ceremonies. In fact, my own opinion is, Sir, that if we really wish to retain this honourable office, our Lodges must be made, as they evidently were of old, schools for the cultivation not only of brotherly love, but also of the liberal arts and sciences, and especially that of architecture. The generous tribute of esteem for the Manchester Unity of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows as a well conducted benefit society, given in your last issue, has very materially narrowed the grounds of difference between us. But if our worthy brother thinks that "it is not our business to inform Bro. Tweddell of the reason why Odd Fellowship is enrolled among the mock Masonic societies, nor is he obliged to know;" I think every intelligent reader of the Magazine, whether he belongs to the Craft or not, will at once acquit me of blame if I throw up my brief; as it is impossible for me properly to answer assertions which are made without proof. Before I enter on the defence, I must hear the evidence for the prosecution.

At some future time, if the G.A.O.T.U. spares me, I may accept the invitation given me, I believe in the true fraternal spirit, to "study the history" of the various societies mentioned at page 1153, and to give to the pages of the Freemasons' Magazine the result of my labours." It is a subject in which I have from boyhood taken an interest; but I am sorry to say that before I trouble you with formal essays thereon I must have access to better materials than I have hitherto been able to meet with. Perhaps I shall be better able to furnish you with short historical notices of such Lodges of the Craft in the northern counties as will allow me to search their records, or supply me with any information for the purpose. The information thus collected and preserved in your pages would be of immense value hereafter to the historian of the Order.

In reply to the remark that I have put myself "in the attitude of a champion of Odd Fellowship rather than of Masonry," I will only say, that I shall ever hold myself ready, on all fitting occasions, to use those "literary attainments," for which you have been kind enough to give me credit, for the defence of Freemasonry wherever, whenever, or by whomsoever it may be attacked, and I will do it "with all my heart, with all my mind, with all my soul, and with all my strength." I am happy to say, that though I have conversed with thousands of Odd Fellows and Foresters in the counties of Northumberland, Durham, Yorkshire, and Lancashire, I never heard one of them speak disparagingly of our beloved Craft. They have unfortunately too often imitated the Freemasons in the truly unmasonic practice of holding their meetings at public houses; a practice which they have many of them got rid of by meeting in schoolrooms—a practice which we, I trust, will get rid of by having, in every town in England, our own Masonic Hall. I know not what is meant, sir, by the remark applied to me by our worthy brother—"nor will he do himself any good by his attack on our Architectural Chapter." In furthering what I regard to be the legitimate object of the Magazine, that of giving faithful reports of what our powerful brotherhood is now doing, and in showing them how trifling it is compared with the immense good we might accomplish—humble though I am—yea, one of the poorest "brethren of the mystic tie"—you have no more devoted a fellow labourer than myself. But, when I think of the immense amount of human suffering in the world, I am unwilling for different men labouring for one common end—the happiness of their race—to waste their time in marring each others efforts, instead of each doing his allotted task. Believe me, sir, there is work enough for us all, and it will be much better for us to prove the superiority of Freemasonry over all other organizations by doing it faithfully, than by calling the "outer world" profane, and sneering at other orders whose good deeds are indisputable.

Had my friendly challenge been accepted, I think that I could have satisfactorily proved, that the Order of Odd Fellows who so courteously invited the Freemasons of Leicester to their banquet, have no more connection with the convivial societies of "mock Masons" of the last century, than our beloved Craft has with the Vehm or the Illuminati.

In conclusion allow me to observe, that though I would not for a moment compare Odd Fellowship and Freemasonry, there is one thing in which my brother Oddfellows put my brother Freemasons to shame; it is the manner in which they spend their Lodge funds, seven eighths of which are kept sacred for the sick and funeral gifts, and the other eighth for rent of Lodge-rooms, secretaries' salaries, and all the incidental expenses of the Order. Not one penny is spent in refreshment of any sort. I hope the day will come when our Craft will apply its funds, not as a benefit club, but one half to the charities, and the other for building Masonic Halls, forming libraries, and in various ways instructing the brotherhood, not only in our beautiful system of morality, but also in the hidden mysteries of nature and science.

Trusting that there is nothing in this epistle to cause unnecessary annoyance to any one, and freely giving credit to the writer of "Our Architectural Chapter" for those good motives which he is charitable enough to grant to me,

I remain, Dear Sir and Brother, yours fraternally,

GEORGE MARKHAM TWEDDELL.

"MASONIC MISSIONS."

TO THE EDITOR OF THE FREEMASONS' MAGAZINE AND MASONIC MIRROR.

DEAR SIR AND BROTHER,—I cannot allow some observations contained in your article on "Masonic Missions," in the Magazine of the 1st of June instant, and referring to the Howard Lodge, No. 64, at Arundel, in Sussex, to pass entirely without observation; and I will therefore shortly state the efforts which have been made by the brethren of the province to effect its resuscitation.

In the year 1857, assisted by other members of my Lodge, I made close inquiries amongst the old remaining members of the Howard Lodge, to ascertain the precise position in which that Lodge was placed with regard to Grand Lodge; and I found that although no return of the members had been made to Grand Lodge since March, 1836, the number still remained in the Calendar; and the existence of the Lodge was recognized by the quarterly communication of Grand Lodge being regularly transmitted to it. This gave me hope, and I wrote in consequence to the present Grand Secretary on the subject, and received a reply from him, dated the 28th of November, 1857, in which he says, "Should there be any of the original members still alive, who have possession of the warrant, they might possibly be permitted to revive the Lodge, by paying their quarterage to benevolence from the time of the last payment, in 1836, to the present time; but in case none of the original members are to be found, the warrant cannot be made over to any fresh body of Masons."

This again gave me encouragement; and I easily made arrangements that the arrears due to the fund of benevolence should be paid.

I again communicated with the Grand Secretary; and in a letter received from him, dated the 22nd of December, 1857, he says, "Should the brethren who still consider themselves members of the Lodge, and in whose hands, I presume, the warrant remains, think fit to draw up a memorial to the M.W. Grand Master, giving their reasons for having during twenty-one years disregarded the laws of Grand Lodge, and further, stating fully their motive for now, at an advanced age of life, seeking to revive the Lodge, I shall of course submit the same to the consideration of the Grand Master."

There probably would have been no difficulty in assigning cause satisfactory to the M.W. Grand Master for the want of energy which had been shown for so many years in keeping alive the light of Masonry in the Howard Lodge; inasmuch as the whole Masonic structure of the province had for very many years been allowed to fall to decay, in consequence of the cessation of the holding a Provincial Grand Lodge for twenty-seven years, and other obvious consequences; and Masonry had fallen to the lowest ebb.

The revival of the Provincial Grand Lodge, and the praiseworthy exertions of individual brethren, have, I am happy to say, raised Masonry to a height of prosperity in the province of Sussex which it has scarcely attained before; and the old members of the Howard Lodge, warmed by the zeal which they saw spreading around them, were roused, like the old war-horse at the sound of the trumpet, and were desirous to take a part in the good work which was progressing. This was the reason why, in their old age, they were desirous to see the Lodge (to which one of them had been attached for upwards of fifty years, and others for considerable periods), rise from its ashes; and it is a cause of the deepest regret to me, as it must be to all true Masons, that their wishes and hopes were not gratified.

The reason why all our endeavours failed was, that the warrant was not forthcoming. I at once had an interview with Bro. Wilson, P.M., a Past Grand Officer of the province, and a member of the Howard Lodge for fifty years and upwards, and he informed me that he had never within his recollection seen a warrant, and that he had always understood that as the Howard Lodge worked under a warrant granted by the Athol Grand Lodge before the amalgamation of that Grand Lodge with the present Grand Lodge, no written warrant had ever been furnished. Whether our Bro. Wilson is right in the conclusion to which he came, I cannot say; but it is notorious that the proceedings of the Athol Grand Lodge were carried on in a very loose and unbusinesslike manner, inasmuch as they were unable at the junction of the two Grand Lodges to furnish the dates of the origin of the Lodges who worked under their warrants.

On discovering that the warrant of the Lodge was not to be found, I again wrote to the Grand Secretary, and in his reply he says, "that the absence of the warrant will unquestionably be an insuperable bar to the revival of the Lodge."

My exertions were stopped by this "insuperable bar;" and with the greatest regret to myself and the brethren who were willing to assist me in my endeavours, we were compelled to give up our much cherished hopes. I could not but regret that the absence of the piece of parchment, on which the warrant (if a warrant ever existed) was written should be an "insuperable bar" to raising an old and honoured Lodge from its ashes. Its existence and number are recognized by Grand Lodge up to the present moment: no doubt exists in the mind of Grand Lodge, or of any other person, that the Howard Lodge of Brotherly Love was well and justly entitled to the number attached to it in the Calendar when it assumed that number. There are many brethren, not only of my own Lodge, but of the Mariners' Lodge at Littlehampton, and other Lodges, who are anxious to share in the glory of raising to prosperity the (except two) oldest Lodge in the province, and yet we are prevented from accomplishing our end (of which there would be no chance of failure), by the absence of what, as far as our best information goes, never existed.

If any brother who has the interest of Masonry at heart can suggest to me, either directly or through your columns, any means of obviating the difficulty, and at the same time preserving the original number of the Lodge, you will not again, in the columns of your journal, have to call the attention of the Masons of Sussex to the necessity of taking steps to revive the Howard Lodge of Brotherly Love, No. 64.

With many apologies to you, sir, for having trespassed at so great a length on your valuable columns,

I am, dear Sir and Brother, yours faithfully and fraternally,

JAMES POWELL, JUN.,

P.M., No. 45, Prov. J.G.W. for Sussex.

West Pallant, Chichester,
June 20th, 1859.

[We should not consider the mere absence of the warrant as an "insuperable bar" to the revival of the Lodge, as a warrant of confirmation might be applied for. There, however, may be other circumstances connected with the case which may have led to the decision of the Grand Secretary, and upon which we cannot give an opinion without having the whole of the correspondence before us.—Ed.]

"JUSTITIA" AND BRO. GARROD.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE FREEMASONS' MAGAZINE AND MASONIC MIRROR.

DEAR SIR AND BROTHER,—I beg to disclaim any intention of wishing "Justitia" to throw off his disguise, and state his name—that being well known to me already.

I have also yet to learn, that a letter with the signature attached would cause you to lie open to such censure as you mention, or in any way render you liable to be trounced for libel.

The truth is, the facts were unpalatable (for that facts they were you have yourself acknowledged in your last number), and hence the propriety of withholding the insertion of them.

I am sorry to find that the general report of your want of impartiality has been confirmed in the short acquaintance had with your Magazine, by,

Dear Sir, yours fraternally,

London, July 4th, 1859.

H. GARROD, No. 11.

[We do not believe that Bro. Garrod knows the real name of "Justitia." The knowledge our correspondent has of the law of libel is sufficient, of itself, to stamp the value of his opinion as to our impartiality.—Ed.]

THE MASONIC MIRROR.

MASONIC MEMS.

FREEMASONRY appears to be making rapid progress amongst our brethren in Victoria. A private letter from Melbourne, dated April 5th, says:—"Since the appointment of a Prov. Grand Master for Victoria, we have opened seventeen new Lodges, making now twenty-nine in this province, and a dispensation has been granted for another, which I expect will be opened during the present month."

THE Prov. Grand Lodge of Cumberland is appointed to be held at Maryport, on July 27th, in order to give a flip to the Lodge of Perseverance, No. 508, which has just begun to show signs of renewed vitality, after lying almost dormant for some years.

A Prov. Grand Lodge for Somersetshire is to be held at Glastonbury on the 26th inst., when the Pilgrim Lodge, No. 1,076, for which a warrant has just been granted, will, we presume, be consecrated.

THE Prov. Grand Lodge for Hampshire will be held at Southampton on the 19th inst.

WARRANTS have been granted for the following new Lodges:—

Southern Cross (No. 1095), Tarrangower, Victoria.

METROPOLITAN.

GLOBE LODGE (No. 23).—This Red Apron Lodge held an emergency meeting on Monday last, at the Freemasons' Tavern, for the purpose of initiating Mr. Mander, who is about to proceed to the Cape of Good Hope. Present—Bros. Haig, W.M.; Collins, S.W.; T. A. Adams, J.W.; and a full meeting of brethren. The ceremony having been gone through with the W.M.'s accustomed ability, the Lodge was closed at two o'clock, P.M., when the members and visitors, thirty-five in number, adjourned to the Crystal Palace to celebrate the summer dinner, which was exceedingly well supplied by Bro. Strange. The day was one of perfect enjoyment; and we must particularly notice the re-appearance of Benjamin Webster on the Masonic stage who, on responding to his health, reminded the brethren, that though absent, he had not been altogether unmindful of his Masonic duties; in fact "he had of late been very extensively engaged in operative Masonry, and he had already very good evidence that it would prove more than speculative."

LODGE OF PRUDENT BRETHREN (No. 169).—The brethren held a Lodge of emergency, on Tuesday last, July 5th, when Bro. Wm. Exall was raised to the third degree, as was also Bro. Ashton, of the Crystal Palace Lodge. Mr. John Pullen and Mr. Wm. Jeffreys Pegus were initiated into the Order.

MOIRA LODGE (No. 109).—This Lodge gave a grand entertainment to their members, visitors, and the families of their members, on Tuesday, the 20th ult., at the London Tavern, the whole of the grand apartments of which were retained for the occasion. The hall was laid out for the banquet with gold candelabra and salvers, and the rest of the service of silver, having a magnificent effect, which was the more appreciated from the taste and comfort which attended all the arrangements. There were very few dishes on the tables, which were arranged in a horse shoe form, and there was abundant room for the ladies and other guests; the carving was well managed on the side tables, and there was an ample provision of waiters. The bill of fare was carried out so as to do justice to the orders of the Lodge and to reflect full credit on Messrs. Chater and Funge, who were, by many of the brethren present, considered to have succeeded in arranging one of the finest entertainments of the season. The musical arrangements of the banquet were conducted by Bro. Lawler. The chair was taken by Bro. S. N. Driver, W.M., Bro. A. Sargood being S.W., and Bro. G. W. K. Potter, P.S.G.D., acting as J.W. A-ladies were present, the usual Masonic ceremonial was avoided, and the toasts received in the ordinary way. In proposing the D.G.M., Lord Panmure, and the Grand Officers, the Worshipful Master mentioned that the Lodge was proud of having two highly valued Grand Officers among its members, Bro. G. W. K. Potter and Bro. Slight. Bro. Crohn, Secretary for German Correspondence, returned thanks for this toast. The Worshipful Master in giving "The Past Masters," referred to the services they had received from Bro. Webster and others, but in calling on Bro. Potter to return thanks for the P.M.s, he took the opportunity of paying a tribute to the high Masonic character of that brother, his signal benevolence, the deep interest he had shown in the welfare of their Lodge, and the service he had rendered in preparing the festival, the arrangements of which had been marked by every provision for taste and comfort. To this toast Bro. Potter responded. Bro. Webster gave "The health of the Worshipful Master." Bro. Sargood said they had among their visitors some brethren most distinguished for their attainments as Masons, and named Bro. Crohn and Bro. Hyde Clarke, calling upon them to drink the health of the visitors with that of the latter brother. Bro. Clarke, in returning thanks, gave some information respecting Lodges of adoption on the continent, the celebration of the festival of St. John's day by the wives, daughters and sisters of brethren, and the practice of adopting the orphans and other children of brethren. He concluded by addressing a few remarks to a youth who was seated at the table, and who had distinguished himself at a public school, impressing upon him that as the son of a Mason he would, if he persevered in the pursuit of knowledge and of virtue, be privileged to be received in the great brotherhood of Masonry before strangers. The company adjourned from the banquet to the suite of rooms on the main floor of the London Tavern, which were arranged to form a drawing room, concert room, and refreshment room, and where a further number of members and ladies and some few non-masonic friends assembled. Here again the care of Bro. Potter was recognized. Each lady, on entering, was presented with a bouquet. The grand room was provided with tables, on which were placed stereoscopes and various objects of interest contributed by Messrs. Negretti and Zambra, and where a concert was given, in which numerous English and foreign musicians took part, and which was continued to a late hour. While the main object of the members was to give the ladies a handsome reception, the arrangements were well calculated to impress strangers present with a favourable conviction of the externals of Masonry in its intellectual and social relations.

TEMPLE LODGE (No. 118).—The summer dinner took place on the 29th, at the Royal Pavilion Hotel, North Woolwich. Bro. Scott, P.M., took the chair, and Bro. Farthing, J.W., the vice; the usual Masonic toasts were duly given and responded to, including the officers of the Lodge, the flatter toast being responded to by Bro. Beard, Honorary Secretary. Some excellent singing by Bros. Mackney, Grover, and Farthing, considerably enhanced the pleasures of the meeting.

FLORENCE NIGHTINGALE LODGE (No. 1008).—The annual meeting was held on Thursday, June 23rd, at the Freemasons' Tavern, Woolwich. Bro. Major Henry Clerk, W.M., presided; and after the confirmation of the minutes of the preceding Lodge, when the W.M. and Treasurer for the year ensuing were elected, Bro. Capt. Forbes, P.M., presented Bro. J. W. Cann, the W.M. elect, for installation, to Bro. Clerk, who discharged that duty with his accustomed ability, performing the entire ceremonial, and delivering the addresses in a manner that reflected the highest credit on his diligence. The W.M. then appointed and invested as his officers—Bros. W. H. Carter, S.W.; Major F. Du Cane, J.W.; J. M. Boldy, Secretary; J. Smyth, S.D.; H. Church, J.D.; J. R. Thomson, I.G. Bro. Peter Laird, who had been re-elected Treasurer; and Bro. Henderson, Tyler, were also invested. There being no other business, the Lodge was duly closed. After drinking the toasts of "The Queen;" and "The Grand Master," the W.M. in proposing "The health of the Deputy Grand Master and the rest of the Grand Officers," coupled with it the health of Bro. Hinxman, as a Past Grand Steward. Bro. Hinxman, after referring to the services of Lord Panmure and the other Grand Officers, said he now appeared as a visitor, feeling that in the present official state of the Lodge, there was no imperative want of his services. He had assisted in the formation of the Lodge, and had continued his membership as long as he considered he could be useful to them; but the claims of his profession demanded more of his time, and he could only say, should the Florence Nightingale at any future time require his services, he should most readily reunite himself with the Lodge. Bro. Clerk then proposed the health of the W.M., and expressed the pleasure he felt on resigning the gavel into the hands of a brother so capable of sustaining the prestige of the Florence Nightingale Lodge. The W.M. briefly acknowledged the compliment, and said he hoped, by diligence and attention, to merit the honours the brethren had conferred upon him in electing him to preside over them. The W.M. then proposed "The Visitors," which was responded to by Bro. Hinxman. To the health of "The Past Masters," Bro. Major Clerk replied, and referred the resolution the Lodge had come to in transacting their Masonic business at a place apart from the tavern, which plan it was hoped would be adopted by the other Masonic bodies in Woolwich. The banquets would continue to be held at Bro. De Grey's, as now. In conclusion Bro. Clerk tendered his thanks to all the officers who had acted with him during the period he had the happiness of presiding as W.M., whose active co-operation was his success. The W.M., in proposing the health of the first Master of the Lodge, expressed the pleasure he and the brethren had in the presence of Bro. Capt. Forbes on that occasion; in reply Bro. Forbes said, his being the first Master of the Lodge would ever afford him pleasing recollections. On accepting the Mastership he entered office under the auspices of the other Lodges in Woolwich, and had the assistance of some of their members. He was happy to say, that in two years they had been able to clear the Lodge of the expenses incurred on the foundation. This last year, under the admirable Mastership of Bro. Clerk, had been particularly successful. He trusted that every member would feel it his duty to support the Florence Nightingale Lodge, no matter where he might be placed; for himself he assured the brethren he should ever consider such to be his duty; and that wherever his residence might be, he should continue to be a member. Bro. Laird made an appeal to the brethren to aid the widow of a brother, but it having been suggested that the subject would be more properly brought forward in Lodge, he reserved his observations until the next meeting. Some other toasts followed, and after remembering "All Poor and Distressed Masons," the brethren separated. There were thirty-six present; and among the visitors were Bro. Col. Gordon, R.E., of the Delhi Lodge; Bro. Benthall, Prov. G. Organist, Surrey; Bro. Mugeridge, P.M., No. 227; Bro. W. Farnfield, jun., No. 318, &c.

PRINCE FREDERICK WILLIAM LODGE (No. 1055).—An emergency meeting was held on Wednesday, the 29th ult., at their Lodge-room, St. John's Wood. Present—Bros. John Dennis Caulcher, W.M.; J. J. Hardey, S.W.; E. J. Fraser, J.W.; H. A. Stacey, Secretary, and many other brethren. The work of the evening consisted of two initiations, two passings, and two raisings. All of these ceremonies were performed by the Worshipful Master, Bro. Caulcher, in a correct and impressive manner. After dinner the health of the Initiates was replied to by Bro. Whitaker, who, in the course of an eloquent address, said that to his dying hour he should not forget the occurrence of this eventful day; from his heart he thanked the Worshipful Master and brethren for the honour they had done him in admitting him a member of this Lodge, to participate in the rights and mysteries of so ancient and honourable a society. The Worshipful Master (his health having been proposed) was gratified to know that, during his year of office, his endeavours to perform his duties creditably had met with the approval of the Lodge. He proposed the health of Bro. Hardey, S.W., who was also Worshipful Master elect. Bro. Hardey tendered his thanks, and hoped that during the ensuing year he should be as well and faithfully supported by those who would be connected with him as the retiring Worshipful Master had been through the whole term of his office. Bro. W. Watson returned thanks for the P.M.s, and Bro. Elisha Cooke, from Kentucky, expressed his thanks for the hospitality of the brethren of the Prince William Frederick Lodge. Bros. Platt, H. A. Stacey and Caulcher sang some good songs.

INSTRUCTION.

THE MANCHESTER LODGE (No. 209).—At the Western Masonic-hall, Old Bond-street, there was a crowded assembly on the 28th ult., the attraction being Bro. Elisha Cooke, from America, who very lucidly and minutely explained the whole system of working, as practised in the United States. Thanks having been voted to Bro. Cooke, he said, "Brethren, there is a great deal more in Masonry than its mere forms—there is a wondrous beauty in the theory of Masonry. To me it is the image of a band of men united in the bonds of brotherly love, and in which all hearts are bent on the acquisition of knowledge, and only look on the mere technical lectures as a key to the great storeroom where the information is deposited that we are in search of. And I truly believe that an all-wise Providence would not have permitted a society, so great in numbers, and extending into every clime, to exist for so long a period were there not some good cause. Brethren, we have a great work to perform, let us lean towards each other till we have accomplished it, and when finished, may it meet the approbation of the great Architect of the universe."

THE ST. JAMES UNION LODGE (No. 211).—This Lodge received a visit on Monday last from Bro. Elisha Cooke, accompanied by Bro. S. B. Wilson, P.G.D. The brethren were much gratified at the urbanity and promptness of our American brother, in answering the many questions put to him. On the motion of Bro. Walkley, P.M., Bro. Cooke was unanimously elected an honorary member of this Lodge of Instruction. The Lodge was very numerously attended.

CHANNEL ISLANDS.

JERREY.—Lodge La Césarée (No. 860).—The usual monthly meeting of this Lodge was held on Thursday, June 30th, under the presidency of the W.M. Bro. Le Cras; the S.W. Bro. Bandains was present, and the duty of J.W. being taken by Bro. Philip Binet. The minutes of May 24th, June 7th, and June 18th, were read and confirmed. The Secretary then announced the names of five gentlemen for initiation at seven days' notice—Jean de la Mare, Gustave Auguste Neel, George le Boulanger, Thomas Dorey, John George Devenille. The ballot was taken, and was followed by the ceremony of initiation, administered to all but the first, who was unable to be present. The Lodge was then opened in the second degree, for the purpose of passing Bro. Philip Edward le Sueur. At the conclusion of this ceremony, the ballot was taken for the admission, as a joining member, of Bro. Peagam, (a P.M. of the Royal Sussex Lodge, No. 722, from which he had retired), and this proved unanimous in his favour. Bro. Louis Poisson, of the Justice Lodge (under the Irish warrant), was proposed as a joining member, and the names of several other gentlemen were entered for future initiation, if found worthy. Brothers Ratier and Manuel, members of the Committee for the erection of the Masonic Temple, read several important communications on the subject. After a protracted sitting, the Lodge was closed with the usual ceremonies, and the Brethren, in number about sixty, repaired to the banqueting-room, not to partake of sumptuous fare—for such is not the lot of those who seek a suitable and handsome location worthy of Freemasonry—but merely for light refreshments and social intercourse. On this occasion several interesting addresses were delivered, and we regret to notice an attempt on the part of a visitor to throw in the apple of discord, which, however, was speedily suppressed.—[H. H.]

CUMBERLAND.

CARLISLE.—Union Lodge (No. 389).—This Lodge met on Tuesday, at the King's Head, to pass Bro. Armstrong to the second degree; in the absence of the W.M. the degree was conferred by Bro. Hawood, the S.W., in the presence of three P.Ms. of the Lodge and the other members. Bro. C. J. Banister, P.M., expressed himself well pleased with the improvement of the working of the brethren, and offered his services as preceptor, which were gratefully accepted. The brethren and visitors dined together and spent a happy evening, and there is good hope that the Carlisle Lodge will soon become what it was twenty years back.

DEVONSHIRE.

STONEHOUSE.—Lodge of Sincerity (No. 224).—This Lodge met at St. George's Hall, Stonehouse, on the festival of St. John's, June 24th, for the purpose of installing Bro. R. Rodd, S.W., the W.M. elect; Bro. Lord Valletort, the W.M., being detained in London by his parliamentary duties, deputed the work to P.Ms. Hunt and Hancock, who divided the labour between them. Upon being installed in the chair, the W.M. installed the following Officers for the year:—Bro. Lord Graves, S.W.; Bro. Knocking, J.W.; Bro. Ridley, S.D.; Bro. Rae, J.D.; Bro. Tripe, P.M., Treasurer; Bro. Spence Bate, Secretary; Bro. Walker, I.G.; Bros. Hughes and Howe, Stewards; Bro. Rogers, P.M., Tyler. After it had determined that a letter of sympathy and condolence should be forwarded to the widow of the late Bro. Rowe, P.M., P. Prov. G.O., P. Prov. D.C., the J.W. announced that the hour of refreshment was at hand. The Lodge accordingly adjourned to the banquet, the W.M. presiding. After the cloth was removed and the Lodge properly tyled, the usual Masonic toasts were proposed and severally responded to. The Lodge was finally closed in peace and harmony at a quarter before ten o'clock.

DURHAM.

GATESHEAD.—Lodge of Industry (No. 56).—At the regular monthly meeting, the brethren assembled at the Grey Horse Inn, on Monday evening, June 27th, and the Lodge was opened by the W.M., Bro. C. J. Banister, and his Officers, assisted by Bro. R. J. Banning, as S.W., that Officer being unable to attend. After the minutes of last meeting were confirmed, the ballot was taken for Mr. G. Green, jun., Mr. T. C. Emmerson, Mr. Isaac Barker, and in each case declared unanimously, Mr. Wm. Green, being proposed by note, at seven days' notice, was also balloted for and unanimously elected; being all present they were each severally initiated into the Order by the W.M. with his usual earnestness. Bros. Buckham and Robinson, wishing to take the second degree, were duly passed, the W.M. expressing himself well pleased at their attention to the duty of the Order. The W.M. was assisted by P.Ms. Hotham, S. Bell, Gillies, Franklin, and Clapham. The W.M. gave notice of motion that next monthly meeting he would propose that the funds of the Lodge should be laid aside to form a building fund. The business completed, the Lodge was closed and the brethren adjourned to refreshment. Visitors present—Bros. J. B. Browning, Geo. Rochester, W. Scott, S. Cohen, and a full attendance of the members. The usual loyal and Masonic toasts were given and responded to, and the harmony of the evening was much increased by the excellent songs of Bros. Kimpster, Buckham, Wm. Green, &c.

HAMPSHIRE.

WINCHESTER.—Lodge of Economy (No. 90).—The monthly meeting of this Lodge took place at the Masonic Hall, adjoining the Black Swan Hotel, on the evening of Wednesday, the 29th ult. In the absence of the W.M. (Bro. Hasleham) and the immediate P.M.; Bro. C. Sherry, as the senior P.M. in attendance, took the chair. There were also present, Bros. J. Carter, S.W., pro tem.; H. Newman, J.W., pro tem., and Bros. Durant, P.M.; S. Everitt, P.M.; W. Cowen, P.M., and a number of other brethren. The first business transacted was, the balloting for a brother as a joining member of the Lodge, Bro. T. W. Fleming, Prov. G.M. of the Isle of Wight. The vote was unanimously favourable. Bro. Sherry then said he had received a letter from Bro. Stebbing, announcing that the annual Provincial Grand Lodge of Hampshire would be held at Southampton, on Tuesday, the 19th of July, and he (Bro. Sherry) hoped all would strain a point to go down and support the Prov. G.M. on the occasion. Bro. Sherry then said, "Since our last Lodge meeting, the Grand Lodge of England have assembled to elect the Board of General Purposes, the ministers of the Craft, to conduct the affairs for the ensuing year. At our last meeting, the regular business paper from Grand Lodge was presented here, accompanied by a printed form, being a copy of a letter from Bro. Roxburgh, G. Reg., to Bro. Gray Clarke, G. Sec., complaining of Bro. Whitmore's motion. This was a matter which took us rather by surprise. The cause of complaint had been the proceedings of the Grand Registrar of England, who had taken upon himself (contrary to the usual custom) to summon a party of Grand Officers and others, to his private residence or chambers, for the purpose of selecting a number of brethren for recommendation to Grand Lodge, as those to conduct affairs as ministers of Masonry for the next year. He believed the Grand Registrar had erred in judgment only, and that he was not aware at the time, that he was arrogating to himself the selection of men for such important purposes as conducting the affairs of the whole body of Masons. He had no doubt the Grand Registrar had acted with the purest motives, and that it had been a mistake, not thinking of the consequences it would entail upon him. But the Grand Registrar could not be allowed to think and act for us. If so, it would be like selecting Her Majesty's ministers for conducting the affairs of the nation entirely and exclusively from London members of parliament, without including any representatives from the provinces. Indeed, it appears that the list of names selected at the Grand Registrar's meeting was exclusively chosen from London Lodges. All members of Grand Lodge in the provinces were summoned to attend when the Board of General Purposes were to be elected, and to give their votes in accordance with their own views. But it must be recollected that some of these provincial members had three or four hundred miles to travel if they did attend, and therefore the necessary expenses were so great that they could not do so, though some from shorter distances did attend. Many lived at a much greater distance from London than himself. He had managed generally to attend of late years, and had given his votes as he conceived for the best interests of Masonry; but not one tenth of the provincial members did or could attend, in consequence of the inconvenience he had already mentioned. What was the use, then, of the provincial members being summoned to London nominally for the purpose of electing the officers of the Board of General Purposes, and other such important business; and then those few who did attend to find when they got there, that the business had been pre-arranged. All members of Grand Lodge in the provinces (and those in London too) should, in his opinion, have the privilege of voting by proxy. Then there would be a chance of some provincial brethren being taken into the Board of General Purposes. He believed there were as good men in the provinces as there were in London, and men quite as experienced in Masonry. At the same time, he wished it to be understood that he had little fault to find with the London brethren, for he believed there were very good men among them, and he was ready to admit that the officers selected were Masons fully capable of properly conducting Lodge affairs. It was not the brethren personally he objected to, but the system under which they were nominated for office. It was with these feelings he had seconded the motion of Bro. Whitmore at the late Grand Lodge meeting, which motion was, in Bro. Whitmore's absence, brought forward by Bro. Binckes. The facts were—Bro. Whitmore had given notice of a motion expressing regret that the Grand Registrar should have originated a movement contrary to the rules of Masonry. Upon that Bro. Roxburgh conceived himself unjustly attacked, and submitted to Grand Lodge that such attack became a "breach of privilege." Bro. Binckes (who himself is a most strict disciplinarian), in the unavoidable absence of Bro. Whitmore, took up the subject, and spoke at considerable length, and it was apparent the whole of Grand Lodge was with him as he proceeded. He (Bro. Sherry) took upon himself to second the motion. Since then some remarks upon the discussion had appeared in the Magazine, in which reference had been made to himself. He therefore wished to explain the reasons why he had supported Bro. Binckes. He considered it was quite clear that Bro. Roxburgh had no right to summon a party to his own residence to nominate officers, unless he summoned an equal if not larger number of provincial brethren also; as it was well known the provincial members were by far the most numerous. The metropolitan district took in those Lodges only within ten miles of London; and the effect was that six or seven hundred provincial Lodges were, to a certain extent, shut out from expressing their opinion on the elections. Bro. Stebbing, the only provincial Mason put in nomination, had polled only forty-two votes, from causes he had already explained; and this showed the unjustness of the present mode of proceedings. There was not a better Mason in England than Bro. Stebbing, and why should such brethren be excluded? Were the system different, and had voting by proxy been introduced, he was sure Bro. Stebbing would have been elected. The view he was led to take of the matter was, that the London brethren were determined to keep the management of the affairs of Grand Lodge in their own hands, those in the provinces being excluded from all else but paying to the funds; and he hoped that some system of voting by proxy would be introduced, so as to give the provinces a fair share in conducting Grand Lodge business. Bro. Durant, P.M., said the information conveyed to him in Bro. Sherry's speech had struck him with astonishment; he could not have supposed that the Grand Registrar had so wrongly acted. Every Mason must know that it was improper for the chief officer to summon certain members to a private meeting, and there make a selection of them and others to constitute the Board of General Purposes. Bro. Newman made a few observations, expressing his regret that such a course of proceeding should have been adopted. Bro. Sherry (in reply to Bro. Oakshot, P.M.), pointed out that by the Book of Constitutions the Grand Master was in possession of the power of electing the President of the Board, and ten others, which, added to the Grand Officers, gave the Grand Master the presumed support of seventeen votes, against the fourteen annually elected in June by Grand Lodge. Bro. Carter, P.M., regretted that anything like jealousy should have arisen between the London and provincial brethren. The provincial brethren, if they went up to London and attended the meetings, could outvote the others, though he admitted the difficulty of their attendance. He discerned a disposition on the part of the London Lodges to hold fast that power which they had so long exercised. After some little further discussion, Bro. Sherry moved the following resolution:—"That this Lodge very much regrets the late proceedings of the Grand Registrar, though it excuses him from any party motives." Bro. Durant, P.M., seconded the motion, which was put to the Lodge and carried unanimously. Bro. Carter, P.M., moved another resolution, to the effect that, "In the future selection of Officers of the Board of General Purposes, a fair share of provincial brethren should be nominated." This was seconded by Bro. Everitt, P.M., and unanimously agreed to. The Lodge was then closed, after which the brethren adjourned, as usual, to the festive board, finally separating at the hour of high twelve.

[We are sure, if country brethren can be found to act upon the Board of General Purposes, they will be gladly elected.—Ed.]

KENT.

GRAVESEND.—Lodge of Freedom (No. 91).—The monthly meeting was held on Monday, the 19th June, at the Town Hall, Bro. E. Wates, W.M., in the chair. The brethren proceeded to the election of a Master for the ensuing year, when the choice fell on Bro. Thomas Pottinger, S.W. Bro. F. W. Dobson, P.M., was re-elected Treasurer. On a proposition of Bro. Hilder, P.M., being brought forward for providing a set of tracing boards, it was moved by Bro. Robt. Spencer, P.M., and resolved, that a sum of five guineas be given for that purpose. In consequence of the next meeting falling on the same day as the Prov. Grand Lodge, the installation will take place one week later. The W.M., Bro. Wates, has been distinguished during his year of office for the attention he has given to the working of the Lodge, and has not only maintained its efficiency, but advanced it in estimation, and with the improvement of Masonry in the province. Such exertions are needed to maintain the character of every individual Lodge.

GRAVESEND.—Cent Lodge of Freedom (No. 91).—This Lodge met on Thursday, June 30th, Bro. S. B. Wilson presiding as W.M., who introduced to the notice of the brethren Bro. Elisha D. Cooke, when that brother, at their request, repeated the ceremonies and lectures as practised in the United States. Bro. S. B. Wilson made a few remarks explanatory of the differences between the American and English systems. A vote of thanks was ordered to be recorded on the minutes to Bro. Elisha D. Cooke, for the very able manner in which he had explained the lectures and ceremonies, as also for his courtesy in replying to the many questions put to him. Here we will reply to a question asked of us by many Members of the Craft—"Who is Bro. Elisha D. Cooke?" He was initiated into Freemasonry in Chester Lodge (No. 18) at Chesterville, South Carolina; was exalted to the supreme degree of a R. A. Mason in Franklin Chapter (No. 14), and also the degree of Royal and Select Master, at the same place; about seven months since he was made a Knight Templar in Louisville Encampment (No. 2) at Louisville, Kentucky, and admitted to the A. and A. rite of Sublime Princes in the Supreme Consistory Court of the same place; and is the appointed Grand Lecturer to the Lodges in Kentucky.

GRAVESEND.—Lodge of Sympathy (No. 909).—A meeting of this Lodge was held at the Town Hall, for the choice of officers, on Monday, the 19th ult., when Bro. Stratford was elected W.M. for the year ensuing.

NORTHUMBERLAND.

NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE.—Northern Counties Lodge (No. 586).—The members met at the Masonic Hall, Bell's-court, on Saturday, June 25th, by emergency summonses, to initiate Mr. James Sanderson, who had been previously balloted for and accepted. There were present Bro. H. Smitor, W.M., who gave the degree to the satisfaction of the brethren, it being his first attempt, ably assisted by Bro. H. Hotham, P.M., as S.W., and the Officers of the Lodge; Bros. J. Medcalf, D. Prov. G.M.; Wm. Punchon, P.M.; Geo. Weatherhead, P.M.; C. I. Banister, P.M.; S. Joel, J. H. Vincent, H. Ion, and the members of the Lodge. The Lodge was closed in due form, and the brethren retired to the supper-room, under the able presidency of the father of Masonry in the north of England, Bro. Punchon, P.M., who gave the usual loyal and Masonic toasts which were duly responded to, and the brethren separated at nine o'clock.

STAFFORDSHIRE.

UTTOXETER.—Foresters' Lodge (No. 670).—A special meeting was held at Uttoxeter, on Thursday, June 30th, for the purpose of installing as its Worshipful Master the Hon. Wm. Warren Vernon. The brethren met at two o'clock, when Bro. G. Sergeant, Prov. G. Reg.; P.M. Nos. 660, and 606 (assisted by Bro. Butterworth), proceeded to perform the ceremony of installation, which duty he performed in such a manner as to elicit the commendations of the Prov. Grand Master of Staffordshire, and of the Lodge. The address to the W.M. was very impressively given by the D. Prov. G.M., Bro. Ward. The closing address was beautifully given by the Prov. G.M., Colonel Vernon, who afterwards congratulated the newly installed Master upon the high and honourable position he had attained, and the Lodge, upon having so good a Mason and such a noble brother to preside over them; also upon the good position the Lodge had now attained, which was mainly attributable to the exertion of Bro. Sergeant, P.M., and the brethren of the Menturia Lodge Hanley, who had worked well and constantly to revive the Lodge and bring it to its present state of perfection. This was briefly acknowledged by the W.M., who quite coincided with the remarks of the Prov. G.M., and would do his utmost to continue and keep the Lodge in the position it now occupied. After receiving the congratulations of the D. Prov. G.M., Bro. Ward, and the other members of the Prov. Grand Lodge, present, the newly installed Master closed the Lodge in the usual manner amongst Masons. After the ceremony the brethren sat down to a grand banquet, at which the newly installed W.M. presided, and the following brethren were present:—Bros. Col. Vernon, Prov. G.M. of Staffordshire; Thomas Ward, of Newcastle, D. Prov. G.M.; G. Sergeant, Prov. G. Reg., P.M.; Cartwright, of Newcastle, Prov. G.D.; Fletcher, P.M.; Cooper, S.W.; Keates, J.W.; Torrens, J.D.; and Bros. Mould, Douglas, Earp, Fish, of Uttoxeter; Bros. Butterworth, W.M. No. 606, Hanley; J. C. Daniel, S.W.; W. Large, I.G., and Bros. Bradford, Swift, Hall, and Chantrey of Hanley. The cloth having been withdrawn, and grace said, the W.M. proposed a number of appropriate toasts, including "The Prov. G.M. of Staffordshire, Col. Vernon;" "Bro. the Hon. W. Warren Vernon, W.M. of Foresters' Lodge;" "The Prov. G. Reg., Bro. G. Sergeant, Installing Master;" and a number of other toasts, concluding with that of "The Poor and Distressed Masons." In reply to the toast of his health, Bro. Sergeant introduced the subject of the Masonic charities, strongly advocating them, urging upon the Lodge and the brethren the necessity of becoming subscribers at once, which, from the hearty response given by the brethren present, no doubt will be done. This was approved and followed up by the Prov. G.M., Col. Vernon, who is now a life governor to all the charities. This Lodge was formerly a very prosperous one, but owing to the death of its late W.M., and other untoward circumstances, it has been nearly dead the last few years, but has recently been resuscitated by the exertions of Bro. Sergeant, P.M., and the officers of the Menturia Lodge, Hanley, who were present on this interesting occasion and much pleased to see the success attending their labours of Masonic love. The new Master is a son of Lord Vernon, of Wolsey Hall, Derbyshire, and Bro. to the Honourable Augustus Vernon, who recently lost his election for the county of Derby by a minority of one vote. He is also a relative of our Prov. G.M., Col. Vernon. Bro. Chantrey, of Hanley, presided over the musical department with his accustomed ability, and a most pleasant fraternal evening was spent.

SUSSEX.

BRIGHTON.—Royal York Lodge (No. 394).—The monthly meeting of this Lodge was held at the Old Ship Hotel, Brighton, on Tuesday the 5th inst., the W. M. Bro. Moppett presiding, supported by the whole of his officers, and honoured by the presence of Bro. G. E. Pocock, Grand Sword Bearer (who was saluted on entrance), and several brethren from Lodge, No. 390. A successful ballot having been taken for Messrs. Ball and Willard, they were initiated into the mysteries and privileges of the Order. A communication was read from the D. Prov. G.M. of Sussex, certifying the new by-laws.

BRIGHTON.—Royal Clarence Lodge (No. 338).—The monthly meeting of this Lodge was held on Friday, June 17th, Bro. John H. Scott, W.M., presided; and the visitors present were the R.W. Bro. Capt. Dalbiac, D. Prov. G.M. of Sussex; Bro. Heather, Prov. G. Treasurer of Hants; Bro. Machin, of the Shakespeare Lodge, Warwick; Bro. Rudduck, P. Prov. J.G.W. of Suffolk; Bro. Goldberg, No. 390, and Bro. Taaffe, No. 394. Dr. Moon was initiated, and Bro. Stedman was passed to the second degree. About forty of the brethren adjourned to refreshment. After the toasts of "The Queen and the Craft," and "The Earl of Zetland, M.W.G.M.," had been duly honoured, the W.M. rose, and said—"The next toast is 'Lord Panmure, the R.W.D.G.M. of England, and the Officers of Grand Lodge.' Until lately we have for so many years been cut off from all but an official connexion with Grand Lodge, that most of us have taken little or no interest in its proceedings; we have been ignorant of its functions; and how closely identified are the interests of private Lodges, and the Craft in general, with the well being of Grand Lodge in particular. We have therefore hitherto looked upon this toast and the one preceding, more as a formal acknowledgment of the allegiance which was due to Grand Lodge, than as making any great calls upon our enthusiasm. But to-day this toast is invested with more than usual interest, and will in future be more cordially responded to by you because there will be associated with it the name of one whom we all hold dear, and whose absence on this occasion I deeply regret, Bro. Gavin Pocock. You all know that Bro. Pocock has this year been appointed to office in Grand Lodge, and I am quite sure you all feel that this high Masonic distinction has been justly merited by him. But independently of the honour that has thus been conferred upon Bro. Pocock, and through him upon Freemasonry in the province of Sussex, this appointment must give great satisfaction to all zealous and true hearted Masons, because it is a proof to them that the M.W. Grand Master is determined that in future the honours of the Craft shall not be confined exclusively to London Masons; that there shall be other qualifications to Grand Office, besides filling the chair of two or three particular Lodges; that he knows who the men are, and where they are to be found, who, without expectation of reward, beyond the respect and affection of their brethren, are steadily and indefatigably doing the real work of Freemasonry. That this has been pre-eminently the case with Bro. Pocock, you all know, and I know that his surprise, upon receiving this appointment, was as great as the delight of his friends on hearing of it. The D. Prov. Grand Master, in reply to his health, and that of the Provincial Officers, expressed the pleasure that he had in paying a visit to the Royal Clarence Lodge, and how much satisfaction he had experienced in seeing the work so admirably performed. He had visited many Lodges in other provinces, and had never seen it excelled, and he felt proud in having so perfect a Lodge under his jurisdiction. The visitors also severally expressed a similar opinion with regard to the manner in which the working had been conducted. The D. Prov. Grand Master then proposed the health of the Worshipful Master, who thanked him and the visitors for the high compliment they had paid the Royal Clarence Lodge; he attributed the success which had attended his exertions in the chair entirely to the great advantage he had derived from the Brighton Lodge of Instruction, and strongly exhorted all those who were anxious to advance in Masonry to become members of that Lodge, as he felt very certain that future Masters of Lodges would look to the Lodge of Instruction to guide them in the selection of their Officers; at any rate it was more likely that they would appoint brethren who showed zeal in the cause, and proficiency in the work than those who were only to be found at the Lodge upon banqueting nights. In proposing the Entered Apprentices, the W.M. said—"We will now drink to the health of those brethren who have lately joined our Order." This is generally looked upon as the toast of the evening, for although it is contrary to our principles, in any way to persuade others to become Freemasons against their own inclinations, we are at all times rejoiced to welcome amongst us men of intelligence, of high character, and of social position. It shows that Freemasonry is making its influence felt in society when such men are anxious to join us. And what, brethren, is the influence which Freemasonry exercises? I believe that it binds together hearts which would otherwise remain estranged—that it unites members of the various classes of society in a bond of union, which nothing can sever but dishonour, to the Craft. And surely in an age when political strife and religious animosities, and ungenerous competitions, and selfish interests of every kind are doing their baneful work in severing heart from heart, and man from man, we must all of us feel it to be an inestimable privilege to belong to a society, where, however diverse our opinions, however antagonistic our creeds, whatever the avocations by which we gain an honest livelihood, we can meet together in social intercourse on grounds of common brotherhood; and so long as Freemasonry presents to the world a body united in itself, noble in its charities, and generous in its sympathies, so long will Masonry outlive the sneers of its detractors, and so long will there be found men of station, of influence, and of ability desirous of ranking amongst its members. We have to-night to drink to the health of two brethren who would be an honour to any society. I hope they may fully realize the advantages I have spoken of, and never have occasion to regret that they have become members of our ancient and honourable fraternity." Bros. Stedman and Moon responded, and thanked the brethren for the kindness with which they had been received, and regretted that they had not joined many years earlier, a society which was productive of so much good will and usefulness to others. The W.M. in proposing "The Past Masters" said, it has often struck me when I have heard this toast proposed by others, it is one which it is peculiarly incumbent upon us to respond to most heartily. Nothing more truly indicates a noble spirit than the recognition of past services; and yet I am afraid that there is a tendency in most of us to become so anxious for progress, or so absorbed in all that concerns the present, that we are apt to forget and to overlook the obligations which are owing to the past. This is more particularly the case when all things go well with us; we find ourselves in the midst of prosperity, and we do not trouble ourselves to inquire how that prosperity was brought about. Flushed with success, we are apt to imagine that it is our own right arms which have gotten us the victory, and we forget how far that victory was owing to the strategy and wisdom of more experienced and directing minds. Now this toast for a moment draws off our attention from that which concerns our immediate interests, and fixes it upon the claims of those whose active services are past, but who in their day did their duty well, and in such a manner as to lay the foundation of the success and prosperity which we are now enjoying; but when I speak of their active services as past, I am scarcely doing the Past Masters justice, for there is not one of them who is not at all times ready in Lodge and out of Lodge to render any service to the Lodge which may lie in his power. For myself I owe many of them much gratitude for very valuable and kind assistance in the discharge of the duties of my office, and to all of them many thanks for very cordial and generous support. Other toasts followed—"The Visitors;" "The Officers of the Lodge," &c., &c.; and the meeting separated shortly before eleven o'clock.

WARWICKSHIRE.

COVENTRY.—Trinity Lodge (No. 316).—The brethren of this Lodge celebrated the festival of St. John Baptist, at the Castle Inn, on Tuesday, 28th ult., at which more than an usual number of brethren assembled. After the ordinary routine of business, the brethren dined under the presidency of the W.M., Bro. H. Matterson. The usual loyal and Masonic toasts having been honoured, the Lodge was closed in due form, and the brethren dispersed at an early hour.

WORCESTERSHIRE.

KIDDERMINSTER LODGE.—Hope and Charity (No. 523).—This Lodge held its usual monthly meeting on Monday, June 27th, when Mr. Thos. Cope was duly initiated into Freemasonry, according to ancient custom, as a serving brother to the Lodge, by dispensation from the R.W. Prov. G.M., H. C. Vernon, Esq. The Lodge was honoured on this occasion by a visit from the following distinguished brethren:—The V.W. Bro. Wm. Masefield, P.M., No. 313 and 730, Prov. G. Treas.; the V.W. Bro. Wm. Howells, P.M., No. 780, Prov. G. Sec.; the V.W. Bro. Dennison, P.M., No. 730, P. Prov. G. Reg.; the W. Bro. Wm. Bristow, jun., P.M., No. 313, P.A.D.C., and the Rev. Bro. M.S. Walrond, No. 460.

YORKSHIRE (WEST).

BRADFORD.—Lodge of Hope (No. 379).—The monthly meeting of this flourishing Lodge was held at the Masonic Hall, Duke-street, on Monday evening, the 13th of June. After the Lodge was opened in the first degree, a complimentary letter was read from the W.M. elect, of the Lodge of Harmony (an offshoot from this Lodge), inviting the officers and brethren to their installation and banquet on the 25th, which act of courtesy was much appreciated by the brethren assembled. The W.M. (Bro. C. H. Taylor), then proceeded in a masterly manner to initiate Messrs. William Woodhead, Chas. Storey Woodhead, Samuel Woodhead, and the Rev. Wm. Fearnside, curate of St. John's church (three brothers and a cousin), into the secrets and mysteries of Freemasonry. The W.M. was ably assisted by Bros. H. Smith, Rogerson, and W. Mawson, P.M.s and the other officers of the Lodge. After the business was concluded, the brethren were called from labour to refreshment, and the usual loyal and Masonic toasts were given and responded to in true Masonic style. The healths of the newly initiated brethren were heartily drunk, each expressing the pleasure they felt in becoming members of so ancient and honourable an institution, regretting they had not before joined the Order, and expressing an anxious desire to become good working Masons. The E. A. song was given in good style by Bro. Heseltine, J.W., Bro. Thos. Woodhead, (another brother of the newly initiated), presiding at the piano. The health of the Prov. Grand Officers was responded to by those who were present, and it was very gratifying to hear that the D. Prov. G.M. of West York (Bro. Dr. Fearnley, of Dewsbury), had expressed himself so highly as to call this the model Lodge of the province. The health of the W.M. was also received with much applause by the brethren, and in returning thanks he expressed his willingness to do all he could for Masonry in general, and this Lodge in particular. After spending a pleasant and truly Masonic evening, the brethren retired at an early hour, highly gratified. A Lodge of Emergency was also held at the same place on Friday, the 17th, to work up arrears of business, when Bro. Alexander Hunter was raised to the sublime degree of Master Mason, and Bro. Pratt passed to the degree of Fellow Craft.

[We are glad to receive an interesting account of the progress of Masonry in West Yorkshire. We understand that the Lodge of Hope, No. 379, West Yorkshire, is in a very flourishing condition, having a good staff of working P.M.s (fifteen in number), a capital working Mason for Worshipful Master, and an efficient staff of officers. A Lodge of Instruction is held weekly, and is well attended by the young Masons who are anxious to improve and make themselves competent for office. We are also glad to hear that the brethren in this district take a deep interest in all the Masonic charities, and have this year elected three of their number as annuitants of the Royal Benevolent Fund for Aged Freemasons. In the Lodge of Hope every member is a subscriber, and to the kindness of Bro. Guth, P.M., who went to London to superintend the election on behalf of the West Yorkshire district, may in a great measure be attributed the successful result of the election, as two of the candidates were only first applicants. The appeal on behalf of the Boys School has also been heartily responded to by the brethren in this province, and a very handsome sum subscribed. We wish the Lodge of Hope, and all other Lodges in the district, success in their endeavours to inculcate true Masonic principles.—Ed.]

ROYAL ARCH.

METROPOLITAN CHAPTER.

OLD KING'S ARMS CHAPTER (No. 30).—This Chapter held a convocation at the Freemasons' Tavern, on Monday, July 4th, when Comp. G. Biggs, with his accustomed solemnity and impressiveness, exalted two brethren to the supreme degree of R.A., and afterwards installed the three Principals into their respective chairs, viz:—Comp. Paas as M.E.Z.; Comp. Maudsley, H.; Comp. England, J. The Chapter was then closed, and the Companions adjourned to the banquet. After the usual loyal and Masonic toasts, the Companions separated, highly gratified with the proceedings of the evening.

JOTA CHAPTER (No. 223).—A convocation was holden at the Bridge House Hotel, Southwark, on June the 27th. The Chapter was declared open at half-past five, p.m., the chief business of the evening being the installation of the Principals, Comps. H. A. Isaacs, T. E. Laud, and M. A. Cohen; subsequent to which four brethren were exalted, a large attendance of the Companions being present. At eight o'clock dinner was announced. In giving the health of "The Visitors," Comp. Isaacs reminded the members of this Chapter they were honoured with the presence of a distinguished Mason from America, Comp. Eliasha Cooke. Comp. Cooke, in reply, said—"Should any of you ever visit 'Old Kentucky,' there is not a Mason there but will do all in his power to show what Kentucky hospitality really is. I visit this country on a purely Masonic mission, for the purpose of ascertaining the difference between European and American working. Entering upon this pleasing duty, my anticipations were of the brightest character. I felt that a welcome awaited me, and I now feel they have been more than realised. Your Chapter I visit to-night on the very kind invitation of Comp. Dr. Ladd, whose acquaintance I am proud to have made. He is in the Masonic hemisphere a star of the first magnitude." After some very appropriate remarks from the other visitors, and some good singing, the Companions separated.

KNIGHTS TEMPLAR.

METROPOLITAN ENCAMPMENT.

KEMEYS TYNTE ENCAMPMENT.—The Eminent Commander summoned an Encampment at the Freemasons' Tavern, Woolwich, on Friday, July 1st, and at four o'clock it was opened, when there were present Sir Knt. Major Henry Clerk, E.C.; Sir Knt. J. How, as 1st Captain; Sir Knt. J. W. Figg, 2nd Capt.; Sir Knt. Major F. Ducane, Expert; Sir Knt. Taylor, Capt. of Lines; Sir Knt. John Masson, Grand Chancellor, assisting as Prelate. Comp. J. Smith, of Chapter No. 25, was introduced and duly installed. Sir Knt. Eliasha D. Cooke, of the United States, was a visitor. This being an emergency meeting, and as there was no other business, the Encampment was closed at an early hour.

PROVINCIAL ENCAMPMENT.

SOUTHAMPTON.—A conclave of the Royal Gloucester Encampment was held on Thursday, June 30th, at the Freemasons' Hall; Sir Knt. Charles Bromley, E.C.; Sir Knt. J. R. Stebbing, Prelate; Sir Knt. J. T. Enright, 1st Capt.; Sir Knt. Geo. Luugley, 2nd Capt.; Sir Knt. Geo. W. Clarke, Registrar, &c., &c., being present. The ballot was taken for Comp. Frederick Perkins, of the Chapter of Concord, and W.M. of the Royal Gloucester Lodge, No. 152, and he being declared duly elected, was afterwards admitted into the privileges of the Order. The ceremony of installation was ably performed by Sir Knt. Bromley, assisted by the above named officers, particularly by Sir Knt. Stebbing, who was most impressive in the duties of Prelate. This Encampment, which had pretty nearly died out, is now so well revived, as to assume a position of importance, the number of members continually increasing, and all the elements of success being visible in its arrangements.

PROVINCIAL GRAND CONCLAVE OF KENT.

A meeting of the Knights Templar of the province of Kent, was held at the Freemasons' Tavern, in Woolwich, on Friday, July 1st. At five o'clock the Prov. Grand Conclave was opened, present Sir Knt. Henry James Hinxman, M.D., V.E. Prov. Grand Com.; Sir Knt. John Masson, G. Chan.; Sir Knt. Major Henry Clerk, 1st Grand Capt.; Sir Knts. Peter Laird, J. W. Figg, F. Du Cane, John Dixon, and others.

The minutes of the previous Grand Conclave were read and confirmed, the Treasurer's account was adopted, and the annual audit committee was appointed.

The V.E. Provincial Grand Commander then proceeded to appoint and invest the officers for the year ensuing: he prefaced the choice he had made by a few remarks on his inability to fill all the offices on their previous meetings, and especially referred to that of his deputy. Last year there was no member of the province who, by rank in the Order, was eligible, he was now however relieved from the difficulty, as in Sir Knt. Clerk he had a brother well capable of supplying his place in case of absence; he therefore requested Sir Knt. Clerk to accept the appointment of D. Prov. G.M. Sir Knt. Clerk said he felt much honoured by the kindness with which the appointment was conferred, and accepted the office with gratitude. The other Prov. Grand Officers are, Sir Knt. Shuttleworth, 1st Capt.; Sir Knt. Lt. Alderson, 2nd Capt.; Sir Knt. Peter Laird, Chan.; Sir Knt. Major F. Du Cane, Prelate; Sir Knt. J. W. Figg, Expert; Sir Knt. J. Lyons, Capt. of Lines; Sir Knt. J. Dixon, Almoner; Sir Knt. Spratt, Supt. of Works; Sir Knt. Jackson, Herald; Sir Knt. J. Smith, Sword Bearer; Sir Knt. Platt, Banner Bearer; Sir Knt. Henderson, Janitor. Sir Knt. Taylor was re-elected Grand Treas.

The Prov. Grand Encampment was then closed, and at seven o'clock the Knights re-assembled at dinner, at which thirteen were present. After paying due honour to the loyal and Masonic toasts, the Prov. G. Com. gave "The Visitors," and first referred to their honoured guest, Bro. Masson, whose ardent services in the cause of Freemasonry were almost beyond praise; his industry in his distinguished position as Grand Chancellor of the Knights Templar was well known. He also alluded to Bro. Masson having, by virtue of his office, consecrated and opened their Encampment, the first established in Kent. He next noticed Bro. Cooke, whose presence afforded him much pleasure, and who they hoped would convey to his brethren in the United States, an assurance that the interchange of visits was always agreeable. Sir Knt. Masson in acknowledgment said, that seeing its successful career he looked back with great satisfaction to the fact of his having consecrated the Kemeys Tynte Encampment. He also mentioned the great pleasure he had in the prosperity and increase of the Knights Templar. He alluded to his having been appointed to represent the Templars of America in the Grand Conclave of England, and said he anticipated good results from the interchange of these relations between England and America.

The Prov. G. Com. next proposed the Grand Officers appointed on that day, and expressed his gratification in having been enabled to fill all the offices. At the top of the list was Sir Knt. Clerk, who was fully able to assist him in carrying on the business or of conducting the Prov. Grand Conclave in his unavoidable absence; and in all the other officers he was assured of finding support. Sir Knt. Clerk in responding, said, in speaking for himself and the other officers, they pledged themselves to support the Order to the best of their ability, but especially in the province of Kent.

Sir Knt. Masson asked the knights to drink the health of their Prov. G. Com., a brother who had shown by his efficiency the excellency of the appointment. He referred to Dr. Hinxman's general enthusiasm in favour of every degree of Masonry, and under his auspices there was reason to hope ere long, one, if not two Encampments, would be opened in Kent. In concluding, Bro. Masson said, that from the opportunities he had had of witnessing Bro. Hinxman's fulfilment of his duties, he was sure a better Mason did not exist. The Prov. G. Com. in reply said, Bro. Masson had referred to his services, and he could only say he had endeavoured by diligence to deserve all the honours conferred upon him. He alluded to the increase of their Order, and noticed that the Kemeys Tynte Encampment numbered twenty-three members, which must be looked upon as most satisfactory, being but two years old. There was a prospect of an Encampment being established at Maidstone; Walmer and Canterbury were also spoken of.

The health of Sir Knt. Smith, who had that day been installed in the Kemeys Tynte Encampment, was proposed by Sir Knt. Clerk, and a most agreeable meeting was brought to a close.

ANCIENT AND ACCEPTED RITE.

METROPOLITAN CHAPTER.

THE assembly of the Metropolitan Rose Croix Chapter, on Tuesday next, the 12th inst., at Freemasons' Hall, will be of a particularly interesting character. At the last meeting a select Chapter was appointed to consider the ritual and arrangements, consisting of Ill. Bros. the M.W.S., Dr. W. Jones; J. B. Cole, 33°; J. A. D. Cox, 33°; Hyde Clarke, 32°; Dr. R. H. Goolden, 32°; and Dr. Kent, 32°, Treasurer and Secretary. Under the direction of these brethren, the arrangements have been remodelled, the furniture and fittings extended and improved, suitable dresses provided, and the musical and choral portions of the service increased, and made more effective. Ill. Bro. Hyde Clarke, the junior member of the 32°, has been appointed Dir. of Cers.; Bro. W. H. Bernhard, of the Mauritius and Metropolitan Chapters, Assist. Dir. of Cers., with other assistants; and Bro. Horsley, Organist, with some distinguished brethren of the choir under his direction. The service for the next meeting is selected from Palestrini, Mozart, and Beethoven. Music is likewise provided for the banquet. The number of candidates is large. At the subsequent meetings further improvements will be effected. The meeting of the 12th will be, it is supposed, the best celebration of the rite which has been held in this country for the last sixty or seventy years, if not since Ill. Bro. W. Preston served the functions of M.W.S. of the Metropolitan Chapter.

The Supreme Council have, through Ill. Bro. Cox, given their sanction and assistance, and have largely contributed to the expenses. Like arrangements are in progress for placing the working of the 30°, 31° and 32°, on a footing commensurate with their importance.

IRELAND.

CORK.

FRIDAY, the 24th of June being the Masonic festival of St. John, the brethren of Lodges, Nos. 1, 3, and 8, met according to previous agreement, for banquet in the beautifully decorated hall of the first Lodge of Ireland, situate in Tuckey-street, city of Cork. The company, in full Masonic costume, sat down at seven o'clock to a magnificent dinner, provided by Mrs. Tauner, of the Grand Parade. The Worshipful Master's chair (at the request of the W.M.) was occupied by the D. Prov. G.M. of Munster, Bro. George Chatterton, who, with eloquence and nicety of discernment, discharged the duties thereof so as to please all present. The vice-chair was ably filled by Bro. Richard Meara, the W.M. of No. 1, and the duties of the J.W. were satisfactorily discharged by Bro. Richard R. Brash, the W.M. of No. 3. The Masonic harmonies were admirably sustained by Bros. James Roche, E. Moran and Hoffman, and several amateurs. The visiting deputations from the other Lodges were received with the usual honours, and suitable responses made to their paternal greetings. The company retired at twelve o'clock, having spent a very delightful and instructive evening. The Freemasons of Munster propose to invite their Prov. G.M., General Sir Jas. Chatterton, to a banquet in the autumn.

PROVINCIAL GRAND LODGE.

IN consequence of the absence of our Prov. G. Master, General Sir James Chatterton, Bart., and also of his Deputy, Bro. George Chatterton, the quarterly Provincial Grand Lodge meeting did not take place till the 20th June, when it was held in the large Masonic Lodge-room of the first Lodge of Ireland, Cork. The Deputy Provincial Grand Master presided, and having opened our Provincial Grand Lodge, the minutes of the previous meeting were read and confirmed. Our Deputy Provincial Grand Master then told the brethren that he had recently been in London, where he had the pleasure of meeting our Provincial Grand Master, who, he was happy to tell them enjoys good health, and expressed his warm and sincere wishes for the prosperity of the several Lodges over which he presides as their Provincial Grand Master, and he desired him to say that whenever they required his presence he will be with them after timely notice.

Our Deputy Provincial Grand Master said that at the previous Lodge meeting having promised to carry out the wishes of the Provincial Grand Lodge, he addressed a letter of condolence to the Grand Master of Ireland, his Grace the Duke of Leinster, which letter and the answer to it he then read, copies of which are as follows:—

"To His Grace the Duke of Leinster, K.G., Most Worshipful Grand Master of Ireland.

"We, the Provincial Grand Master, Deputy Provincial Grand Master, Grand Wardens, and members of the Provincial Grand Lodge of Munster, beg to approach your grace with heartfelt expressions of sincere condolence upon the afflictive dispensation with which it has pleased the Great Disposer of events recently to visit you. We deeply deplore the loss which your grace has sustained, and we earnestly pray that under the teaching of that divine book, the great light and pillar of our order, you may be supported in your present heavy trial; and that finally when called to the Grand Lodge above, by a summons which none can evade, you may be able to depart in the certain assurance of a blissful reunion with her, so loved and esteemed on earth, in the cloudless regions of life and light eternal.

Carton, Maynooth, 1st March, 1859.

DEAR SIR AND BROTHER.—I have received your letter of the 26th of February, enclosing the address of condolence from the members of the Provincial Grand Lodge of Munster. I am most grateful for their kind sympathy; and as they truly say, it is to the Great Disposer of events alone I must look for consolation.

I am, dear Sir and Brother, yours very faithfully,
LEINSTER, G.M.

To the R.W. George Chatterton, Esq.,
D. Prov. G.M. of Munster.

COLONIAL.

TRINIDAD.

ON the 27th December, 1850, the foundation stone of a Masonic Temple, on Mount Zion, was laid by the then governor of the island, the Right Hon. Lord Harris, assisted by Bro. Daniel Hart, W.M. of Philanthropic Lodge, No. 585, and a numerous assemblage of brethren, and the gentry of the island. The building was built on shares between the members of the Philanthropic Lodge; and from the good feeling that prevailed, and the rapidity of the workmen, the brethren were enabled on the 24th June, 1851, to consecrate and dedicate the same to Masonic purposes. It is a stone building of two storeys, 50 feet long, 30 feet wide, and 25 feet high, in the clear. The upper story is used as the Lodge room, and is of the entire length and width of the building, besides a preparation room and lobby attached; the lower story is set apart as a banqueting room, to which is also attached a pantry and spare room. There is a portico in front, 30 feet long by 12 feet wide, built in the Gothic style, with three arches above, and three below, with Corinthian pillars. The building cost the brethren £800 sterling, and is the sole property of the shareholders. By a compact entered into, the building can never be used for any other than Masonic purposes.

At Sanfumando, a town twenty-eight miles from Port of Spain, there is also a Masonic building, which was in 1856 erected there by the brethren appertaining to Trinity Lodge; it is a plain, neat, and substantial building, with a Lodge room of 30 feet long, and 18 feet broad, with a lobby, pantry, and banqueting room attached, besides a gallery. The building cost £400 sterling.

At Port of Spain, besides the Philanthropic Lodge, there is the Lodge United Brothers, No. 251, under the registry of the Grand Lodge of Scotland. The building stands on Mount Morial, and takes precedence of any other Masonic Hall in the West Indies, except Antigua. It was erected in 1803. It is built of stone; having a very commodious Lodge room of 30 feet long, and 20 feet wide, which is neatly decorated. There is also a banqueting room, lobby, pantry, and preparation room attached, with a fine open gallery to the front. It is the exclusive property of the members who remain faithful to the allegiance of the charter.

THE WEEK.

THE COURT.—Her Majesty held a court at Buckingham Palace on Saturday morning, and took a carriage drive in the afternoon. In the evening Her Majesty, the Prince of Wales, the Prince Consort, the King of the Belgians, &c., honoured with their presence the Royal Italian Opera, Covent-garden. On Monday the Queen received at Buckingham Palace the address from the Convocation of the clergy of Canterbury. Her Majesty was seated on the throne, and the Archbishop of Canterbury read the address, to which her Majesty returned a gracious answer. The Duke of Oporto took leave of her Majesty on Tuesday afternoon. The Prince Consort was sworn in at the Trinity-house on his re-election as master of the Trinity corporation. The Queen and the Prince Consort, the King of the Belgians, and Princess Alice again went to the Italian Opera, Covent-garden, in the evening. It is said that her Majesty will not visit Scotland this season; it is supposed that she is going to Ireland instead. The Duchess of Kent continues to improve in health. Her Majesty held a privy council yesterday, at which several members of the new government were sworn in as privy councillors, and other business connected with the change of ministry transacted. Her Majesty had a dinner party in the evening.

FOREIGN NEWS.—The Empress Eugénie went on Sunday in state to the Cathedral of Notre Dame, to be present at a solemn Te Deum, as a thanksgiving for the late victory. The great officers of state and chief notabilities, civil and military, attended the service. A like service was to take place in all the churches of France. A Paris letter in a Brussels journal, says that 300,000 projectiles had been sent off to the army of Italy, and 1,000,000 more were to be manufactured for the same destination. The Moniteur informs us that the French have attacked the army of Annam, in Cochin China. They have also captured a fort, the loss of the enemy being 500 killed.—From the seat of war we have some slight news. An official message from the French head-quarters says, that the French army, increased by Prince Napoleon's corps, will operate against Verona, while part of the Sardinian army will begin the siege of Peschiera. Another official message from Turin informs us, that the Sardinian army has more closely invested the exterior fortifications of Peschiera, situated on the right bank of the Mincio. The army crossed the river on the 30th for the purpose of investing Peschiera, also on the left bank of the river. The Austrians have withdrawn from Bormio, abandoning their provision chests and cattle. The Piedmontese are advancing towards the Stelvio Pass. Louis Napoleon having sent back the wounded Austrian officers without exchange, and having requested an exchange of prisoners, an Austrian officer has arrived with the announcement that the Emperor of Austria will also send back, without exchange, the wounded prisoners of the allies, and that his majesty is equally disposed for an exchange of other prisoners. A telegram from the Emperor Napoleon to the Empress, says, "The whole army has passed the Mincio. The Sardinians have invested Peschiera. The reinforcements which I have received by the arrival of 35,000 men, led by Prince Napoleon, have enabled me to approach Verona without compromising myself in any way, as I have left a corps d'armée at Goito to watch Mantua, and am about to assemble another at Brescia to watch the passes of the Tyrol." An express has arrived in Paris from Berne, with the news that a corps of from 3,000 to 3,500 Tyrolean Chasseurs had been threatening the Valteline; but that several columns of Garibaldi's and Cialdini's corps had repulsed them from Bormio, and driven them as far as the first cantonment of the Stelvio Pass. The Austrians suffered considerable loss. General Garibaldi's loss was ten, severely wounded, and Cialdini's, three killed and four wounded. Advices have also been received from Locarno up to the 5th instant. The Sardinian steamers on the Lago Maggiore have been given up on condition of their being employed for mercantile purposes only; and the liberated vessels quitted Mogadino directly, with freight and passengers.—The little frontier difficulty between the Spanish and Portuguese Governments is likely to be amicably settled. The vine disease was making its reappearance, and some heavy rains had done great injury to the corn. The Prince of Wales is reported to have won golden opinions from the Portuguese. The Madrid Gazette of the 28th ult. mentions the death, at Seville, of M. Zea de Bermudez, who held several diplomatic and government offices during his political career. It is difficult to get any reliable news from the Spanish journals, but we learn that there have been some democratic outbreaks in that country, probably of a more serious character than the Madrid journals would lead us to believe.—It is stated that the proposals made by Prussia in the extraordinary sitting of the Federal Diet on the 4th instant, were the following: 1. The junction of the 9th and 10th corps d'armée to the Prussian army. 2. The appointment to the command in chief of the four non-Prussian and non-Austrian Federal corps d'armée. 3. The placing of all reserve contingents in readiness to march.—Accounts from Vienna state that the Emperor of Austria had arrived at Laxenburgh early on the 28th. Various conjectures had been formed as to the cause of this unexpected visit. Baron Hess has taken command of the Austrian army in Italy, to which the third corps, under the Archduke Albert, was proceeding by forced marches. The recruitment was going on so fast that 150,000 men would be clothed and equipped before the end of August.—Advices have also been received from Rome to the 2nd instant. The Giornale di Roma protests against the reports published of the massacre at Perugia, and promises a detailed account of what has really happened there. An official contradiction has been published of the reported liberation of criminals at Rome. A circular publication on the temporal power of the Pope, and an address by his Holiness to the cardinals on the Legations, have been issued, both expressing confidence in the Emperor of the French.—Advices have been received from Naples to the 2nd instant. Prince Ollojano has been despatched to the Court of St. James. The screw liner Marlborough, four sailing ships of the line, and one aviso steamer, originally bound for Athens, on receipt of important despatches last week, took another direction. The frigate Enryalus, having on board Prince Alfred, has also been ordered to proceed on its way with all speed.—Advices have been received from Constantinople to the 29th ult. The Divan has decided that reasons of State require the presence of the Sultan in Egypt, and he will therefore leave for that country immediately after the Fêtes of the Bairam. Great and magnificent preparations are being made for his journey. It is said that the Sultan will subsequently visit Candia, where the popular agitation has rendered fresh reinforcements necessary.—According to letters from Persia, 60,000 Russians have been sent against Khliva, via the Caspian Sea. Persia has given her assent to the expedition, the object of which is to reduce the Turcomans to submission.—The African has arrived at Liverpool with advices from New York to the 22nd ult. It was said that General Cass was preparing a circular on the subject of neutral rights, and that he does not acquiesce in the British views with regard to articles contraband of war.

INDIA AND COLONIES.—The overland mail has brought both the Bombay and Calcutta and China mails, by which we have dates from Calcutta to May 17th, Bombay, June 4th, and Hong-Kong, May 5th. The news from India is unimportant. The operations for the final suppression of yet existing disturbers seems confined to the usual encounters of parties of our troops with small bodies of flying rebels on the frontiers of Oude and Nepal, ending invariably in considerable slaughter among the latter. Many of these rebels continue to come in and surrender themselves to be admitted to the benefits of the amnesty. The dissatisfaction among the English soldiery of the late East India Company was subsiding.—The Peninsular and Oriental Steam Navigation Company have favoured us with the following communication:—"The Ellora, having on board the Calcutta and China and the Bombay mails, arrived at Marseilles at noon yesterday. The Alma grounded on Mooshedgerah, near the Harnish Islands, in the Red Sea, at three, A.M., June 12th; heeled over immediately, and the starboard and stern ports being put under water, she filled rapidly from above. The mails, crew, and passengers, all saved; and it was confidently believed that the vessel's bottom was not injured, and that she may be got off. Twenty-six of the Alma's passengers came on in the Ellora. The remainder are on board the Pera, which left Malta on the 30th June, and may be expected at Southampton on the 9th inst."

HOME NEWS.—A cabinet council was held on Saturday afternoon at Lord Palmerston's official residence, all the members of the cabinet were present, including Mr. Milner Gibson. Another council was held on Wednesday at the official residence of Lord Palmerston.—A painful termination has been made to the excursion of an Historic Society to Bolton. A wheel came off a vehicle, and the result was that four gentlemen were thrown violently to the ground, and the horse then breaking off into a gallop, others were subsequently thrown. No fatality occurred, but some of the injuries are of a very serious character.—On Monday, Samuel Adams, the murderer, was hanged at Newgate.—A suicide occurred at Cork on Friday evening under more than usually horrifying circumstances. A young married woman, in a fit of grief for the loss of a child, threw herself out of a window forty feet from the ground. Her mother, who had followed, succeeded in seizing her by the hair, when, as she was thus suspended, a man from a window below caught her by the feet. At the same moment the mother had to leave her hold; the body swung over, and also fell from the grasp of the person below, descending to a railing underneath, where the wretched woman was impaled, meeting instantaneous death.—In the Court of Exchequer, at Guildhall, the case of Swinfen v. Lord Chelmsford, has been tried. The question is whether Lord Chelmsford, then Sir F. Tesiger, had wrongly compromised an issue tried at Stafford in reference to a will in which the plaintiff was interested. Several witnesses were examined, when Sir F. Kelly asked if there was any evidence to go to the jury? The Lord Chief Baron said there was not a particle of evidence upon the second count. The learned counsel then made a most powerful address on behalf of his client. Lord Chelmsford, Mr. Justice Crosswell, and Lord Chief Justice Cockburn, were then examined, and the jury found a verdict for the defendant without a moment's hesitation.—At the Central Criminal Court, William Abraham Moore was charged with the wilful murder of his wife, Sophia. The trial occupied a very long time on account of the number of witnesses examined. The jury found the prisoner guilty of manslaughter only, and the court sentenced him to penal servitude for life.—Vice-Chancellor Wood has given judgment in the celebrated case, Gye v. Graziari, and after examining the evidence and going through the facts, made the following decree: Injunction to issue in the same terms as the injunction originally made; all costs to be paid by the two defendants, Signor Graziari, and Mr. E. T. Smith; inquiry in chambers as to damages.—A commission agent, named Lyon Goldsmith, of Finsbury-pavement, who was on Thursday last made a bankrupt, and immediately thereafter given into custody, underwent examination at Guildhall, on a charge of being guilty of certain fraudulent transactions connected with his bankruptcy. After hearing some preliminary evidence an adjournment was ordered.—The contest for the representation of the borough of Marylebone terminated on Wednesday in favour of Lord Fermoy. The close of the poll showed for the successful candidate a majority of 1,930 over Major Lyon, and 3,164 over Colonel Dickson; the numbers being—Fermoy, 4,238; Lyon, 2,308; Dickson, 1,074.—As usual at this period of the year, the return of the Registrar General shows an increase in the rate of mortality in the metropolis. Last week the deaths were 1,024, having been 913 and 970 in the two previous weeks. Diarrhoea is making progress, but at present is principally confined to children. The number of births for the week was 1,790.—On the 4th of July, the members of the American Association in London celebrated the eighty-third return of the anniversary of the American declaration of independence. General R. B. Campbell, the United States consul in England, presided, and Mr. Dallas, the American minister, was present. "The health of her Majesty" was given after that of the President. "Young America and Old England" was also given with much display of fraternal union.—The navy estimates have been issued. The total estimate for 1859-60 is £12,682,055; the amount already voted on account is £6,311,723, leaving £6,370,332 to be voted.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.—In the HOUSE OF LORDS on Monday the Duke of Marlborough moved the appointment of a select committee to inquire into the present operation of the law and practice respecting the assessment and levy of church rates. After some observations favourable to the appointment of a committee upon the subject from Lord Teynham, the Archbishop of Canterbury, Lord Portman, and the Bishop of London, Earl Granville, on the part of the Government, assented to the appointment of the committee.—On Tuesday, Lord Lyndhurst (in a most powerful speech) called attention to the state of the national defences. He said that the introduction of steam rendered the country more open to invasion than formerly, and that there was an absolute necessity to maintain the navy in such a state of efficiency that it might be able to cope with the joint navies of any two powers. Lord Stratford de Redcliffe said though fearless of invasion, he was an advocate for a powerful armament on sea and land. Earl Granville deprecated such discussion, as tending to endanger the preservation of peace. So far from invasion being at the present moment probable it was not even possible, for Russia was unprepared for war, and France was engaged in a costly and bloody struggle to which all her energies were devoted. On the part of the Government, however, he repeated that they would omit no means to place the defences of the country in a state of the utmost strength and efficiency.—In the HOUSE OF COMMONS, on Monday, the Chancellor of the Exchequer said as soon as some estimates which were pressing should be disposed of, he would bring forward his financial statement. Lord C. Paget, in reply to Sir J. Pakington, said it was the intention of the Government to bring in a bill during the present session to carry out the recommendations of the Royal commissioners for manning the navy. Lord Palmerston stated that, owing to the late period of the session it was not his intention to bring in a Reform Bill. Sir S. M. Peto moved for leave to bring in a bill for the prevention of noxious effluvia from the River Thames within the metropolis. After a short discussion, the motion for leave to bring in the bill was negatived without a division.—On Tuesday, Mr. Collier moved for leave to bring in a bill limiting the power of imprisonment for small debts exercised by the county court judges. His object, he said, was that no county court judge should have power to imprison for mere non-appearance, unless there should have been fraud in the contracting of the debt, or that he was satisfied that the debtor had the means of paying, and would not. He also proposed to limit the imprisonment on any one judgment to twice forty days. Mr. Malins expressed his indignation that some of these judges should have issued over 700 commitments in one year. Mr. Clive, on the part of the Government, assented to the introduction of the bill. Mr. Palk moved an address to her Majesty for providing arms and accoutrements for volunteer rifle corps, which led to much discussion, and Mr. Palk withdrew his motion on the assurance of Mr. S. Herbert that the Government was willing to encourage these volunteer corps as being very useful auxiliaries for the defence of the country.—On Wednesday Mr. Dillwyn moved the second reading of the Endowed Schools Bill, the object of which was, that no endowed school should be assumed to be established for the Church of England exclusively, unless it should appear from the instrument by which it was founded that such was the express intention of the founder. He disclaimed all intentions of making any attack on the Church of England, his only object being to give some protection to the dissenters. Sir S. Northcote said the measure was one which created much alarm, it being regarded more as an aggressive than as a protective bill. He believed the bill would give rise to a large amount of very mischievous litigation, and he therefore moved as an amendment that it be read a second time that day three months. Mr. Puller seconded the amendment, believing that it was an attack on the established church. Sir R. Bethell supported the second reading of the bill. Sir H. Cairns supported the amendment. Mr. Gladstone could not see in the bill the elements of a party difference, and all were so nearly unanimous as to finding a remedy for the grievances complained of that they should not present to the public the appearance of disagreement. He therefore advocated the suggestion of Sir G. C. Lewis. After considerable discussion, the house divided, and the second reading of the bill was carried by a majority of two hundred and ten to one hundred and ninety-two.

PUBLIC AMUSEMENTS.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.—At Covent Garden Theatre the magnificent "Puritani" was given for the first time this season on Saturday night, in presence of a brilliant audience, among whom were her Majesty, Prince Albert, the Prince of Wales, the King of the Belgians, and other distinguished persons. The cast was as follows:—Elvira, Mine. Penco; Arturo, Gardoni; Riccardo, Signor Graziani; and Giorgio, Signor Ronconi. Mme. Penco was true to nature, expressive, if not passionate, thoroughly versed in the artifices of the stage, and able to make the most of every point suggested by dramatist or composer. "Son vergin vezzosa" was fluent, correct, and showy. Not only did Signor Gardoni sing his part in "Ah te, o cara" well, but all the music that belongs to Arturo—more especially in the third act—and Signor Ronconi's Giorgio, we are inclined to think, will be admitted by connoisseurs as the very best that has been witnessed since the inimitable Lablache. On Thursday Flotow's "Martha" was again performed by the same artists as on the last occasion.

DRURY LANE.—On Saturday "Don Giovanni" was again performed, on the occasion of the last night of the subscription. The principal morceaux were enthusiastically received by a very numerous audience, and, after the termination of the opera, the indefatigable entrepreneur was summoned before the curtain, and warmly welcomed by his patrons. Mr. Smith's benefit was a series of triumphs. In addition to scenes from the "Barber of Seville," the "Traviata," the "Trovatore," and other operas which have been produced with success during the present season at Drury Lane, Mademoiselle Titiens appeared in the grand scena from "Fidelio." Badiali, Mongini, and Fagotti, sang the trio from "William Tell;" Mademoiselle Piccolomini and Signor Giuglini gave the duet from "I Martiri," which was performed with so much success last season at her Majesty's Theatre, and, finally, Mr. E. T. Smith made a speech. In his brief but effective oration, the manager referred with natural satisfaction to his efforts on behalf of the public, and added some explanations in justification of his conduct in re Graziani. On Thursday "Norma" was given with the following cast:—Pollio, Mongini; Oroveso, Vialetti; Adalgisa, Mdlle. Brambilla; and Norma, Mdlle. Titiens (her first appearance in that character). M. Benedict led the admirable orchestra, which has now arrived at perfection.

At the HAYMARKET, PRINCESS'S, and OLYMPIC, we have nothing new to report this week.

NEW ADELPHI THEATRE.—Mr. Webster has concluded a short engagement with Mr. and Mrs. Henri Drayton, who, on Thursday, gave their excellent entertainment called "Never Judge by Appearances." They were most favourably received by a crowded and fashionable audience. Mr. A. Wigan's admirable comic acting in the "First Night," continues to attract.

STRAND THEATRE.—The comedietta produced on Wednesday for the entrée of Miss Swanborough, entitled "A School for Coquettes," and announced as "new and never acted," is by Mr. Palgrave Simpson. We may record its success. Miss Swanborough played in the part of the widow extremely well, and Miss M. Oliver acted charmingly, affording occasional touches of natural pathos and grace, which frequently assisted in relieving the well-known bent of the situations in which the personage she represents was involved. The audience loudly applauded the comedietta after the fall of the curtain, and recalled the ladies and gentlemen engaged in its performance. A new burlesque extravaganza by Mr. Henry J. Byron is to be produced on Monday, under the title of "The Very Latest Edition of the Lady of Lyons." Miss Marie Wilton is to be the Pauline of the revival, and Miss Charlotte Saunders the Melnotte.

CRYSTAL PALACE.—The vocal and instrumental concert on Saturday attracted a large attendance of subscribers and fashionable visitors. The vocalists were Miss Clara Novello and Mr. Sims Reeves, who sang several of their favourite morceaux, and elicited the most cordial tokens of approval from their hearers. The fourth of the operatic concerts took place on Wednesday afternoon, and included, as usual, two overtures, two grand concerted pieces as finales to the first and second parts of the entertainment, and a variety of solos and duets from the most popular operas of the day. All the principal vocalists of the Royal Italian Opera Company appeared. The concert was well attended, and in spite of the heat (which, however, was sufficient to prevent anything like mere lukewarmness on the part of the audience) the applause was frequent and energetic.

Obituary.

BRO. ROBERT RAMSAY.

On the 28th June, at the Asylum for Aged Masons, Croydon. Bro. Robert Ramsay who, had he lived another month, would have completed his 88th year. Bro. Ramsay was initiated in the Lodge of Fidelity (No. 3), London, in the year 1793; he afterwards joined the Lodge of Industry (No. 56), Swallow, Durham, since removed to Gateshead, and subsequently the Gehon Lodge (No. 57), London. He was elected on the Aged Masons Annuity Fund in the year 1837, and was one of the first occupants of the asylum, into which he was received on its opening in 1850, and in which he has quietly passed the close of his days, not having a relative or friend (save his Masonic brethren) left to assist him.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

MASONIC MISSIONS.—A "W.M." writes: "I am obliged by your notice of Norfolk Freemasonry; it has already done some good. We want stirring up!"

"R. E. X."—The Constitutions, p. 63, edition 1855, will not justify the Worshipful Master referred to in wearing the jewel of a Mark Master, either during Lodge hours, or at the banquet. You state that at a banquet the Worshipful Master observed "several brethren bearing such jewels, in addition to P.M., R.A. and others worn by an officer of Grand Lodge, and the said officer informed the Worshipful Master he could wear his if he were a Mark Master." To which "R. E. X." adds, "My opinion is that the Worshipful Master is not justified in wearing such jewel during Lodge hours, but at a banquet, which is merely a private party of gentlemen dressed in Masonic costume, dining in a private room, he may wear it. Which is right?"—[Our reply is—neither. The Grand Officer must have been ignorant of the laws and constitutions of the Order; and the distinction drawn by "R. E. X." cannot be recognized. Either in Lodge or at banquet, whilst Masonic clothing is worn, the brethren must be held to be amenable to Masonic law, which knows nothing of the "Mark degree;" it not being acknowledged in English Freemasonry, as defined in the Book of Constitutions. If the "Mark" jewel is allowed to be worn, then may some brother claim also the right to wear the jewel of the Rose Croix, or the Star of the Knight Templar.]

"313 & 730."—On the same ground which induced us to decline publishing a letter of a P.M., 730, in our last, so must we decline publishing a letter on the subject from Bro. Clark, P.M., 313, and Prov. S.G.D., Worcestershire. At the same time we can assure Bro. Clark that he is altogether mistaken in his surmise as to our correspondent, who has no right to the prefix with which Bro. Clark has honoured him. We are glad, however, to receive the assurance, not only of Bro. Clark, but of two other highly respected brothers, that there have been no disputes between the Dudley brethren on the subject of the Hagley festival.

BRO. S. BARTON WILSON, P.G.D.—In our report of the association of the Wellington Lodge, Deal, in our number of the 29th ult., we accidentally omitted to state that Bro. Wilson was elected an honorary member in acknowledgment of his distinguished position as a Mason, and performing the ceremony of consecration, and that the address delivered by Bro. Pullen, the D. Prov. Grand Master, Isle of Wight, was written for the occasion by Bro. S. B. Wilson. In our notice of the Crystal Palace Lodge of Instruction, Bro. Wilson ought also to have been described as an honorary member.

LONDON, SATURDAY, JULY 16, 1880.

THE ROYAL BENEVOLENT INSTITUTION FOR AGED MASONS AND THEIR WIDOWS.

THE dispensation of that charity, which is enjoined alike by the principles of our ancient Order and the precepts of our religion, is perhaps, to the well-constituted mind, the easiest in performance of the whole round of social duties; for callous indeed must be the heart that derives no satisfaction from supplying the wants of others. It is true that there is an inherent weakness in the bosoms of most mortals which inclines them from time to time to favouritism or to prejudice, and operates as a hindrance to the exercise of an unbiassed judgment and an equal distribution of benevolence. To this cause perhaps may be attributed the very prosperous condition of the Royal Freemasons' Girls School, which until lately has thrown comparatively into the shade the other great charities which belong to the Craft—the innocence and winning ways of the pretty little residents at Battersea Rise have, no doubt, contributed in a great degree to produce the munificent contributions of the brethren to that noble institution. On the other hand, the Boys School and the Benevolent Institution, although acknowledged to be equally valuable, can certainly not be said to have achieved a corresponding amount of success.

The attention of the brethren has happily been awakened to the necessity of placing all the three charities upon a similarly prosperous footing, and the efforts of the last year or two have done wonders for the Boys School, and the Aged Masons, while we rejoice to find that the Girls School has not in the slightest degree suffered. And we think that the progress of the Royal Benevolent Fund must be considered peculiarly satisfactory.

In another page will be found a most gratifying return of the receipts and expenditure of the two funds of this institution from the date of their establishment to the 30th March last. It shows how steadily the funds are growing in the affections and support of the brethren. By the return it will be seen that, since the establishment of the Male Annuity Fund in 1842, only seventeen years since, the total receipts, including the donations from Grand Lodge and Chapter, had amounted to £28,242, of which Grand Lodge and Chapter have given £8,258, the brethren and private Lodges by donations £6,586, and by annual subscriptions £9,474. Of this sum no less than £10,858 have been invested to provide for the permanence of the fund, and £13,214 have been dispensed in annuities amongst 137 brethren, many of whom would have been reduced, by no fault of their own, from affluence to absolute want—but for the aid afforded by this institution—as is proved by the case of the brother whose death we recorded last week, and who, after enjoying the advantages flowing from the institution for a period of twenty-two years, died without a relative or friend to perform even the last sad duties of humanity, and which were therefore, of course, undertaken by the Institution. Though much more recently established, only in 1849, and not quite so munificently supported by Grand Lodge, the Widows' Fund shows an equally gratifying progress. The total receipts on account of this fund have been £6,111 of which £1,744 have arisen from the votes of Grand Lodge and Chapter; £2,525 from the donations of private Lodges and brethren; and £1,021 from annual subscriptions. The funded property already amounts to £3,450, and the sum of £3,236 has been disbursed in annuities amongst thirty recipients—each of whom, like the male annuitants, have also had the option of going into the Asylum if they so desired.

We think the returns speak trumpet tongued for the prosperity and finance of the Institution, and it only requires exertions such as were made at the last festival to be emulated in January next, and to be continued for two or three years longer to enable us to boast that the poorer brethren or their widows never appeal to us in vain to render the close of their lives comparatively happy and comfortable; but that if worthy a safe and sure retreat from the pangs of poverty is to be found in the Royal Benevolent Institution for aged Masons and their Widows.

In fig. 11, from a miniature of the sixteenth century, taken from a MS. in the library of St. Mark, the whole field is filled in with rays of light, the centre ones being much shorter than those at the angles, and partaking of the shape of the square nimbus with concave lines.

11. Square nimbus, concave sides and rays of light.

In a fresco of Campo Santa, at Pisa, of the fourteenth century, Michael Angelo has represented Christ showing his wounds to his disciples, the head being adorned with rays of light of very unequal lengths.

In all the examples that may be met with, the rays seem to spring from the centre of the forehead between the eyes. In fig. 10 the rays are thrown out from thence in a line with the temples, and the region of the brain. This may be seen also in the head of an infant Christ, painted in the sixteenth century fig. 12, (also Italian), where the rays emanate from these several points, instead of finding their common centre in the forehead. It was in the sixteenth century, that luminous circles, drawn in perspective, first appeared, adapting themselves to the several positions of the heads, as in fig. 13.

A more marked nimbus, and one only applied to the godhead, the allegorical lamb, or the Virgin Mary, is that in which the centre rays of fig. 10 are omitted, the others cut shorter than the outer circle, and the point of the rays connected by an inner curved line reaching only to them. In some early examples these rays retain their straight form, but this was soon abandoned for one more graceful, in which the lines are curved, as in fig. 14. The lower ray or bar is concealed by the head, otherwise it would be a perfect Greek cross.

13. Circular perspective nimbus. Circa 1500.

As to the propriety of this form for the Son of God, there can be no doubt, but it is applied equally to the other persons of the Trinity, as may be seen in a remarkable painting of the Trinity, of the thirteenth century, in which the figures of the Father and the Son are exactly similar, while the Holy Ghost is in the form of a dove standing on a globe, held by both the Father and the Son, each having a similar nimbus.

14. Cruciform circular nimbus. Circa 1200.

That these rays are intended to represent the cross, is evident from the sculpture on an old sarcophagus in the Vatican representing Christ sending forth his disciples to preach to and baptize all nations; in one hand he holds the volume of the sacred law, while the other points to the stream of water running at his feet. In this example the disciples, though represented as lambs, have no nimbus, neither has Christ himself, but the symbolic lamb which stands by him has the Latin cross on a nimbus, elevated from the head, as fig. 15. All the lambs seem to be advancing to the mound on which Jesus and the lamb are standing, teaching us that all christianity should thus be tending towards that stream of baptism which flows at his feet. In fig. 16 is a cruciform nimbus of the eleventh century, elevated entirely above the head.

15. Cruciform nimbus of the Divine Lamb.

16. Cruciform nimbus.

17. Circular cruciform nimbus of the Divine Lamb.

In the tenth century the Lamb of God was frequently represented with a nimbus, the bases of which were opaque, but bearing in the centre of each a perfect cross, as in fig. 17.

The cruciform nimbus was a sign characterising equally the Son and the other two persons of the Trinity, but the cross itself is an attribute which belongs immediately to Christ, and through whom the Father and Holy Ghost have it quartered, as it were, on the field of their nimbus. The Greek church particularly honours Christ, believing that he alone is the source of being. It is thus that he is represented on their iconoclasts and in their stained glass. He is also represented governing the Greek church as he does the world. His form, too, is more often represented than that of either the Father or Holy Ghost. In every era this has been the principal form delineated, sometimes as a youth, sometimes as a young man with a flowing beard, but it remained with the papacy to depict him as an old man, under the figure of a Pope, almost worn out with old age. In very many paintings he is represented as the creator of the world, with a cruciform nimbus, and holding in his hand, or resting his hand upon, a globe, symbolic of the world of his creation.

In Rheims Cathedral it is also the custom to give greater honour to the Son, during the service, than to the other persons of the Trinity. It is a curious custom, and peculiar to one or two of the continental churches. When the Gloria Patrie is said, the name of the Father is passed over without any notice, but at the word "Filio," the clergy and choristers rise, and reverentially incline the head, seating themselves when the Holy Ghost is mentioned.

This may arise from the force of early impressions, but holy writ fully justifies this adoration; and from that passage in St. Paul to the Philippians, "At the name of Jesus every knee shall bow, &c.," we may trace the origin of the innumerable representations of the Son over the Father and the Spirit.

While this prominence is given to the Son, the Deity, or God the Father, is sometimes represented by a portion only of the body, most frequently the hand. In this case it is usually surrounded by a circular nimbus with cross bars forming a cross, and with rays of light decorating the remainder of the field. These are supposed to form the earliest representation of the Father, and the hand is usually extended as if in the act of blessing. In the frescoes of St. Savin (twelfth century) the hand of God, without a nimbus is extended from the clouds, blessing Melchizedek. There are several other examples of the divine hand being without a nimbus, but where a nimbus is shown it is nearly always decorated by the cross.

There is another form of nimbus that we have only incidentally mentioned, and that is the triangle; some artists have connected the rays from the temples with those of the brows, forming a pyramid, the base line of which extends through the forehead as in fig. 3. There has been something more than accident, however, in thus forming the triangle. Members of the Royal Arch degree of Freemasons know perfectly well some of the attributes of this sacred figure, attributes peculiar to the Craft; but independently of these, the triangle possesses a mystical reason which maintains its importance among other geometrical forms. It ever has been considered as the geometrical emblem of the Trinity, representing in its unbroken area, the unity of one God in three persons. Throughout the whole of Asia the triad is a mystic number. It is symbolic of the attributes of the Supreme Being, uniting in itself the properties of the two first numbers of the unity and the duad. The Grecians adopted this form at a very early date, but it remained with the Italians to elevate it as a fitting symbol of the Great Architect of the Universe, the Great I A M. This expresses perfect divinity, but the Greek Masons by adding another triangle, symbolized the infinity as well as the divinity of the godhead. In the centre of the double triangle are sometimes written three Greek words, called by Royal Arch Masons the Holy Tau, and which indicate the Supreme Being. The words then represent the great Jehovah; the triangle, the Trinity; and the double triangle the infinity of God. In a fresco at Mount Athos, the three persons are represented with each a different nimbus. The Father with the double triangle, with three Greek words signifying "I am that I am;" the Son with a circular nimbus with cross bars, and the same words; and the Holy Ghost as a dove, without a nimbus, but in an aureola.

Another fresco in the same place contains the coronation of the Virgin by the Holy Trinity. Mary has a circular nimbus, the Holy Ghost a circular radiating nimbus, Christ a circular cruciform nimbus, and the Father a triangular radiating nimbus. These different forms show different gradations of dignity, and are made to indicate, moreover, the hierarchy of created beings, and the relative position of the different persons of the Trinity. In our own times Canby asserts that the triangle expressed three of the inseparable attributes of Deity—"to be, to think, to act." It has thus been, undoubtedly, the geometrical expression of the Trinity, and it can therefore be easily conceived that the triangular nimbus would be peculiarly appropriate to God the Father. The triangle thus belongs especially to the Father, is sometimes given to the Son, but never to the Virgin.

Angels, saints, and holy men are frequently decorated with a nimbus; but in these instances they are mostly confined to a circular form with the field of the disc perfectly plain. St. John the Baptist is never represented without a nimbus, in most cases consisting of a double circle. Joseph, the husband of Mary, is also occasionally represented with one, as in the Cathedral of Chartres. The nimbus of the Virgin Mary is frequently highly decorated with jewels, &c., and having rays, but in very few instances cruciform. The apostles are always adorned with the nimbus. In the porch of Rheims Cathedral, the nimbi of St. Peter and St. Paul are adorned with pearls, and on the chancel windows nearly all the apostles are represented with nimbi ornamented with precious stones, emeralds, rubies and sapphires.

The nimbus has been given by the ancients to allegorical figures as well, but they confined it solely to everything powerful, and everything good. Any creature supposed to be infirm, or destitute of power, or deficient in virtue was denied it. The nimbus is the characteristic of physical energy, as well as of moral strength, of civil and political power, as well as of religious authority.

THE AUREOLA.

We will now touch upon another emblem of glory, similar in character to that of the nimbus, but different in size, form, and position. The aureola, like the nimbus, is intended to represent rays of light, and is frequently drawn in wavy lines.

The aureola is, in fact, an enlarged nimbus, and the nimbus a diminished aureola; the one is confined entirely to the head; the other surrounds the whole body.

For the reasons given in introducing the nimbus, the aureola has not that importance when used alone, which is attached to the simple nimbus, in that case conferring no honour upon the person decorated therewith; but when combined with the nimbus, it completes the figure, and is supposed to make the glorification of the representation perfect.

It is in fact the symbolic token of supreme power and energy, and therefore should belong to God himself, he being the very centre, as it were, of omnipotence. The Roman Catholics, however, extend the aureola beyond the Trinity, and confer it upon the Virgin Mary, ranking as they say she does, superior to saints and angels. She is therefore usually represented in an aureola, but mostly of the oval shape. In the cathedral of Our Lady at Paris, she is framed in an oval of clouds, the field being decorated with stars; and in the Campo Santo, at Pisa, in the picture of the last judgment, the Virgin is sitting on a rainbow, and surrounded by an aureola. When the church became corrupt, that is in about the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries, the aureola was prostituted to very base purposes—remaining no longer the attribute of divinity, but enshrining equally the souls of mortals, with the person of the Trinity. In Chartres Cathedral are many examples of this debasement of Christian art—one in particular being the soul of St. Martin, in an oval aureola surrounded by flames of fire, the aureola possibly representing the power of the Roman church, which is said to keep the soul free from the smell of fire while undergoing the pains of purgatory.

Up to the fifteenth century the inner line of the aureola was formed by decided lines, but soon afterwards the well defined border gradually disappeared, and, like the nimbus, it became formed by rays of light or wavy lines.

The aureola is of many forms, the most common being that of the "vescia piscis." It is formed of a perfect oval—a circle, a quatrefoil, a cinquefoil, &c., in which latter case the head, shoulders, &c., are made to occupy distinct lobes. In some cases it fits close to the body, or assimilates itself to the form of the body, but detached from it.

With the Italians the outer line of the aureola is perfect, as in most examples of the Italian nimbus, one of which is represented in fig. 18, taken from a miniature of the fourteenth century, in the library of St. Mark. The transverse line is the rainbow, as they are usually drawn by Italians at that epoch. When God the Father is represented, he is usually sitting, with his feet resting upon a rainbow, a second supporting his back, and a third pillowing his head. The aureola is chiefly confined in early examples to the two first persons of the Trinity, but the figure of the Holy Ghost may sometimes be found so enshrined. When this is the case, we always find the Holy Ghost forming part of a tableau, in which the two first persons occupy the most prominent part. Of this I gave an example in fig. 7, treating of the nimbus.

18. Circa 1200.

Fig. 19 represents God the Son in an aureola of clouds, taking the form of the body; it is of the tenth century, and a very good example of this kind. The upper and lower portions are two small circles—the upper containing the head and bust, and the lower the feet; the lines confining the body are those of the "vescia piscis," but cut short at each point by the intercepting circles.

The pure oval shape is sometimes formed by branches of trees, which open and leave a vacant space; sometimes by wreaths also, each side being reversed. In a miniature of the thirteenth century, Jesus is represented in an oval aureola, formed by branches of trees, each branch having three smaller branches springing therefrom, on which are three doves; while the upper portion of both branches support the Dove—the Holy Ghost. These seven doves are to represent the seven gifts of the Spirit, which were conferred upon Christ. Each dove is enclosed in a circular aureola; but they are devoid of nimbi. A similar aureola is to be met with at Rome—the aureola in this case being formed by the petals of flowers, the stems of which spring from the branches.

19. Circa 1100.

In representing God with the aureola, we frequently find a carpet substituted for the lower rainbow, and more or less emblematically figured, but to represent the heavens as his footstool instead of the earth. This does not carry out the beautiful picture, delineated in the first Craft lecture—"He has stretched forth the heavens as a canopy—he has planted the earth as his footstool—he has crowned his temple with stars as with a diadem, and in his hand he extends the power and the glory. The sun and moon are messengers of his divine will, and all his laws are concord." In the cathedral of Città di Castelló, in Italy, is an oval aureola of the twelfth century, in which Christ appears with a cruciform nimbus; on his left the moon's crescent; on his right the sun spreads his glistening rays; and in the field of the aureola shine stars with five points, or lobes, like the rose.

One great peculiarity in the aureola as pictured by the Byzantians is, that it takes the shape of a wheel, six rays usually diverging from the centre. In Chartres Cathedral are two or three very good representations of this example.

The aureola is frequently used for the Divinity, the Virgin, &c., without any other distinguishing attribute, but in most cases it is combined with the nimbus, making then, what is termed by the most celebrated of the Christian archaeological authorities of the present day,

THE PERFECT GLORY.

In fig. 19, the upper circle of the aureola forms the nimbus itself, the field being decorated with the cross bars, but in most other examples the nimbus is kept entirely distinct and separate.

The glory is popularly applied to the nimbus, and not without reason, where that alone is used; but if we take the glory of God, as described by Ezekiel, we shall see at once that the aureola alone can fully convey that idea. He says, "Then I beheld, and lo, a likeness as the appearance of fire; from his loins, even downward, fire—from his loins, even upward, as the appearance of brightness, as the colour of amber. And behold the glory of the God of Israel was there." A similar description may be found in the 24th chapter of Exodus, and the 17th verse.*

It is thus that the Deity is represented as the centre of radiating light, or surrounded by luminous clouds. In a miniature of the tenth century Jesus is represented as coming to judge the world, being surrounded with clouds, and having above the following inscription:—"Dominus in nubibus, et vident eum inimici ejus et qui perpugerunt." The glory is sometimes represented as a tongue or flame of fire resting upon the head, but this should be confined to the Holy Spirit, it being in that shape that the Holy Ghost descended to the apostles. It is often used as a simple flame in this sense, but only as a nimbus, and without pretension to the term glory. Fire is, however, the especial attribute of God, for under his visible form God is light. At Mount Sinai, at the transfiguration, and at the burning bush, fire represented "power," the power of the Divinity. At the expulsion of Adam from the garden of Eden, power was also described by the two flaming swords,—and by fire, therefore, did the ancient artists most correctly delineate this especial attribute.

MARK MASONRY.

FROM A SCOTTISH CORRESPONDENT.

THE ancient Mason Lodges of Scotland appear to have been almost exclusively of an operative character. This was clearly the case with regard to the Lodge of Edinburgh Mary's Chapel, the Lodge of Glasgow St. John, the Lodge of Ayr, the Lodge of Stirling, the Lodge of Dunfermline, the Lodge of Dundee, the Lodge of Aitchison's Haven, the Lodge of St. Andrew's, the Lodge of Melrose, the Lodge of Kilwinning, and others that might be mentioned. The Lodge of Glasgow St. John has a charter conferring on it important powers and privileges, granted by Malcolm III., King of Scotland, at Fordel, on the 5th day of October, 1051. The Lodge of Edinburgh dates from 1513, and almost all the Lodges named were in existence previous to the year 1600, as the signatures of their chief office-bearers appear at that date appended to a charter granted to the Laird of Roslin, renewing to him and his heirs all the powers and privileges which his forefathers had for several generations enjoyed as patrons and protectors of the Mason Craft within the realm of Scotland.

The old Lodges of Scotland being thus composed for the most part of operative Masons, it is natural to conclude that it was incumbent on each member to have a distinctive mark, which he should record in the books of the Lodge, and which he should inscribe on his working tools, and particularly on the stones which he prepared for the buildings at which he was employed. We accordingly find that at a meeting of the Masters of Lodges, convened at Edinburgh on the 28th December, 1598, by William Schaw, "Maister of Wark" to his Majesty James VI., and general Warden of the Mason Craft in Scotland, it was inter alia statuted and ordained "That na Maister or Fallow of Craft be ressavit nor admitted without the numer of six Maisteris and twa enterit Prenteisses, the Wardene of that Ludge being one of the said six; and that the day of the resavving of said Fallow of Craft or Maister be orderlie buikit, and his name and mark insert in the said buik, with the names of his six admittors and enterit Prenteisses," &c.

The advantage of a mark; and a law to regulate its use are evident. By referring to the books of the Lodge the mark of each brother was known, and the newly entered workman was prevented from adopting a mark already appropriated by another. The operative, by placing his mark on his tools, could readily recognize them when mixed with those of his fellow workmen, and could thus keep them from being used or claimed by others. By cutting his mark on the stones which he squared or carved, they could at once be distinguished, and the overseer was able to award to him either praise or blame, according as he had performed his work. The marking of stones was carefully attended to by the ancient Masons of Scotland, as their marks are still found on most of the old baronial and ecclesiastical edifices of this country. The elegant monument erected by Anna of Denmark, Queen of James VI., in the Abbey Church of Dunfermline, to the memory of William Schaw, already mentioned, contains the Mason marks of that distinguished member of the Craft. They are as follows: being most likely his ordinary and his official marks.

We consider that it is a matter beyond dispute that the members of the old operative Lodges of Scotland were required to take a mark, but the question to be settled is—was any ceremony observed in bestowing it? The books of the old Lodges would most likely throw light on this subject; but, unfortunately, access to these documents cannot be very readily obtained. In the records of the Lodge of Edinburgh it is frequently stated that the persons admitted as members took a mark, and paid a fee for obtaining this privilege. The marks of many of the members are consequently found in the books of the Lodge. This plainly and incontrovertibly establishes the fact that the Lodge of Edinburgh, long before the institution of the Grand Lodge of Scotland, and long before the existence of a Royal Arch Chapter was heard of, was in the practice of conferring marks upon its members; but it leaves us still in the dark regarding the special rite or ceremony that was observed. This Lodge, about a hundred years ago, lost its strictly operative character, and, from that time, it appears to have abandoned the practice of Mark Masonry.

In the year 1707, the Lodge of Edinburgh was split into two divisions. One comprised the Masters, and the other the Journeymen or Fellow Crafts. The Masters were superior in influence and authority; but the Journeymen had a much greater portion of numerical strength. After an arduous and determined struggle, the Journeymen succeeded, by an appeal to the Lords of Council and Session, in obtaining a right to exist as a separate and independent society, "to communicate the Mason's word, and receive fees for the same."

For forty years the members of this new society went no farther in their Masonic working than the degree of Fellow Craft. On the 27th December, 1750, James Dick, Gilbert Duncan, and William McLean, members of the Lodge Journeymen, were raised to the sublime degree of Master Mason, in the parent Lodge of Edinburgh, Mary's Chapel, and these were the first Master Masons connected with the Journeymen. The fact that they and a large number of other Journeymen a short time afterwards were all raised without the payment of any fee, show that an entire reconciliation had by this time been effected between the two Lodges.

The founders of the Lodge Journeymen were evidently all Mark Masons. The marks of a considerable number of them are found in the records of the Lodge of Mary's Chapel—the Lodge in which they were all entered and passed, most of them towards the close of the seventeenth century. We give a few of their marks as a specimen:—

The Jo. Weymouth continued to maintain the operative character of their Lodge by admitting only one non-operative to eleven operative, and this regulation was strictly enforced till within these few years. They appear all along to have practised Mark Masonry—a thing which was to be expected from a body of men sprung from the operative Lodge of Mary's Chapel, and belonging nearly all to the building art. The minutes of the Lodge being chiefly devoted to monetary transactions, very little is said in them regarding Mark Masonry till the year 1789. At that time it was found that some of the members had neglected to make themselves acquainted with this department of Masonry, and, therefore, they were enjoined to lose no time in submitting to initiation; and in order to identify it more closely with the Lodge, it was agreed that it should in time to come be placed under the direction of the Master and ordinary managers, and that the fees derived from initiations should go into the common fund of the Lodge. At the time referred to, Bro. J. McDonald held the office of Mark Master. He was an enlightened and zealous Mark Mason, and for his great services in initiating and instructing the brethren, received the thanks of the Lodge in 1790. It appears that it was through his zeal and attention that a more regular record of the marks of the members began to be kept than had hitherto been the case. The practice established by him has been kept up to the present time, and the result is that the Journeymen possess a roll of marks more extensive perhaps than any modern Craft Lodge in the kingdom. Bro. McDonald continued to fill the office of Mark Master for several years, and had for his Senior Overseer Bro. Peter Douglas; and his Junior Overseer, Bro. John Moir; two of the most distinguished Masons in the Lodge. In 1806, a special jewel was prepared for the Mark Master, and was worn by the brother who filled that office till 1822, when it, along with the other jewels and clothing of the Lodge, was forcibly taken from the Tyler in a street of the city as he was one evening carrying them home after a visitation to the Lodge St. James, and never was recovered. Three Mark jewels were afterwards provided, and these continue to be worn by the Mark Master, and his Senior and Junior Overseers.

The members of the Lodge Journeymen, are all, with few exceptions, Mark Masons. They have long held that Mark Masonry should form part of the Fellow Craft degree, and therefore on various occasions they have urged that it should be recognized as such by the Grand Lodge of Scotland. With this view they, in the beginning of last year, presented a memorial to the Grand Lodge, complaining that the Supreme Arch Chapter of Scotland had unwarrantably assumed the sole power to grant warrants to work Mark Masonry, and claiming protection in their ancient rights and privileges. The Grand Committee entertained the memorial with much cordiality and unanimity, and gave the following deliverance, viz:—

"1. That the Grand Committee having taken into consideration the petition from the Lodge Journeymen, and the reasons adduced by Bro. Kerr in support of it, are of opinion that it has been proved to their satisfaction, that certain Lodges have worked the Mark Degree ever since their foundation, previous to the existence of the Grand Lodge, and have continued to do so to the present time.

"2. That the assumption by any other authority of the sole power to grant warrants for the working of Mark Masonry, is consequently an interference with the rights and privileges of Lodges under the jurisdiction of the Grand Lodge.

"3. That the Grand Lodge Committee recommend the Grand Lodge of Scotland to appoint a special committee to enter into communication with the Grand Lodges of England and Ireland, and any other authority claiming of Scotch jurisdiction in Masonry, to endeavour to come to some amicable and fraternal arrangement, and to report to next quarterly communication."

At the quarterly communication, which took place on the 1st of February, 1854, some of the members of the Supreme Arch Chapter were disposed to cavil at the report of the Grand Committee, but it was adopted by a large majority, and the following brethren were appointed a special committee to carry its recommendation into effect, viz: J. Whyte Melville, chairman; Andrew Kerr, William Hunter, John Duchar, Hector Gavin, James Finlayson, F. D. McCowan, and Samuel Sommerville.

This committee, we understand, has met, but we have not heard that anything has yet resulted from their proceedings. We may at a future period have occasion to make a few further remarks on this subject.

SURREY ARCHÆOLOGICAL SOCIETY.

THE sixth annual general meeting of this society was held on the 5th inst., at Richmond, and was attended by a large number of ladies and gentlemen, members of the association, and their visitors. The chair was taken at eleven o'clock, in the large room of the National Schools in Eton-street, by Lord Abinger, the vice-president, and there were present during the proceedings of the day, Mr. Evelyn of Wootton; Rev. Harry Dupuis, Vicar of Richmond; Mr. Geo. Scharf, F.S.A.; Mr. H. G. Bohn; Mr. William Lambert; Rev. R. Burgh Byam, M.A.; Rev. H. Branker; Rev. J. Chandler; Rev. C. Lushington, and a number of gentlemen well known in literary circles. The business of the day was commenced by the reading of the annual report of the council, to which were appended the balance sheet and the auditors' report; from these documents it appears that the progress of the society during the year has been highly satisfactory, a large number of new members having been added to the muster roll of the association, and its pecuniary resources largely increased. The present very efficient committee and local honorary secretaries were, with some slight alterations, re-elected, and the value of their services acknowledged; and at twelve o'clock the reading of the following papers was commenced:—

1. "Notices of the Family of Cobham, of Sterborough Castle, Lingfield, Surrey," by John Wickham Flower, Esq. The subject was illustrated by a series of rubbings from some ancient sepulchral brasses in Lingfield Church. In the course of this paper Mr. Flower read some interesting extracts from old wills preserved in the archbishop's registry at Lambeth, which have never yet been published; in particular from those of Reginald the second Lord Cobham of Sterborough; of his mother, Joan, daughter of Maurice Lord Berkeley, and widow of that famous Lord Cobham, created a Knight of the Garter by Edward III., who led a division of the English army on the memorable day of Crécy, and under whose orders the Black Prince won his spurs upon that occasion. Among other passages in these documents is a bequest by the Lord Cobham of one hundred pounds, to be expended in masses and divine offices for the repose of the soul of his godmother, Philippa, Queen of Edward III.—as he expresses it, "pur l'aine de ma tres honorable comiere, Dame Philippe, jadis Reyne d'Angleterre;" he also devised thirty pounds to purchase ten thousand masses for the repose of his own soul, to be performed immediately after his death "en si brief tems comme ils pourroient estre faits." The will of Lady Cobham also contains many curious bequests of plate, jewels, and illuminated books, one of the latter is worked "cum mortuato et genensiles; there is also a horn described as "from a griffin's hoof"—this has a gilt cover, upon which are engraven the arms of "Barkel" and Cobham.

2. "Notes from the Parish Registry of Richmond," by William Henry Hart, Esq., F.S.A. Some very curious facts throwing light upon the customs of our forefathers, have been extracted by Mr. Hart from these registers. Among these we may notice the manner of interment of what were called "chrisms" children, or infants deceased before the churching of the mothers, but who had been baptized; this was illustrated by the copy of a brass from Stoke Dabernham. In the year 1654, it was made legal for justices of the peace to perform the marriage ceremony without any ecclesiastical interference, and the Richmond register records several instances of such unions. After several other curious extracts from the Richmond registers, Mr. Hart passed to those of Kingston, which commence with the reign of Elizabeth, and contain a record of the various preachers in the parish church, with very quaint entries of burial and other sermons. Here are also recorded the charitable gifts of the parish to individuals who had met with unforeseen misfortunes of various kinds. In 1572 was erected a new "cucking" or "ducking" stool, an institution for the disciplining of women who made too free use of their tongues; the operation of ducking being repeated as often as was considered necessary for the patient's cure—one Anne Downing for instance, was ducked three times "for that she was a common scold and fighter." Mr. Hart here exhibited an invention called the "scold's bridle," an iron frame to fit the head and confine the tongue with a kind of bit. The registers also contain a varied record of deaths by violence and misadventure. The register of Petersham acquires interest from its frequent allusion to Ham House and the former occupiers of that mansion, and its records of marriages and deaths in the Desart and Murray families, and among their dependents. A branch of the Surrey Archaeological Society has been established for the purpose of examining the parish registers, and the present paper has been the result. The thanks of the society were expressed to the clergy for the assistance they have rendered in these researches.

3. "On the Antiquities of Richmond," by Mr. William Chapman. Mr. Chapman observed, that Richmond possessed but few antiquities to strike the eye, but its history contains many highly interesting particulars. Although the ancient name "Sheen" is undoubtedly Saxon, there is no mention of it in Saxon records. Happily there are no records of great battles or dire calamities to give it a place in early history, and previously to the time of Henry VII., the name of Richmond did not exist in this part of the kingdom. In the time of Henry II., the manor of West Sheen belonged to the Wyndsor family. Eventually it was purchased by Bernal, Bishop of Bath and Wells, who obtained from the reigning sovereign the right of free warren and other privileges. Edward III. died at Sheen, as did Anne, the queen of Richard II.; the latter monarch in his grief for her loss caused the whole of the buildings upon the manor to be rased to the ground. Henry IV. allowed Sheen to remain in this desolate condition, but Henry V. rebuilt the palace, and also established in that town the Carthusian monastery of Jesus of Bethlehem. The culminating point of the splendour of Sheen was in the reign of Henry VII., who gave it the name it now bears. In this reign the palace was entirely destroyed in three hours by a terrible fire; Henry rebuilt it in 1501, made it his favourite residence, and died there. Henry VIII. was more partial to Greenwich, and was little at Richmond; but for a short time Wolsey resided there, much to the disgust of the inhabitants, after his gift of Hampton Court to the king. Queen Elizabeth was very fond of Richmond, and died there. Charles I. was educated there, but after his death the palace was sold by order of the Commonwealth. A small portion of the building is still in existence.

The three papers were of highly interesting character, and were listened to throughout with great attention. The authors having received the thanks of the meeting, a similar vote to Lord Abinger, for his kindness in presiding, was moved by Mr. Evelyn, and carried with applause.

An interesting description of the ancient monuments in the parish church was then given, which had been drawn up by the Rev. W. Bashall, and the company proceeded to inspect the church and the surrounding grave-yard. The church is not of great antiquity, the oldest part being of the Tudor period only. Among the most striking monuments are several of the time of Charles I. and Charles II.; one in particular to the dissolute and infamous Brouncker, some time cofferer to Charles II. Among the modern tablets is one to the memory of several officers of the Guards who fell in the Crimea, erected by the Freemasons' Lodge at Richmond of which they all were members. The poet Thomson is buried in the north aisle; and the great Edmund Kean lies in the churchyard, where a tomb has been erected to his memory by his son.

At three o'clock Lord Abinger proceeded to open the temporary local museum, which was formed in the lecture hall of the new Cavalry College, by the permission of the commandant. His lordship very briefly recommended the collection to the notice of the visitors, observing that amongst such variety there must be surely something to suit all tastes. There were mediæval weapons, Indian guns, and Captain Cook's teakettle; every kind of old key to open old locks, and an autograph poem of Robert Burns to open the heart. He would not, however, detain them, for he had but small claims to the title of an antiquarian—though he might himself very properly be classed among the antiquities. Mr. Hart then proceeded with the catalogue raisonnée of the collection, which among various objects deserving careful examination, comprised a number of ancient seals and seal-rings; a spoon and a fork of Sir Walter Raleigh; some old time-pieces; many valuable coins; some beautiful specimens of Roman glass; various old monuments and leases; specimens of illuminated missals, and early book-binding; numerous rubbings from ancient brasses, plaster casts from old monuments; and an excellent selection of rare autographs, and some very curious autograph letters, especially one from Flora Macdonald acknowledging the receipt of £1,500 for the services rendered to Charles Edward Stuart, thus setting at rest that disputed question.

An account was given by Mr. Wright, of the excavations now being carried on at Wroxeter, near Shrewsbury, in which a buried Roman city, "Uriconium," like another Pompeii, has, through his exertions, been exposed, after ages of forgotten burial, to the light of day and the research of modern investigation. This able antiquary has already succeeded in tracing two of the streets of the little town, with their paved causeways in perfect preservation, and composed of close set, small, angular stones, exactly resembling the rough paving still met with in so many of our villages and quaint, old-fashioned towns. Besides these, he has clearly made out a double row of shops, with the débris or remains of the original occupiers' calling still remaining.

It has long been a matter of belief among antiquaries that mineral coal was known to the Romans, especially in this country. The discoveries made by Mr. Wright at Uriconium have set this matter beyond dispute, as quantities of coal have been found mixed with wood and charcoal, both in the shops and holocausts investigated in the ruins. That some fearful calamity of fire and sword, some sudden and overwhelming irruption of the Picts and Scots, or hostile tribes of Welch Britons, burst upon the little colonial town and destroyed it in one savage onslaught, is made evident by the ruins of the chief public building and the position and character of the human bones found within its precincts; for, with only one exception, the remains are all those of women and children, clearly showing that the male population had mustered in some other part of the city to meet the invaders, while the women fled to the prefecture or chief building of the town for safety, and as the foe approached hid themselves in vaults, and even in the holocausts, where great numbers were found, and where, before the enemy could reach them, no doubt many were burnt or suffocated. An infant's skeleton was found by itself in the court yard, and the only male remains, were those of a very old man, crouching in a vault, holding in his bony fingers a box containing many hundred coins. The only other tenant of this living grave had been a woman, who, probably, unknown to the miser, had secreted herself in an opposite corner. Mr. Wright has, also, by these investigations demonstrated the fact that the Roman dwellings in this island were in many instances tiled with slates, as vast numbers of them were found among the ruins. Not the least interesting discovery, however, was the certainty afforded that the houses had glass windows. The specimens of glass exhibited, and of which large quantities were strown all along the ruins, prove that glass windows were in use in this country a thousand years before it was supposed to have been known in northern Europe. It is Mr. Wright's intention shortly to publish a full account of his explorations.

At six o'clock the members of the association and their friends re-assembled at the Castle Hotel, where an elegant collation, and the music of a military band, terminated a very delightful day.

D.

THE HUMAN HAND.—The most powerful imagination can scarcely conceive anything of which the hand is incapable. It aided the savage of old in the mountain chase, hunting for his daily bread, equally with the discoverer of the sextant and goniometer. It worked its way for the Carthaginians through the flinty Alps; shaped lake Mæros and the pyramids of Egypt; reared the temples of Athens and their divine statuary; peopled the world with cities; formed canals that connected seas; bore aloft Babylon, with its hanging gardens, and its towers that were stronger than the Tigris; and descending to humbler but not less useful purposes, it disdains not to upturn with hard labour the stubborn glebe, and to weave the constant toil of commerce, so that our fields abound with the green grass and golden fruit, and our seas are whitened with the sails of our ships, and shook with the rush of their prows. And to the hand, as it is now formed, do we trust to all that art and science shall effect for the future. To the end of all time, and amid all the mighty improvements of centuries, do we trust to this simple organ for our advancement, happiness, and prosperity. This small flexible assemblage of bone, tendon, ligament, muscle, nerves, arteries, veins, and other tissues, is what we trust to.—this hand, that is both flexible and strong, graceful though powerful, almost fully capable even when maimed and injured, and ever the instrument of the mind to fulfil its loftiest and most daring efforts.—John Walker Ord.

MASONIC NOTES AND QUERIES.

PROVINCIAL GRAND PAINTER.

Was such an office as that of Grand Painter ever recognized by the constitutions of the Order, and, if so, when was it abolished?

The following curious notice of a prospective appointment of such an officer is supplied by the minutes of a meeting of the Prov. Grand Lodge of Leicestershire, held on June 18th, 1793, under the presidency of the Rev. William Peters, D. Prov. G.M.:-

"Bro. Phipps was invested as Grand Architect. . . . The R. W. Prov. Grand Master [Thomas Boothby Parkyns, M.P., afterwards the first Lord Ranelagh] having heard much of the virtues and abilities of Mr. Smith, jun., the son of Bro. Smith, who is not yet a Mason, but it is probable will be one, was pleased to reserve a blue apron for him, as Grand Painter, and it was accordingly delivered into the hands of Bro. Hodges, S.G.W., in order to the investiture of Mr. Smith after his initiation."

The last appointment to the office was made in the year 1816.—WM. KELLY, D. Prov. G.M., Leicestershire.

GRAND ARCHITECT.

The above extract shows, that at the same period a Grand Architect was appointed. Noorthouck's edition of the "Constitutions," 1784, p. 360, after giving a list of "the proper officers of Grand Lodge," states in a note—"At present there is also a Grand Architect; but this is a personal compliment to Mr. Sandby, as designer of Freemasons' Hall, and no stated office; see p. 317." When was the office made a permanent one, and when was its designation changed to that of "Grand Superintendent of Works?"—WM. KELLY, D. Prov. G.M., Leicestershire. [The present possessor is Bro. S. W. Daukes, who succeeded Bro. Philip Hardwick. His predecessor was Bro. Sir John Soane, who long held the office.]

BRO. THOMAS SANDBY.

Bro. Thomas Sandby, B.A., was of the family of Sandby of Babworth, and was born at Nottingham, in 1721. He distinguished himself by the preparation of a new system of perspective. He then applied himself to the arts, and coming to London, was, in 1743, appointed draughtsman to the chief engineer in Scotland, and served during the rebellion of 1745, and in Flanders on the staff of the Duke of Cumberland. In 1746, he was made deputy ranger of Windsor Great Park, and afterwards architect to the king; and in 1754 planned Virginia Water. Of these works he published eight folio plates. In 1755, he assisted in the foundation of an academy of arts; in 1766, joined the Society of Incorporated Artists; and, in 1768, was one of the original Royal Academicians, and Professor of Architecture from 1768 until 1798. Of these lectures the MS. was presented by John Britton to the Royal Institute of British Architects. In 1775, he designed and built Freemasons' Hall, as above stated. He died on the 25th of June, 1798, aged seventy-six, and was buried at Old Windsor. Many of his drawings are in the British Museum, and in the museum founded by his successor, Sir John Soane. See his memoirs, in the English Encyclopædia. His brother, Paul Sandby, was also a Royal Academician.

It is worth inquiring—To what Lodge did Thomas Sandby belong? and the particulars of his connexion with Masonry. What is the inscription on his tomb? Was Paul Sandby a Mason? What was the connexion between Sandby and Soane?

GRAND LODGE, 1732.

The meeting of the Grand Lodge, held on the 19th April, 1732, at Merchant Taylors' Hall, attracted the attention of the public journals of the day. Lord Viscount Montagu was installed Grand Master; Thomas Batson, Deputy Grand Master; George Rooke, Senior Grand Warden; and James Smyth, Junior Grand Warden.

It is noticeable, and I think has been referred to in the Freemasons' Magazine, that the meetings of Grand Lodge, until the building of the Hall in Great Queen-street, were only exceptionally held in taverns, but were held in the halls of the public companies.—HYDE CLARKE.

ROSE CROIX.

A Worshipful Master asks, whether it is indispensable for the Rose Croix degree that the candidate must have been installed First Principal in a Royal Arch Chapter. [It is not necessary in this country, or under any constitutions of the Rose Croix, although the possession of the Royal Arch degree, or service in the chair of a Chapter, would be an additional claim to promotion, on the ground of Masonic proficiency or service.]

THE ANTEDILUVIAN MASONIC PILLARS. "LATRES."

In the British Museum (Harl. MSS., 1942) is a manuscript on the subject of Freemasonry, a copy of which, in a hand of the last century is now before me. It is entitled "The Beginning and first Foundation of the most worthy Craft of Masonry, with the Charges thereto belonging." After stating that the four children of Lamech, Jabal, Jubal, Tubal Cain, and Naamah "found out the beginning of all the crafts in the world," it proceeds to record that "These children knew that God would take vengeance for sin, either by fire or water; therefore they wrote their sciences that they had found out on two pillars, that they might be found after Noah's flood. One of the pillars was marble, which will not burn with any fire, and the other pillar or stone was called Latres, which will not drown in any water."

My friend, Mr. Halliwell, quoting the MS. in the introduction to his "Early History of Freemasonry in England," gives the word as "Latres," and refers to the Freemasons' Quarterly Review, vol. iii., pp. 288-295; and adds, that the earliest copy he has met with is in MS. Lansd. 98, No. 48, written about 1600." On turning to the Review, where the MS. is printed in extenso, (varying, however, in some respects from my copy); I find that the word is there also given as "Latres," with the following note, by Bro. H. Phillips, of musical celebrity:—"What the literal meaning of this word is, I cannot discover; no doubt it had allusion to some floating substance." Can you, Mr. Editor, or any of your scientific or architectural readers, throw any light on the probable meaning and derivation of the word?—WM. KELLY, D. Prov. G.M., Leicestershire.

[We have not the least doubt that the MS. in question, so far from being of the year 1600, as supposed by Mr. Halliwell, is not more than 130 years old, and we are of this opinion, first, from internal evidence, and next, from the doctrines being of the period we have assigned. We cannot determine the word, or its meaning. The MS., modern as it is, is of interest, because, as Bro. Kelly is most probably aware, it refers to various doctrines and ceremonials prevalent in the last century].

SUFFOLK PROVINCE.

In the last number of the "Masonic Missions," there is an account given of Masonry in Suffolk, which is incorrect as to the year 1838, as then Bro. Reade, of Holbrook, was installed Provincial Grand Master, who appointed—

Bro. Bullen, of No. 131, Ipswich, D. Prov. G.M.
Bro. Green, of No. 131, Ipswich, S.G.W.
Bro. Head, of No. 96, J.G.W.
Bro. Jones, of No. 277, G. Treas.
Bro. W. Grimsey, of No. 131, Ipswich, G. Sec.
Bro. Martin, of No. 131, Ipswich, S.G.D.
Bro. Ruddock, of No. 131, Ipswich, J.G.D.
Bro. Catchpole, of No. 131, Ipswich, G. Registrar.
Bro. Mason, of No. 131, Ipswich, J.G.W.
Bro. W. R. G. Key, of No. 131, Ipswich, G. Dir. of Cers.
Bro. Forster, of No. 131, Ipswich, G. Organist.
Bro. Beales, of No. 388, G.S.B.
Bro. Schuler, of No. 272, G. Pursuivant.
Bro. Burch, of No. 131, Ipswich, G. Tyler.
Bro. Horton, of No. 84, Grand Steward.
Bro. Deck, of No. 131, "
Bro. Head, of No. 522, "
Bro. Gosling, of No. 522, "
Bro. Scott, of No. 131, "
Bro. Kersey, of No. 417, "

After installation, the brethren went in procession to the church of "St. Mary, Tower," and the Rev. H. Ledger, B.A., preached a sermon for the benefit of the County Hospital.—W. R. G. KEY.

BATH MASONIC HALL.

Can any brother furnish an account, either extracted from journals or newspapers of the time, or from recollection, of the consecration by the M.W.G.M., the Duke of Sussex, of the Masonic Hall, York-street, Bath, together with the names of the officers in attendance on the occasion? I have heard that the day's proceedings were most grand and imposing, and I believe constitute the "great event" in the annals of Bath Freemasonry.—A.

THE CHIEF BUTLER AT THE SOVEREIGN'S CORONATION.—This office is held by the Lord Mayor for the time being, and his appointment to it is coeval with, or even anterior to, the institution of the mayoralty itself eo nomine. For at the coronation of Richard I., in 1189, we find the chief magistrate of London, under the title of baillif, officiating as chief butler.—City Press.

MASONRY IN TURKEY.

THE following circular has been issued from the Grand Secretary's office :—

WORSHIPFUL MASTER.—I am directed to inform you that there are several Lodges meeting at Smyrna which have been formed in an irregular manner, and which are not in possession of warrants emanating from any duly constituted Masonic authority.

From information laid before the Grand Lodge, it appears that during the late war with Russia an officer in one of her Majesty's regiments, who was said to be in possession of a warrant formerly belonging to an Irish Lodge, initiated several persons at Smyrna; and that having so initiated a certain number, he formed them into three Lodges, which three Lodges then assumed the title of "The Grand Lodge of Turkey."

It appears also that several persons who have been thus initiated have subsequently applied to be admitted as joining members of Lodges holding under the Grand Lodge of England, and that in a few instances they have been received, in consequence of the Lodge affiliating them not being cognizant of the irregular formation of the Smyrna Lodges still informed that brethren so admitted could not be registered in the Grand Lodge books.

To prevent other Lodges being placed in a like position of difficulty, and to avoid any countenance being given, through inadvertence, to these irregular Lodges, it was, on motion duly made at the Special Grand Lodge held on the 23rd day of June last, resolved—'That the Worshipful Masters of all regular Lodges be cautioned against receiving persons claiming admission, either as visitors or joining members, on the ground of their having been initiated in such irregular Lodges at Smyrna.' And you are hereby strictly enjoined not to admit any person so initiated even to visit your Lodge, still less to receive him as a joining Member, and you are to cause this notice to be read in your Lodge, and recorded in your minutes.

By order of the United Grand Lodge.

REVIEWS OF NEW BOOKS.

Local Etymology: A Derivative Dictionary of Geographical Names. By RICHARD STEPHEN CHARNOCK, F.S.A.

The taste for archaeological and antiquarian studies, has certainly been developed to a remarkable extent of late years. Formerly the discussion of these and similar subjects was confined to the pages of the Gentleman's Magazine and the almost invariably ponderous and dry volumes which were the fruits of the learned leisure of retired minor canons and studious country gentlemen. Thanks, however, to the general and growing taste for reading, the spread of education, and the acquisition of a mattering of knowledge in the various branches of the arts and sciences, which (whatever Pope may say to the contrary), has not seldom produced a craving for greater and more substantial participation in the power derived from knowledge—thanks also to cheap printing, cheap newspapers, and the removal of postal and other governmental hindrances to the free interchange of ideas—the number of inquirers in these as well as other departments of historical learning has increased to a wonderful extent; this result has been assisted also by the establishment of local branches of the elder learned societies, and by the formation of new bodies, having for their object the pursuit of studies, formerly considered trivial, but which the concentrated attention of their devotees, applied upon system, has elevated into real importance. Among the worthy emulators and contemporaries of the Gentleman's Magazine's antiquarian and literary researches, Notes and Queries has achieved a wide spread and well deserved reputation; the Illustrated London News, and other newspapers, have also devoted a portion of their space to the same object; and we ourselves have occasionally touched upon those and similar points—a feature in the Magazine which we think has been appreciated by our readers, and one which, as space permits, we shall still further develop.

The value of national and local etymology, in a historical point of view, is undoubted, and the increased care that has been bestowed upon its examination of late years, has contributed not a little to clear up disputed facts, to settle historical controversies, and even to remove ancient and time honoured falsifications and prejudices. The interchange of newly acquired information by means of the corresponding and other literary societies of the present day, leads to friendly discussions which prevent their members from a continuance in the old established groove in which the solitary student is too apt to become settled; and hence the works which are day by day brought before the notice of the historical inquirer, possess a real value, and contribute to the flood of light by which the readers of the present century are enabled to contemplate the history of past ages.

Mr. Charnock's volume cannot fail to interest that class of readers whose opinions, doubtless, he will most regard—those who seek for information. In the comparatively small compass of one octavo volume i.e. has brought together a mass of facts and authorities for derivations, which will afford substantial food for the student, and matter for the discriminating critic. More profound works are to be found, as plentiful as blackberries, but few readers will deny that they have been interested in the one under notice—and that, as we take it, will satisfy the writer. At the same time that we are giving the author credit for the production of an agreeable volume, we should be sorry if that particular recommendation from us should deteriorate his honest and most satisfactory labour in the estimation of a single student. Mr. Charnock has brought together information which must have involved a surprising amount of research into old volumes and crumbed manuscripts, some musty, and others whose hitherto undiscovered treasures may have proved an unexpected reward to their disinterrer.

Compilation, of course, becomes the chief element in a work of this description, and our author honestly acknowledges those sources to which he is indebted. Some of the pundits whom he has consulted may possibly differ in opinion as to the particular antiquities of which they treat; and Mr. Charnock deserves very great praise for the judicious way in which he has adapted the sifting process to the materials before him. The book is not a thick one (some three hundred pages only), for which mercy, this sultry weather, we sincerely thank this most considerate of archaeologists—and from our own dabbings in that pursuit, we can speak of the Circean fascinations of the science. But though of a pardonable bulk, our author's matter is of a satisfactory quality, and whether we wish for information as to the nomenclature of our native town, of the spot upon which our earliest sonnet was penned, or our first vows poured into the ear of our first sweetheart; where our first cricket match was won, or where the colours of our regiment were triumphantly borne in the far east; where science may have led us; where the purest wishes for the present and future welfare of our fellow men may have guided the missionary footsteps of well-beloved brothers; wherever the enterprize and gallantry of British mariners has penetrated—in the work before us it will be strange indeed if we do not find some singular derivation propounded for the nomenclature of the honoured spot—some fact unknown before connected with its well worn English name, or the confirmation or demolition of some preconceived theory upon the original growth of the much quoted name.

In our examination of the present volume, we have been compelled to award to the compiler the credit of an extensive range of subjects. From Jack Straw's Castle to Sebastopol—from Berlin to Tartarus, we must candidly acknowledge that we have learnt something new and valuable as to each respective locality. Some of our most favourite notions are completely upset by Mr. Charnock's more or less logical deductions, and we are free to confess that by his aid we begin to have a faint glimmering of the real meaning (philosophically considered) of some few of the most commonly known names in the English tongue. "Brum-magem" thus is clearly shown to be old English, instead of Cockney.

"Birmingham," says our author, "is found written Bermyngham, Bermingham; in the Letters Patent of Edw. VI., Brynmymcham, and in other old writings Brumwycheham. Dugdale says the general opinion seems to be that the 'appellation Berming' was originally taken from some ancient owner or planter there in the Saxons' time." Others assert that the original spelling was 'Brum-wich-ham,' (A.S.) i.e. 'the broom-place dwelling,' in allusion to the natural growth of the shrub termed broom on its site; and, indeed, there are two places in the neighbourhood called Bromwich. This latter etymology agrees with the vulgar pronunciation, 'Brum-midum.' See Smith, Hist. Warw."

We can safely recommend this book to those of our brethren who possess the enviable privilege of literary leisure; and while we are confident that most of its items may be digested with comfort and profit, we are free to confess that the work possesses negative advantages in its capabilities for stirring up the bile, and giving a healthy impulse to the too sluggish current of the blue or purple vital fluid of some respected and most worthy critics of our acquaintance, whose stock of knowledge is of so great amplitude as to overflow in most strongly expressed opinion of all those who write or speak in opposition to themselves. Some of the authors quoted by our author cannot but be considered antagonistic upon some minor points, but great care is exhibited throughout in the selection of the various illustrations of the names of well known places; Mr. Charnock has accumulated a large amount of grain, while he has carefully rejected all extraneous chaff.

To give anything like a detailed account of the contents of such a miscellaneous work is of course impossible; we can only, therefore, spare the necessary space for a few extracts by way of illustration; and to the inhabitants of London we think that some quotations from Mr. Charnock may possess the charm of novelty. Puffing linendrapers, for instance, who have their "all-rounders" and "Piccadilly collars" to recommend to the notice of the London gent, little know, perhaps, how well founded is the designation of the latter garment. Of Piccadilly, Mr. Charnock says:—

"Where Sackville street was built stood Piccadilla Hall, where piccadillas or turnovers were sold, which gave name to the street." (Pennant.) A turnover is the name of the broad flat white linen band falling from the neck over the jacket, which succeeded in Cromwell's time to the ruffs of the preceding reigns. 'A pickadil,' says Blount, 'is that round hem or the several divisions set together about the skirt of a garment or other thing; also a kind of stiff collar made in fashion of a band; hence, perhaps, the famous ordinary near St. James's, called Pickadilly, took denomination, because it was then the utmost or skirt house of the suburbs.' Others say that 'one Higgins, a tailor, who built it, got most of his estate by pickadilles, which in the last age were much worn in England.' The word picardill, says Cunningham, 'occurs in Ben Jonson and several of our old dramatic writers.' According to Gifford, it is a dim. of pizza (Sp. and It.) a spearhead, and was given to this article of foppery from a fancied resemblance of its stiffened plaits to the bristled points of a spear."

Lamb's Conduit-street, and Lothbury, commend themselves to our notice from different points of taste, savoury and unsavoury. A pastoral air pervades the former, and a cool breath of babbling founts and watercesses. Our author says:—

"The Old English Herbal, speaking of winter rocket or crosses, says, 'It groweth of its own accord in gardens and fields by the wayside in divers places, and particularly in the next pasture to the Conduit Head, behind Gray's Inn, that brings water to Mr. Lamb's conduit in Holborn.' The fields around Lamb's Conduit formed a favourite promenade for the inhabitants of St. Andrew's Holborn and St. Giles in the Fields. They were first curtailed in 1714, by the formation of a new burying ground for the parish of St. George's, Bloomsbury, and again in 1739, by the erection of the Foundling Hospital. The conduit was taken down in 1746.' (Cunningham's London.) At the north end of Lamb's Conduit-street is a tavern, which formerly had for its sign a 'lamb!'"

Lothbury, on the other hand (delightful locality to those who have cheques to cash on the London and Westminster Bank—and equally disagreeable to others who have small bills to take up at the same comptoir), is not so favourably spoken of by our author's authorities.

"Stow, speaking of one of the city wards, says 'of the antiquities to be named therein are these:—First, the street of Lothberie, Lathberie, or Loadberie (for by all these names have I read it) took the name, as it seemeth, of berie, a court of old time there kept, but by whom is grown out of memory. This street is possessed for the most part by founders, that cast candlesticks, chafing-dishes, spice mortars, and such like copper and laton works, and do afterwards turn them with the foot, and not with the wheel, to make them smooth and bright, making a loathsome noise, to the by-passers, that have not been used to the like, and therefore by them disdainfully called Lothberie.' Lothbury may have been originally called Latonbury. The word latone, now laten, was a term used in the middle ages for a fine kind of brass, or copper very much resembling brass, used for making crosses, candlesticks, &c.; from Fr. leton or laton, D. laton, Arm. laton."

Leaving our native country with all its eccentricities of topographical nomenclature (most of which are well worth inquiring into), we proceed under the guidance of our local etymologist to explore the secret of the appellations of some of those lands and cities with which the course of events has made us familiar of late. Balaklava is a name that few Englishmen can think of without shuddering, and hereupon we think, is an observation which has been a little too hastily incorporated.

"Balaklava (Crimea). The Genoese founded the little town at the bottom of the haven, and built the fort on the adjoining cliff. The name is corrupted from It. bella chiare, beautiful quay; an appellation which it well deserves."

Of the famed Malakoff, an agreeable story is quoted from a French source:—

"Some ten years ago, a sailor and ropemaker, named Alexander Ivanovitch Malakoff, lived in Sebastopol, and by his good humour, jovial habits, and entertaining qualities, became the centre of a select circle of admiring companions. Like many great conversationalists and wits, Malakoff contracted most intimate relations with Bacchus, and, under the influence of the latter, he participated, in 1881, in some riots which broke out in the town, and which had one result—that of the dismissal of Malakoff from the dockyard in which he was employed. Being incapable of turning himself to any more reputable trade, he opened a low wine-shed on a hill outside of the town, and introduced into practice the theoretical notions which he had acquired by a long and zealous study of the nature of beer houses and wine shops. His trade prospered, his old admirers crowded round him, and in their enthusiasm christened the wine shed—which soon expanded into a decent public-house—and the hill on which it was built, by the name of the popular host. In time a village grew around the public-house, and was likewise called by the name of Malakoff. But the entertaining and imaginative founder of the place, in his deepest cups, could never have dreamt that one day his name would be in the mouths of all men, and that one of the heroes of a great war would esteem it as an inestimable title of honour."

We are tempted to linger further over this very agreeable, valuable, and suggestive volume, but our space is limited, and we must draw our remarks to a close. The work is not perfect (what scientific treatise is?) but it will be studied with profit and pleasure, and laid down by the student without fatigue, and with a feeling of regret that there is not more of it; and in saying this we have paid the author no unmerited compliment—for we speak from experience—we have ourselves derived refreshment, amusement, and information from these pages. Quaintness occasionally predominates too much in the quotations given from authorities, to the prejudice of more substantial facts—there are other minor defects which seem to indicate something of haste in the compilation of the work; but still we are glad to welcome Mr. Charnock as an able and agreeable contributor to our stock of archæological knowledge, and we trust that the success of his present work may be such as to induce him to give to the world the fruit of his more mature thought and labour. CORRESPONDENCE.

[THE EDITOR does not hold himself responsible for any opinions entertained by Correspondents.]

"THE OBSERVER PARTY."

TO THE EDITOR OF THE FREEMASONS' MAGAZINE AND MASONIC MIRROR.

DEAR SIR AND BROTHER,—As an active member of the Craft I have been asked by several brethren whether I belonged to the so-called "Observer Party," and if not, why not?

My reply has expressed convictions shared by very many hard working but silent bees in the hive of Masonry, and therefore I venture to repeat the reasons in your columns:

1st. Because all parties or cliques of Masons are unconstitutional, and properly so.

2ndly. Because as an impartial witness as regards questions at issue between the "Observer Party," and the constituted authorities, I have noticed that some great Masonic principle has been violated by that "party" in every step it has taken.

3rdly. Because the "party" is disunited in itself, and some Herodian member is continually complaining of being out Heroded by another member.

4thly. Because if the "party" were to obtain for the Craft all the advantages it pretends to contend for, those benefits would be counterbalanced by the evil example shewn by its leaders in malignity, discontent, recklessness of manner and argument, and unmanly insinuation.

A variety of circumstances renders it impossible for me ever to take office in Grand Lodge, even if I were known to the authorities there, which is not the case; but I am equally certain that I would rather be a doorkeeper there than the president of so pernicious a combination as that which takes the Observer for its name.

I implore every Brother who loves Masonry to stand aloof from these oppositionists, and remain,

Dear Sir and Brother, yours fraternally,

O. P. Q.

THE GRAND OFFICERS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE FREEMASONS' MAGAZINE AND MASONIC MIRROR.

DEAR SIR AND BROTHER,—As I have the interests of our Order very sincerely at heart, and consequently feel deeply the inconsistency and absurdity of too many of the appointments to Grand office which we have lately witnessed, I have read with much interest another letter from "P. M." which appeared in the last number of your Magazine, and agree with him in the expediency of the members of Grand Lodge selecting a portion of their rulers. It seems to me that this is the only course by which we can remedy the evil, because in the first place no favouritism could be shown, and no brother would get an appointment unless he well deserved it; or, at all events if he did so, it would be more an exception than the rule as it is at present. And in the next place brethren would take more trouble to qualify themselves for office than they do now, because they would know that they had the same chance as their fellows, and that, provided they displayed sufficient ability and Masonic knowledge, no office in Grand Lodge would be closed against them. Depend upon it, sir, if this system were adopted we should soon have a different state of things throughout the Craft. Brethren would not then think themselves entitled to Grand office merely on account of their social position, or because they were on terms of intimacy or friendship with the ruling powers; but would strive for that which might then really be considered an honour instead of a reward for want of merit, which it too often is now.

Unfortunately, too, the example of Grand Lodge is contagious, and Provincial Grand Lodges, as well as private Lodges, think themselves perfectly justified in appointing brethren to office whose only qualification for such appointment (except their social position) is their unfitness; but if they found that Grand Lodge made no appointments, except really good ones, a spirit of emulation would prompt them "to go and do likewise," and we should be then spared the anomaly which we too often witness of seeing a W. M. in the chair (by whom we are supposed to be instructed), who can neither open nor close his Lodge in the three degrees!

The time will come when these matters will find their proper footing, and when Masonic theory and practice will, in some degree at all events, assimilate; but I am afraid unless some alteration takes place very shortly we shall have to still designate this good time as "looming in the future."

In recommending the election of some portion of the Grand officers by Grand Lodge itself, I am aware a great part of the patronage would be taken from the M.W. Grand Master; but in order that he might still have the authority to which he is entitled as the head of the Craft, I would suggest that he should have the right of approving or disapproving of any brother so elected if he pleased; and also that the Grand Lodge should only have the privilege of electing the Grand Wardens, Grand Secretary, and Assistant Grand Secretary, the other appointments remaining as now in the hands of the M.W. Grand Master. This would also relieve the M.W.G.M. of much unpleasantness, and be the means of getting "the right men in the right places," for who could so well know the merits of any individual Brother as those with whom he was constantly brought in contact?

I am, dear Sir and Brother, yours fraternally,

MASONIC LITERATURE.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE FREEMASONS' MAGAZINE AND MASONIC MIRROR.

DEAR SIR AND BROTHER,—Having seen in this day's issue of the Freemasons' Magazine, a letter signed "H. Garrod, No. 11," in which that brother strongly urges the support of Bro. Binckes's proposition, to be brought before Grand Lodge, recommending a search among the MSS. in the British Museum, the Bodleian Library, "and other places," as likely to be of great service to the history of Freemasonry by disinterring the valuable stores of material supposed to be accumulated in those repositories, and placing them before the Craft in an accessible form—perhaps you will permit me to trespass a little on your space, and show that a more chimerical fallacy never entered the brain of man.

Disclaiming all intention of being egotistical, I am afraid offence may be taken at the following detail; but even at that risk I feel it is due to my less informed brethren to place before them the actual facts of the case; and how very little there is to be gathered from the British Museum and the Bodleian Libraries. The "other places," so vaguely defined by Bro. Garrod, I must confess to be beyond my ken.

Owing to a love of antiquity, an acquaintance with one of the most erudite (although I think mistaken) men of the nineteenth century, the late Godfrey Higgins; and having, as a choir boy, been several times admitted to sing at Masonic banquets, a spirit of inquiry was stirred within me, and when I became admissible by age, I applied for, and obtained, an admission to the reading-room of the British Museum, and have since visited almost every library of note in this country. Joining to my own profession the unthankful, but more profitable, occupation which Dr. Johnson termed "a bookseller's hack," when other work was slack—my researches, commenced about twenty years since and carried down to the present moment, took me regularly into the subject of Freemasonry, and long before I was initiated I had commenced collecting the titles of all works I could see, or hear of, touching on that science. This has grown steadily, larger and larger year by year and, in round numbers, I have about eight hundred entries as to Masonic books and references to works in which Freemasonry is mentioned; and I have, either wholly or in part, read about three hundred books on the subject, from the smallest catchpenny to the most voluminous treatise. But with all this reading I was far from satisfied: I was known, and employed, as a transcriber of rare and curious MS., and what so natural that I should set a great value on discovering any early MS. that treated of the subject? I felt that any one could read printed books, but I knew that few, very few, can decipher the quaint handwriting of the sixteenth, seventeenth, and eighteenth centuries, and could I hit upon such a treasure my reward would, as I thought, be proportionably great; so to work I went, hunted for years and still hunt yet, to find Masonic MSS. and have much pleasure in supplying Bros. Garrod and Binckes with a list of all the MSS. on Freemasonry that are in the library of the British Museum. They are as follow:—

The Poem, Bibl. Reg. 17. A. i., so admirably edited by my friend, James Orchard Halliwell, Esq., having been in print since 1843, and succeeded in 1844 by a second edition, cannot be looked upon as an available rarity.

Harl. MS. 2054. Well known—referred to in the Encyclopædia Metropolitana, Art. "Freemasonry."

Harl. MS. 1942. Printed in Freemasons' Quarterly Review (1836) iii., p. 288.

Lansdowne MS. No. 98, art. 48. Printed in the Freemasons' Magazine (1794) ii., p. 81, and reprinted in the present series (1858) iv., p. 343.

Sloane MS. 3848 (fol. 213) dated by the writer 1646, as well as another in the same collection, viz. 3323 (fol. 195), dated 1659, both of which are copies of the Lansdown MS., No. 98.

The above list comprises every Masonic document, in MS., to be found in the whole of the various collections deposited in the British Museum!

The letters and papers bearing on Masonry deposited in the Bodleian Library, are contained among the Rawlinson MSS. and the whole, or very nearly so, have been printed under the head of "Masonic Antiquities," in the Freemasons' Magazine for 1857-8.

The MSS. of "that great Mason, Elias Ashmole," contain some few allusions to Freemasonry, but they are so incorporated with alchemical formulae that it is almost impossible to know, for certain, what he intended to record, and to sum up all, if transcribed, would about fill six pages of your Magazine.

I give these details, the result of twenty years' inquiry, for the benefit of Bros. Garrod and Binckes, assuring them I have all my life been a hunter for curiosities, but I never yet discovered such a mare's nest as they seem to have stumbled on.

Granting that it is desirable that our Craft and its history should be fairly displayed, shorn of the ravings and fiction with which it has been the practice of modern writers to clothe it; and knowing that there are extant trusty and unerring sources of such information which, if my life is spared, I shall not fail to avail myself of to write an honest impartial History of Freemasonry in England but, as I have no wish to be forestalled, I cannot disclose more at the present time.

Hoping I have shown that Bro. Garrod's idea of "placing the Craft in possession of a literature in some degree worthy of it," as far as the MSS. in the British Museum and the Bodleian Libraries are concerned is pure unsophisticated moonshine, and apologising for the length of this communication,

I am, dear Sir and Brother, yours truly and fraternally,

MATTHEW COOKE,

Formerly one of the Children of Her Majesty's Chapels Royal, Honorary Music-Master to the Royal Freemasons' School for Female Children.

MASONIC CHARITIES.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE FREEMASONS' MAGAZINE AND MASONIC MIRROR.

SIR AND BROTHER,—In addressing this letter to you I am most desirous that my motives should not be misinterpreted.

I am a member of the Union Lodge, No. 149, Margate, and have observed with considerable satisfaction the strenuous and laudable exertions being made by Bros. Lyall, Symonds, and Binckes, with a view to increase the funds of the Boys and Girls Schools.

It must not be supposed I entertain any antagonistic spirit to the object which induces those brethren to labour so assiduously to obtain so desirable an end; but it certainly does appear to me, that the appeal to the country Lodges was too indiscriminately made, and that credit has not been given to those who have worked long and zealously in the same cause in which the above-named brethren are happily engaged.

To respond favourably to that appeal was certainly optional, but all Freemasons having the interest of the Order at heart, must feel desirous to second any movement calculated to benefit its institutions; failing to do this the brethren of any particular Lodge or province might be charged with uncharitableness, unless a valid reason be advanced for not immediately awarding their hearty co-operation.

If the brethren in the province of Kent have not rendered, to those by whom the appeal was made, that unqualified support which they doubtless thought they were entitled to, it arises from a belief on their part that they have already done more than any other province towards the object sought to be obtained; and that if a proportionate amount of pecuniary assistance were forthcoming from the rest of provinces, the Committee would soon have reason to congratulate themselves upon the flourishing condition of their funds. The following statement of facts, I trust, will go far to satisfy the Craft generally, that the Freemasons of Kent have not been blind to the necessity of supporting their charitable institutions.

In 1851 Bro. John Harvey Boys, P. Prov. S.G.W. (to whose excellent judgment and untiring perseverance the Craft stands indebted for many important improvements in the by-laws of the Prov. Grand Lodge, &c., and who is now appointed D. Prov. Grand Master), laid a scheme before the late Prov. Grand Master Bro. L.C. Humfrey, for the formation and maintenance of a fund to be applied to charitable purposes, which was highly approved by the Prov. Grand Master, and has since realized the most sanguine hopes of the proposer, it having been the means of placing at the disposal of the Prov. Grand Lodge upwards of thirty guineas annually, which amount has been regularly paid; and the Kentish brethren are in the proud position to be able to state that since the plan came into operation they have paid towards the fund of the Girls School, £200; and to that of the Boys, £100; and on the 18th of July next (the Provincial Grand Festival at Margate) thirty guineas more will be paid. This handsome amount is irrespective of the usual annual subscription from the Lodges in the province, and the private subscriptions of many whose circumstances enable them to give more solid, but not more genuine proofs of their willingness to forward the interests of the Masonic Charities.

Trusting these remarks may be favourably received, and have the effect of inducing other provincial Lodges to follow our example,

I am, Sir and Brother, your obedient servant,
RICHARD SAMUEL THORNE.

Margate, 25th June, 1859.

P. S.—I subjoin an extract from our Provincial By-laws (for the information of the brethren in other provinces) with reference to our Charity Fund.

The Provincial Charity Fund, alluded to in Rule 4, is raised by the annual contribution of 2s. by every member in the province, and is appropriated to such Masonic Charities as the Provincial Grand Lodge shall direct. The present arrangement is that the Lodge having the greatest number of members, according to the returns, shall receive the amount of subscriptions, or such portion thereof as shall be voted in Provincial Grand Lodge, to be applied, by way of contribution, to such one or more of the Masonic Institutions as the Provincial Grand Lodge may direct, so as to give the Lodge so contributing the advantages during its existence of a Life Governor; and in the following years each Lodge in succession having the greatest number of members, shall have the same advantages.

PROVINCIAL GRAND LODGES.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE FREEMASONS' MAGAZINE AND MASONIC MIRROR.

DEAR SIR AND BROTHER,—I believe it is generally understood among Masons, that one object of our annual provincial meetings is to afford to the brethren of the province an opportunity to meet one another, and exchange ideas, and enjoy social intercourse for a short time. I therefore think that every means should be adopted to promote such pleasurable re-unions, and any means that are calculated or have a tendency to obstruct so desirable an end should be avoided. Impressed by such sentiments, it is with much regret I find a custom that has prevailed in this province for a quarter of a century infringed upon by the brethren of the Margate Lodge, No. 149, who are to entertain the Provincial Grand Lodge of Kent, on the 18th instant. Hitherto, I believe, it has been the custom to have the tickets for the banquet fixed at 6s. 6d., thus leaving every brother free to order such wine, &c., &c., as he may be disposed to take, a custom that has never yet, I believe, been complained of; but in the circular of invitation issued by Lodge No. 149, I read, "Tickets, including a bottle of wine, dessert, and waiters, 11s. each." Under such circumstances a brother is compelled to pay for a bottle of wine, or absent himself from the banquet, at which he would have been present, had he been at liberty to call for what he liked, or thought best for himself. This strikes at the object I have alluded to already, and I fear will tend to diminish the attendance at the banquet, for we know that provincial meetings are composed of all classes of society, and therefore due regard should be paid to such a consideration. The occasional mingling of the various classes at such times has a very beneficial tendency, especially among Masons, and leads to a reciprocity of good feeling and harmony among "all sorts and conditions of men."

Many of our Craft are endeavouring, in a most praiseworthy manner, to provide suitable places for their Lodge meetings, to rid themselves of the odium of holding their Lodges at inns or taverns; how does this arrangement of including a bottle of wine in the banquet ticket harmonize with such efforts?

It is too late, however, to remedy this (I must call it) fault: I therefore put these sentiments on record, hoping, that in so doing, we may for the future sit at the banquet as Free Masons.

I am, dear Sir and Brother, yours faithfully and fraternally,
Kent, July 6th, 1859. A KENTISH MASON

BRO. SHERRY AND THE GRAND REGISTRAR.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE FREEMASONS' MAGAZINE AND MASONIC MIRROR.

DEAR SIR AND BROTHER,—I was much surprised on reading the account of a meeting of the Lodge of Economy, No. 90, province of Hampshire, where a P.M., Bro. Sherry, thought fit to revive the subject of the conduct of the Grand Registrar, who was so completely cleared of the charge brought against him by the vote of Grand Lodge on June 1st. Bro. Sherry appears to have entirely forgotten the charge he received as an E.A.P., when he was told his "Obedience must be proved by a ready acquiescence in all votes and resolutions duly passed by a majority of the brethren" (which surely must be binding on him and all others in respect to Grand Lodge, as of a private Lodge); and still more recently when, as W.M. elect, he solemnly promised "to submit to the awards and resolutions of his brethren in general Lodge convened," and further "strictly to conform to every edict of Grand Lodge,"—all this, I repeat, appears to have been forgotten by that worshipful brother. Had a younger Mason committed himself in this way we could not be so much surprised. Bro. Sherry had of course a right to explain to his Lodge the part he took in the proceedings of Grand Lodge, but he should not insult the Grand Master, and the members of Grand Lodge as he did in his resolution.

There are other provinces where the proceedings of Grand Lodge are narrowly watched as well as those connected with the "Observer party," and one would fain hope that the bad grace with which they (the Observer party) come out of every storm, raised by themselves, and which would disgrace any body of men of less pretensions, will teach them to do to their neighbours as "in similar cases they would wish he would do to them," and allow the discussions in Grand Lodge to be characterized by more "brotherly love."

I am, dear Sir and Brother, yours truly and fraternally.
JAMES FITZGERALD.
P.M., and Hon. Sec., 523, and Prov. G.O.

CITY WARDS.—The division of the City into wards is very ancient, but the number of them is unknown prior to 1285, when, according to the Liber Albus (vol. 1, page 165), it was divided into twenty-four wards. The division of Farringdon into two wards increased the number to twenty-five; and when, in 1550, the liberties of the borough of Southwark were granted to the Mayor, Aldermen, and Commonalty of the City of London, a twenty-sixth ward was formed, by the name of the Bridge Ward Without.—City Press.

THE MASONIC MIRROR.

MASONIC MEM.

A NUMBER of the friends of the Freemasons' Magazine, as at present conducted, will meet at the Freemasons' Tavern, on the 20th instant, at half-past four o'clock, when brethren wishing to assist the Committee are requested to attend.

METROPOLITAN.

ROBERT BURNS LODGE (No. 25).—The brethren celebrated their summer festival at the Crystal Palace, on Thursday, 7th inst., where nearly two hundred of the brethren and ladies assembled at an early hour. At two o'clock, in the south tower, Bro. Strange provided an elegant dinner and dessert. After grace had been chanted by Miss Jeffreys, Bros. T. Young, Donald King, and T. Lawler, the W.M., Bro. D. R. Farmer, proposed "The health of the Queen," which was followed by the national anthem. "Prince Albert, Albert Prince of Wales, and Prince William Frederick of Prussia (he being a brother of the noble Order)," was the next toast, followed by the healths of "The Earl of Zetland and Lord Panmure, and the rest of the Grand Officers." During the afternoon an excellent selection of music was performed by the professional brethren and ladies. In giving the toast of the day, "Prosperity to the Robert Burns Lodge, No. 25," the W.M., Bro. D. R. Farmer, thanked those by whose suffrages he had been thought worthy to preside over a Lodge named after Scotia's immortal bard, and hoped the Robert Burns Lodge might exist as long as his honoured name, which he felt and hoped would be for ever. Bro. W. Watson, P.M., congratulated the brethren on the progress of the Lodge. He said the Robert Burns Lodge now ranks amongst the most flourishing and best regulated Lodges of the Craft; that there was something in a name he firmly believed, and in that of Burns especially. The bard's attachment to Freemasonry was great; he was initiated at the age of twenty-four, in the St. James's Lodge, Tarbolton. In 1787, Burns presided as W.M. of the Marchline Lodge, and on the minute book is the name of Dugald Stewart as a visitor. In May of the same year, Burns was exalted to the degree of a R. A. Mason, the entry on the minutes is: "On account of R. Burns's remarkable poetical genius, unanimously agreed to admit him gratis, and considered themselves honoured by having a man of such shining abilities for one of their Companions." In the same year (1787), he became a joining member of the Canongate, Kilwinning, Edinburgh; the minutes on this occasion style him "A great poetic writer, and well known from a late publication of his works, which have been universally commended." At Edinburgh he erected a monument at his own expense over the remains of a brother Mason and a fellow bard, Ferguson; upon this monument, after his own death, which occurred July 21st, 1796, an iron plate was laid with the following epitaph:—

"Oh, Robert Burns, the man, the brother;
And art thou gone, and gone for ever?
And hast thou crossed that unknown river,
Life's dreary bound?
Like thee where shall we find another
The world around?
Go to your sculptured tombs, ye great,
In a' the tinsel trash of state;
But by the honest turf I'll wait,
Thou man of worth!
And weep the sweetest poet's fate,
E'er lived on earth!"

Bro. Watson concluded by hoping that the spirit of brotherly love, wit, and humour, might abound among them that day, in honour of the bard from whom the Lodge is named; that day might the spirit which one hundred years ago entered the mortal frame of the matchless poet, whose memory we venerate and love, make their meeting one of unmingled delight; so that in days to come they might look backward with pleasure, and say, "I was there that day." The W.M., in proposing "The Ladies," congratulated the meeting on the honour conferred on them by the presence of so many of them that day; it was such arrangements as these that enhanced the value of Freemasonry, by showing the fair sex how highly the members of the Craft valued their society. Bro. Thomas Alexander Adams most gallantly and eloquently returned thanks for the ladies, and must have felt amply repaid by the approving looks of the fair ones around. "The health of the W.M.," having been proposed, the W.M. said, "Allow me to express my gratitude for the very kind manner which my health has been received at your hands. I cannot but feel the honourable position in which I am placed by being chosen to preside over so happy, numerous, and respectable a meeting." "The Stewards," coupled with the name of Bro. Apted, P.M. and Treasurer, was then proposed, who in reply offered their warmest thanks; they rejoiced that the little service they had rendered had given satisfaction, more particularly to the ladies, for whom they might say this festival was especially arranged, and it should not be their neglect if many more such reunions did not take place. The company now adjourned to the beautiful grounds of the Crystal Palace, and again met in the south tower at eight o'clock, where tea and coffee were served; and this very agreeable party broke up.

ST. JOHN'S LODGE (No. 196).—A monthly meeting of this flourishing Lodge was held at the Holly-Bush Tavern, Hampstead, on the 5th inst., the W.M., Bro. H. Cornick in the chair, Bros. J. R. Smith, S.W.; G. Hart, J.W.; G. Pritchard, S.D.; Jno. Douglas, J.D.; J. Houghton, I.G., pro tem.; F. Adlard, Dir. of Cera.; Hamilton, P.M.; Shury, P.M.; Adams, P.M.; Aldrich, P.M., Hon. Sec., and Bros. Pitt, Dr. Winter, Capt. Thomson, G. F. Fry, Bayertz, Harman, Higman, Stopher, Caney, Davis, Chadwick, Matthews, Giltro, and others. The visitors were Bros. H. C. Shenton, P.M. No. 40; E. W. Davis, J.W. No. 112; W. Paxon, P.M. No. 96; Capt. Edward Thomson, No. 306, Ireland; Major G. E. McLain, No. 306, Ireland; W. Hughes, S.D. No. 70; W. L. Edwards, No. 70; F. Pearson, No. 70; H. Marston, No. 149, and others. Two brethren were raised to the third degree. The Lodge proceeded to ballot for Mr. Henry Holt, R. N., who being duly elected, was initiated into Freemasonry. Two gentlemen were proposed by Bro. Stopher for initiation at the next meeting of the Lodge. Bro. Vinall was unanimously elected a trustee of the Benevolent Fund of the Lodge, in place of a brother resigned. It may be worthy of notice that a portion of all fees for initiation and joinings are devoted to this benevolent fund, to which the members of the Lodge liberally subscribe. This fund is to be devoted to such of the members, past members, and widows and orphans of deceased members of the Lodge as may require its assistance. We sincerely congratulate the St. John's Lodge on the excellent principles on which it is conducted, and we strongly urge Lodges generally to follow the example. The Lodge business being concluded, the Worshipful Master and brethren adjourned to an excellent banquet, provided by Bro. Dale. The usual loyal and Masonic toasts were given and responded to in right Masonic style. The health of the initiate was proposed by the Worshipful Master and responded to by Bro. Henry Holt, R. N., who, in thanking the Worshipful Master for the kind way in which he had mentioned his name, and the brethren for the very cordial way in which they had responded, said that it could not be expected that he should expatiate at any length upon Freemasonry, but he had ever heard it mentioned with respect and admiration. With what he had witnessed that evening he was highly gratified, and he thanked his friends and Bro. Captain Thomson for proposing his admission into so ancient an Order and so respectable and influential a Lodge. He would promise to be as diligent in learning the duties incumbent upon him in his new capacity, as his professional duties would admit. In whatever climate he might be called to, he should not fail to recollect the important admonition he had received that evening. He trusted he should ever reflect credit on the Order as well as on the St. John's Lodge, which had received him with so much kindness and brotherly regard. The Lodge was highly entertained by the excellent singing and imitations of Bros. Major McLain, Capt. Edward Thomson, Caney, Giltro, &c., &c.

YARBOROUGH LODGE (No. 812).—This Lodge held its eleventh anniversary on Thursday last, July 7th, 1859, under the presidency of Bro. R. B. Hampton, W.M., assisted by his officers. The Lodge was opened at twelve o'clock at noon, when four gentlemen were initiated into our mysteries, after which the brethren, accompanied by their ladies, assembled at Bro. Smith's, Bell Tavern, Lower Edmonton, to dinner. The usual toasts were given, and the health of Bro. Crisp, the immediate P.M., was received with great applause, and was succeeded by the presentation of an honorary P.M. jewel from the Lodge, highly worthy of the givers and receiver. The pleasures of the day were greatly enhanced by the introduction of the boys of the Masonic school (which establishment is not far from Edmonton); the appearance of the children elicited the highest encomiums from all present, the ladies especially. Many well known members of the Craft were present, particularly Bros. J. Biggs, William Wynne, Kindred, Vasey, Rev. D. Shaboe, M.A., and Rev. C. Woodward, of the Boys' School, Purdy, Mobbs, Day, and Thompson.

INSTRUCTION.

PANMURE LODGE (No. 1023).—The first meeting of this Lodge of Instruction was held at the Swan, Stockwell, on Wednesday, 6th July, ably presided over by Bro. Charnock, W.M. of the parent Lodge, assisted by Bro. Braham, S.W., and Bro. Garrod, J.W. There was a numerous attendance of brethren. The W.M. having opened the Lodge, worked the first section, and afterwards went ably through the ceremony of initiation—Bro. Ball, No. 1022, being the candidate—the fourth section was also worked, after which Bro. Braham was elected W.M. for the ensuing week, who appointed his officers in rotation. Several joining members were proposed and unanimously elected, and it was resolved that the inauguration festival be held at the Swan, Stockwell, Wednesday, 27th July, at six o'clock, on which occasion Bro. James Richard Warren, P.M., was requested to work the ceremony of installation. This Lodge is under the especial supervision of Bros. Thomas, Dr. R. Farmer, H. Garrod, H. Charnock, J. R. Warren, and W. Braham, and the correctness of its working may be relied upon.

PROVINCIAL.

DORSETSHIRE.

LYME REGIS.—Montague Lodge (No. 963).—This Lodge held its annual meeting on Wednesday, July 6th, for the purpose of installing the W.M., Bro. Dr. Marder, by Bro. R. Collard, P.M., Nos. 168 and 209. After the investment of the officers, a vote of thanks to Bro. Collard was carried and ordered to be inserted on the minutes for the readiness and truly Masonic courtesy he had acceded to the request of the brethren of the Montague Lodge to perform the ceremony of the day. The brethren afterwards dined together.

LANCASHIRE (WEST).

LIVERPOOL.—Mariners' Lodge (No. 310).—The brethren of this Lodge held their monthly meeting at the Masonic Temple, in Hope-street, on Thursday, the 7th inst., at half-past two o'clock. Bro. Williams, W.M., commenced the labours of the day, and at the proper time, Bro. Henry Lamb, W.M. elect, was presented for installation, which ceremony was performed by Bro. Pepper, P.M., assisted by Bros. Hamer, Prov. G. Dir. of Cers.; Edwards, Prov. G. Reg.; Maddox, Prov. G. Supt. of Works and Treasurer of the Lodge; Banister, Prov. G. Sec. and W.M. No. 56; Youngtushand, W.M. No. 294, and Phillips, W.M. No. 965. The Worshipful Master then appointed and invested the following officers:—Bro. M. Pepper, jun., S.W.; Joseph Swift, J.W.; A. H. Caldwell, S.W.; A. Green, J.D.; Wm. Crane, I.G. Two gentlemen were initiated into the Order, and several sums of money presented to applicants. The Prov. G. Dir. of Cers., Bro. Hamer, presented (in the name of the Lodge) to Bro. Pepper, P.M., a valuable gold jewel bearing the following inscription:—"To Bro. John Pepper, P.M., P.G.S. West Lancashire, this jewel is most respectfully presented by the Master, Wardens, Officers, and Brethren of the Mariners' Lodge, No. 310, of Antient Free and Accepted Masons, in testimony of their warm regard toward him as a man and a Mason. Liverpool, June, A.D., 5859;" and also an elegant silver tea pot inscribed as follows:—"Presented to Bro. John Pepper, P.M., P.G.S., by his brethren of the Mariners' Lodge, No. CCCX., of Free and Accepted Masons. Liverpool, June, MDCCCLIX." Bro. Pepper having expressed his thanks in brief but feeling terms for the honour done him, the brethren were called off, and proceeded to the Queen's Hotel, Waterloo, at which delightful resort Bro. Condliff had provided a very elegant dinner. The evening's pleasure was much enhanced by the singing of Bros. Wood, Graham, Haswell, Thomason, and Atherton. Bro. Wilberforce presiding at the pianoforte. All the usual loyal and Masonic toasts were given and responded to, and the Lodge being duly closed, the brethren left the health restoring breezes of Waterloo for the more sombre atmosphere of Liverpool.

GARSTON.—Lodge of Harmony (No. 287).—On Monday, the 4th inst., the installation of Bro. Aldrich, the Worshipful Master elect of this Lodge, took place in the Lodge-room at the Wellington Hotel, Garston. The ceremony was attended by a large number of Prov. Grand Officers and members of the Lodge, as well as a goodly number of visiting brethren. After the installation, which was performed by Bro. J. Hamer, Prov. G. Dir. of Cers., the Worshipful Master appointed Bro. Fleetwood, S.W.; Bro. Pierpoint, J.W., and invested them and the other officers. After the initiation of Mr. Leach, the Lodge was closed, and the brethren dined. The W.M. proposed, in succession, "The Queen," "The Prince Consort," "The M.W.G.M.," the first and last of which were received with enthusiasm. Bro. Banister, Prov. G. Sec., proposed "The health of Lord Panmure, R.W.D.G.M. with musical honours." The W.M. gave "Bro. Le Gendre N. Starkie, R.W. Prov. G.M., Lancashire," and said, several of them knew him better than he did, but he had heard of him, and he had every reason to hold him in the highest admiration. "The health of Sir Thomas Hesketh, R.W.G.D.M., and the Prov. Grand Officers" was afterwards responded to by Bro. Edwards, Prov. G. Reg., who said, he was sure they would all allow that every effort was made by the Prov. Grand Lodge to extend the usefulness of the Order, and to further the interests of the various Lodges. The W.M. gave "The West Lancashire Masonic Institution for the education and advancement in life of children of distressed Masons," and with it he would couple the name of their esteemed Bro. Walsley, who had laboured so hard for its establishment and success. Bro. Walsley said, it gave him very great pleasure to state, that he had just received the names of two brethren as life members to the institution. Bro. Banister had contributed £5 5s., and the W.M. had requested his name to be added to the list for a like sum. As to the usefulness of the institution, there was nothing approaching it in the provinces, and he would, therefore, call upon those present to follow the example set them, for they could not contribute to an institution possessing greater claims, or one entitled to greater consideration. He had recently given up taking an active part in the institution's affairs, and regretted the absence of Bros. Campbell and Brahner, who could have furnished them with every information. The institution was worthy of Freemasonry; it aided the offspring of their brethren in their advancement in life, and when they had talent assisted them in the higher branches of the arts and sciences. Bro. Holme, P.M., proposed the health of the W.M., who returned thanks, and said, his greatest desire was to see the Lodge prosperous, and to promote working. There had certainly been some slight difference among them, but for the opposition which he met with he cherished no ill will against any of them. He concluded by giving the health of the immediate P.M., Bro. Holme, who in reply said, he would do all he could to assist the W.M. Bro. Dr. Marder, in the work of the Lodge, and in promoting its prosperity. The Wardens and other Officers of the Lodge, and the visiting brethren were afterwards toasted. The musical brethren lent their valuable aid in enlivening the proceedings of the evening by singing several songs and glees.

LIVERPOOL.—St. John's Lodge (No. 971).—The installation of the Worshipful Master of this flourishing Lodge took place on Wednesday evening, the 6th instant, at the Caledonian Hotel, Duke-street. There was an unusually large number of the brethren present, and among the visiting brethren were Bros. John Hambleton, No. 350; David Smart, No. 1,026; James Hamer, Prov. G. Dir. of Cers.; G. W. Phillips, W.M., No. 965; John Pepper, Prov. G. Sec.; Thomas Armstrong, P.M., No. 368; W. H. Martin, No. 111; Louis Reddick, No. 378. Bro. Hamer installed Bro. W. T. May, and Messrs. Wm. Dabbs and George Gowland were afterwards initiated into the mysteries of our noble Order by the W.M., Bro. May, after which the Lodge was called off from labour to refreshment. At the close of an excellent repast, the W.M. gave the usual loyal and patriotic toasts, which were warmly responded to. After the healths of the M.W.G.M., the R.W.D.G.M., and the Dukes of Athole and Leinster, the W.M., in giving the health of Bro. Le Gendre N. Starkie, R.W. Prov. G.M. of West Lancashire, alluded to his deserved popularity. Bro. Walsley said the West Lancashire Masonic Institution for the education of children of distressed Masons was going on very favourably, but the claims on its funds were now very largely increasing, and it behoved every brother to make an effort to assist its progress. The sum of five shillings per annum was all that was asked as a subscription to its funds, and the payment of that sum for three years entitled them to be a governor, which gave them the privilege of nominating a child to its funds. They had now a fund of between £2,500 to £3,000, which, with the continued subscriptions of every member of the province, would be ample to place the institution in a good position for years to come. The health of the W.M. having been drunk, several other toasts followed, and the brethren broke up at an early hour.

STAFFORDSHIRE.

WOLVERHAMPTON.—Lodge of Honour (No. 769).—At the monthly meeting of this Lodge on Friday, July 8th, J. Fraser, Esq., M.D., and C. Hawley, Esq., were initiated into the mysteries of Freemasonry, the ceremony being correctly and impressively performed by the W.M., Bro. Gough; after which, at the request of the W.M., Bro. C. Matthews, S.D. delivered the charge of this degree. Bros. Reeves, Kitson, and Tudor, were passed to the second degree, the charge being given by Bro. F. Sollom, J.D. A proposition was made to subscribe to the Masonic charities, two pounds per annum to the Boys' School, and the same amount to the Girls' School. The W.M. reminded the brethren that the next provincial meeting would be held at Stafford on the 2nd of August, when he hoped as many brethren as possible would attend.

SURREY.

PROVINCIAL GRAND LODGE.

The annual Provincial Grand Lodge was held on Monday last, July 11th, at the Angel Hotel, Guildford, under the presidency of the R.W. Prov. G.M., Bro. Dobie, Prov. G. Reg.; who was supported by Bros. Dr. Harcourt, D. Prov. G.M.; G. White, Prov. S.G.W.; G. Price, Prov. C. Treas.; Greenwood, G. Secretary; C. Beaumont, S.G.D.; W. J. Meynott, J.G.D.; Francis, P.D. Prov. G.M.; W. H. White, P. Prov. G. Sec.; H. Evans, P.G.S.B.; Snow, P.G.S.B., Sussex; D. Bruce, P. Prov. G.S.B.; John Symonds, P.G. Steward, &c., &c.

The Lodge having been duly opened, the minutes of the last meeting were confirmed; after which the Treasurer's account was read, showing a balance in hand of £77 18s. 8d., out of which £20 was voted to the widow of the late Bro. David Freeman of Croydon.

Bro. Price was re-elected Grand Treasurer; and the following officers appointed for the ensuing year:—Bros. Dr. Harcourt, D. Prov. G.M.; Elkins, S.G.W.; Moates, J.G.W.; Greenwood, G. Sec.; Rev. Lawrence W. Till, G. Chaplain; Meynott, S.G.D.; Baillie, J.G.D.; Masterman, G. Dir. of Cers.; C. J. Smith, G.S.B.

The recommendation of the committee on the propriety of establishing provincial committees, to aid the funds of the two Masonic schools, was agreed to, with the addition that the committee should act on behalf of all the Masonic charities, viz., the Girls' School, the Boys' School, the Aged Masons' Annuity Fund, and the Widows' Annuity Fund.

The Lodge was then closed, and the brethren adjourned for about an hour, when they reassembled at a very elegant banquet, presided over by the R.W. Prov. Grand Master, supported by the D. Prov. Grand Master, his officers, visitors, and other brethren.

On the removal of the cloth, the health of her Majesty was given, and enthusiastically responded to.

The R.W. Prov. Grand Master said, that the next toast, like the former, was one of loyalty, and was sure to meet with a cordial reception—"The health of their M.W. Grand Master, the Earl of Zetland." (Cheers). The noble lord had assumed the office under some difficulties, having succeeded his late royal highness the Duke of Sussex, who had long enjoyed the confidence of the brethren. The noble lord had however, shown the greatest zeal, ability, and courtesy, in conducting their affairs, and under his rule Masonry had extended beyond all precedent. (Cheers).

The D. Prov. Grand Master said he had the honour to be entrusted with the next toast, the health of "Lord Panmure, and the rest of the Grand Officers." Lord Panmure was a most distinguished man and excellent Mason, and in his office of Prov. D. Grand Master had shown himself most energetic and zealous in the discharge of his duties, evidently having the welfare of the Craft at heart. They were honoured that day with the presence of more than one Grand Officer, including their respected Bro. Evans, the excellent Master of the Reigate Lodge, and their venerable Bro. White, who had so many years filled the office of Grand Secretary, in which he won the respect and esteem of the brethren, from the Grand Master down to the humblest member in the Craft. (Applause). He therefore coupled with the toast the names of Bro. White and Evans. (Cheers).

Bro. White, P.G. Sec. returned thanks for the honour conferred upon him, and assured the brethren that after sixty years of active life as a Mason—nearly the whole of which had been spent in the service of the Craft—nothing gave him greater gratification than to receive such a mark of approbation from so distinguished a body in the Craft as the Prov. Grand Lodge of Surrey. (Applause).

Bro. Francis, P.D. Prov. G.M. had great pleasure in being allowed to propose the next toast—and he was sure he needed no excuse for doing so in the highest of terms—the health of their "Right Worshipful Prov. Grand Master." (Applause). Bro. Dobie not only filled that office to their satisfaction, but he also for many years held a most distinguished position in Grand Lodge as G. Reg., the duties of which he performed to the great advantage of the Craft, and his own honour. (Cheers).

The Prov. Grand Master returned thanks for the very handsome manner in which his health had been proposed, and to the brethren for so cordially responding to it. He could assure them that he always felt highly gratified at being amongst the brethren of Surrey, whom he felt proud of presiding over. Wherever a brother could be found willing to take his position who was likely to be more serviceable to the Craft than he could be, he would willingly make way for him (No, no!), but so long as the province was confided to his care he would use his utmost endeavours to promote its prosperity. (Cheers).

The health of the visitors was given and responded to by Bro. Bell, P. Prov. G.W., Norfolk, and Bro. Snow, P. Prov. G.S.B., Sussex, the latter of whom stated that he was an old Surrey Mason, that he was about to rejoin a Surrey Lodge, and hoped to die a Surrey Mason.

The Prov. Grand Master then proposed the "Health of the D. Prov. G.M. and the rest of the Prov. Grand Officers." The D. Prov. G.M. had shown himself in every way worthy of his office, and had by his strict attention to his duties, very much tended to the prosperity of the Craft in the province. He had recently given another convincing proof of his zeal for Freemasonry, by consenting to assume the chair of the new Lodge, though with the old title of the Royal Alfred of Guildford, and there could be no doubt that under his auspices it must prove successful. (Cheers). With regard to his other officers he believed he might say, that as he had been fortunate in his selection upon previous occasions, so he should prove upon the present. He had great pleasure in asking the brethren to join him in drinking their health. (Applause).

Bro. Dr. Harcourt, D. Prov. G.M., thanked the R.W. brother for the renewed mark of confidence extended to him that day, and the brethren for the kindness which he always received at their hands. He had always met with the most flattering reception throughout the province, telling it his duty to occasionally visit every Lodge within it, and would, so long as he continued to receive the confidence of the Prov. Grand Master and the brethren, use his utmost exertions to promote and maintain the best interests of Freemasonry in Surrey. (Cheers). As there were several other Grand Officers, such as their excellent Treasurer, their valuable Secretary, and their Chaplain, who had done them so much honour by coming amongst them, and who would probably like to say something for themselves, he should now only again thank them for the confidence reposed in him. (Applause).

The Prov. Grand Treasurer having declined the invitation to address the brethren.

Bro. Greenwood, Prov. G. Sec., thanked the Prov. Grand Master for having re-appointed him to so responsible an office as that of Grand Secretary, the honour of which he duly appreciated, and assured the brethren he would ever endeavour to discharge the duties of the office to the best of his ability.

Bro. the Rev. L. W. Till, G. Chaplain, assured the R.W. Prov. Grand Master and the brethren that he was deeply grateful for the honour which had been conferred upon him by his appointment as Grand Chaplain to the province. He had ever regarded Freemasonry as well calculated to assist the cause of religion and morality, and so far as the duties of his parish would allow him, would do his best to promote and strengthen its position in the province. (Applause).

The Prov. Grand Master had now to ask them to drink to "The health of the Past Grand Officers," coupled with the name of Bro. Francis, who had for a considerable time filled the office of D. Prov. G.M., indeed after the death of the late Lord Monson he was for some time virtually the Grand Master, and had discharged his duties with great tact and ability. At that time there was some disunion in the province, which rendered the office one of great difficulty, but Bro. Francis had successfully overcome every difficulty and restored union and happiness.

Bro. Francis, P. D. Prov. G.M., returned thanks, and stated that the R.W. Prov. G.M. having alluded to the difficulties with which he had been beset when he held office, he could assure them that those difficulties were more than compensated by the happiness he had enjoyed in later years when their present excellent Prov. Grand Master had re-appointed and continued his confidence in him as D.G.M. Though he now no longer resided in the province, he felt the greatest interest in its prosperity, and was always happy in visiting it on every possible occasion. (Applause).

Bro. Elkins, P. Prov. G.W. having obtained leave to propose a toast, gave the health of the "Prov. Grand Treas., Bro. Price," to whom they were all greatly indebted for the care and attention he paid to the duties of his office. (Applause).

Bro. Price, Prov. G. Treas., returned thanks, assuring them that the compliment was quite unexpected, as he considered that his health had been drunk in the toast of the officers. He esteemed the toast the more highly as coming from a brother who had preceded him in the office, but whose other duties would no longer allow him to continue to hold it.

The Prov. Grand Master proposed "Prosperity to the Royal Alfred Lodge," by whom they had been so kindly and hospitably received that day. The resuscitation of the old Lodge, under a new number, was chiefly due to Bro. Haydon, who he regretted was unable to be present that day, and Bro. Elkins, assisted by the D. Prov. Grand Master—who had kindly become the Master—he had no doubt would make it a very successful and popular Lodge. (Applause). In the absence of Bro. Haydon, he would couple with the toast the name of Bro. Elkins. (Cheers).

Bro. Elkins, Prov. S.G.W. regretted that Bro. Haydon was prevented by illness from being present to acknowledge the toast, as he was sure he would have had great pleasure in doing so. He trusted that that brother would soon be restored to health, and that when installed as Worshipful Master, as he would no doubt be next year, he might be enabled to complete the work so well begun by the D. Prov. Grand Master in resuscitating the Lodge. In the name of himself, and the rest of the brethren of the Royal Alfred Lodge, he could assure them it gave them the greatest pleasure to meet the Prov. Grand Lodge in Guildford, and he trusted it would not be many years before they might meet in greater strength than at present, and again have that honour. (Applause).

The health of the Master and brethren of the various Lodges in the province present was drunk, and responded to by Bro. H. Evans, Prov. G.S.B., Master of the Reigate Lodge.

The Prov. Grand Master said, he had now to give a toast in which he always felt the greatest interest. This country owed much to the possession of a press which was generally conducted by gentlemen of great independence, talent, and education. The Craft had for many years possessed the advantage of a journal which, with more or less fidelity, had recorded the proceedings of their body; but never as a rule with greater ability and impartiality than at present. He had, however, seen some editorial observations in the Magazine, which had caused him great pain, and which had evidently been made without due inquiry. When he last had the pleasure of being present at a Masonic gathering in Guildford, it was to take part in the consecration of the Royal Alfred Lodge, and on that occasion the brother who had charge of the musical arrangements, had introduced female voices into the choruses and anthems. Upon them the Editor of the Magazine had made the remarks to which he alluded, assuming that the ladies were admitted into the Lodge—an assumption which he was happy to see denied by a letter in a subsequent number from Bro. How. He admitted, that when he first heard the ladies' voices he was taken by surprise, and not knowing whether the ladies were in the clock case (laughter), or adjoining room, or where, made some inquiries—when he was assured by the Tyler, and by others, that they were so placed in another room, the door of which, though opened when their services were required, was effectually shaded by a curtain, so that nothing could be seen, and the instant that the music concluded, the door was closed, and properly tyled. Such being the case, he did not think a charge of want of attention to their Masonic duties ought to have been made, for even if he (the Prov. Grand Master) would have allowed any infringement on their ceremonies, he was sure that so distinguished a Mason as Bro. Stephen Barton Wilson would not have done so. (Applause). He made these remarks, knowing that Bro. Warren was present, not in any ill feeling, or to complain of the manner in which the Magazine was generally conducted, for he could assure them that he had the highest respect for that brother, and being at all times, as he was convinced the brethren were, happy to meet him in Surrey, he begged to give them "The Press, and prosperity to Bro. Warren." (Applause).

Bro. Henry G. Warren begged to thank the brethren for the compliment paid him, and through him to the Freemasons' Magazine. As a rule he would decline to discuss the policy of the Freemasons' Magazine or of anything which might appear within its pages. But as regarded the playful allusion at the close of the report of the consecration of the Guildford Lodge, he had no hesitation in taking upon himself the full responsibility of having written it. In making this admission he regretted that it should have given the slightest annoyance to their respected Prov. Grand Master; but he was sure that their R.W. brother would give him credit that in making the remark he was actuated only by a principle which he had consistently advocated. In Grand Lodge he had raised his voice against the admission of professionals—other than members of the Order—to their Masonic festivals, and he felt that but for circumstances which existed at the time which caused his motion to be regarded, by some of the brethren, with feelings altogether apart from its merits, that he would have carried his motion—that no professional should be allowed to sit down at their festivals unless he were a member of the Craft—holding as he did that it was impossible for a large body of Masons to sit down in festive communion without letting drop some word or gesture which ought not to be uttered or made in the presence of strangers. (Cheers). Though he had been defeated in Grand Lodge, he still maintained the same opinion, and had induced one or two of his friends, being professional singers who had sung at their festivals, to take the same view of the case and join the Order. (Cheers). Though he might be quiet on the question at present, he could assure the brethren he was only biding his opportunity, and should never cease his exertions until it was authoritatively declared that under no circumstances should non-masons be allowed to take part in Masonic banquets. (Cheers). Now, what he held to be improper in a Masonic banquet he could not hold to be proper in a Lodge, and hence the observations which appeared to have caused, though unintentionally, some annoyance to the R.W. Grand Master and other brethren. He did not mean to say that any harm had been done on the occasion alluded to—he had no doubt every possible precaution had been taken to prevent it—but the danger was, that innovation, however slight, often led to its being followed and extended until the bounds of prudence were passed, and they knew not when to stop. He should not pursue this topic further than to assure them that so long as he had the honour to be connected with the Freemasons' Magazine—and he spoke also for his colleagues—it would steadfastly and independently pursue the course of expressing an opinion without looking to the right or to the left, or without regarding the position of the brother, however exalted, whom it might for the moment oppose—though every care should be taken to avoid giving offence to any one. (Cheers). Having said so much, he might be allowed to thank them for the kind manner in which he had always been received in the province of Surrey, and to bear his testimony to the way in which the business of the province was conducted. Indeed their Right Worshipful Grand Master had, to some extent, been the cause of a series of articles in the Freemasons' Magazine, which he believed had caused a more sudden and perfect reform throughout the country than any articles written. It had long been the opinion of the conductors of the Magazine that the principle of opening the Prov. Grand Lodge within a private Lodge—a supreme power within a subordinate body—was decidedly opposed, not only to common sense, but to law. In this opinion they knew they were supported by some of the most distinguished brethren in the Order, but it was the observation that the Prov. Grand Registrar of England—the Prov. Grand Master for Surrey—followed out the principle in his practice, which the more immediately led to those articles upon the management of Prov. Grand Lodges, the justice of which he was proud to know had been almost universally acknowledged—the opening in any other way than as an independent and supreme body with the province, being now the exception, not the rule. (Applause).

One or two other toasts having been drunk, the brethren separated at an early hour.

CHICHESTER.—Lodge of Union (No. 45).—The brethren had a most delightful meeting on Friday, the 1st instant. On this day, according to the custom of this ancient Lodge, the brethren had decided on celebrating the annual festival of St. John the Baptist, and the Very Worshipful D. Prov. Grand Master for Sussex, Bro. Captain Dalbiac, having intimated his intention of paying a visit of inspection to the Lodge, the brethren mustered numerous on the occasion. The Lodge was opened at half-past three, by the W.M., Bro. George Molesworth, supported by Bros. Gooden, S.W.; Elliott, J.W.; Powell, jun., P.M.; Rev. — Watkins, Prov. G. Chaplain; Jones, Treasurer; Cottell, Sec. The visiting brethren were Bros. G. C. Dalbiac, D. Prov. G.M., Sussex, P.M. No. 390; John Bacon, P. Prov. S.G.W., and W.M., 1,034; Gavin Elliot Pocock, G.S.B., and P. Prov. G. Sec.; William Robert Wood, Prov. G.D., Sussex, P.M. Nos. 76 and 394, and W.M. No. 27; R. Wilkinson, P. Prov. S.G.D., Sussex; William Verrall, Prov. G. Treas., P.M. No. 338, W.M. No. 320; Garwood Wellesley Wollaston, No. 387; Allen Duke, M.D., Canongate Kilwinning, No. 1, Scotland; W. H. Stone, No. 21; A. Ambrosini, S.W., No. 1,034; W. L. Reid, Victoria Lodge, No. 756; J. C. Craven, Nos. 38 and 388; and Charles Whitefield. The brethren having saluted the D. Prov. G.M. and Prov. G. Officers in due form, Mr. Percival Wouham and Mr. Henry Shotter, both of whom had been previously proposed and seconded, were balloted for, unanimously elected, and initiated in a very able and efficient manner, by the W.M. We remarked how correctly and impressively the W.M. gave the charge for the first degree to the initiates. Bro. Powell, jun., P.M., on behalf of the Lodge, "begged to offer its most sincere congratulations to Bro. Pocock, P.M., for several years the valued Secretary of the Provincial Grand Lodge of Sussex, upon his recent appointment to the office of Grand Sword Bearer of England, and to express to him the gratification it feels that the M.W. Grand Master of England has been pleased to confer the office upon one whose exertions in the cause of Masonry have so well entitled him to that honour." Carried by acclamation. Bro. Pocock very feelingly thanked the brethren for this unexpected compliment. The R.W.D. Prov. Grand Master said, "It was gratifying to him to see the able working of the Lodge, and also to find it so flourishing; it was the desire of Grand Lodge that there should be strict uniformity of working throughout the kingdom, therefore he was sure that any little difference perceivable in the working of different Lodges could easily be rectified in these days of locomotion by the brethren visiting the neighbouring Lodges; he begged to express his satisfaction with the proceedings." The Lodge being closed, the brethren adjourned from the council chamber to the banquet, in the assembly room of the fine old Town Hall, built in 1731, and with pleasure we read in the tablets on its walls, among the list of subscribers to its erection, the name of the "Lodge of Ancient Free and Accepted Masons." The banquet, served by Bro. Purchase, of the Railway Hotel, was excellent; about forty brethren, including the R.W.D. Prov. G. Master and Provincial Officers, were present; every one seemed comfortable, and loth to say good bye to the Lodge of Union.

ANCIENT AND ACCEPTED RITE.

PROVINCIAL CHAPTER.

A Chapter of the Rose Croix degree was held on Tuesday, the 5th July, at Portsmouth, the M.W.S., R. W. Bradley, presiding. Comp. J. Rankin Stebbing was affiliated, and Comps. George William Clarke, George Lungley, and John Thomas Enright (all of Southampton Chapters), were received into the degree. The ceremonies of the evening were most excellently performed. The members afterwards adjourned to a banquet, and closed the evening in a most agreeable manner.

COLONIAL.

VICTORIA.

FIRST PROVINCIAL GRAND LODGE AT BALLARAT.

The first Grand Lodge of the Craft in Ballarat, was held on Thursday, March 17th, in St. Paul's school room, under the auspices of the R.W.D. Prov. G.M., Bro. F. Thos. Gell, assisted by Bro. H. W. Lowry, Prov. S. G.W. Bro. Levick, Prov. G. Secretary, acting as Prov. J.G.W. Bro. the Rev. C. P. M. Barden, Prov. G. Chaplain, and the W.Ms., P.Ms. and Wardens of the Ballarat Lodges. During the holding of the Lodge in the first named place, the following address was presented to Bro. Gell, beautifully engrossed on parchment:—

"To Francis Thomas Gell, Esq., R.W.D. Prov. G.M., of the ancient and honourable order of Free and Accepted Masons, under the jurisdiction of the Grand Lodge of England.

"Right Worshipful Sir and Brother,—We, the undersigned Worshipful Masters and Past Masters, officers and members of the various Lodges under the English constitution, desire to express our gratification on the occasion of this your first visit to this part of the province. Recognising the fact, that while some govern, others must obey, and sensible that order is an essential part of our system, we rejoice at the establishment of a Provincial Grand Lodge, as tending to cement more closely the bond of union between the brethren in this colony, and to the prevention of lasting disputes, and by the administration of the internal affairs of our order. We hail with delight the advancement of the Craft over the whole surface of the habitable globe, and especially throughout this country; where the fusion of races from all climes have agreed to rear temples to our common Father and great Architect of the universe, whom we all ought to obey, and most humbly adore. We sympathize with our brethren in distant lands persecuted by blind rulers, and trust that light from above may be diffused in those lands, and that the eyes of the persecutors may be opened to know that the world's great Architect is our supreme Master, and the unerring rule he has given us is that by which we work. We look forward with pleasure to future visitations from the R.W. Prov. Grand Master and yourself, Right Worshipful Sir, and other Officers of Grand Lodges, so that the uniformity in the ritual, so desirable, may be strictly maintained, and the order, unity, and glory of the Craft, may for ever be preserved. And we are, Right Worshipful Sir and Brother, yours fraternally,

"W. SCOTT, W.M., No. 956.

"HENRY HARRIS, W.M., No. 1015.

"J. H. TAYLOR, S.W.

"R. H. WOOD, J.W.

"W. L. RICHARDSON, M.D., W.M., No. 1019,

"H. LEVINSON, W.M., No. 1046.

"RICHARD COCK, P.M.

"E. STEINFELD, P.M."

At twelve o'clock on the same day the ceremony of laying the foundation stone of the Ballarat Benevolent Asylum was appointed to take place under Masonic auspices—men of all creeds and opinions joining in this truly charitable work. The day was fine, and bright "queen's weather" encompassed everything; so that the first and chief element in the gala holiday was most auspiciously present. Most of the respectable houses of business were closed by the hour of noon, and all the town was full of life and bustle of a holiday sort. From shop, and office, and shaft, from "ceiled houses" and the humbler tent, there flocked the expectant sightseers in all directions, until it seemed as if all Ballarat had turned out of doors to keep a universal holiday.

Soon after twelve o'clock the several orders and local bodies began to muster in Melbourne-road, while the "Grand Marshal" (Mr. Superintendent Winch) and his "deputies," (Messrs. Dimant and Gwynneth), mounted on their steeds and arrayed in the scarfs of the Masonic Craft, marshalled the procession in the order determined on previously. At length the word of command was given, and the procession began its march, with bands playing and colours flying. First came four mounted troopers, as the vanguard of the procession. Then came the children of the Ballarat West National School, and the Mount Pleasant Wesleyan School. After them came the children of the Band of Hope, followed by the adult members of the Temperance Society. Then came the Colonial Society, bearing the Scottish flag, and composed of mounted members with tilting lances and pennons, and members on foot attired in full Highland costume, all wearing sprigs of heather in their bonnets, and preceded by a piper. Then came the band of the Ballarat Fire Brigade, followed by the members of the brigade in uniform, bearing not fewer than three copies of the "meteor flag" of England, and carrying axes, hooks, hose, pipe, and other implements of their body, decorated with gay ribbons. After the brigade came the members of the Mining Board, followed by the members of the District Road Board. Following the District Road Board came the several Lodges of the Odd Fellows, bearing their beautiful banners, attired in their scarfs and aprons, carrying the several emblems of their Craft, and preceded by a band. Then came the members of the municipal councils, and the band and banner of the several Lodges of the order of Freemasons. The banner was a small unpretending one, having a representation of the southern cross displayed, silver stars on an azure ground. But the magnificent insignia of the order, particularly of its chief officers, lent a special and majestic character to the procession. Closing the procession came the members of the committee of the Benevolent Association. After the procession and all around, everywhere, there came flocking the general public; and what with the bands playing, flags flying, ladies' gay dresses, eager pressing sightseers from window and balcony and housetop, the whole line of march presented such a scene as has not been equalled in Ballarat before or since the visit hither of his excellency Sir Henry Barkly.

The asylum reserve is situated, on the south side of Sturt-street, lying Dana-street for its southern, and the yet unformed street next west of Drummond-street for its eastern boundary. On the reserve a spacious and substantial gallery for the ladies' committee of the association, and ladies holding tickets, was erected; as also a smaller platform at right angles thereto, for the officers of the order of Freemasons; the latter platform being covered with green baize.

On arriving at the reserve it was found to be densely crowded, and the ladies' gallery being thronged with "the beauty and fashion" of Ballarat, a most gay and even brilliant coup d'œil was presented.

Around the foundation stone, which was placed in the angle between the two platforms, assembled the following officers of the body of Freemasons:—

The bearer of the Lodge banner.

The mallet, borne by Bro. Steinfeld, P.M.

Trowel, borne by Bro. Ocock, P.M.

Inscription roll, by the W.M. of the Clunes Lodge.

Phial, with coins, by the W.M. of the Buninyong Lodge.

Square, level, and plumb, by the W.M. of the United Tradesmen's Lodge, Ballarat East.

Ewer, with wine, by the W.M. of the Ballarat Lodge.

Cornucopia, by the W.M. of the Yarrowee Lodge.

Ewer, with oil, by the W.M. of the Victoria Lodge.

Volume of the Sacred Law, on a cushion, borne by Bro. Adams.

The Rev. C. P. M. Bardin, M.A., Provincial Grand Chaplain.

The Prov. G.J.W., Bro. R. Levick.

The Prov. G.S.W., Bro. H. W. Lowry.

The Prov. Grand Sword Bearer.

The R.W. Deputy Prov. Grand Master of Victoria, Bro. Francis Thomas Gell.

With these were also the president, vice presidents, and members' committee of the Benevolent Association, the architect, and the contractors.

The ceremony commenced by the singing of the Hundredth Psalm (Masonic version), after which the Prov. G.J.W., Bro. Levick, read the following inscription roll, afterwards deposited in the cavity of the stone, with the phial containing the coins of the realm:—

"The Benevolent Asylum. The stone of this building was laid March 17th, A.D. 1859, Anno Lucis, 5859, by Francis Thomas Gell, Esq., D. Prov. Grand Master of the colony of Victoria, holding warrant from the Grand Lodge of England; assisted by the Prov. Grand Officers, and by the Lodges of Ballarat, viz.:—The Victoria Lodge, No. 956, Bro. William Scott, W.M.; the Yarrowee Lodge, No. 1015, Bro. Henry Harris, W.M.; the Ballarat Lodge, No. 1019, Bro. Dr. Richardson, W.M.; the United Tradesmen's Lodge, No. 1024, Bro. Hyman Levinson, W.M.

"I was hungry, and ye gave me meat; I was thirsty, and ye gave me drink; I was a stranger, and ye took me in; naked, and ye clothed me; I was sick, and ye visited me; I was in prison, and ye came unto me."

The bottle having been deposited in the hollow of the stone, the Rev. C. P. M. Bardin, Prov. Grand Chaplain, offered up an appropriate prayer.

The acting Prov. Grand Master asked his Officers—Bro. H. W. Lowry, acting as D. Prov. Grand Master; Bro. Levick, as S. Prov. G.W.; and

Bro. H. Harris, as J. Prov. G.W., who bore the Masonic square, plumb and level—what were the emblems of their Craft? The Wardens replied, showing their emblems, applying each one his implement to the stone, and reporting the result to the R.W.D. Prov. Grand Master, who then had a silver trowel handed to him by Bro. Ocock, P.M., and the mallet by Bro. Steinfeld, P.M.

The stone having been laid, the D. Prov. Grand Master invoked the divine blessing to preserve the institution from ruin and decay. He then scattered corn from the cornucopia as the emblem of plenty; poured out wine as the emblem of joy and gladness; and oil as the emblem of peace and concord. The D. Prov. Grand Master having offered a brief extemporaneous prayer, returned to the architect the plans and elevations of the building, saying, "I have examined these plans of the building about to be erected, and they are all correct. I now return them to you, as to a skilful and competent architect." The National Anthem was then sung, followed by cheers for the Queen.

The R.W. Deputy Prov. Grand Master then addressed the assembly, saying that from time immemorial it had been the custom in the mother country for the Masons of England to be engaged in kindred ceremonies at the laying of the foundation stones of public buildings. As an old Mason and representative of the Craft, he was glad to find the order had so advanced in the district, and that it had been so distinguished as to have conferred upon it the honour of laying the foundation stone of that edifice. Their customs arose in the time when they were operative Masons, but now they were only speculative Masons. They were the only body who had preserved a ceremony for such an occasion as that; and it afforded him considerable satisfaction to have the opportunity to aid in the establishment of an institution which had for its object the relief of the poor and the distressed. In the name of the Masons he congratulated them, and the ladies in particular. The ladies were ever the first in the train of charity, that charity which waits on all below, and is the first of the bright hosts above. That day would redound to the credit of the colony, and be a testimony of the progress of the town. In the name of his brother Masons, he invoked the blessing of God upon the asylum, where all, both poor and rich, would be able to look for a home, not as a charity, but as a legitimate asylum to which they had contributed in their better days.

The close of Bro. Gell's address was followed by three cheers, and "one for the ladies."

The company were then addressed by the Rev. J. Potter, Church of England; the Rev. J. Bichford, Wesleyan; and the Rev. W. Henderson, Presbyterian; all of whom advised the members of every denomination to take part in the good work by their subscriptions and exertions. The Rev. P. Madden, Roman Catholic; and the Rev. J. Strongman, Congregationalist, also took part in the proceedings.

At the close of the proceedings, the procession re-formed, and retired from the reserve, and gradually the dense crowd broke up and dispersed. There were about five thousand persons assembled on the ground. It was half-past three o'clock when the head of the procession reached the post-office in the return march, and the Masonic body having retired to Bath's Hotel, where they subsequently partook of a cold collation, the other portions of the procession wended their way to their various destinations, and the ceremony of the day was at an end.

A collection was made during the proceedings amounting to thirty-eight pounds.

BAHAMAS.

A SPECIAL meeting of the Provincial Grand Lodge of the Bahamas under the registry of England, was convened at Masonic Hall, on Thursday evening, May the 10th, for the installation of officers for the ensuing year. The following is a list of the present office-bearers:—P. Treco, R.V. Lodge, Prov. S.G.W.; N. French, R.V. Lodge, Prov. J.G.W.; C. R. Hinson, Forth Lodge, T.I., Prov. G. Reg.; J. A. Brook, R.V.L., re-elected, Prov. G. Treas.; C. R. Perpall, R.V.L., re-appointed Prov. P.G. Sec.; J. H. Minns, R.V.L. Prov. S.G.D.; J. J. Musgrove, R.V.L., Prov. J.G.D.; C. Mardenbrough, R.V.L., Prov. The ceremony of installation was performed by S. Dillet, D. Prov. Grand Master.

INDIA.

DISTRICT GRAND LODGE OF BENGAL.

A QUARTERLY communication of the District Grand Lodge of Bengal, was held at the Freemasons' Hall, on Monday, the 21st March, 1859, at which were present, the R.W. Bros. John J. L. Hoff, D. Prov. G.M., as Prov. G.M.; Philip W. LeGeyt, P. Prov. G.M.; Henry Howe, P.D. Prov. G.M.; William Clark, Prov. S.G.W.; John B. Roberts, Prov. J.G.W.; Duncan Monteith, P. Prov. S.G.W.; William J. Judge, P. Prov. J.G.W.; and the V.W. Bros. the Rev. Dr. F. F. Mazuchelli, as P. Prov. G. Chaplain; John Gray, Prov. G. Reg.; William H. Hoff, Prov. G. Sec.;

W. Fredk. Jennings, Prov. S.G.D.; John G. Llewelyn (P. Prov. J.G.W.), as Prov. J.G.D.; Thomas Jones, Prov. G. S. of W.; Henry Frazer, P. Prov. S.G.W.; Thomas E. Carter, Prov. G.D. of C.; William Handford, Assist. Prov. G.D. of C.; George O. Wray, Prov. G.S.B.; Robert E. Ross, P. Prov. G.S.B.; and Joseph K. Hamilton, Prov. G.P.

Visitors and representatives were present from the Lodges St. David in the East, No. 371, under the Grand Lodge of Scotland; True Friendship, No. 265; Humility with Fortitude, No. 279; St. John's, No. 715; Star of Burmah, No. 897; Lodge de Gode Hoop, Cape of Good Hope; Star in the East, No. 80; Industry and Perseverance, No. 126; True Friendship, No. 265; Humility with Fortitude, No. 279; Marine, No. 282; Courage with Humanity, No. 551; St. John's, No. 715; Kilwinning in the East, No. 740; Star of Burmah, Rangoon, No. 897. A visitor of high rank; R.W. Bro. W. H. Read, Prov. G.M. of the Eastern Archipelago, was escorted in due form to the door of the District Grand Lodge, when the brethren rose, while the Deputy Prov. Grand Master advanced, greeted R.W. Bro. Read, and conducted him to his seat on the left of the throne. The brethren then saluted the distinguished visitor, in the usual manner, seven times.

The District Grand Lodge was opened in form, and with a prayer offered up by the Rev. Bro. Mazuchelli, and minutes of the quarterly communication of the 27th December, 1858, were read and confirmed.

The Prov. Grand Secretary read a correspondence with the Rev. and R.W. Bro. T. C. Smyth, regarding the representation of the Prov. Grand Lodge of the Eastern Archipelago in the District Grand Lodge of Bengal, by the R.W. Bro. J. J. L. Hoff; and also the report of the Finance Committee on the audit of the Prov. Grand Treasurer's accounts. The accounts were examined and found to be correct.

It was proposed by R.W. Bro. Roberts, seconded by Bro. Spiers, and carried, that a committee be appointed, with power to expend a sum not exceeding Rs. 2,500, for the purpose of decorating and furnishing the Freemasons' Hall.

Before closing the District Grand Lodge, the Deputy Prov. Grand Master delivered the following address:—"Dear brethren, when I last presided in this place, I did not think that I should have to do so again; but as I am still the locum tenens of the Prov. Grand Master, it is my duty to represent him once more in this Grand Lodge. As, however, it may be the last time that I shall have to do so, suffer me to address to you a few parting words. In taking a retrospect of Freemasonry in this province, extending to more than thirty years, it is undeniable that our institution holds a far more important position now than it did at the beginning of that period, although there are yet many things wanting to give it greater stability and a larger sphere of usefulness. At the time to which I have alluded, there was only one Lodge that could be said to be working prosperously, and that Lodge was located in Fort William. In Calcutta itself there were two Lodges; but they were weak in the number of their members. Of two other Lodges, standing high on the English register, nothing whatever beyond their names was known to the Masonic community at large. For a time there was a Prov. Grand Lodge; but of its proceedings the Lodges were in utter ignorance. That Prov. Grand Lodge soon ceased to exist; and then, having no supervision, each Lodge acted according to its own views, having vague notions of what was required by the "Constitutions," a thing which they talked of, but with which they were little acquainted, the book itself being rare. Then reigned many contradictions and absurdities. These have all been swept away, and a better order of things prevails now. This may not be very apparent to Masons who have belonged to the institution for only the last few years; but to one who has seen Masonry in a variety of phases, for a considerable period, the difference appears strikingly clear. Nineteen years ago, the Prov. Grand Lodge of Bengal was revived under that excellent brother, Dr. John Grant, our first Grand Master under the new regime. Fresh vigour was then infused into Freemasonry; but, in my humble opinion, too much was attempted at once. The institution, instead of being allowed to develop itself gradually, was forced into an intense and a dazzling existence; and it is to the want of caution then displayed that I attribute our being to this day without a house which we could call our own. This is a point, however, which has not been, and I hope will not be, lost sight of. The Lodges in Calcutta have increased to eight in number, and they are all flourishing, more or less; but we have not such an useful institution as a Lodge of Instruction, wherein brethren could become properly qualified to fill creditably the several offices in a Lodge, especially the high and important office of Master, upon which the well doing, or otherwise, of a Lodge mainly depends. This is one of the desiderata to which I wish to draw your especial attention. Since my appointment to the office of Prov. Grand Secretary, fifteen years ago, twenty new Lodges have been added to the number existing previously. The mutiny and rebellion of 1857 nearly annihilated all the Lodges in the upper provinces; but with the restoration of peace they are reviving from their ashes. The number of Lodges now actually working in the provinces is as follows:—Calcutta, 8; country 16; total, 24; while some of those still dormant may yet be reanimated. On the formation of the Prov. Grand Lodge in 1840, several benevolent schemes were projected, but none of them came to maturity. Eight years after that time, the Fund of Benevolence was established, but not without opposition, on the ground that it was impracticable, and that the Lodges would be unable to contribute towards its support. The amount of good it has done, in granting relief to the destitute widow and orphan, and to the brother in distress, while no member of a Lodge has felt any inconvenience in paying the trifling contribution of one rupee a quarter, is the best refutation of the objections that were made to the establishment of the Fund. The operations of this Fund could be enlarged considerably, and a more systematic plan of dispensing charity than that which is at present observed, could be established, were the charitable funds of all the Lodges merged in it; but I am aware that this scheme does not enlist the unanimous assent of the Lodges, and unless unanimity can be secured, it had better be left alone. I would only take this opportunity to notice an erroneous notion entertained by some brethren (who, I fear, do not take the trouble to inquire and inform themselves, though I have been at all times willing to give every information in my power) that the Fund of Benevolence is a sort of "St. John's Box" of the District Grand Lodge; and therefore it is sometimes called the Grand Fund of Benevolence. This is quite a mistake. The fund was, of course, established by authority of the District Grand Lodge, i.e., by consent of a large majority of the Lodges in the province, as directed in the Constitutions; but the District Grand Lodge has no control whatever over it. It is entirely under the management of a committee composed of the Masters and immediate Past Masters of the Lodges (country Lodges having the privilege of being represented by proxy) with the addition only of the Deputy Provincial Grand Master as President, and the Grand Treasurer and Grand Secretary as members ex officio; even these latter could be dispensed with, and by a slight alteration in the by-laws of the District Grand Lodge, the Master of the senior Lodge, during his tenure of office, could be made the President if it were so desired. The Fund of Benevolence, therefore, is nothing more than a nick "St. John's Box" in Calcutta, with this difference only, that it is not attached to any Lodge. I need hardly touch upon another most important topic; but I cannot let the opportunity pass without saying a word regarding it. I allude to the careful discrimination which should be exercised in the admission of candidates into our Order, it being advisable that we should bear in mind that the eyes of the world are upon us, and that they will judge of us as they would of a tree, by the fruit we bear, and not by what we profess ourselves to be. The recommendation of a candidate by his friend should be received with due respect, but it is not sufficient. Every member of a Lodge ought to consider it his duty to inquire into the character of the individual, and thus to be prepared to exercise his privilege at the ballot conscientiously. It is for this purpose that the ballot is deferred for a fortnight; otherwise there could no necessity for it. A candidate could be proposed, balloted for, and if elected, initiated at once, as used to be done occasionally in former times, when Lodges gave their own interpretation of what constituted a case of emergency. Much has been said and written upon this highly important subject. It is needless, therefore, for me to do more than to recommend it to the serious notice of every brother in the Craft. In regard to the working of Lodges in Calcutta, and their management, I am happy to testify from my official connection with them during the last fifteen years, that there is a great improvement. It was remarked to me, lately, that Masonry was in a state of decadence in Calcutta. I could not concur in this view. It is true there is nothing of an exciting nature at present, which would awaken enthusiasm; but at the same time there appears to me to be abundant evidence that the calm which prevails is healthy. The Lodges seem to me to be pursuing the even tenor of their course; there are no storms or convulsions; and the Craft is in as prosperous a state as could be wished or expected—while there is a vast and unoccupied field on which there is every prospect that our banners shall yet be planted. And now, brethren, not wishing to trespass further on your time, allow me to bid you farewell! Be kind to my many shortcomings, and I shall ever be mindful of your many favours. Be of one mind; live in peace; and the God of love and peace shall be with you."

There being no further business, the District Grand Lodge was closed in antique and solemn form.

MASONIC FESTIVITIES.

DUDLEY.—On Wednesday, July 6th, the annual re-union of the brethren of the four Masonic Lodges in Dudley took place at Hagley Park, the beautiful seat of Lord Lyttleton, lord lieutenant of the county. After the brethren had rambled about in the delightful shades of this most classic ground, once the favourite haunt of Shenstone, Crabbe, Lyttleton, Shelley, and Pope, they repaired to the Lyttleton Arms, at four o'clock, p.m., and enjoyed an excellent repast. In addition to the Dudley brethren, we noticed Bros. Col. Vernon, Prov. G.M. of Staffordshire; G. H. Royds, D. Prov. G.M. of Worcestershire; Lieut. Webster; Underhill, W.M. of Noah's Ark Lodge, Tipton; Dudley Parsons, of the St. Matthew's Lodge, Walsall; Packwood, of the Lodge of Stability, London; B. Brooke, P.M., Webb, and Stringer, from the Stourbridge Lodge of Stability, besides the following P.M.s:—Masefield; Clark; Dennison; Bristow; Morris. There were also present, Bros. Sheppard, W.M. No. 313; George Horton, W.M., No. 838. Bro. Clark, P.M. of No. 313, occupied the president's chair, and the vice-president's was filled by Bro. Horton, W.M., No. 838. After the usual loyal and Masonic toasts, the president, in a very complimentary manner, proposed the healths of the Visitors and Officers of the Provincial Grand Lodges Worcester and Stafford, to which Bros. Col. Vernon, Royds, and Dudley Parsons responded. The health of the president and vice-president of the day were received with the greatest enthusiasm, as were those of Bros. Sheppard, W.M. of Lodge No. 313, Masofield, P.M., No. 313, and Brooke, W.M. of Lodge No. 249, all of which were responded to in truly Masonic style. After spending a most harmonious and pleasant evening, the brethren returned by the last train from Hagley, highly delighted with their Masonic re-union.

THE WEEK.

THE COURT.—The Queen took a drive on Saturday morning at Aldershot, and the Prince Consort rode out on horseback. The Prince of Wales rode with the Prince Consort, and the Princesses Alice and Helena and Prince Arthur accompanied her Majesty in her carriage. The Queen drove round a part of the camp, and inspected the regimental schools, the wards of the hospital, and also the racket court. Late in the afternoon her Majesty reviewed the whole of the troops now in camp at Aldershot, amounting to nearly 20,000. On Monday her Majesty, the Prince Consort, and the Prince of Wales, left Aldershot, and proceeded to the new camp at Woolmer, and reviewed the cavalry division. After the review the royal party proceeded by special train in the afternoon to Gosport, where they embarked in the royal steam yacht Fairy, Captain Deuman, en route for Osborne, which they reached in the evening. On Wednesday and Thursday the Queen and royal family walked and drove. There was no addition to the royal dinner party. The duration of the royal family's stay in the Isle of Wight is not fixed, but must of course depend upon public affairs.

FOREIGN NEWS.—The happy tidings of peace form the crowning news of this week. At Paris, the Moniteur of Monday, publishes the reasons which induced the belligerents to agree to an armistice. Inspired by sentiments of moderation, and anxious to prevent the needless effusion of human blood, the Emperor Napoleon, it says, sought to ascertain whether the Emperor of Austria was animated with similar sentiments, and finding this to be the case, an armistice was concluded. On the other hand, an Austrian paper, the Oberpostamts Zeitung, states that it was at the repeated request of the French that the armistice was granted. Commercial vessels of all countries may therefore navigate the Adriatic unmolested. The news of the armistice has had a very beneficial effect upon the public mind in Paris, and produced a considerable rise in Rentes and other securities. All suspense was terminated by a telegram from the Emperor Napoleon to the Empress, communicating the important information that a treaty of peace had been signed between the Emperor and the Emperor of Austria on the following bases:—An Italian confederation, under the honorary presidency of the Pope; the Emperor of Austria gives up his rights over Lombardy to the Emperor of the French, who remits them to the King of Sardinia; the Austrian Emperor keeps Venetia, but it is to form part of the Italian Confederation, and a general amnesty is to be granted. The people of Paris are on the qui vive in anticipation of the return of the Emperor, to whom they are prepared to give a most enthusiastic reception. It appears by advices from Turin that the news of an armistice having been concluded between France and Austria had created intense dissatisfaction among the patriotic party. The correspondents draw a shocking picture of the state of the immediate seat of warlike operations. The troops were suffering greatly from the heat, from dysentery, and the want of water. At Goito, where the corps of Prince Napoleon is encamped, the stench of the unburied horses is dreadful, and the air for miles is tainted with the smell from the half buried bodies of the slain on both sides.—A telegram from Trieste informs us that an Austrian steamer sustained a successful contest with a French frigate, the channel of Zara, on Thursday. The Vienna Gazette publishes a protest of the Duchess Regent of Parma against the late political changes which have occurred within the duchy, "contrary to the directions" left by the duchess on her departure, and "to the rights and interests of the Duke of Parma." A number of Austrians, prisoners of the French, have requested permission to establish themselves in Algeria.—A telegraphic despatch from Naples states, that on the night of the 9th inst., some Swiss troops mutinied in the barracks, and killed the colonel of the 4th regiment, and several officers. Having repaired to the royal palace, they were surrounded, but wounded the General Commander-in-Chief of the Swiss, and twenty privates. Upon this, a fire of grape shot was opened on the mutineers, killing seventy-one, and wounding 233 of them. The rest were disarmed; after this order was restored.—The Madrid journals of the 7th state, that in consequence of the precautions taken by the government, all fears of revolutionary movements in Andalusia had ceased.—The Europa has arrived at Liverpool with dates from Boston to the 29th ult. The proceeds of $5,000,000 dollars, which left Mexico on the 28th May, was seized by General Robles, who ordered it to be shipped at Sacrificios; but the commander refused to receive it, notwithstanding the orders of the English and French ministers to do so. The American government have claimed two millions. The English fleet have been ordered to Vera Cruz, and the English subjects have been banished from the republic. Fifty persons have been killed, and fifty or sixty wounded, by an accident on the Michigan Southern Railway. A telegraphic communication from New York announces the wreck of the steamer Argo, off Newfoundland. Crew and passengers saved.

INDIA AND CHINA.—By the overland mail we have dates from Calcutta to June 3rd, and from Hong-Kong to May 31st. The disaffection of the Company's troops was abating, and they are quietly waiting the result of an appeal to the home government and Parliament. The Calcutta volunteer guard had been disembodied by the Governor-general, in a formal order published in the Gazette—a proceeding that had caused much discontent among the European residents. On the Queen's birthday the Bishop of Calcutta, with the archdeacon and clergy of the metropolis, congratulated the Governor-general on the honours he had won, and also read an address to Her Majesty setting forth "the views of the clergy upon the relation of the government of India to its subjects in a religious point of view." Lord Canning returned thanks for their good wishes for his own health and happiness, and expressed his gratitude for "the steady introduction of peace."—The news from China is comparatively unimportant. The British plenipotentiary was about to start for Peking, escorted by a large force as far as the Gulf of Petcheelee, though it was not expected that any opposition would be made to his progress.

HOME NEWS.—Cabinet councils have been held twice this week at Lord Palmerston's residence.—Instead of having the satisfaction of recording a diminution in the mortality of the metropolis, we have now to announce a rapid increase in the rate. Last week the deaths rose to 1226, exceeding the average by 128.—At the last meeting of the Common Council, the Remembrancer informed the court that a bill for the better regulation of the corporation had been brought into parliament by the Home Secretary, and the bill was ordered to be considered at the next court. A long discussion took place upon a report from the lunatic asylum committee relative to the erection of a pauper lunatic asylum for the City. The report was referred back to the committee to take suitable steps in the matter. The court then adjourned.—John Barlow, the negro who was tried and acquitted last week at the Old Bailey for stabbing a police officer, was brought before Mr. Yardley, at the Thames Police-court on Saturday, charged with committing several very serious assaults. It seems that the prisoner, after his discharge, had been received into the Strangers' Home, where during the night he got up and made an indiscriminate attack with a razor upon those who were asleep in the same apartment, some of whom are dangerously wounded. A remand was ordered for further inquiry, fears being entertained that the unhappy man's intellect has given way.—An apprentice in the employ of Messrs. Wilks, cigar manufacturers, Spitalfields, while engaged at his work wantonly blew some tobacco dust into the eyes of a fellow workman. The man, irritated by the pain, struck a lad near him, under the erroneous impression that he was the delinquent. It was found necessary, in consequence of the blow, to remove the poor boy to the hospital, where he died on Wednesday morning.—A cabman named Woodrow, was brought before the magistrate at Clerkenwell, charged with a furious assault on Emily Barker. It seems that the ruffian had been offended with the unfortunate woman because she refused to go into a public house with him, and holding her with one hand he inflicted several stabs about the neck and breast. She was conveyed to the University Hospital, where she now lies in a critical state. Mr. Corrie remanded the prisoner for a week.—At the Court of Bankruptcy, J. D. Jones, who was lately the proprietor of "His Lordship's Larder," in Cheapside, but who left that concern for the purpose of establishing the "City Wellington," at 60, Fleet street, where he failed, applied for his certificate. The Commissioner considered the bankrupt had been guilty of reckless and extravagant trading, and therefore suspended his certificate (third class) for two years, but, as no fraud had been committed, granted protection.—The Court of Aldermen met on Wednesday, the Lord Mayor in the chair. Mr. F. J. Jonas was elected governor of Newgate. A petition was presented from a committee of liverymen, appointed by the Common Hall for the protection of the rights of the livery, praying the court to assist them in the defence of their rights. A conversation took place thereupon, and eventually the petition was sent to the corporation inquiry committee of the Court of Common Council.—At the commencement of business yesterday, there was considerable activity in the funds, and Consols were at 96½ to 4, but opened at the official period at 96½. Subsequently, sales on the part of the public to realize the late advances occurred, and the final quotation was 91½ to 90.—A very satisfactory report was presented at the meeting of the Union Bank of London, and the proprietors appear thoroughly satisfied with the progress their affairs have made.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.—In the HOUSE OF LORDS on Monday, Lord Wodehouse made the important communication that her Majesty's government had received intelligence that peace had been signed by the Emperor of Austria and the Emperor of the French, the terms of which we have stated above. On the motion of Lord Lyndhurst, a royal commission was agreed to, for the purpose of inquiring into the mode of taking evidence in the Court of Chancery, and its effects, and to report thereon.—On Tuesday some questions relative to the discipline of the volunteer rifle corps led to some discussion, in which several noble lords took part, and to some explanations from the Earl of Ripon on behalf of the Government. Lord Brougham called attention to the Coolie immigration to the British West India islands, which, under the operation of local acts, had degenerated into something not far removed from a revival of the slave trade. The Duke of Newcastle said it would be inconvenient to appoint a committee during the present session. —In the House of Commons on Monday, the further consideration of the Lords' amendments to the Red Sea and India Telegraph Company Bill led to considerable discussion, it being moved by Sir J. Graham that the discussion should be postponed. The house divided, and the amendment of Sir James Graham was negatived by a majority of 177 to 130. In reply to Mr. Disraeli, Lord J. Russell said the armistice was a suspension of hostilities only, but being for a period of five weeks he was led to hope that it might lead to some arrangement between the belligerents, which might produce a peaceful solution. Mr. W. Williams called attention to the increase in the estimates, and also to the punishment of flogging in the navy. Sir C. Napier did not think that corporal punishment in the navy could be altogether done away with. The house went into committee of supply, and the discussion of the estimates chiefly occupied the remainder of the evening. —On Tuesday the Grievous Disabilities Removal Bill, which had passed the Lords without question as a private bill, was thrown out in this House, the Commons considering that it involved public interests. In reply to a question of Mr. Disraeli, Lord J. Russell said that information had been received by the French Ambassador, to the effect that a treaty of peace between the two emperors had been signed. The noble lord then stated the terms of the treaty. The adjourned debate on the Roman Catholic Relief Act Amendment Bill principally occupied the remainder of the sitting. —On Wednesday, Mr. Dillwyn moved the second reading of the Church Rates Abolition Bill. Mr. Du Cane opposed the bill as nothing less than an attempt to rob the established church, and moved as an amendment that it be read a second time that day six months. Lord R. Moutague seconded the amendment. Mr. Baines, as a dissenter, who did not approve of the union of church and state, said he had no wish to say to the established church "stand and deliver." He was quite satisfied to cry out "hands off," and if they kept "hands off" he would be perfectly content. Mr. Adderley supported the amendment. Sir G. C. Lewis quoted a variety of statistics in order to show that the opposition to church rates was not to be attributed to the burden they cast upon the community, but rather to conscientious feelings which they were said to violate. He was at one time favourable to a plan for rating members of the established church and exempting dissenters, but that compromise was opposed by the friends of the existing law, and he therefore saw no alternative but to support the second reading of the bill. Lord J. Manners eulogised the bill brought in by Mr. Walpole, which he considered a liberal compromise. The bill now before the house had not for its object the relief of conscientious dissenters, but the subversion of one of the great principles of the English constitution. Lord Fermoy argued in favour of the bill, which he contended would strengthen the church. Mr. Drummond maintained that every one who voted for the bill voted against the principles of an established church. Lord Palmerston acknowledged himself a convert to the abolition principle, in consequence of the strong feeling expressed out of doors. Mr. Disraeli, in an amusing speech, drew attention to the changes the noble lord's opinions had from time to time undergone. Lord J. Russell did not consider that there was an injustice in church rates, and he could not support the abolition on that ground; but he should support the second reading of the bill on the ground that public feeling had declared strongly in its favour. On the division there were 263 for the second reading, and 193 against it. The bill was accordingly read a second time.

PUBLIC AMUSEMENTS.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.—Covent Garden Theatre, on Thursday, was crowded, as a matter of course, by a purely musical public, the entertainment being for the last time this season, Mozart's opera, "Don Giovanni," with the following powerful cast:—Donna Anna, Madame Crispien; Zerlina, Madame Penco; Elvira, Mlle. Marai; Don Giovanni, Signor Mario; Leporello, Signor Ronconi; Masetto, Signor Polonini; Il Commendatore, Signor Tagliafico; Don Ottavio, Signor Tamberlik. Costa was as great as ever in the management of the orchestra, and the minuet was admirably danced by Mlle. Zina and M. Desplaces.

DRURY LANE THEATRE.—On Monday evening Mr. Balfé took his benefit at Drury Lane. The "Bohemian Girl" was presented in its Italian dress (La Zingara), and served to introduce Miss Victoire Balfé to a London audience in the character of Arlene, who sang to perfection, and betrayed great dramatic power. Giuglini, as Thaddeus, sang admirably, and he was compelled to give the popular air, "When other lips," three times before the audience were satisfied. His delivery of the "Fair Land of Poland," was also most masterly. At the conclusion of the opera Miss Balfé was called before the curtain, and Mr. Balfé, who conducted, was also compelled to appear on the stage to receive an ovation from an audience which it is pleasant to be able to state, filled the house in every part. On Thursday, for the benefit of Sigr. Giuglini, was given part of "Les Huguenots," with the following cast:—Valentina, Mlle. Titiens; Marguerite, Mlle. Brambilla; Marcell, Sig. Marini; Nerens, Sig. Fagotti; San Bris, Sig. Lanzoni; and Raoul di Nangis, Sig. Giuglini. After which, "La Zingara" was given, with Mlle. Piccolomini as Arlene.

HAYMARKET THEATRE.—This evening our worthy Bro. Buckstone takes his benefit, and we sincerely hope he will have the bumper that his managerial abilities and spirit, and his invariable complaisance entitle him to. The following is the bill of fare. The new comedy of "The Contested Election" commences the evening, followed by "How to Make Home Happy," by Mr. and Mrs. Charles Mathews, at the end of which Mr. Buckstone will, as usual, address the audience. This is also the first time of a new ballet, by Mr. Leclercq, entitled "Allhallow's Eve."

PRINCESS'S THEATRE.—The withdrawal of "Henry the Fifth" has been followed by the revival of "Henry the Eighth," shorn of none of its original splendour. Mr. Kean's Wolsey remains one of the best of his Shakespearian assumptions, not conventional, nor aiming at that sustained dignity which, however incompatible with the historical truth or poetic treatment of the character, most actors have attempted to impart to it. Mr. Kean presents to us the man in the habit as he lived, and as he is presented to us by the dramatist. Mr. Kean's Queen Katherine is as impressive as ever, the striking point being of course her dignity in the trial scene.

OLYMPIC.—On Monday night another new drama, by Mr. Tom Taylor, entitled "Payable on Demand," was brought out with unequivocal success, and Mr. F. Robson has thus acquired a fresh character of importance, which he is likely to sustain for some time in the presence of an admiring public. Notwithstanding some faults of construction, and a slight falling off in the dialogue, the piece must be acknowledged worthy of the author. Throughout the whole of the second act the character of Reuben is a great creation on the part of Mr. Robson. The wild thirst for gold, the affection for his daughter, the tearful remembrance of his late wife, to whose spirit he prays in an agony of doubt, are brought into the strongest and most natural collision, while the compound is curiously tempered by the quiet craftiness of the modern speculator. In describing the character and perplexities of Reuben as played by Mr. Robson we, in fact, describe the piece, but a word of commendation is due to Miss Wyndham's earnest performance of the mother and daughter, and Mr. H. Wigan's highly finished representation of a Frenchman, a lieutenant in the first act, and an enthusiastic vendor of curiosities in the second. The two scenes, one an old-fashioned German interior, elaborately set, the other, a modern drawing-room, gorgeously furnished, are well worthy the high reputation which the Olympic managers have acquired by the arrangements of their stage.

STRAND THEATRE.—Two novelties have made their appearance here, a farce entitled "Quixote, Junior," of which we cannot give a favourable report, and a new burlesque. This burlesque is very funny. The dialogue bristles with fun, and the slang allusions, which are plentifully interspersed throughout, are not in such very bad taste. Altogether, as burlesques go now-a-days, the "Last Edition of the Lady of Lyons" is a capital one. The audience were in ecstasies of delight therewith, likewise with the author, Mr. H. J. Byron, who is rapidly achieving eminence in a branch—or rather on a twig in the dramatic art—whose highest rewards are not of a sufficiently gratifying nature to invite much competition.

SURREY GARDENS.—The second series of concerts and fêtes at the Surrey Gardens commenced on Monday afternoon, when the combined attractions of two concerts, a double display of fireworks, and a pre-eminently fine day, had the effect of filling the music-hall, and even overflowing it to such an extent that a considerable number of amateurs had to listen to the music from the garden. Each of the concerts was a very admirable entertainment.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

BRO. J. JOHNSON, No. 61, is thanked. It is impossible for us to keep the appointments correct without the assistance of the brethren. Fully half of the Lodges have not made us any returns of the places and times of meeting, without which we cannot notify their appointments.

CAGLIOSTRO'S EGYPTIAN MASONRY.

In our memoir of Count Cagliostro (page 9 of our last volume of the Freemasons' Magazine), we promised to give some idea of the impostor's bubble which he chose to term Egyptian Masonry. In redeeming this promise we must ask the indulgence of our readers, for we are well aware that the account we are about to give is very imperfect; and this arises from the fact of the inquisition biographer being able to lay hands only on a note book of Cagliostro's, he being much too wary to jeopardise a full revelation of his system by confiding more than a portion of its outline to writing. Another cause of our imperfection is to be found in the very scarce work itself from which we have translated, for it deals in a jumble of biography, confession, invective, and denunciation of the arch-quack, so that our task has been to cull those portions which treat of the Egyptian Masonry alone; and although it might have been presented in a more attractive style, yet we have sacrificed the opportunity of making a thrilling story, to adhere as closely as possible to a literal translation. With these few remarks we now come to the Roman inquisitor's version of Cagliostro's Egyptian Masonry.

Shortly before quitting London, Cagliostro bought some manuscripts, which he said seemed to have been the property of a certain George Coston, who was utterly unknown to him. He saw that they treated of Egyptian Masonry, but following a system which had something in it of magic and superstition. Nevertheless he resolved to build up on this plan a new ritual of Masonry, by removing, as he said, all that could be thought impious, that is to say all that belonged to magic and superstition. In fact he founded that system which has spread to every part of the world and so much contributed to the astonishing celebrity of its author. We extract our details of it from a work composed by himself, and which affords a complete insight into the subject. He declares, moreover, that it is in conformity with this book that he has always regulated himself in the practice of Masonry, that it was the rule of the institutions wherewith he had enriched various Lodges, and that he had left a number of copies in the mother Lodges founded by him in various cities. In his system he promised his followers to conduct them to perfection by means of moral and physical regeneration; by the first to make them find the primal matter or philosopher's stone, and the acacia which consolidates in man the powers of the most vigorous youth and renders him immortal; by the second, to teach him how to procure the pentagon which restores man to his primitive state of innocence, forfeited by the original sin. He supposes Egyptian Masonry was instituted by Enoch and Elias, who propagated it in different parts of the world, but that with time it lost much of its purity and splendour. The Masonry of men was reduced to mere buffoonery, and that of women was almost entirely destroyed since, for the most part, it had no longer any place in common Masonry. Finally, the zeal of the Grand Cophta (such is the name of the high priests of Egypt), had manifested itself in restoring to its original lustre the Masonry of either sex.

By the Grand Cophta is understood Cagliostro himself, who in this system is compared to the Eternal; he is solemnly adored; he is invested with the power of commanding angels; he is invoked on all occasions; and everything is accomplished through the force of his power, which they pretend was imparted to him by the Deity. More than so, amongst the different rites observed in this form of Masonry the recitation is ordained of the "Veni Creator Spiritus," the "Te Deum," and certain psalms of David; and they even carry their audacity so far that, in the psalm "Memento, Domine, David, et omnis mansuetudinis ejus," every time the name of David occurs they substitute that of the Grand Cophta!

No religion is excluded from the Egyptian society. The Jew, the Calvinist, the Lutheran, may all be admitted as well as the Catholic, provided they acknowledge the existence of God and the immortality of the soul, and that they have been enrolled in the ordinary Masonry. Men elevated to the rank of Masters, take the names of the ancient prophets, and women assume those of the Sybils. Here is the oath exacted from the former: "I promise, I engage, and I swear, never to reveal the secrets which shall be imparted to me in this temple, and to blindly obey my superiors." Here is the oath of the women: "I swear before the eternal God of the Grand Mistress, and of all who hear me, never to write or cause to be written, anything that shall pass under my eyes, condemning myself, in the event of imprudence, to be punished according to the laws of the Grand Founder and of all my superiors. I likewise promise the exact observance of the other six commandments imposed upon me, that is to say, love of God, respect for my sovereign, veneration for religion and the laws, love of my fellow-creatures, an attachment without bounds for our order, and the blindest submission to the rules and code of our ritual, such as they may be communicated to me by the Grand Mistress." On rising to the third degree, that of Master or Mistress, the oaths are renewed, but the formula is not preserved in the book.

We know that it is usual in common Masonry to give the recipiendary two pairs of gloves, one for himself and the other for the lady of his love. In preserving this custom the Grand Cophta has added one peculiarity, viz., that in the admission of women the candidates are presented with a cockade, which they are told to offer, with the gloves, to the men they most regard.

The forms of admission to the different degrees are equally sacrilegious. We will cite two only—that used on the admission of a woman to the degree of Apprentice, and that with which a man is raised to the rank of a Companion. According to the first, the Grand Mistress breathes upon the face of the recipiendary, from the forehead to the chin, saying, "I thus breathe upon you to cause the truths possessed by us to germinate and penetrate within your heart; I breathe upon you to fortify your spiritual part; I breathe upon you to confirm you in the faith of your brothers and sisters, according to the engagements that you have contracted. We create you a legitimate daughter of the true Egyptian adoption and of the Lodge N.; we will that you be recognized as such by all the brothers and sisters of the Egyptian ritual, and that you enjoy the same prerogatives with them. Lastly, we impart to you the supreme pleasure of being henceforth and for ever a Freemason."

It is thus that the Grand Master addresses the men who are being raised to the degree of Companion: "By the power that I hold from the Grand Cophta, the founder of our Order, and by the grace of God, I confer upon you the degree of Companion, and constitute you a guardian of the new science in which we are preparing to make you a participator by the sacred names of Helios, Méné, Tetragrammaton."

In the "Essay upon the Illuminati," printed at Paris in 1789, we are told that these last words were suggested to Cagliostro as being Arabian and sacred terms, by a juggler who pretended to be assisted by a spirit, and who added that this spirit was the soul of a Jewish Cabalist who, by his magic art had killed his father before the advent of Christ.*

The ordinary Masons are accustomed to take St. John the Baptist for their patron, and to celebrate his festival. Cagliostro, in his ritual, has chosen the feast of St. John the Evangelist, and this is precisely the day on which he was imprisoned at Rome. His reason for adopting this festival was, according to his own account, the great affinity that exists between the Apocalypse and the workings of his ritual.

It is now time to speak of these workings. This is the abominable ceremony prescribed upon the admission of a Master. They take a young boy, or a young girl, in a state of innocence, whom they name pupil, or dove. Then the Venerable imparts to this child the power that he had received before the first fall, a power which more particularly consists in commanding the pure spirits. These spirits are seven in number; they are said to surround the throne of the Deity, and to govern the seven planets; their names, according to Cagliostro's book, being Asäel, Michäel, Raphaël, Gabriel, Uriel, Zobiachel, and Anachiel. The dove is brought before the Venerable; the members address a prayer to heaven that it would vouchsafe the exercise of that power which it has granted to the Grand Cophta. The pupil, or dove, also prays to obtain the grace of working according to the behests of the Grand Master, and of serving as a mediatrix between him and the spirits, who on that account are called intermediates. Clothed in a long white robe, ornamented with blue ribbon and a red scarf, and having received the sufflation, she is enclosed in the tabernacle, a place hung with white. It has an entrance door, a window through which the dove makes herself heard, and within is a bench and a little table, whereon burn three tapers. The Venerable repeats his prayer and begins to exercise the power that he pretends to have received from the Grand Cophta, in virtue of which he summons the seven angels to appear before the eyes of the pupil. When she announces that they are present, he charges her by the power granted by God to the Grand Cophta, and by the Grand Cophta imparted to himself, that she ask the angel N., whether the candidate have the qualities and the merits requisite for the degree of Master. After having received an affirmative answer, he proceeds to the other ceremonies for completing the reception of the candidate.

* The author of the "essay," quoted, must be mistaken. The three words are Greek, they signify the sun, the moon, and the name compounded of four letters, which is that of God, or more properly of Jehovah, such being written in Hebrew by four characters.—Translator.

The same working is prescribed for raising women to the degree of Mistress. The dove being placed as we have just described, she is ordered to make one of the seven angels appear in the tabernacle, and to ask him whether it is permitted to lift the black veil with which the initiate is covered. Other superstitious ceremonies follow, and the Venerable orders the dove to command the presence of the six other angels, and to address to them the following commandment:—"By the power which the Grand Cophta has given to my mistress, and by that which I hold from her, and by my innocence, I command you, primitive angels, to consecrate the ornaments by passing them through your hands." These ornaments are the garments, the symbols of the order, and a crown of artificial roses. When the dove has attested that the angels have performed the consecration, she is desired to cause Moses to appear, in order that he also may bless the ornaments, and may hold the crown of roses in his hand during the rest of the ceremonies. She afterwards passes through the window of the tabernacle, the garments, the symbols, and the gloves, whereon is written, "I am man," and all are presented to the initiated. Other questions are now put to the dove; but above all to know whether Moses has held the crown in his hand the whole time, and when she has answered "yes," it is placed upon the head of the initiated. Then after other rites equally sacrilegious, the dove is questioned anew to learn if Moses and the seven angels have approved of this reception; finally, the presence of the Grand Cophta is invoked that he may bless and confirm it; after which the Lodge is closed.

The stated object of Cagliostro's Masonry is the perfectioning of man, to which he promises to conduct his disciples by moral and physical regeneration, after they have been raised to the degree of Masters. To obtain the one and the other, he prescribes two quarantines of different kinds—that is to say, for the first, a retirement of forty days; for the second, a corporeal cure for the same period.

He who wishes to obtain moral regeneration, i.e., a primitive state of innocence, must choose a lofty mountain, to which he will give the name of Sinai, and on its summit he will construct a pavilion divided into three floors; this he will call Sion. The upper chamber will be eighteen feet square, with four oval windows on each side, and a single trap door to enter by; the second or middle chamber will be perfectly round, without windows, and capable of containing thirteen little beds, it will be lighted by a lamp suspended from the centre, and will have no furniture save what is absolutely necessary, and will be called Ararat (the name of the mountain on which the ark rested), in token of the repose, which is reserved only for those Masons who have been chosen by God; finally, the first chamber, situated on the level of the ground, will be large enough to serve for a refectory, and will have three cabinets, two to hold provisions and other necessities, the third to contain the vestments, symbols, and other Masonic instruments, as taught by Moses.

All these being collected, the thirteen Masters will shut themselves up in the pavilion, without the power of quitting it for forty days, which they will spend in Masonic operations, observing every day the like distribution of the hours. Six will be given to devotion and repose, three to prayer and a holocaust to the Eternal (which consists in devoting one's self with the deepest effusion of heart to the glory of God); nine to holy works, that is to say, to the preparation of the virgin leaf, and to the preparation of the other instruments, which must be made from day to day; and the remaining six belong to conversation, and the re-establishment of the lost moral and physical strength. When the thirty-third day of these exercises has passed, the Masters will begin to enjoy the privilege of communicating visibly with the seven primitive angels, and of knowing the seal and cypher of those immortal beings. They will both be engraved by themselves on the virgin leaf, which is either a lamb's skin purified, the caul of a male child born of a Jewess, or a piece of common paper blessed by the founder. This favour will last to the fortieth day, on which their labours being finished, each will begin to enjoy the fruits of his retirement, for each will receive for himself the pentagon, or the virgin leaf, whereon the angels have engraved their seals and cyphers. Thus fortified, and become master and chief of the art without any mortal aid, the spirit of each will be filled with divine fire, and his body will become as pure as that of the most innocent child, his penetration will be without bounds, his power will be immense, he will aspire only to perfect repose in order to attain immortality; and he may say of himself—

"Ego sum qui sum."

There will not only be the pentagon whereof we have spoken, but seven others also, which he may bestow upon seven individuals, men or women, in whom he is most interested. These inferior pentagons bear the seal of only one of the seven angels, and the possessor can only control that one without having any power over the others. Nor can he, like the holder of the first pentagon, command in the name of God, but only in the name of the Grand Master, from whom he has received the talisman.

He will operate by his own power, but without knowing the principle.

Now let us see the working of the regeneration, or physical perfection, the possessor of which may attain the spirituality of five thousand five hundred and sixty-seven years, or prolong a healthy and quiet life, until it shall please God to claim him. He who aspires to such perfection must retire every fiftieth year, in the full May-moon, into the country with a friend; there shut up in a chamber, with an alcove within it, he must submit for forty days to the most rigorous diet, eating very little, and only of a thin soup, of tender herbs refreshing and laxative, and drinking nothing but distilled water and May-rain. Every repast will commence with the liquid, and finish with the solid, which will be a biscuit or a crust of bread. On the seventeenth day of this retreat, after a slight blood-letting, the aspirant will take certain white drops (the composition of which is not explained). The dose must be six drops in the morning, and six in the evening, but increased by two drops daily until the thirty-second day. Then in the morning twilight the emission of blood will be repeated; the day after he must go to bed and rise no more till the end of the quarantine; and now the first grain of the primal matter is to be swallowed. This primal matter is the same that God made to render man immortal, but of which, through original sin, he has lost the knowledge, nor can he regain it except by the grace of heaven, and by Masonic workings. When this grain has been taken, he who is to be rejuvenized loses his speech and senses for three hours; and in the midst of convulsions undergoes violent perspiration and large evacuations. After the patient has come to himself, and his bed has been changed, he must be restored by a cullis made of a pound of beef, without fat, mixed with divers herbs of a stimulant nature. If by these means he is sufficiently restored, he is given the next day a second grain of primal matter in a cup of jelly, which, in addition to the effects of the first dose, will produce a fever, accompanied by delirium, making his skin peel, his hair drop off, and his teeth fall out. The following day, which is the thirty-fifth, if the patient is strong enough, he will take, for an hour, a bath, that is neither too hot nor too cold. On the thirty-sixth day he will take, in a glass of strong old wine, the third and last grain of primal matter, which will make him fall into a soft and tranquil slumber, when the hair will begin to sprout, the teeth to come forth, and the skin to be renewed. When he comes to himself he must be again plunged into a bath, but this time it is to be a bath of aromatic herbs, and on the thirty-eighth day into a bath of pure water intermixed with nitre. This last bath having been taken, he will dress himself and walk about his room. On the thirty-ninth day he must swallow ten drops of the Grand Master's elixir in two spoonfuls of red wine, and on the fortieth day he will leave the house altogether rejuvenized and perfectly regenerated.

To complete this history we must not forget to add that both methods are equally ordained for women, and that as regards physical regeneration, every one is enjoined to retire to a mountain, or to the country, with no other companion but one friend, who is to administer the necessary succours, and more particularly in the crises of the bodily cure.

When Cagliostro was at Mittau he founded one of his Egyptian Lodges in that town, and finding his audience not sufficiently enlightened by his words, he undertook to give them actual proof of the truth of the maxims announced by him; that is to say, of the existence of God, and the immortality of the soul. He caused—it is himself who speaks—to be brought into the Lodge a young child, the son of a nobleman, and placed him, kneeling, before a table on which stood a decanter of pure water with illuminated tapers behind it. He then performed certain exorcisms about him, laid his hand upon his head, and both he and the child, in this attitude, addressed their prayers to God for the happy accomplishment of their enterprise. Next he desired the child to look into the decanter, when the latter suddenly exclaimed that he saw a garden. Knowing by this that God was assisting him, Cagliostro took heart and bade the child ask the favour of the Deity that he would cause him to see the angel Michael. At first the child said, "I see something white, but cannot make out what it is." Afterwards he began to jump about, like one possessed, crying, "I see a child like myself, who seems to have something angelic." All the assembly, and Cagliostro himself, were dumbfounded. Then the father of the child desired that his son, by the help of the decanter, should see what his daughter was doing at that moment, she being at a country house fifteen miles from Mittau. The child was exorcised anew, the hands of the Venerable were laid upon his head, the usual prayers were addressed to heaven, when, looking into the decanter, he said his sister was just then coming down the stairs, and embracing another of her brothers. This appeared impossible to those present because this same brother was some hundred miles off from the place where the sister was. Cagliostro was not to be put out; he said they might send to the country house to verify the fact, and, all having kissed his hand, he closed the Lodge with the usual ceremonies. After the Lodge was closed they did send accordingly; and he maintains that what they had refused to believe was found true in all its details, the young man alluded to having just arrived from a foreign land.

On many occasions Cagliostro made his experiments without the aid of water, only placing the pupil or dove behind a screen which represented a sort of little temple. The questions and workings were not confined solely to the descent and apparition of angels, but extended to the discovery of secrets, future events, and answers to curious inquiries that were sometimes very much opposed to decency. Nor was Cagliostro the sole operator; he caused the others, at his pleasure, to work likewise, but it was necessary that he should first communicate with them, and should transfer to them the power which, as he pretended, he had received from heaven.

The consecration of an Egyptian Lodge was celebrated with the same ceremonies as that of a church. We have not all the details, but amongst the prescribed ceremonies was a continuous praying for forty-eight hours, pronounced by two of his sons—so he called his disciples—each alternately relieving the other.

The formula of the patent confirming the formation of a new Lodge is conceived in the following language:—

"Glory, Union, Wisdom, Benignity, Prosperity.

"We, the Grand Cophta, founder and Grand Master of high Egyptian Masonry throughout east and west, give all to know, who shall see these presents, that during our sojourn at Lyons many members of that east, according to the ordinary ritual, and bearing the name of wisdom, have manifested an ardent desire to submit to our government, and to receive from us the needful lights and powers for understanding and propagating Masonry in its true form and primitive purity. We have, therefore, acceded to their wishes, persuaded that, in giving them these tokens of our good will, we shall have the sweet satisfaction of having laboured for the glory of the Eternal, and for the benefit of humanity.

"With these motives, after having sufficiently established and verified to the Venerable, and many other members of the aforesaid Lodge, our power and authority to that effect, we now, by the help of these same brethren, found and create, for ever, at the east of Lyons, the present Egyptian Lodge; and we constitute it the mother Lodge for all the east and west, assigning to it the distinctive title of 'Triumphant Wisdom.'

Cagliostro then names the Officers,—the Venerable, the Orator, the Keeper of the Seals, the Archivist, the Treasurer, the Grand Inspector, and the Master of the Ceremonies; each of these having a deputy.

The emblems were the septangle, the triangle, the trowel, the compass, the square, the gavel, the death's head, the cube stone, the rough stone, the triangular stone, the wooden bridge, the Jacob's ladder, the phoenix, the globe, time, and many others, with such phrases as these:—"Lucem meruere labore;" "Odi profanum vulgus et arceo;" "Petite et accipietis;" "Querite et invenietis;" "Pulsate et aperietur vobis;" "In constanti labore spes;" "Aut vincere, aut mori." Amongst other particulars we must not omit to mention the jewel of the Egyptian Order which was a cross, upon the ribbon of which were the letters L. P. D., for Lilium pedibus destrue.

Such is the official account put forward by the holy Roman inquisition, and, with whatever suspicion we may look upon the source from whence it emanates, we cannot shut our eyes to the world renowned facts—that Cagliostro founded what he called Egyptian Masonry; that in the Lodges owning his supremacy, magic and prediction were universally said to be practised, as well as the most horrible blasphemy. It is a matter of deep congratulation to our Craft that the first of the articles of Union, in 1813, has so defined English Masonry that no charlatan can now deceive our brotherhood, nor is there any probability of the spurious Freemasonry of former days ever again obtaining the countenance of which it formerly boasted.

AMANUENSIS.

AUTOBIOGRAPHY AND HALIEUTICS.—I.

Of all the different modes of preserving the records of a man's life and actions, the autobiographic is perhaps the most agreeable to the reader, and presents the most genuine delineation of the individual, since few men can write their own history without leaving upon the page unintentional evidences which enable the shrewd observer to trace the opinions and habits of life of the writer, however guarded he may have been in the expression of his thoughts and experiences. Whether carefully compiled for the public eye, or preserved in the form of a diary intended only for the writer's own use, or for his immediate family and friends, the labours of the autobiographer are an unfailing source of instruction and, almost always, of amusement to his descendants and to successive generations of readers.

To take two well known examples—Pepys and Evelyn—how much does the student of history owe to them for the light which their diaries throw upon the manners and events of their time? Amusement of the most intellectual kind is ever to be found in their pages in contemplating the state of social life and customs of the period, and examining those sketches of their contemporaries in their own and the higher ranks, which illustrate so admirably the more ponderous tomes of Clarendon and Burnet. How the errors, malice, and prejudiced views of the historian, which might otherwise become impressed upon the mind of the student, are counteracted and deprived of their venom by a few unintentional photographs of life as it truly was, stamped in a happy moment upon the page of the diarist: and how many circumstances, otherwise obscure and inexplicable, are made plain by their contemporary observations.

We have spoken of the instructive purposes to which works of this kind invariably tend in a greater or less degree; but to the "reading public" of the present day, we fear this would not be so high a recommendation as the amusement which is to be derived from them. And it is very curious, that a narrative which would probably be nauseating from its tediousness in any other shape, will be swallowed without difficulty when presented in the shape of a recital of the writer's own history. The appreciation of this fact may account for the frequent use made by modern writers of fiction of the form of narration in the first person; the opportunity thereby is afforded of making up for the poverty of ideas, as regards incident and delineation of character, by stopping the gaps with the author's sentiment, his witticisms, or his remarks upon things in general. Perhaps the most favourite tales in this or any other language have been composed in this form—the story-tellers having discovered that a man usually is more earnest in discussing his own affairs than those of other people—and thereby cunningly appealing to the sympathies of their audience.

The present and the last generation have seen the publication of numerous autobiographies, some of which rival in interest their ancient predecessors. Every department of social life, and almost every pursuit of modern times, has its representative who has given the world the account of what he observed with his own eyes and how he fulfilled his own speciality, whatever that might be. Such men as Bubb Doddington and Wrexall, have preserved a mine of facts for the commentator upon the politics and intrigues of the Georgian era; military diarists we have without end, though not many of great interest; the memoirs of Leigh Hunt, Cyrus Redding, and Jerdan, written by themselves, afford pabulum for the literary curiosity-dealer; while to come to the present time, the literature of scandal has been wonderfully enriched by the great Doctor Véron and the Baroness Dudevant.

There are two distinct classes into which we would divide these contributors to literature—the more pretentious, who would dignify their lucubrations with the title of "Memoirs"—and what we would term the autobiographical gossipers; and this latter section is the one in which we most delight. It is true that we sometimes have to encounter twaddle, and sometimes prosiness, but these are but occasional drawbacks and detract but slightly from the pleasure to be derived from their volumes. Written as they are, of course, by men generally advanced in years, they have the merit of possessing to our taste a peculiar ripeness of flavour, while there is often a quaintness about the opinions which is refreshing in our prosaic times; the old stories embalmed in their pages, though they have doubtless seen long and arduous service, come out again, bran new, to the readers of the present day. In fact, so far from deteriorating, gossip of this kind, like old port wine, frequently appears to have acquired mellowness in proportion to its age. Gunning's "Reminiscences," we warrant would not be found tedious by any member of the university or inhabitants of Cambridge, while we Londoners derive ample amusement from Raikes's diary, or Cyrus Redding's memoirs.

An autobiographer of the latter class has lately made public a small part of his observations on men and things during the course of a life extended to a limit which few attain. He is for aught we know (and we sincerely trust) now alive and in good health at the age of something like eighty-four or five. William Wright (the name of our author) informs us that during a great number of years he has been in the constant practice of entering in a book the result of his own observations, or authentic facts gleaned from sources which could be depended upon and which were worthy of being remembered; and this more particularly in reference to his own favourite pursuit, angling, which indeed appears to have been the darling recreation of his leisure from his earliest days. We beg that our readers, however, will not understand from this that his book is a mere dry record of wonderful piscatory feats, of taking baits and of gentles and gut lines—on the contrary, though full of valuable information with regard to the finny tribes and their habits—it contains a very interesting account of many curious and peculiar circumstances which have come under the author's observation during a life by no means wanting in vicissitude, and even adventure.

We have alluded to the diaries of soldiers and politicians—the one we have before us may be called an autobiography of private life: it confides to us the domestic history of the author from his boyhood upwards, at least so far (we suppose) as the author considers it would be interesting, during his career. What revolutions in society and manners, in the constitution and government of states, in men's thoughts and the way of expressing their ideas—have taken place during this one life. This same individual, now alive and going about amongst us, was a lad of ten years old at the period of the separation of America from England—an event which seems almost to belong to a forgotten time, so much has occurred since to obliterate its traces. In ten more years he hears of the sanguinary commencement of the revolution in France and the death of the sixteenth Louis. At thirty years of age he joined with his fellow countrymen in celebrating the glory of Trafalgar. The first half of his recorded life brings him to the age of forty-two, at the time of the battle of Waterloo, and at the age of sixty-four, a man well stricken in years, he saw ascend the throne of these realms that royal girl who has now ruled as the beloved sovereign of this mighty empire for twenty years. He has seen his country at war with all the world, has seen the torch of war extinguished, as was fondly hoped, for ever—but rekindled to blaze with the ancient fury in his old age. During his life the wealth, territory and power of his native country have increased to an extent that sounds like an Eastern fable. Surely there is hardly to be found in the whole page of history a period compassing greater wonders and more extraordinary changes.

Our author's first reminiscences take us to Dartford in Kent, the scene of his earliest childhood, where his father and mother inhabited a handsome mansion surrounded by beautiful grounds, and containing among other delights a pond full of fish, the sight of which as captured by dozens at a time, seems to have implanted in his youthful breast a taste which grew with his growth and strengthened with his strength. His school days take us back to the time of hoops and patches, of square skirted coats and powdered wigs, and he tells of an encounter which he witnessed at the church door between two irate vestrymen which resulted in their throwing their cauliflower wigs in each other's faces, and pommelling each other furiously—a mode of settling parish matters which appears of late years to have gone out of vogue. Those were the days when that most popular of the European sovereigns of his day, George III., used to delight in reviewing his troops, regular and irregular, surrounded by the handsome striplings of his family—then England was one great camp, and a really martial spirit pervaded all ranks. Of course the fair sex were ambitious of assisting at these warlike displays, and the lad Wright's astonishment and admiration were excited at seeing ladies in military costume (as to the upper part, that is to say, of their dress), proceeding either with or without military companions to the camp at Coxheath.

"Strange indeed," says our author, "are the mutations of this life,"—and stranger still, we may add, are the alterations in the opinions of society within the last three quarters of a century. Before that time it was by no means uncommon for ordination to be freely granted to persons of little or no education; and in this very book we are told of a journeyman cabinet-maker who, though merely able to read and write, became incumbent of two parishes, married a rich widow, and died respected. To a fellow workman of this handicraft parson the public were indebted for the Adelphi theatre (lately in ruins, and now resuscitated with brighter glories under the auspices of Bro. Webster)—then called the Sanspareil. This was the well-known "True Blue" Scott, as he was called, whose nickname arose from the source by which he made a fortune. He, like the divine, married a widow, relict of a colourman—and carefully considering the stock which he had acquired with his new wife, by a lucky stroke of genius hit upon that blue colour, which, strange as it may seem to our modern notions, speedily became the rage as the fashionable tint for ladies' stockings. "True Blue" Scott became rich and famous, and built the Sanspareil to be the delight of thousands of London playgoers.

Startling, in truth, are the many changes and contrasts which the present day shows, as compared with Bro. Wright's youth. To say nothing of the alteration in travelling, in manufactures, in manners and mode of life, of the wonders of steam and electricity, as compared with the clumsy mechanical contrivances of the last century, the very commonplace item (as it seems to our everyday eyes) of police, exhibits a state of society in the lifetime of one still among us, which astonishes us, but would be simply impossible in our day. Let the reader picture to himself an army of highwaymen on a turnpike road levying their contributions on her majesty's lieges; yet such was the case sixty years ago. Hear our diarist:—

"I remember a Mr. H.—ds, as a good-looking and pleasant gentleman, a frequent visitor at our house, who I think had some dealings in corn or malt, and some of his descendants are still influential inhabitants at Dartford. Some time after we left this part of the country, he (Mr. H.) was returning from London, with a friend in his chaise, when about three miles from his home he was attacked by seven footpads; Mr. H. shot the man who held the horse's head, the animal ran away into the next village, an alarm was given, parties went out, and found the wounded in a chalk pit, stripped by his companions, and nearly dead. Medical assistance was immediately rendered, and the robber stated that their gang consisted of about seventy men, but he would only impeach the dastardly companions who had treated him in such a cruel manner. The six men were taken, but before he could legally identify these fellows he expired; and as nothing could be brought home to them, they were reluctantly discharged. Mr. H. received many threatening letters, supposed to emanate from the gang, and he never went out unarmed with pistols. One afternoon, in walking home from Cranford, two men begged of him; he gave them some halfpence, but immediately after thought he recognized their faces as being two of the six who had been taken up, and as they were following him closely, he took his pistols from his pocket, and said, 'I have seen you before, my lads, and I do not like you; now either go before me into Dartford, or go back.' They chose the former alternative, and he thus by his determination probably saved his life, and was afterwards left in peace."

Our friend passes over a considerable period of his life in silence, but invites us to accompany him to France in the year 1801, where he intended like many Englishmen—the peace of Amiens having thrown the continent open—to make the grand tour, and especially to indulge in the gaieties and, tant soit peu, of the dissipation of the gay city of Paris. Fate had decreed that Wright's trip should end at Boulogne, where he landed, and to his sorrow made the acquaintance of two compatriots of a class which then as now, it appears, were but too common in that Anglo-French colony—they were, sooth to say, swindlers. Having persuaded him to join them in a bubble speculation, they plundered and left him a wiser and a poorer man. The effect of this change in his circumstances was to make him more observant than before, with a view to avoid the extortions and impositions for which he, as a milord, was considered fair game by the unsophisticated Boulogners. Better times were in store for him, and a removal to Calais, under a new partnership with an honest Swede, turned out to be a profitable speculation.

At what period of his life our hero entered into Masonry, we are not informed, but the sequel of our narrative will show that at the time of which we are writing he was in the enjoyment of the privileges of our fraternity. We have never had the pleasure to meet Bro. Wright in the Craft, but we have little doubt that he is a worthy and consistent brother among us; there is a truly Masonic spirit of piety which pervades his book, showing the feeling of a really religious man, at the same time that it displays that disgust which honest men must always feel at the manifestation of bigotry in any shape. Our friend's passion for angling might well harmonize with his Masonic pursuits—for if angling be justly termed the contemplative man's recreation, surely it must accord with the study of that queen of sciences, which is fairly entitled to the same designation. Bro. Wright's life has been an active and a bustling one, but he has thought deeply and studied extensively; he may claim to have fulfilled the duty enjoined upon the newly initiated member of our body to devote his energies to the improvement of his own mind and the benefit of his fellows.

Few of us have enjoyed the society and tough yarns of any of those veterans who have survived the shot and steel of the Nile and Trafalgar, the Peninsula and Waterloo—without being made the willing recipients of many passing strange stories of the wonders which the mystic tie has effected under various circumstances in time of war. Some of these anecdotes, indeed, have fallen upon such fertile soil as to bear fruit at an undesirably copious rate; we may instance a celebrated and voluminous modern historian who has trotted out one or two of these hard worked stories at so unmerciful a rate, at every Masonic celebration honoured with his presence for a dozen years past, as to become to those frequently thrown into his company a most unmitigated bore, and cause his hearers fervently to wish that his "very remarkable facts" were carefully stowed away and discharged from further duty in this world. The Peninsular War was a period in which fraternal services and intercourse were frequent between individuals of the hostile armies; and these brotherly passages have furnished the theme for many a chapter in romances whose scenes are laid among the stirring events of that time. Spanish ground, indeed, would seem to have been always favourable to the development of Freemasonry, in spite of the enmity constantly manifested against it by priests and government. We ourselves (to speak of a later period) are acquainted with a wiry little Scotchman, one serjeant Mc——, who shared the fortunes of the British Legion under General Evans, through good and bad luck, till he had the misfortune to become prisoner to the Carlists. He does affirm that he found, wonderful to say, a Masonic brother in the priest who was sent to impart ghostly counsel to him previous to his being discharged from the army and this life by a volley from a firing party. Furthermore, the valiant Celt has to us asserted that, aided by the priest, he was permitted to escape, and that though knowing little Spanish, and of course having no means of concealing what his profession was, he was, by the powerful aid of his Craft knowledge, enabled to pass safely through the country until he regained the Christino quarters.

Among soldiers and sailors, too, when engaged in enterprises involving danger and hardship, this firm fellowship has ever been a source of mutual support and comfort under circumstances of the most melancholy and depressing character. The records of the late terrible occurrences in India show this in a very eminent degree. Mr. Rees's narrative of the siege of Lucknow furnishes several cases in point, and one in particular where he describes a meeting of the brethren during the height of that siege; at which symposium, notwithstanding the deadly peril in which each brother found himself from hour to hour—notwithstanding their privations, and apparently hopeless position—the social intercourse of the Lodge was as triumphant over their misfortunes as if want, sickness, and danger were but imaginary, and not dread realities.

At the time of Wright's residence in Calais it would appear that Masonry was flourishing there in practice; but whether the strict laws which Bonaparte enacted against it were then in force we are not aware. Suffice it to say that our worthy brother found friends who afterwards stood him in good stead. The English residents in France were in a state of constant anxiety as to the prospects of a continuance of peace, the unscrupulous character of the French dictator, which was but too well known, leaving them in dread of the harshest measures. These fears were soon confirmed. In the month of May, 1803, the French government (that is, Bonaparte) decreed that all Englishmen between the ages of eighteen and sixty were prisoners of war to "the republic."

The commissary-general of police at Calais was named Mengaud, and had been one of Robespierre's intimate friends. This distinguished French patriot speedily showed that he had not omitted, in that famous school of political economy in which he had graduated, to make himself master of the art of enriching himself at the cost of the enemies of his beloved country. The great man not being able to speak English, engaged Wright as interpreter, whose position was thereby rendered somewhat more tolerable than that of his countrymen, who were fleeced right and left under various pretences by this petty tyrant, and after being carefully "cleaned out" were sent up the country, having been forced individually to pay M. Mengaud a final complimentary three and fourpence for a passport before taking leave of the town which rejoiced in his jurisdiction. Among the poorer classes of our countrymen, such as workmen who had been induced to settle in France, the misery was extreme; indeed many of them were reduced almost to starvation.

Bro. Wright, who appears in a very eminent degree to have been possessed of the faculty of keeping his eyes open, at this juncture looked about him to some purpose. Feeling convinced that hostilities were not likely soon to subside, and as the détenu regulations had not as yet been extended strictly to women and children, he by dint of management obtained permission to send home his family. And here again we have evidence of a strange phase of difficulty in getting from Calais to London, which the circumstances of the time presented and which contrast strongly with our modern "Paris in ten hours." Our author says:—

"I agreed with the captain of a neutral trading vessel, for a heavy price, to take my family, with their luggage, to London, where he said he was going. When they had got about mid-channel, this captain told them he should land them at Dover, or wherever he pleased, and evinced such villainous intentions, as caused them to entertain great fears for their safety; so that a lady, who with her son formed part of my family, waved her handkerchief, and made signs so effectually to an English cruiser, that the captain sent a boat with an officer on board the trader, the explanation given of the conduct of the skipper, that the lady was allied to some of the first families in Dover, and was then, as it might be called, escaping from a hostile shore; that she had a brother-in-law commanding a gun brig in the channel; the captain of the cruiser, who was going into the Dover roads, ordered the trading skipper to land them at Dover, and to refund a reasonable proportion of the sum he had extorted, to pay the difference it made between their being taken to London, as the scoundrel of a skipper had undertaken to do, and their having to travel thither by land. It was in vain the skipper said he would take them to London; the captain of the cruiser, who had caused the former to come on board the king's ship, told him plainly he would not trust him, as he looked upon him as little better than a pirate or robber."

The lady in question seems to have behaved with the true spirit of an Englishwoman; she also shows that she possessed no little portion of the presence of mind and determination which her relation afterwards displayed.

Having provided for the safety of his family, our brother had leisure to contemplate the state of his own affairs. The prospect was not cheerful. We have mentioned that Bro. Wright had engaged in a business partnership with a Swede, who was a French subject. With that regard for justice and the rights of citizenship which so eminently distinguished the great hero—Bonaparte's government first laid an embargo and then confiscated the ship which constituted the property in which our friend's capital was invested—not considering of any importance the fact that the ship was also owned by a French citizen. Of course Bro. Wright never received any compensation for this loss, and as funds could not be transmitted from England at that time, he was reduced to no little straits. His knowledge of the piscatory art proved of real service to him, and often supplied him with a dinner or supper when fate seemed determined he should fast.

The English gold mine having been well worked, and the plundered "milords" being all at Verdun, or on their way thither, the general discovered that there was no longer any demand for the services of his English interpreter.

"At length the general, having no further occasion for me, informed me I must also go up the country, to the same place as the rest; I therefore made up my mind to escape, but how to accomplish this desirable object was the difficulty. A variety of plans were discussed by me with the other prisoners; but I found they did not possess the necessary cool determination to ensure success, and therefore I resolved to attempt my own emancipation in my own way. Accordingly, I laid myself on a mattress, and marked upon that, with a red pencil, the exact size into which I could compress myself; I then went, with a brother Freemason, to dealers in furniture, boxes, &c., and found an old trunk, with two locks, the exact size I required; this I purchased, and only awaited the arrival of a neutral vessel, which was expected to convey a number of females, children, and Englishmen, who passed as subjects of neutral states, and had corresponding passports. Curiously, whilst we were dealing for the trunk that I bought, we were shown one in which some person, for whose capture a great price had been offered, escaped from England. In about a week or ten days, the Danish brig the St. Anna, Hans Hussen, master, arrived, in ballast, and was to sail for Dover on the 10th of July, 1803. I therefore threw a few things into the trunk, together with a large bag, passed the trunk at the Custom-house, and, dressed as a sailor, I placed it very carefully, along with other luggage, in the cabin. My friend went on board, and just before the mustering of the crew by the deputy commissary of police, attended by a guard and the town sergeants, the minute examination by the customhouse officers having taken place, my friend, after I had tumbled everything into the bag, and stripped off my jacket, locked me up in the trunk. I had not calculated the expansion of the human body by heat, and he was obliged to place his whole weight on the lid to force it down; he gave the key to an Englishman who had a neutral passport, another brother Mason. There being but very little wind, and the tide running to the eastward, three hours after high water the skipper cast anchor in Calais roads. I had been three hours and a half thus compressed, I suffered dreadfully from cramp, but dared not breathe too hard. My friend on board, who had the key, fearing I should be suffocated, let me out; I washed, dressed myself, and came upon deck. There was another Englishman, who had been brought off by a Frenchman in a sailing boat, which proved the total ruin of the latter, and he was obliged to fly over to England. Thankful to the great Supreme Being who had listened to my supplications, and assisted me so far, and entertaining the opinion that were I taken, my life would not be very safe if I were in the power of the commandant, I induced the passengers to believe that the vessel would speedily, by the efflux of the tide, be aground; and as several on board knew I was well acquainted with that part of the coast, and all were most anxious to get under weigh for their native land, we made a determined attack on the skipper by gesticulations, for we did not know Danish, or he English, and very little French; I seized an axe, and made signs I would cut away the cable, when he allowed his men to weigh anchor, and trim the sails, and to our great joy got under weigh for Dover, where we safely arrived. As we departed from the French coast, we saw an English man of war brig attacking three or four gunboats which had crept out of Boulogne and endeavoured to get into Calais, and another of our cruisers, of the same class, spreading every stitch of canvas, bearing down to assist in the destruction of these craft. I made our skipper hoist Danish colours, as I was fearful the man of war brig as she neared us might cause some delay by overhauling us. We had to land at Dover in boats, and the boatmen, many of whom knew me, expressed so much pleasure, not for me personally, but as a principle, that one had escaped from the unjust imprisonment, more particularly in such an extraordinary manner, that they almost disputed who should carry me ashore."

On his arrival in London our hero became somewhat of a celebrity, as he deserved to be; his escape was chronicled in all the newspapers, and he appeared in print as the author of a pamphlet on the condition of the détenus, which was soon in everybody's hands. The short confinement in the trunk, however, which procured him his liberty, appears to have permanently injured his constitution, and he describes himself as suffering from its results for twenty-five years in the form of cramps recurring in a most painful manner, and very frequently; eventually these disappeared, or we doubt if the diary of angling adventures would have been so copious.

Another result of Bro. Wright's continental adventures was a very decided and properly patriotic hatred of the French, which developed itself in an offer to do the state some service. Ever on the outlook for information, Wright while at Calais, had carefully inspected Fort Rouge, at the entrance of the harbour, while ostensibly engaged in wild duck shooting. On his arrival in London, he was sent for to the Admiralty, and gave information to show how the fort might be destroyed. More than this, he offered, if the means were supplied, to undertake the business personally. Quoth he, "I knew the risk, but would have been glad to undertake the hazard." His offer was declined, and Admiral Sir Home Popham afterwards attempted to destroy the fort, but for want of sufficient local knowledge did not succeed in doing anything effectual.

Here our friend's perils by land and by sea appear to have ended; and we are informed that his time was pretty fully occupied thenceforth with the labours of his profession, that of aural surgery. He tells us of his removing his family to Hainault Forest in 1813, and from that time his love of angling and researches into natural history appear to have been fully developed. D.

THOUGHTS UPON IRON PLATES.

We propose in the series of papers of which this is the first to review the rise and progress of mechanical invention in this country, and the general principles which regulate the application of machinery to the purposes of daily life. There is perhaps no single circumstance which so distinguishes England, as the pre-eminence she has attained in successful appliances, derived after many failures, for man's convenience or enjoyment. If we look round the rooms we occupy, or the neighbourhood in which we live, we see the results of an amount of patient but unconquerable thought of genius, unfortunate in its day, although immortal by the inheritance for which it suffered. Nor is it only upon this country of ours that the vast accumulation of skill and science has conferred benefit. It has revolutionized the whole world. Bandana handkerchiefs have long been exported from Glasgow for the use of the Chinese and the natives of India. The blade polished by the Sheffield workman is more excellent in its temper and finish than the famous scimitars of Damascus, or those manufactured in the Italian republics. It must therefore have some interest for us to trace the sources and ends of modern inventions—their influence upon social life and manners—their results as developed in religion and philosophy—their aids as civilizing agents, and their effects upon international policy.

The invention which has produced the greatest results during the last half century is undoubtedly the steam engine. It has been applied to almost every practical purpose in life. Thus, we travel by steam, we sow and reap by steam, we read by steam; steam grinds the wheat of which our bread is made, steam weaves our garments, steam saws and shapes the beams of which our houses are built, steam prints our books and newspapers, as has already been indicated—so that we may be said almost to live, think, and have our being by virtue of steam. † It may not, therefore, be inappropriate, in order to keep ourselves within reasonable limits, to begin with the introduction of the steam locomotive.

Necessity is the mother of discovery and invention. The apothegm is old, but its truth has been accepted in every age and everywhere. New discoveries beget new wants; new enjoyments follow new wants, and these diversify and multiply themselves with such marvellous rapidity and accumulative power, that human ingenuity must either keep pace with, or be overwhelmed by them. Indeed it may be said that where ingenuity fails to keep pace with the demands which civilization makes upon it, decay of the intellectual powers and degradation of social institutions set in. To illustrate our meaning more clearly, we may relate an anecdote which, though by no means new, is yet most apposite to our present purpose.

The story is told of the Marquis of Worcester, a man who affected a love of science in his day, but who would appear to have little pretension to excellence beyond that which personal vanity, high social rank, great wealth, and an understanding inclined to mysticism invariably supply. Desirous of seeing the Bicêtre upon an occasion, he put himself in communication with the governor. That official was not slow to make acquaintance with a marquis; a day was appointed for the visit of the eccentric and scientific nobleman. Punctual to day and hour, the great man's carriage drew up before the portico of the then madhouse; he was received with gracious courtesy and conducted from cell to cell where were wretches chained, who howled in very agony at the wrong which men as mad as they were doing, but of which they were unhappily the victims. "For all these," said the smiling official, "there is a gleam of hope; but I will show your lordship one poor wretch who has been pronounced by the whole faculty incurable." Entering a small room, they saw a man rocking before a fire which he was stirring up with remarkable assiduity. His hair was shaggy and dishevelled, his forehead was wrinkled, his small blue eye emitted the moisture which sorrow long endured infallibly distils, his beard was grizzled and grimed with dirt, and his whole form was enveloped in rags. This wretch had formed a notion that he could make his tin kettle run about the room by virtue of the steam which it threw off, and never surely was such a mad notion conceived. He had had a fortune left him, but one so demented was deemed by the law incapable of taking care either of himself or property. He died, and was buried, and the old tin kettle which he prized as the friend of his hallucination, was thrown on one side, where it lay long neglected, until a more practical genius took up its case, made a model of it, furnished it with wheels, levers, valves, and governors, and other regulating checks, until at last he succeeded in making it travel to the neighbouring village, next from city to city, next from kingdom to kingdom, and now from continent to continent. We do not know what became of the original kettle of Salomon de Caus—it is not preserved in the Society of Arts and Manufactures; neither does it adorn a glass case in any national museum. Perhaps it may have fallen in with decent company. We can only give our readers the clue furnished by Mr. Babbage in his Essay on Manufactures, where he says, "The worn out saucepans and tinware of our kitchens, when beyond the reach of the tinker's art, are not utterly worthless. We sometimes meet carts loaded with old tin kettles, and iron coal scuttles, traversing our streets. These have not yet completed their useful course. The less corroded parts are cut into strips, punched with small holes, and varnished with a coarse black varnish for the use of the trunkmaker, who protects the edges and angles of his boxes with them; the remainder are conveyed to the manufacturing chemists in the outskirts of the town, who employ them, in conjunction with pyroligneous acid, in making a black dye for the use of calico printers."

The operations of man are, in their character at least, the counterpart of those of his Creator. They are on a smaller scale indeed, and bounded by limits which do not apply to the silent course of nature, untrammelled by considerations of time or space as she is. Man works with an energy inferior in amount of force, but still with an object intelligible, because definite, and this he pursues from failure to failure, until a ray, as it were from an unknown world beams upon him, and that which was wrong is made straight, and what was omitted is supplied. Man produces his results by what he calls the agency of motive forces. These he divides into five different kinds, namely,—the muscular power of man, the muscular power of horses, the power or force of the wind, the weight and moving force of water, the expansive force and rapid condensation of steam. To one or other of these every mechanical appliance is referable. In this country, however, we have been accustomed to adopt horse power as the common standard of reference, or as mechanics call it, the dynamic unit. Our calculations are all based upon it; and whether we wish to ascertain the hydraulic force of a body of water, the impetus of a machine propelled or moved by the wind, or the velocity and power of the steam engine—we speak of all as of so many horse power. It may, therefore, be well to state in this place, that the medium power of the horse is estimated to lift about twenty-two pounds one foot high in a minute.

The Marquis of Worcester, whom we have mentioned, was amongst the first to draw attention to the motive power of steam. This nobleman died in 1663, nearly two centuries ago, and the only work he left behind was entitled, "A Centurie of the Names and Scantlings of Inventions." This volume is exceedingly obscure and now of little worth. There is, however, a manuscript of his preserved in the British Museum, which we have been at some pains to inspect, and from which we take the following very graphic description of his first experiments with steam. "An admirable and most forcible way," he says, "to drive up water by fire; not by drawing or sucking it upward, for that must be as the philosophers call it, infra sphaeram activitatis, which is but at such a distance. But this way hath no boundary, if the vessels be only strong enough, for I have taken a piece of a whole cannon, whereof the end was burst, stopping and screwing up the broken end as also the touch-hole, and making a constant fire under it; within twenty-four hours it burst and made a great crack; so that having found a way to make my vessels so that they are strengthened by the force within them, and the one to fill after the other, I have seen the water run like a constant fountain stream forty feet high—one vessel of water, rarified by fire, driving up forty of cold water. And a man that tends the work has but to turn two cocks, that one vessel of water being consumed, another begins to force and refill with cold water, and so successively, the fire being tended and kept constant—which the self-same person may abundantly perform in the interim between the turning of the said cocks."—Harleian MSS. No. 2428.

Close upon this invention followed others, some of which were presented to the French king, others to the Royal Society; and the reader will remark that the only use of these experiments in the minds of philosophers of that day was to lift a body of water, with a view to relieve miners from the flooding of their mines, by which their work was often obstructed, and lives were occasionally lost. For nearly seventy years the use of the steam engine remained the same, the improvements being confined to mere matters of detail. It was not until 1736—and many who have been accustomed to connect steamboats with the nineteenth century and Dr. Lardner, who protested against them as dangerous to life, and impossible as well as intractable agencies, will be surprised to learn that at that early period a pamphlet was published by one Jonathan Hull, in which he described a machine of his invention, by which "Vessels or ships could be carried out of or into any harbour, port, or river against wind, or tide, or in a calm." This extraordinary pamphlet has come to light in consequence of the recent discussion respecting the claimants to the modern locomotive. The claim of Hull is now generally admitted, but his invention appears to have altogether failed in his time either for want of encouragement, or inefficiency of apparatus. Perhaps the nearest to the truth is, that Hull was considered mad in his day, and was treated accordingly. At about this period also, the uses to which the steam-engine was applied had become more numerous. It was now employed to raise water to turn corn mills; to raise coals up a shaft; and to drive mills, generally, in that manner; and at a later period in making gas. But it was now to undergo such improvement as that the whole surface of the kingdom should be changed by it, that every inhabitant of this island should be nearly affected by it in every relationship, and that the future of the world should be encompassed in its mighty folds, creating new sources of wealth, opening out new vistas of inquiry, and reducing time and distance to such proportions that, considering the results of individual effort, a man of common energy may be said to effect, in the ordinary span of a lifetime, both for his country and his family, fourfold what he could have accomplished half a century ago. At that period the transit of goods from Manchester or Liverpool to London could not be effected in less than a week, now it can be accomplished in six hours.

Articles that were then prized, are now regarded as worthless. Human thought is, as it were, packed in railway carriages, in the shape of vast piles of printed sheets, and distributed daily over every town and village in the three islands. Is the pauper oppressed—his complaint reaches millions of hearers. Is the criminal flogged—millions of readers protest against the act of inhumanity. Does the toil-worn mechanic fall under his burthen—thousands come to his aid. To this mighty agent are we, like the luxurious natives of the east and the inhabitants of the desert indebted for most of the comforts and conveniences we enjoy. The produce of our factories, by its means, outstrip our most enterprising travellers. The cotton of America carried in British ships is outrun by the cry of the American slave brought here in British steamers.

How far then, let us inquire, has the honourable and illustrious fraternity to which we belong contributed to this end? Certainly a great number of distinguished names are entered upon its rolls, and a great many of the glorious results achieved have been in some degree indebted to the fraternal co-operation, the patience in difficulty, the energy and perseverance in prosperity, which our Craft inspires. Palaces, temples, tombs, remain as standing monuments and glorious interpreters of our art and the doctrines it inculcates; and though the genius that constructed them sleeps beneath their shadows, the spirit which sustained outlives the decay which the hand of time imperceptibly but surely brings about. Nor may we repose—many other improvements are to be made. He who falls out of the march of intellect and industry misses the very end and aim of his existence. He deceives himself too; for it is the work of his hand that gives the reward that gratifies. The man who takes no part in the concerns of life is like the turtle which floats upon the surface of the billowing sea, and which fancies it nears its destination because it is rocked by the waves; yet it finds its way to the stomach of some aldermanic Brobdignagian, with the same certainty that the bray of a certain quadruped in London streets prognosticates rain and spring onions.

ANCIENT VIEWS OF FREEMASONRY.—I.

As it may interest some readers of the Magazine, and by exciting thought and inquiry tend to improvement, I propose from time to time to transcribe various comments and scraps relating to Freemasonry from The Gentleman's Magazine and other works, published within the last one hundred and fifty years; and, as the first instalment, now transmit an article, published in vol. i. of the Gentleman, at page 431, and there quoted as from the Grub Street Journal of October 21st, 1731, No. 94.

"THE CONSTITUTIONS OF THE FREE MASONS.

"Mr. Spondee, a member of the society, gives some extracts from a book, entitled The Constitutions of the Free Masons, lately digested by the Rev. Mr. James Anderson, A.M., one of the Worshipful Masters.

"This work, now ordained to be read as the only Constitutions of Free and Accepted Masons, consists of three grand parts; the History of Masonry, the Charge of a Free Mason, and some general regulations, with three or four songs.

"In the History, we find that Adam was created after the image of God, the great Architect of the universe, whose Messiah is the great Architect of the church. In Assyria, the priests and mathematicians, called magi, preserved the science of geometry, as the kings and great men encouraged the Royal Art of Masonry. The Israelites, at their leaving Egypt, were a whole kingdom of Masons, instructed by their Grand Master, Moses.

"Among other wonders related in this History, is that of the great obelisk of Semiramis, which, says the author, was one hundred and fifty feet high, and twenty-four feet square at bottom, or ninety feet in circuit at the ground, all one entire stone, rising pyramidically, brought to Babylon, about the time of the siege of Troy.

"In the Charges, the author tells us that a Mason is obliged by his tenure to obey the moral law, and that his relation to the Lodge remains indefeasible though he should prove a rebel against the state; and that an apprentice must be a perfect youth, having no maim or defect in his body that may render him incapable of being a brother.

"By the Regulations a new brother, at his making is decently to clothe the Lodge with white aprons and gloves (that is, all the brethren then present), and to deposit something for indigent and decayed brethren. He is charged to be cautious in his words and carriage, that the most penetrating stranger shall not be able to discover, or find out, what is not proper to be intimated.

"A SONG, containing an abstract of the History:—

"Adam, the first of human kind,
Created with geometry,
Imprinted on his royal mind,
Inducted soon his progeny,
Cain and Seth, who then improv'd
The liberal science in the art
Of architecture, which they lov'd,
And to their offspring did impart;
But Samson's blot
Is near forgot.
His secrets once to wife disclos'd,
His strength was fled, his courage tam'd;
To cruel foes he was expos'd,
And never was a Mason nam'd.

"A HEALTH, by Mr. Birkhead:—

"Come let us prepare,
We brothers that are Assembled on merry occasion;
Let's drink, laugh, and sing,
Our wine has a spring,
Here's a health to an Accepted Mason."

LEGALITY OF MASONIC MEETINGS.

In reply to "J. J.," and other correspondents, we publish Clauses 5 and 6 of the 39th Geo. III., cap. 79, entitled "An Act for the more effectual Suppression of Societies established for Seditious and Treasonable Purposes; and for better preventing Treasonable and Seditious Practices."

"And whereas certain societies have been long accustomed to be holden in this kingdom under the denomination of Lodges of Freemasons, the meetings whereof have been in great measure directed to charitable purposes; be it therefore enacted, that nothing in this act shall extend to the meetings of any Society or Lodge which shall before the passing of this act have been usually holden under the said denomination, and in conformity to the rules prevailing among the said Societies of Freemasons."

"Provided always, that this exemption shall not extend to any such society unless two of the members composing the same shall certify upon oath (which oath any justice of the peace or other magistrate is hereby empowered to administer) that such Society or Lodge has before the passing of this act been usually held under the denomination of a Lodge of Freemasons, and in conformity to the rules prevailing among the Societies or Lodges of Freemasons in this kingdom; which certificate, duly attested by the magistrate before whom the same shall be sworn, and subscribed by the persons so certifying, shall, within the space of two calendar months after the passing of this act be deposited with the clerk of the peace for the county, stewardry, riding, division, shire, or place where such Society or Lodge hath been usually held: provided also, that this exemption shall not extend to any such Society or Lodge unless the name or denomination thereof, and the usual place or places and the time or times of its meetings, and the names and descriptions of all and every the members thereof, be registered with such clerk of the peace as aforesaid within two months after the passing of this act, and also on or before the twenty-fifth day of March in every succeeding year."

By these clauses it will be seen that the act only extended to regular Lodges of Freemasons held before the passing of the act; but by an Act passed 57 Geo. III., cap. 19, "for the more effectually Preventing Seditious Meetings and Assemblies," the exemption was extended to all Freemasons' Lodges. Clause 26 declaring—

"Provided always, and be it further enacted, That nothing in this Act contained shall extend or be construed to extend to any Society or Societies holden under the denomination of Lodges of Freemasons, in conformity to the Rules prevailing in such Societies of Freemasons, provided such Lodges shall comply with the Rules and Regulations contained in the said Act of the Thirty-ninth Year of His present Majesty, relating to such Lodges of Freemasons."

MARK MASTERS' JEWELS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE FREEMASONS' MAGAZINE AND MASONIC MIRROR.

DEAR SIR AND BROTHER,—The Past Grand Secretary, in his letter to Bro. W. Tucker, Prov. Grand Master for Dorset, dated 10th November, 1853, wrote, "Out of Lodge every one may wear whatever decoration he chooses;" and it is notorious that his late majesty, George IV., G.M.; H.R.H. the Duke of Sussex, G.M.; and other of the royal dukes, wore non-masonic with Masonic full costume, and no objection was made to such admixture—at least none that I can recollect. It is submitted that when a Lodge is closed and the brethren retire to another apartment, for any other purpose than that of Lodge business, the Mark Master's jewel, as well as the mantle or star of K.T. or R.C., or the elegant sash of K.D.S.H., or any other jewel, may be worn, without the wearer being subject to the condign punishment of being summoned before the Grand Registrar or the Prov. Grand Master—without infringing the Art. 22, p. 63, Constitutions, or Art 3, p. 18, both of which are, in my humble opinion, only restrictive to the extent of wearing jewels "in the Grand Lodge, or in any private Lodge." Now a banquet is certainly not a part of a Lodge business, mighty agreeable as it often is, and was on the 4th instant at the Crystal Palace; and if a Worshipful Master feels disposed to wear a medal or other device, honourable to himself only, at a banquet, I for one should certainly not object to it.

Yours fraternally,
R. E. X.

DISSENSIONS IN THE CRAFT.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE FREEMASONS' MAGAZINE AND MASONIC MIRROR.

SIR AND BROTHER,—As one who was present at the last Grand Lodge, you must allow me, if possible, space for a few remarks which seem to be called for from all independent members of the Craft then present, by the recent letter of Bro. Binckes.

Not being a member of any London Lodge, and simply a provincial brother, I might hesitate to express an opinion on proceedings of which I am not an habitual spectator in Grand Lodge, did I not feel assured that whether by London or provincial brethren my remarks will be received in the same spirit by which they have been made by a brother Mason. For the information, then, of my provincial brethren especially, of whom very few were present on the occasion alluded to, I would say that I was present at the whole of Grand Lodge proceedings from the opening to the close, but that I never attended any Grand Lodge which filled me with deeper disappointment, humiliation, and regret. I would therefore, to-day, most earnestly and solemnly protest in your pages against the continuation of the unmasonic temper and spirit exhibited by a very small portion of the brethren (I am happy to observe), when in Grand Lodge—and that meaningless, yet pertinacious opposition to every semblance of Masonic authority, and to almost every proposition emanating from the legal executive. I hope, too, Bro. Editor, that our recent Grand Lodge meeting was the last occasion on which, as Masons, we shall have the time of our Grand Lodge taken up by what—in more than one instance which I could name—seemed to be a mere love of talking for talking's sake; or that we shall witness, sadly enough, the dignity of the Grand Lodge lowered, and its authority impaired by the baneful influences of party organization, unworthy imputations, and unseemly personalities. As far as any one brother can venture safely to express the sentiments of other brethren, I believe I am not misinterpreting their feelings when I say that a large majority of our brethren are sick and weary of this intestine strife, and in no slight degree ashamed and indignant also at these persevering endeavours by a little clique (ready for ceaseless opposition or attack), to assimilate the great assembly of our venerable Order to an unruly vestry where party politics are the abiding hindrance to all useful and beneficial action. On the contrary, I feel quite sure that the prevailing sentiment of the Craft is—to rally round the Grand Master and uphold his Masonic character, position, and dignity, to give a generous and fraternal consideration to all the proposals of the executive, proceeding as they do—I firmly believe—from a genuine reverence for the landmarks of the Order and an earnest desire to promote the honour and dignity of the Grand Lodge. Surely the time is come when we should all, as Masons, endeavour earnestly to put an end to proceedings calculated to inflict permanent injury on the Craft, and when all who love and venerate the principles of Masonry, should determine that they will no longer allow Grand Lodge to be made the opportunity of insult and incrimination, handed over to the hateful demon of party strife for the amusement and self glorification of any Masonic Ishmaelite whose hand is against every man and every man's hand against him.

I am, Sir and Brother, yours fraternally,
A PAST PROVINCIAL GRAND OFFICER.

FREEMASONRY; ITS HISTORY AND PUBLICATIONS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE FREEMASONS' MAGAZINE AND MASONIC MIRROR.

SIR,—Having been led into the consideration of that portion of the history of architecture in England, called mediæval, or Gothic, and especially of the transition of one style into another, the inquiry has necessitated the perusal of a large number of works, and the inspection of many illustrations and buildings. Among the publications, those relating to the fraternity of Freemasons were brought forcibly under my attention. The natural result was an inquiry into its history, as being likely to assist the object of my researches. Greatly to my regret, I fear I have been sadly wasting my time, and it is upon this point that I venture to intrude myself on your attention.

I had always conceived that the present society of Freemasons had an established historical account of its descent through the mediæval period, tracing the gradual changes in the art of architecture down to the present time. I had heard of the Lodges, the signs, the marks, and of the Grand Masters, commencing from St. Alban. But when I came to read, to study, and to compare the various works published by the authority of the fraternity, and otherwise, I grieved to find how valueless is the whole of them in respect of the earlier portion of their history. Mystification appears almost to be the aim and end of all the writers. No author since the earlier years of the last century has attempted to clear away the obscurity which evidently even then shrouded the subject. The account adopted at that time seems to be merely an attempt at a history of architecture, or of Masonry, as it is called in the works. Names are brought forward, and titles are given to them for which no evidence is adduced. Transactions are recorded without sufficient explanation of cause and effect. "Old manuscripts," that convenient expression, are referred to without a prospect of any one, at the present day, having the remotest chance of inspecting them; the whole presenting, to me at least, the appearance of having been put together to blind the uninitiated, and mislead the unwary. This is the impression I have, resulting from the perusal and comparison of the old works with modern documents. At the period when the historical account was compiled, it must have been a very skilful production. It is greatly to be regretted, however, that so many succeeding writers should have put such great faith in it; perhaps they may not have been permitted to think for themselves.

Though not a Freemason, I am not one of those who despise the Craft. If it had an object when it commenced its modern development in 1717, it has well pursued it, and is therefore worthy of all commendation. But as an architect, I am sadly disappointed at this absence of a satisfactory history of the Craft. I have sought for some account of the history of any of the old Lodges—say for instance that of the York Lodge, with its pretensions to date from the time of Athelstan. I have not, however, met with any; and have also been unable to see a copy of Oliver's "Brief History of the Witham Lodge." Some ancient charges have been printed at various times; and, it appears to me, the Craft is especially indebted to Mr. Halliwell (who I presume is not a Freemason), for his discovery and publication of the mediæval manuscripts on Masonry, which he considers to be of the end of the fourteenth century; some writers referring to which, I find, are pleased to call them "of the tenth century," to suit a purpose.

Some of the present authors, I consider, are endeavouring to claim for ancient Freemasonry an existence distinct from that of practical masonry—a position that the earlier writers clearly did not maintain. What is the cause of this seeming inconsistency?

The original York Lodge, I understand, ceased to exist many years since. Its papers and records, I presume, have not been destroyed. Surely there can now be no such great secrecy in the account of their doings as to necessitate public reference to them being withheld. If by chance their records contain any information, it would prove to be highly interesting, and would surely repay any Masonic archæologist for the trouble of the search, and the preparation of the documents for publication. There are two other old Lodges in the kingdom, whose records might possibly be made serviceable in the compilation of a reasonable historical account of so highly esteemed a fraternity.

One circumstance forcibly attracted my attention. In 1717, as you are aware, a Grand Lodge was formed in London. What evidence is there of any Grand Lodge having been held previous thereto, anywhere in England? Had there been one, what had become of the office and officers? Why was it necessary that a Grand Lodge should have been so established in 1717? I presume there are no other accounts but those published in Anderson, Preston, and the other usual works, and they are assuredly unsatisfactory. It is undoubtedly true, from other evidence, that Lodges were in existence previous to that date; but no connection is adduced of them one with another, or with a head Lodge. They may just as likely, for all evidence to the contrary, have been independent clubs, though possibly sprung from one another, and formed as the members separated and became resident in the various parts of the country during the commotion of the seventeenth century.

These observations are the result of researches which have been caused by the desire which I, with many others in the profession, feel for that certain information of the working of the early bodies of executive masons, who were unquestionably the means by which the knowledge of construction and architectural art was diffused. The absence of this information in the works put forward by the fraternity, led me to inspect various other sources more or less connected with the question; and I entertain no doubt but that any one pursuing a similar course of inquiry, and having the inspection of, and permission to make use of, such of the early records relating to the old Lodges as may prove to be corroborative evidence, would be enabled to compile a history worthy of Freemasonry. To an Englishman and an architect nothing could be of greater interest, possessing, as this country does, the purest specimens of gothic architecture.

May I add, as a disinterested observer, that I would urge that some steps should be taken to put a stop to the publication of such speculative absurdities as those written by Oliver and others, which have been already aptly criticised as "distinguished by an intrepidity of statement which must advance the cause considerably with a more numerous than choice class of understandings." They may be successful perhaps as publishers' speculations, but they are certainly damaging in a literary view. I think that the publications on the present Freemasonry, professing to be written by members of the fraternity, assume a great amount of respectability due to a long pedigree; and that on the contrary, the very documents to which they refer detract considerably from the respectability of the speculative Masonry founded comparatively a few years since. If the fraternity of the present day is descended from the mediæval Masons, the true history of such descent should be submitted to the members and the public.

Having trespassed so largely on your attention, I will only add, that I trust these observations will not be looked upon in the light of fault-finding, but as the result of a long study of the subject. Whilst aware that the fraternity urges secrecy and prevents discussion, I yet hope that any one who may be permitted to afford an explanation, or who can point out any better source of evidence, which he thinks I may have overlooked, will kindly do so in a kindred spirit of inquiry. After the society has allowed the appearance of such works as some of its members have written, it seems more than disingenuous to refuse to elucidate any doubtful points that may be raised, or others which could be raised, even under so plausible a plea as an oath of secrecy which, on those points, if it exist, has been, I fancy, broken by authority over and over again.

Should these remarks be considered eligible for your Magazine, I may perhaps be again tempted to trespass on your valuable pages in a future number, more especially with reference to the sources available for such a history as I have touched upon.

I am, yours respectfully,
W. P.

AMERICAN BRETHREN.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE FREEMASONS' MAGAZINE AND MASONIC MIRROR.

DEAR SIR AND BROTHER,—As the almoner of our Lodge, I am frequently puzzled by the proofs of fraternity offered by travellers en route, professing to have been initiated in some American Lodge, the same differing so widely from the English mode as not to be approved by me. As Bro. Cooke is now in this country, probably you could inquire of him if there be any difference in the working; and, if so, he could perhaps name some brother in London who could explain the difference, that myself and other almoners may be instructed in their mode, so that we may not close the portal of relief to any of the American brotherhood, who, for want of knowing the English working, fail in proving themselves to have been properly initiated.

Yours faithfully and fraternally,
R. E. X.

MASONIC MISSIONS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE FREEMASONS' MAGAZINE AND MASONIC MIRROR.

DEAR SIR AND BROTHER,—There can be no doubt as to the benefit which will arise to the Craft in this country from the admirable series of papers which you are publishing under the head "Masonic Missions." They will not only tend to point out deficiencies and neglect in some districts, and to hold up to commendation the energy which characterizes others, but they must in the end have the effect of inciting to greater efforts in provinces where the claims of the Order are but little known, and thus of removing inequalities among us, which, by causing different standards of merit to prevail, in proportion to the number of Lodges under the surveillance of any Provincial Grand Master, omit to confer elevation in accordance with the services and merits of individual brethren in a masonically populous district, in comparison with other provinces in which the number of Lodges is small, and where consequently a low standard is adopted as the claim to office in the Provincial Grand Lodge.

I have before troubled you with some remarks on this subject, but it is by some considered of so much importance to the well being and the united action of the Craft, that I do not hesitate to recapitulate on the present occasion a portion of what has been already said, and to add some further considerations.

In reality, the duties of the Provincial Grand Officers are so trivial, and of so little practical benefit, that the purple apron cannot be regarded in any other light than an honorary distinction, though there are some who very reasonably consider that the Provincial Grand Lodges ought to be made thoroughly effective, by affording means of extending and exalting our Order, of investigating its history, of raising its literature, of spreading a knowledge of its origin and its progressive development to the present period. Such, however, is not the case at present, and therefore, as the tenure of office imposes no duties which prevent brethren of low qualification from accepting it, great discrimination ought to be used by the Provincial Grand Masters in the selection of fit persons to surround themselves, as the heads of the Craft, on important occasions. For this there are several reasons; namely, the desirability of offering objects of aspiration beyond the mere routine of office, as the reward of services not well defined; the maintenance of their own dignity in the Craft by the standing and position of their officers; the impression produced, in cases of publicity before the world, by attendance at church, at Provincial Grand Lodge meetings, or at public processions for any object, when we shall of course be judged unfavourably by our fellow citizens, if they see the highest honours and decorations appertaining to those who morally and socially appear to have but slender, if any, claims to distinction and honour. If the purple apron merely marks honour, dignity, merit, distinction, let care be taken that in no instance it is conferred unworthily, for from that moment it ceases to be an object of ambition, and it would be easy to point out provinces where such has been the effect of a few injudicious appointments.

For these reasons it seems most desirable to have one rule of action prevailing universally throughout all districts under the warrants of the Grand Lodge of England. To give an example: in one province, with which I am acquainted, the Provincial Grand Master, though in many respects very efficient, and therefore highly esteemed, knows but little of the characters and qualifications of the Masters of Lodges under his control, except in a few individual cases, and makes his appointments on the suggestion of one or two of his principal officers, who in their recommendations act on some rule which has been laid down for them by him, but about the justice of which many have grave doubts. The number of Lodges in the province is considerable. None are appointed to office in Provincial Grand Lodge unless they have filled the chair of Worshipful Master. The first appointment is that to the office of Pursuivant, and a brother once entering upon it expects, and generally obtains, an advance every year, on certain reasonable conditions, until he arrives at the Senior Wardenship. Thus the number of vacancies is very small; no brother who is not a Worshipful Master can hope to have the purple; very many who are Past Masters, and have in every way acquitted themselves well, never attain to it, and thus the Provincial Grand Officers may generally be expected to be the best men in the province, and to obtain respect and honour accordingly, if due caution be used in the first instance.

In another province the same principles of elevation prevail, with the additional guarantee afforded by the fact that the Prov. Grand Master has the credit of being so active in the promotion of every thing tending to the best interests of the Craft, and of personally obtaining so complete an insight into the conduct and working of every Lodge under his control, that he is able to form his own opinion of each member before he invests him with the purple, and will not advance any brother who does not deserve it. Here then also the Prov. Grand Officers are or ought to be entitled to respect.

Now take another province of which I have seen much. The number of Lodges is five, or about one third of those in the district previously alluded to. Being concentrated within a limited space, the Prov. Grand Master knows the merits of every brother, and therefore may be expected to exercise judgment in his appointments. With every inclination to do so, his desire is nullified by the course which he adopts. The number of Lodges is sufficient to allow the rule prevalent in the districts before named to be carried out, namely, that none who have not filled the chair of Worshipful Master shall be elevated to the purple; yet, scarcely any of them are in so honourable a position; some even have been initiated within a year; and the reason of so anomalous a state of things is, that there is no gradual annual progression upwards from Pursuivant to Senior Warden, and a brother has no tolerably sure expectation that, provided he conducts himself well, he will arrive at the highest point, since he will in all probability be set aside for some one who may have less pretensions than himself, or who has no claim of long standing and experience in the fraternity. Hence, the purple apron appearing to depend more on the present state of feeling, or it may be on the caprice of the Prov. Grand Master, and not upon long services or high merit, is less prized, or rather a high position and successive progressive appointments in Prov. Grand Lodge are less prized there than they are where a different system prevails. Thus the rank of a visiting brother from other districts does not obtain for him due consideration in the province alluded to, while any one happening to hold high office there, obtains when presenting himself elsewhere more honour than is really due to him. It appears desirable therefore that throughout the country a uniform system of appointment and promotion should prevail for the reasons given, and especially because a member of a small province has a great advantage over those who belong to a smaller one.

To sum up the whole. In Grand Lodge, whatever office is assigned to a brother, is only for one year; it is supposed to be such as his abilities, position, and Masonic usefulness fairly entitle him to; he cannot expect any advance beyond it unless under extraordinary circumstances. In some provinces the same plan is adopted, and if they are small, such a course makes the purple apron too cheap, and therefore not valued, because bestowed on inexperienced Masons who have not passed the chair of W.M. and have not otherwise distinguished themselves. In other provinces a brother must have been Master of a Lodge, and even this, owing to the number of Lodges, is not sufficient, but he must have shown his superiority over others by additional means; he becomes Pursuivant first, and then gradually advances each year to the rank of Senior Warden. This seems to be the course best adapted to secure the object of such appointments, namely, honorary rank, provided that the Provincial Grand Master uses a discretionary power in not promoting a brother beyond such an office as his Masonic knowledge, abilities, and position, fairly warrant.

It would perhaps be well if some arrangement could be made for equalizing the extent of the Masonic provinces according to the number of Lodges which exist, or may naturally be expected to exist, in them, instead of the present very unsatisfactory adoption of the counties as provinces, with a very few exceptions. According to the calendar we have twenty-five Lodges in Cheshire, while in North Wales, which borders upon it, there are only four Lodges. It is manifest, therefore, that a very inferior Mason may hold high rank in the latter, while a large number of good and energetic brethren have no position in the former, to many of whom he is probably, decidedly inferior. This must sometimes be felt in any intercommunications between different provinces.

Again, in East Lancashire there are forty-five, and in West Lancashire twenty-seven Lodges, while in Cumberland, the next district on the north, there are only six. In Herefordshire there are only three Lodges, and the same number in Monmouthshire, while in Devonshire on the other side of the channel, there are twenty-four. These cases, to which other parallel ones might be added, are sufficient to show the anomalies which exist, and the inequalities in the position of individual brethren, according to the province with which they are connected. One other instance may be mentioned, namely, that of the Channel Islands. In Jersey there are five Lodges, in Guernsey four, in Alderney one. Jersey constitutes one province, Guernsey and Alderney another; they are both under the direction of the Provincial Grand Master, yet are quite distinct from each other. Why are they thus divided, giving opportunity for the elevation to high position of brethren who, if put into competition with others, would soon find a lower level, and making it difficult for the Prov. Grand Master to select two sets of officers of sufficient standing to secure the respect of the Craft?

It may be said that these matters are trivial and not worthy of notice, that the genuine Mason will never be envious or jealous of the honours of others; that we are all on a level, and recognize no distinctions but those of virtue and merit. Such is the theory, and such undoubtedly are the tendencies of the science, but your columns afford ample evidence that Masons are after all, but men, subject to the same feelings and passions as others, though our principles require that they should be kept under control. All possible efforts ought to be made to accomplish so desirable a purpose, and to prevent temptations to evil thoughts and notions of injustice. It is considered by many that much more might be done by our authorities in this direction if their attention were from time to time directed to the amendment of our constitutions and different arrangements, so as to suit them to circumstances. In this view, a greater participation by country members in the offices of Grand Lodge in London could not fail to present itself as a desirable point for consideration, as also the power of voting by proxy among those beyond a certain distance from London.

Wishing to give offence to none, and to promote the cause of fairness and justice to all,

I am, dear Sir and Brother, yours faithfully and fraternally,

H. H.

THE MASONIC MIRROR.

MASONIC MEMS.

A NEW Lodge will be shortly opened at Maidenhead, Berks, under the title of the St. John's Lodge (No. 1,097). Bro. William Watson, P. G. Steward, is to perform the ceremony of consecration, and install Bro. E. S. Cosens as the first Master. The Prov. G.M.; D. Prov. G.M., and other Prov. Grand Officers, are expected to attend.

A NEW Lodge will be consecrated at Glastonbury on the 26th instant, to be called "The Pilgrim's Lodge," No. 1,074, and to be held at Bro. Bailey's, the George and Pilgrim Hotel. The ceremony will be performed by the D. Prov. G.M., Bro. Randolph, who will also install the W.M. After the consecration and installation, the Prov. Grand Lodge of Somerset will assemble at high twelve, after the despatch of business. A special train will leave Bristol at 8.0 a.m., returning from Glastonbury at 8.17, p.m.

THE BOYS' SCHOOL.

A QUARTERLY meeting of the Governors of this School was held at the offices, Great Queen-street, on Monday, July 18th, Bro. Geo. Barrett, V.P., presiding.

The Treasurer's report was presented, showing that £600 had been invested, making the funded property £14,100.

It was resolved, that in future the Audit Committee should meet one week prior to the General Committee, instead of only two hours previously as hitherto.

It was also resolved, that all votes recorded for a candidate should be carried forward to his account, until he was either elected or became disqualified for admission to the school by age.

A vote of thanks to the Chairman closed the proceedings.

METROPOLITAN.

LODGE OF PROSPERITY (No. 78).—On Wednesday, July 13, 1859, the brethren of this Lodge held their summer banquet at Bro. Smith's, Bell Inn, Lower Edmonton; a goodly number of the brethren assembled, accompanied by several ladies. Bro. J. H. Goodwin, the W.M., presiding. The banquet was in Bro. Smith's usual excellent style. The cloth being removed, the usual loyal toasts gone through, the health of Bro. Goodwin was announced and heartily received, likewise that of Bro. A. Day, P.M., to whom the Lodge is much indebted for his zeal, and especially for supporting the Masonic charities: "The Royal Masonic Institution for Boys," followed, Bros. Thiselton and R. C. Woodward responding in the most pleasing and enlivening terms. The boys at present in the school in Lordship-lane were invited to attend in the evening by request of the members of the Lodge (most of them being earnest supporters of the institution), and were introduced by the Secretary of the Lodge. They were afterwards provided with a suitable repast. The whole of the company expressed the highest admiration for their healthy appearance and excellent behaviour, which reflects high credit on the managing committee and their preceptor. Among the company not members of the Lodge, were Bros. Thiselton, Rd. C. Woodward, Perrin, Morris, Horris, and Stean.

ST. JAMES'S UNION LODGE (No. 211).—This Lodge met, at the Freemasons' Tavern, on Tuesday, July 12th, there being present Bros. H. A. Stacey, W.M.; C. Smethurst, S.W.; G. Gill, J.W.; T. Simpson, S.D.; H. Francis, J.D.; Sedgwick, I.G.; Jackson, Sec.; J. Gurton, P.M.; Kelly, P.M.; and about thirty other brethren. The Lodge was opened in the three degrees; and Bros. Walker and Levett were raised to the sublime degree of M.M. The Lodge was then resumed to the second degree, when Bros. P. Addington, W. H. R. Beatty, T. Williams, and W. Hasberry, were passed to the degree of Fellow Craft. The Lodge was then resumed to the first degree; and Mr. Thomas Baynham admitted to the mysteries and privileges of ancient Freemasonry. A long discussion on the proposed new by-laws took place. The alterations recommended by the committee were adopted, namely, an increase in the subscriptions of members, four shillings out of each subscription to go to charitable purposes connected with the Order; and the preliminary expenses of a steward to the charities to be borne by the Lodge. A petition to the Board of Benevolence, on behalf of a widow of a brother formerly belonging to this Lodge, was signed. It was arranged that the summer banquet of the Lodge be held at Boxhill, and take place on the 4th August. It is expected to be numerously attended by members of the Lodge; and as it is principally got up as a treat for the ladies, it is hoped they will use their powerful influence in rendering the meeting a pleasant and a happy one. The Lodge adjourned at half-past ten.

ZETLAND LODGE (No. 752).—This Lodge held its annual meeting on Wednesday, July 13th, at the Adam and Eve, Kensington, there being a large attendance of the brethren to do honour to the installation. The W.M., Bro. Doust, opened the Lodge in the three degrees, and having granted permission to Bro. Woodstock, W.M., No. 1051, to take the chair, he (Bro. Woodstock) proceeded to raise Bro. Meyer and pass Bro. Clink, (both of the Belgrave Lodge, No. 1051), both ceremonies being performed in a very impressive manner. The W.M. elect, Bro. Durrant, was then installed by Bro. Andrew, P.M., in an ancient form, and in this interesting ceremony Bro. Andrew displayed great ability and Masonic skill. The newly installed W.M. afterwards appointed and invested his Officers. They are: Bro. Barnshaw, S.W.; Bro. Wilson, J.W.; Harrison, S.D.; Gibbins, J.D.; Fellowes, I.G. Bro. Nowall was reelected Tyler. The W.M., while investing them with the collars and jewels of office, gave very appropriate addresses on the respective duties of each officer. The next business was the presentation of an excellent P.M. jewel to Bro. Copus, which the W.M. said was voted under very peculiar circumstances; it might be in the recollection of many of the brethren, that on Bro. Copus completing his year of office as W.M., it was proposed and carried "That the Lodge present him with a jewel in token of the important services he had rendered." Bro. Copus had filled the chair of that Lodge with great zeal and ability; he had not only performed the ceremonies incumbent on every W.M., but had installed his successor. At that time Bro. Copus acknowledged his gratitude for the intended compliment, but respectfully declined to accept it, "on account of the financial position the Lodge was then in;" some of the brethren, however, determined that Bro. Copus's merits should not go unrewarded, and entered into a private subscription. The result was the jewel he was now about to place on the breast of the worthy brother; and that he might live many years to wear it in that and other Lodges was the fervent desire of all the contributors towards it. Bro. Copus thanked the W.M. and brethren who had subscribed to pay him this very handsome compliment and mark of their approbation, and assured them he should remember this as the proudest moment of his life, and ever cherish this token of their esteem in grateful recollection of the Zetland Lodge and its members. The brethren then adjourned to a very handsome banquet, which being ended, the W.M. and brethren duly honoured the usual loyal and Masonic toasts, Bro. Smith, G. Purst., returning thanks for the Grand Officers. The health of the W.M., Bro. Durrant, was proposed and received with due honours. The W.M. said—Allow me to express my gratitude for the manner in which my health has been given, and for its flattering reception at your hands. I must claim the indulgence of the brethren if I do not respond to it in the way I could wish; I cannot but feel the distinguished and honourable position in which I am placed, to preside over so numerous, happy, and respectable a Lodge, and will endeavour, as far as I possibly can, to perform the important duties annexed to the appointment—it was most gratifying to me that my election was unanimous; and I trust, with the co-operation of my Officers, and the able assistance of the Past Masters, I shall be enabled to transmit the important office of W.M. to my successor with the same satisfaction my predecessors have done. Bro. Andrew, for himself and the other Past Masters of the Lodge, tendered their thanks in responding to the toast of the P.M.s.—the same spirit he was sure pervaded them all—a readiness to discharge their duties as rulers of the Craft, by being present on all occasions to aid the business and ceremonials of the Lodge. "The Visitors," joined with the name of Bro. Dr. Nolan, was then given. Bro. Dr. Nolan, in returning thanks for himself and brother visitors, acknowledged the kind, fraternal, and hospitable manner in which they were at all times received by the Zetland Lodge, and expressed their gratitude for the truly Masonic reception the Zetland had given to those visitors whom they honoured with an invitation on that occasion. He hoped that meetings of this kind would become more frequent, and had no doubt they would be attended with the happiest results. The W.M. next gave the health of Bro. Cooper, and thanked him for the banquet of which they had partaken. Bro. Cooper returned thanks, and very much regretted that the state of his health and that of Mrs. Cooper necessitated the removal of the Lodge to some other place; but go where they might, his heart would be with them. The last toast was soon afterwards proposed, and the brethren retired much gratified with the proceedings of the evening. The visitors were—Bros. J. Smith, G. Purst., and W.M. No. 1,082; McManus, P.M., No. 165; White, P.M., No. 168; Jackson, P.M., No. 168; Walkley, P.M., No. 367; Cottebrune, W.M., No. 1,035; Woodstock, W.M., No. 1,051; E. H. Nolan, S.W., No. 219; Caldwell, J.W., No. 25; Platt, J.W., No. 168; Runting, J.W., No. 1,051; Osborne S.W., No. 1,082; Meyer, No. 1,051; Clink, No. 1,051.

PROVINCIAL.

DEVONSHIRE.

STONEHOUSE.—Lodge of Sincerity (No. 224).—At a regular meeting of this Lodge, held on Monday, July 11th, present: Bros. Robinson Rodd, W.M.; Lord Graves, S.W.; Rev. G. Knowling, J.W.; Kadri (Bey), S.D.; Hawker, J.D.; Walker, I.G.; Spence Bate, Secretary. Hunt, P.M.; Narracott, P.M.; Risk; Ridley; Heyne; and Pomeroy, P.M.; the minutes of the preceding meeting were confirmed. Bro. Rev. Erskine Risk, M.A., having shown that he had made such progress as to entitle him to that honour, was passed to the second degree. A letter from the Grand Lodge relative to the irregular Lodges at Smyrna, was read and entered in the minutes of the Lodge. The Lodge then closed in peace and harmony.

TOTNES.—Pleiades Lodge (No. 1,012).—The monthly meeting was held on Thursday, the 14th instant. In the absence of the Worshipful Master, Bro. Henry Bridges, P.M., acted as W.M., initiated Mr. Arthur Browne into the first degree, and delivered the charge in the usual manner. The Secretary then read the letter received from Grand Lodge respecting irregular meetings at Smyrna. Bro. Thomas Lidstone presented a new P.M.'s chair to the Lodge, with the following inscription on it—"Presented to the Pleiades Lodge, No. 1,012, Totnes, A.L. 4859, by Brother Thomas Lidstone, S.D., in esteem for its first P.M., Brother Henry Bridges, of Lodges Nos. 983 and 123; P.M. Nos. 1,012, 680, 367, and 38; P.Z. No. 367; and P. Prov. S.G.D., Surrey.

HAMPSHIRE.

PROVINCIAL GRAND LODGE.

[We are favoured with the following from a correspondent; our regular report had not arrived up to the hour of going to press.—ED.]

The Provincial Grand Lodge was very freely attended, and an interesting discussion ensued on different subjects before the appointment of the new Officers; amongst other things a very handsome portrait was presented as a testimonial to Bro. Stebbing by the members of the Peace and Harmony Lodge, No. 462. The banquet and fête at Spear-hall (the residence of Bro. Lungley) was a most recherché affair. At least two hundred and fifty ladies and gentlemen were present, under the presidency of the R.W. Prov. Grand Master, Admiral Sir Lucius Curtis.

SOUTHAMPTON.—Southampton Lodge (No. 555).—A Lodge of emergency was held here on Wednesday evening, July 13th, in order to enable several brothers to advance in Masonry previously to the annual provincial meeting appointed to take place on Tuesday next. Bro. George Langley, W.M., took the chair, and passed Bros. J. George, jun., of Romsey, and Peter Lungley, the W.M.'s brother, and who, on this the first night of presiding since his election, performed his duty with great accuracy and ability. Bro. J. Rankin Stebbing, immediate P.M., then raised Bro. Wm. C. Humphreys, late high sheriff of the county; and Bro. Wm. Furber. The Lodge was honoured with the company of the following R.W. and W. brethren:—Bros. Admiral Sir Lucius Curtis, Bart., Prov. G.M.; Charles E. Deacon, D. Prov. G.M.; Hyde Pullen, D. Prov. G.M., Isle of Wight; Fred. Perkins, W.M., No. 162; Alexander Fletcher, W.M., No. 462; Rankin Stebbing, W.M., No. 1,087; Wood, P.G.S., of Brighton; R. Warner Wheeler, P.M., Prince of Wales Lodge; and numerous other influential brethren. The W.M. conducted the banquet with great ability, and observed, with much gratification, the general custom of the four Worshipful Masters of Lodges in the town being together at these agreeable Masonic réunions.

KENT.

MEETING OF THE PROVINCIAL GRAND LODGE AT MARGATE.

A Provincial Grand Lodge of the Freemasons of this province, was holden on Monday, the 18th instant, at the Assembly Rooms in Cecil-square. Owing to the fineness of the weather there was a large attendance of brethren, including many visitors from London.

The R.W. Bro. Charles Purton Cooper, Prov. Grand Master, presided; and there were also present Bros. S. B. Wilson, P.J.G.D.; Else and Davies, Past Grand Stewards; James Delmar, Prov. S.G.W.; W. Saunders, Prov. G. Treas.; Batchelor, Prov. G. Chaplain; Cooke, P. Prov. S.G.W.; Thos. Harvey Boys, P. Prov. S.G.W.; Chas. Holtman, P. Prov. S.G.W.; H. Stock, P. Prov. G. Supt. of Works; Charles Isaac, Prov. G. Sec.; Cruttenden, P.M. No. 741; Day, P.M. No. 741; Currie, P.M. No. 235; Vanderlyn, P.M. No. 223; Hoad, W.M. No. 816; Wreford, P.M. No. 34; Duke, P.M. No. 35; H. W. Moore, P.M. No. 20; George Gore, P.M. No. 709; and upwards of a hundred other brethren.

Previous to the opening of the Provincial Grand Lodge, proclamation was made by the Prov. G. Dir. of Cers., that all brethren below the rank of Warden should retire. This was, however, overruled by the R.W. Prov. Grand Master, who said it had not been the custom of the province, during his time, to carry out this regulation. The junior brethren were therefore permitted to remain.

The Provincial Grand Lodge was opened in antient and solemn form at high twelve, after which the minutes of the last Prov. Grand Lodge were read and unanimously confirmed. The brethren then proceeded to the election of Prov. Grand Treasurer, and that office was again conferred upon Bro. William Saunders, who has filled the post for many years past. Bro. Saunders was duly invested, after a few complimentary remarks from the Prov. Grand Master.

The Prov. Grand Master said that during the seven years which had passed since his appointment to rule that province, he had remarked that many brethren upon whom the purple had been conferred, had never attended to perform the duties of their respective offices. For himself, he did not speak—he was aware that no personal disrespect was intended to him—he had always endeavoured to rule with the mild authority of a father, and he was bound to say that he had invariably been treated with almost the affection of sons by the Kentish Masons. He hoped that he should not again be called upon to remark upon carelessness or inattention to the duties of the respective offices, and that the new Provincial Grand Officers might be found punctual in attendance and efficient in their working. He should proceed to the appointment and investment of the Provincial Grand Officers for the ensuing year, and called upon the Provincial Grand Secretary to read the patent of appointment of Bro. Harvey Boys to the rank of Deputy Provincial Grand Master.

Bro. Charles Isaac, Prov. G. Sec., having performed this duty,

The Prov. Grand Master resumed. He alluded to the great services which had been rendered by Bro. Harvey Boys to Craft Masonry, to the Royal Arch degree, and in the Mark Lodges; as also in those high degrees of which he (the Prov. Grand Master) had no cognizance. No more worthy Mason could be found in Kent to fill the important office of D. Prov. Grand Master, and he had very great pleasure in investing him with the insignia of that rank; at the same time, notwithstanding the lustre of Bro. Boys's previous career, and the great personal respect he entertained for him, it was his (the Prov. Grand Master's) intention to spread this office as much as possible, and brethren must not therefore be surprised if another brother should be appointed next year. He himself should continue to perform all the high duties of his office himself, as he always had done hitherto—the office of Deputy Prov. Grand Master would, therefore, be merely a mark of honour, and a complete sinecure, unless unforeseen circumstances should intervene.

The following brethren were reappointed and invested:—Rev. Bro. Batchelor, Prov. G. Chaplain; and Charles Isaacs (P.M., No. 20), Prov. G. Sec.; the new appointments being Bros. Brook Jones, No. 155, Prov. S.G.W.; Hodge, No. 621, Prov. J.G.W.; Thorpe, No. 1,011, Prov. G. Reg.; Feakins, No. 149, Prov. S.G.D.; Green, No. 184, Prov. J.G.D.; Gifford, No. 20, Prov. G. Dir. of Cers.; W. Everist, No. 91, Assist. Prov. G. Dir. of Cers.; Hoad, No. 818, Prov. G. Supt. of Works; Reynolds, No. 34, Prov. G. Org.; Vanderlyn, No. 235, Prov. G.S.B.; G. Everist, No. 91, Prov. G. Pura.; and the following as Prov. G. Stewards: Bros. Philcox, No. 376; Snowden, No. 621; Thorne, No. 149; Philpott, No. 235; Rahles, No. 621; and Havecott, No. 741. Bro. Hoad, the newly appointed Prov. Grand Superintendent of Works, is, we were informed, a builder at Folkestone.

The Prov. Grand Master, at the request of the brethren of the Union Lodge, then presented an elegant jewel, as a mark of their respect and esteem, to Bro. Hayward, P.M. of that Lodge, and the actual Master of the recently consecrated Lodge at Deal. Bro. Hayward returned thanks in a short but feeling speech, in which he alluded to his having been initiated in that room twenty-five years ago.

Proceeding to the business on the printed agenda paper, the R.W. Prov. Grand Master having received the following letter, moved that the same be taken into consideration:—

"Freemasons' Hall, London, April 18th, 1859.

"Rt. W. Sir and Brother,—I am commanded by the M.W. Grand Master, to direct your attention to a pamphlet on Provisional Organization, issued by the respective Committees of the Royal Freemasons' School for Female Children, and the Royal Masonic Institution for the Sons of Indigent and Deceased Freemasons, and which you will receive by the book post. The Grand Master feeling deeply interested in the prosperity of those institutions, requests the favour of your bringing the subject to the notice of the Lodges and brethren in your province, either at a meeting of your Prov. Grand Lodge, or in such other way as you may deem best calculated to ensure its being properly considered.

(Signed)

"WM. GRAY CLARKE, G.S.

"To Chas. Purton Cooper, Esq., Q.C., Prov. G.M. Kent."

The R.W. Prov. Grand Master said that he had been upon the committee of the Boys School for many years, and that he had made a point of attending and voting at the joint committee of the schools, in order that the brethren at large might know from his statements on that occasion, how great was the liberality of the Kentish brethren, and what an admirable example was set by them to other provinces. He proposed that the Provincial Grand Secretary should forward to the V. W. Bro. Gray Clarke a return of the sums contributed by the province of Kent to the various Masonic charities; and that in his opinion would be a sufficient answer to the letter of the Grand Secretary. (Hear, hear.)

The resolution to that effect was put and carried.

Bro. Hallows, P. Prov. S.G.W., moved a resolution according to notice, to the following effect:—"That article 4, p. 53 of the Book of Constitutions, in so far as it recommends the payment of five shillings to a provincial fund of benevolence for every person who has been initiated, and one shilling for every member who has joined any Lodge, be adopted in this province. The time from which the above payments are to commence, to be decided by the Prov. Grand Master, or if he thinks fit, by the Prov. Grand Lodge." Bro. Hallows was proceeding with a speech in support of this proposition, when

The Prov. Grand Master said that there were eight notices of motion upon the paper, some of which would doubtless lead to discussion; and the time was already past at which it was announced that the brethren were to go to church. He therefore proposed that the remaining business should be deferred to a Prov. Grand Lodge of Emergency, to be holden on a future day. This proposition was carried by acclamation.

Bro. Charles Isaac, Prov. G. Sec., made a powerful appeal to the brethren to give their support at the ensuing election of the Boys School, to the son of the late Bro. W. H. Carlin, P. Prov. G. Dir. of Cers.

The Prov. Grand Lodge was then closed in ample form.

The brethren, headed by the band of the Anglo-Italian Legion, marched in procession to the adjoining church, where divine service was performed; prayers being read by the Rev. J. Prosser. The Prov. Grand Chaplain then preached a most eloquent sermon from Eccles. ix., 7, "Go thy way, eat thy bread with joy, and drink thy wine with a merry heart; for God now accepteth thy works."

The reverend brother said that it afforded him unmixed satisfaction to meet the brethren of the province at Margate on the occasion, as he regarded a meeting of that nature as a Masonic anniversary in which they were all interested. To reflecting men, a year could never pass away without some commemoration of God's providential regard, a growing respect for the duties of their daily life, and a more lively sense that the present state only was the one allotted them for action. But in order to guide the brethren to a more devout contemplation of these truths, he should refer them to the words of one who was held in peculiar reverence by Masons, and whose wisdom came from above; they would find his advice in Eccles. ix., 7, 8, 9, 10—how applicable were these words to Masons! As such, they perhaps pursued a different course, one peculiar to their birth, education, and national character, but which they found most conducive to their spiritual and temporal prosperity, and after all they hoped to reach the Grand Lodge above. To each Mason, then, he reiterated the words of Solomon, "Go thy way," but, remember, that to walk surely, whatever might be their distinctive creed, they must practise the precepts of Solomon, "eat thy bread with joy, drink thy wine with a merry heart." He said this precept referred to those necessities of existence which man sought and required for the sustenance of his daily life; but to enjoy those blessings "with joy and a merry heart," they must be procured honestly and partaken of temperately; and he showed that Masons must ever remember that they professed to be upright and temperate men. The Prov. G. Chaplain then dwelt upon the other parts in the exhortation, "Let thy garments be always white" "thy head lack no ointment." These expressions, he said, symbolically bore testimony to that purity of intention, propriety of behaviour, and regard for that body so fearfully and wonderfully made, which the mighty Architect of Nature expected from his creatures. He then noticed the domestic duties of the Mason, to "live joyfully with the wife of his youth," and he showed that, although women were not admitted into their Order, Masonry regarded them with the highest interest, solicitude, and respect, and that it was the Mason's duty in particular to make every sacrifice in order to live purely and joyfully with the wife of his youth. Then, said the Prov. G. Chaplain, how conformable to Masonry was the final exhortation of King Solomon, which not only taught men to live, but reminded them that they must die. Yes! it is the grave where the gavel is no longer heard, "for there is no work" there—the grave, where our noble science can be no longer pursued, for

"there is no knowledge, wisdom, or device there," to which we are all hastening. He concluded with a powerful appeal to all to work while it is called to-day, and whatsoever their hands found to do, to do it with their might.

A liberal collection was made at the doors on behalf of the Masonic, and two other schools in the locality. At the special request we believe of the Prov. Grand Master, the discourse, which made a profound impression upon the audience, will be published.

THE BANQUET.

At four o'clock, one hundred and twelve brethren re-assembled in the noble Assembly Room, but not, alas! to dine. After an hour's delay, dinner was announced, the brethren took their seats, and grace was said; a few dishes made their appearance here and there, but only a few brethren were so fortunate as to procure the much required refreshment after the labours of the day. Three waiters were all that made their appearance to attend upon this large party and upon sixty or seventy ladies for whom refreshment was nominally provided in an adjoining apartment. Meantime the band, with a most praiseworthy perseverance, were doing their utmost to console the famishing brethren by banging away with redoubled energy whenever cries of discontent became audible. At length, the band having been with much difficulty silenced,

The Prov. Grand Master indignantly said, that he saw very clearly that many brethren would have to leave that room half starved. He was not only their Prov. Grand Master, but he was also an equity lawyer, and he would be happy to tell any brother who might wish it what his remedy was. The waiters had confessed to him that preparation had been made only for fifty guests, although the hotel keeper had been guaranteed one hundred to dinner.

Fantasia by the band, followed by a long pause, during which hopes of any dinner appeared to vanish entirely from the minds of the brethren, who bore their sufferings with great good humour.

The Prov. Grand Master said—Brethren, remembering the excellent sermon which we have this day heard, we ought to be satisfied with our morsel, however small it may be. I was therefore about to ask the Prov. Grand Chaplain to say grace, but I have just heard that there is a possibility of our having something else for dinner besides music. I would, however, recommend the brethren to give up their tickets to Bro. Gardiner himself instead of to the stewards, and take the opportunity of making a few Masonic observations to him upon the entertainment he has provided for us.

Towards the close of this singularly ill-managed banquet, Bro. Gardiner, the hotel keeper, made his appearance, and requested permission to explain, which having been granted, Bro. Gardiner observed that at this season of the year it was very difficult to provide for so large a party, or to get waiters. What further observations he made were drowned in the ironical cheers and laughter of the brethren. One brother in a stentorian voice proposed Bro. Gardiner's good health, which was drunk out of empty glasses, with the exception of here and there one who had by favour of the three waiters, or by stratagem, secured a glass of water.

The Prov. Grand Master then said—Brethren, I have lived among you for several years, and through my knowledge of you I have been led still more highly to appreciate the virtues of Masonry. For more than six years no cloud has intervened to darken the sunshine of the Craft in this province. I am delighted that you have had no dinner—I rejoice that you have had no wine—and I will tell you why. Life is chequered; even our enjoyments must be chequered and frequently curtailed; and I am glad to find that the Masons of Kent, in taking their share this day of the rough with the smooth, have exhibited the Masonic virtues of patience and temperance in so exemplary a manner. Our reverend brother, the Prov. Grand Chaplain, will now say grace. I do not think this exactly a fitting opportunity to call for "Non nobis;" but I trust that in the religious sense of the words we may all say, that the smallest donations have been thankfully received.

The Rev. Bro. Batchelor, Prov. G. Chaplain, observed that it had been truly written, that "thy bread shall be given thee, and thy water shall be sure," and having these, it behoved them to be therewith content. But—to pass from the jest of the moment—let them return thanks for all the mercies vouchsafed to them, and pray that the wants of the necessitous all over the world might find willing hands to relieve them.

The three waiters having with much ado removed the cloth, another long pause ensued, terminated by the Prov. Grand Master calling for the National Anthem, which having been sung, and half a dozen bottles of wine having made their appearance,

The Prov. Grand Master said that on the present occasion everything appeared to go by the rule of contraries—they had just had the National Anthem, they would now (as far as they were able) drink the health of her Majesty. He would tell them a Masonic anecdote of the Queen. Before her Majesty's marriage, in leap year, she courted Prince Albert, who after a little difficulty thought proper to accept her. On consulting her ministers upon the subject, they informed her that they held themselves responsible for her Majesty's acts; but as for the young man, they could not be answerable for what he might do, or might leave undone. The Queen said she wished that her Albert should be made a Freemason; but her uncle, the late M.W. Grand Master, the Duke of Sussex objected, on the ground that, as a royal husband, the Prince was bound to have no secrets whatever from the Queen. Her Majesty having urged the point in vain, as the old duke was inflexible—replied that as her husband could not be made a Mason, her first son should be one. He gave them "The health of the Queen and the Prince of Wales."

The toast was received with loud cheers and the Kentish fire, though few brethren had any wine to drink.

Previous to the toast the ladies returned from their meagre collation in the ante-room; of course the proceedings of the evening were carried on without any Masonic ceremonial whatever.

The Provincial Grand Master said—When men can get no dinner they are recommended to swallow clay, and as we cannot conveniently obtain this latter article, we will try and swallow some music. I shall propose the health of the M.W. Grand Master. I make no speech, because I do not think you are in a sufficiently equable state of mind to be bored. As soon as you have received the toast you shall have a song, which I hope will have the desired effect. "The health of the Right Hon. the Earl of Zetland, M.W.G.M."

The toast having been drunk with Kentish fire, an attempt was made by the professionals present to execute a glee, but the three waiters here broke out into such a paroxysm of glass jingling and other clattering that it was impossible to hear a note, and the singers declined to proceed. The waiters took no notice whatever of the loud and angry calls of the brethren to "get out," and at length, (not without considerable resistance) were summarily ejected. This incident occasioned great laughter and restored the wavering good humour of the brethren, which by this time had been tried to the utmost.

The Prov. Grand Master gave "The health of Lord Panmure, R.W. D.G.M., and the rest of the Grand Officers." He was sorry that his lordship was not present, as he had the reputation of being a most gallant man, and it needed all their efforts in that way to reconcile their fair visitors to the disagreeable contretemps of the day. The next most gallant person whom he knew was Bro. Stephen Barton Wilson, upon whom he would call to return thanks for the toast. (Kentish fire).

Bro. S. B. Wilson, P.S.G.D., said,—Right Worshipful Prov. Grand Master, as the only Grand Officer present, it devolves upon me to return thanks for the honour conferred by the brethren upon that body, by the very flattering manner in which they have received the last toast. While I much regret that this duty has not fallen into much abler hands, I have great pleasure in assuring you that Lord Panmure is in every way worthy of your regard. His kindness and affability are ever conspicuous, and were he with us upon the present occasion he would do his utmost to make you even more enjoy each other's society than you appear to do, notwithstanding the shortcomings of your entertainment; he would even make you satisfied with your dinner, bad as it has been. In the compliment which he has paid to Lord Panmure, the R.W. Prov. G.M. has undeservedly left himself in the back ground, for, notwithstanding his modesty, it is well known in the province that he is pre-eminently a ladies' man. To pass to another subject, the health of the humble individual who now addresses you, I have to return you my most heartfelt thanks. Some of you may not be aware that I have held in the course of my Masonic career, the office of Provincial Grand Superintendent of Works in Kent. That honour I highly prize, and deeply feeling the friendship with which I am greeted here, permit me to assure you of my determination to do at all times whatever may be in my power to promote the prosperity of this province. (Cheers).

Bro. Harvey Boys, D. Prov. G.M., in a most eloquent address proposed the health of the R.W. Prov. Grand Master. After alluding briefly and forcibly to the private worth of that dignitary, Bro. Boys continued—Bro. Furton Cooper has superintended the affairs of this province for upwards of seven years; he came among us in the first instance as a stranger, but soon became our trusted and respected friend; and year by year have we seen how the Craft has prospered under his management. I will not further allude to his distinguished literary talents, to his social and domestic virtues, or to his Masonic standing—they are known to you all. I trust that he may be long spared to rule this province with that firmness and also with that suavity which has so conspicuously marked his conduct of our public affairs. I am unable to express either my own feelings or yours in language befitting the theme. In your reception of this toast I trust you will render to your estimable Provincial Grand Master your sincere thanks, expressed not only by your Kentish fire, but deeply felt in the heart of every one of you, giving due regard to his paternal and affectionate care of the Craft in this province. (Tremendous cheering).

The R.W. Prov. Grand Master—Brethren, I should almost be overwhelmed with this testimony of your regard, were it not for the gratifying fact that I have in a measure become accustomed to it from its frequent repetition. Often as I have addressed you, it has not weakened my impression that it is worth a princess's dowry to have the applause of a hundred Kentish men, or men of Kent. If faithful service to you for the last eight years can give me any claim to the title, you will allow me to express my pride in being a Kentish man; and I may inform you that I expect from day to day to find myself the grandfather of a Kentish man. I trust, to the best of my ability, to continue to perform the duties of the high office with which I have been entrusted, to the satisfaction of my brethren and to the furtherance of the dignity and welfare of the Order. During the seven years for which I have presided over you, nothing disagreeable has ever occurred either to you or to me in Masonic matters. Every brother knows that I am always accessible to smooth the path of Masons in any difficulty. I drink all your good healths, married and unmarried, and the health of your wives and sweethearts. (Great cheering).

The Prov. Grand Master very briefly proposed the health of the D. Prov. G.M., Bro. Harvey Boys, and the rest of the Prov. Grand Officers.

The Deputy Prov. Grand Master shortly returned thanks, and said he hoped the Prov. Grand Master and the brethren would not have any cause to repent the appointment of Deputy Prov. Grand Master. It would not be for want of care or energy, if he (Bro. Boys) did not give them satisfaction. There was the less fear of his going wrong, however, since the Prov. Grand Master had expressed his intention of doing all that was to be done himself, without the assistance of a deputy. Nevertheless the brethren might rest well assured that he and his brother Grand Officers would do their duty upon every occasion to the best of their ability. (Cheers).

The Prov. Grand Master next gave the healths of the Prov. G. Treas., Bro. Saunders; the Prov. G. Chaplain, Bro. Batchelor; and their indefatigable Prov. G. Sec., Bro. Charles Isaacs. (Hear, hear).

The Rev. Bro. Batchelor in reply said, that if the services of himself and the two other brothers named had contributed to the welfare of Masonry, they were proud of it; if he or his brethren had contributed to the innocent gratification of the brethren, he as a clergyman was glad of it. They should pass through life in the hope that they might live as brethren, and eventually die and reign.

"Prosperity to the Union Lodge" and "The Ladies" followed, and the party broke up at eight o'clock.

There was some good singing during the evening by Bros. Fielding and Elton Williams, assisted by Miss Harrington and Mr. Champion.

MARGATE.—Union Lodge (No. 149).—On Monday, the 18th instant, an emergency meeting of this Lodge was held at the Assembly Rooms, Margate, for the initiation of Mr. Gore. The Lodge was opened at eleven o'clock, and the ceremony was ably performed by the W.M., Bro. Feakin, assisted by his officers. The Lodge was then closed in due form, and the brethren adjourned to the Provincial Grand Lodge.

LANCASHIRE (WEST).

LIVERPOOL.—Merchants' Lodge (No. 294).—The usual monthly meeting of this Lodge was held on Tuesday, the 12th instant, at the Temple Hope-street. The motion to present Bro. Gambell, P. Prov. G.P., and Sec. to the West Lancashire Masonic Institution for the education and advancement in life of children of distressed Masons, with a testimonial in acknowledgment of his valuable services to the Lodge, &c., was moved by the J.W., and carried unanimously. The Lodge then presented £10 towards the fund, which now reaches £75. Bro. Gambell, however, refused to accept of anything, but the brethren persisted in their determination, notwithstanding, and the subscription list is still open to contributors.

LIVERPOOL.—Mariners' Lodge (No. 310).—On Thursday, the 7th inst., this Lodge held its usual monthly meeting at the Temple, Hope-street, when there was a large gathering of the members of the Lodge, as well as visiting brethren. The principal business of the meeting was the installation of the W.M. elect, Bro. Henry Lumb, who after being duly installed, presented Bro. J. Pepper, jun., with the S.W.'s collar, and Bro. Jas. Swift with the J.W.'s collar, and then proceeded to appoint his other officers. Mr. Craine and Mr. R. Lumb were afterwards initiated by the W.M. in an efficient manner, at the conclusion of which the brethren were called off to refreshment, and proceeded to Waterloo to Bro. Martin Condliffe's, Queen's Hotel. The Worshipful Master took the chair, and after an excellent dinner gave "The Queen," "The Prince Consort," "Albert Prince of Wales," &c., which were enthusiastically received. The Worshipful Master said it was well known to all Masons that the M.W.G.M. of England required no praise from him. It was quite sufficient to state he was a Mason at heart. (Cheers). The health of Lord Panmure, R.W.D.G.M., was afterwards given, and was warmly received. Bros. Le Gendre N. Starkie, R.W. Prov. G.M. of West Lancashire, and Sir Thos. Hesketh, Bart., R.W.D. Prov. G.M., next received the attention of the meeting, and their names were received with great applause. Bro. Hamer replied to the toast of the Prov. Grand Officers, and said, although called upon he could not do full justice to the toast; he could speak in the highest terms of his colleagues as to their willingness to do all they could for Freemasonry, and he trusted that all would emulate him in the endeavour to attain an office in Grand Lodge, which was open to all. The Worshipful Master gave "Bro. the Right Hon. Lord Skelmersdale, patron of the Lodge of Instruction," and said, the Lodge of Instruction had done a great deal for him, and therefore he would advise all to join who were desirous of becoming efficient Masons. He would couple with the toast the name of Bro. Pepper, who was principal of the Lodge. Bro. Pepper in reply said, that they not only taught the working of a Lodge, but they discussed all matters connected with the Craft, as well as tested in debate the wisdom of our ancestors in the compilation of the Book of Constitutions. He urged in conclusion, the attention of the Craft to this important adjunct to the Order, and spoke in favourable terms of their patron, Lord Skelmersdale. Bro. Wade, W.M. of No. 1,062, replied to the toast of the Prov. Grand Masters of East Lancashire and Cheshire, and in speaking of Lord Combermere, said he was as good a Mason as any in England, for he was not only distinguished as a Mason in Lodge, but out of the Lodge, and his efforts in the cause were well seconded by Lady Combermere. Several other toasts were given and responded to, and the brethren returned to Liverpool by the ten o'clock train.

NORTHUMBERLAND.

NEWCASTLE-UPON-TYNE.—St. Peter's Lodge (No. 706).—The brethren of this Lodge met in their Lodge room, Byker, near Newcastle-upon-Tyne, on Monday, the 11th inst., it being the day appointed for the installation of the W.M. elect, Bro. James Elliott; and also the annual festival. Bro. Elliott was most ably and impressively installed by Bro. E. D. Davis, P.S.G.W. of the province. The W.M. then appointed and invested the following brethren as officers for the ensuing year, viz.:—Bros. H. G. Ludwig, P.M.; B. J. Thompson, S.W.; Joseph Cook, J.W.; John Cook, Treasurer; Joseph Sheppard, Secretary; G. H. Dixon, S.D.; Thos. Harper, J.D.; — Ryder, S.S.; Gens Gensen, J.S.; Alex. Dickson, I.G.; J. Miller, Tyler. The brethren afterwards dined together in the Lodge room, the W.M. presiding, supported on his right by the following Past Masters—Bros. Edw. Dean Davis, Henry Bell, Thos. Alexander, and James Prendergast; and on his left by Past Masters H. G. Ludwig, Wm. Berkley, A. Clapham, Geo. Weatherhead, Septimus Bell, W. E. Franklin, and Robert Fisher. The vice-chairs were ably filled by the Senior and Junior Wardens. Supporting the Wardens, and in various parts of the room, we observed Past Masters John Barker, John Hopper, John Cook, Herman Saniter, McFarlane, Vincent; and also Bros. A. Gillespie, S.W., No. 24; W. Newton, No. 24; S. Joel, P.S.W., No. 614; Gabriel Wood; Sheppard; Guy, No. 1025; Gensen; Watkin; and others. Grace having been said, and the cloth removed, the W.M., in a right loyal speech, proposed "The health of her most gracious Majesty the Queen." Anthem—"God save the Queen." Then followed, in rapid succession, the following toasts:—"Zetland and Panmure;" "Athol and Leinster;" "The Rev. Geo. Challoner Ogle, Prov. G.M., Northumberland; and Richard Metcalf, D. Prov. G.M. of the province." The last toast particularly met with a most enthusiastic reception. The W.M. then proposed "The Grand Officers of the province," coupling with the toast the health of Bro. E. J. Thompson, Prov. G. Secretary. Bro. Thompson having replied, Bro. Davis rose to propose the health of the W.M. A young Mason, the W.M. had rapidly risen to eminence; but he would certainly not have attained his present very high position, had it not been on account of his Masonic merits. The Lodge was now in a state of great prosperity, and augured well for the future. It would hardly become him (Bro. Davis) to make a long speech on that occasion, for the W.M. was best known to the brethren of the St. Peter's, who had testified their high regard by choosing him to rule the destinies of the Lodge during the year. The toast was most rapturously received, and drunk with Masonic and musical honours. The W.M. replied. He said it was a proud day which witnessed his installation as W.M. of St. Peter's Lodge. It was also a great pleasure for him to look back, for he had always endeavoured to perform his various duties properly. He trusted the Lodge under his rule would continue to prosper. He should endeavour to maintain the dignity of the chair. He hoped to see present on many occasions those brethren who had honoured them with their presence that day. Bro. E. J. Thompson proposed the health of Bro. E. D. Davis, P.S.G.W., who had kindly consented to perform the ceremony of installation. Bro. Davis was well qualified by his Masonic knowledge to perform any Masonic duty and ever ready to do so. Bro. Davis thanked them for the very flattering reception his health had met with at their hands, and Bro. Thompson in particular, for the very handsome encomiums, which, however, he was afraid were undeserved. (No, no). He was always glad to render any services to the Craft, but was sorry to say his other avocations prevented him joining them on many interesting occasions. Bro. Davis then rose to propose the health of Bro. H. G. Ludwig, the immediate P.M. of the Lodge. (Cheers.) Twelve months ago, he (Bro. Davis) prognosticated for Bro. Ludwig a most prosperous and happy reign, and he had not been mistaken. The wise rule of Bro. Ludwig had given the highest satisfaction to every member of the Lodge. Now that Bro. Ludwig was about to retire comparatively into private life, he hoped he would still keep a parent's watchfulness over his Masonic children. A more worthy Mason, or one more beloved than Bro. Ludwig, did not exist. He trusted they would drink the health in a bumper. (Applause.) Bro. Ludwig rose to reply, but was unable to obtain a hearing for some time, so hearty was the greeting of his brethren. He said he felt deeply grateful for the warm way in which they had responded to his health. During his year of office it had been his endeavour to be present at every meeting, and had never been absent except through ill health. They had been very prosperous, and had had a most harmonious year. The W.M. then gave the "Present Officers of No. 706," coupling the health of Bro. Jos. Cook, J.W. Bro. Cook replied, promising, on behalf of his brother officers and himself, a strict fulfilment of their several duties. The W.M. next proposed "the Visitors," with the health of Bro. Newton, (cheers), whom they were all most happy to see present on that festive occasion. He hoped Bro. Newton would often favour them with his presence. Bro. Newton, in reply, said he could hardly say that he was unaccustomed to public speaking, though he was not accustomed to speak on Freemasonry. (Hear, hear.) He thought, however, he should scarcely err did he quote the sacred writings, and say, "Behold how beautiful a thing it is for brethren to dwell together in unity!" Bro. Cook, P.M., proposed the health of Bro. Berkley, P.M., who had filled the highest offices in Masonry, and in the Grand Lodge. (Cheers.) Bro. Berkley was a "good and true" Mason. (Drunk with musical honours.) Bro. Berkley most warmly thanked them. He had always felt a deep interest in St. Peter's Lodge. He (Bro. Berkley) was much afraid that he was getting into the "sere and yellow leaf" (No. no.) He trusted, however, long to be able to attend their festive gatherings. (Cheers.) The W.M. proposed "Lodge No. 24," coupling the health of Bro. John Barker, P.M. Bro. Barker replied in a neat speech. The toast, "Lodge No. 586, and the health of Bro. Saniter, W.M.," next followed. Bro. Saniter replied, assuring the W.M. and brethren of St. Peter's Lodge of the good fraternal feeling of the brethren of Lodge No. 586. Bro. Geysen replied to the joint toast of "Lodges Nos. 56 and 614." Bro. Berkley then rose, and said he had the health of a brother to propose, at the mention of whose name a thrill went through every Masonic heart, he meant Bro. Dalziel. Although Bro. Dalziel could not be present that day, it would ill become the brethren of St. Peter's to separate without drinking the health of the founder and first Master of the Lodge. When "Ichabod" seemed written over Freemasonry, Bro. Dalziel was in the foremost ranks of the Craft, and he had lived to see the reward of his labours. His long services should never be forgotten. In the absence of Bro. Dalziel, Bro. Fisher, P.M., replied. The toasts of Lodges Nos. 793, 957, and 985 were then given in due order. The "Health of Bro. John Cook, Treasurer of No. 706," elicited a suitable reply from that worthy brother. The brethren separated at a seasonable hour, many of them proceeding home, per train, to Newcastle. The dinner arrangements reflected much credit on the worthy hostess, Mrs. Allinson. Seldom has there been so influential a gathering in the north, and certainly never a more harmonious one.

SOMERSETSHIRE.

HUNTSFILL.—Rural Philanthropic Lodge (No. 367).—The annual festival and installation of Worshipful Master of this Lodge, took place on Friday, July 15th, 1859. The Lodge was opened by the W.M., Bro. C. Halliday. The letter received from Grand Lodge respecting the irregular meetings at Smyrna, was read. The Worshipful Master then resigned the chair to Bro. Henry Bridges, P.M., the Lodge being opened in the second and third degrees, Bro. W. H. Saunders was raised to the degree of Master Mason. Bro. Bridges then installed the W.M. elect, Bro. William Harwood. The W.M. invested the following officers:—Bro. C. Halliday, immediate P.M.; G. W. B. Kiallward, S.W.; Jos. Duke, J.W.; J. S. Broderip, Chaplain; J. Burnett, Treas.; H. Bridges, Sec.; T. Graham, S.D.; A. H. Walkley, J.D.; E. Philipps, I.G.; H. T. Swan, Dir. of Cers.; R. Hawkins, Steward; F. C. Hennes, Steward; W. Woodward, Tyler; H. G. Philipps, Asst. Tyler. The ceremony of installation was then finished, and the Lodge closed in due form and with solemn prayer.

YEovil.—Lodge of Brotherly Love (No. 412).—The attendance of brethren at the ordinary monthly meeting of this Lodge, held at the "Choughs" Hotel, on Wednesday, the 13th instant, was somewhat thin, and the business chiefly of a routine character. The principal transaction of interest or importance was the reading of a communication from the Board of General Purposes, containing the decision of that body on charges recently preferred against the Worshipful Master by Bro. Peach, Prov. S.G.W., on behalf of Bro. Cave. The various points in the charge were referred to, and commented upon, some being dismissed and others substantiated, and the Lodge, through its Worshipful Master, was reprimanded, and admonished to be more careful in future. The document was ordered to be entered on the minute book, in extenso. An invitation to attend the provincial gathering at Glastonbury, with an announcement of the running of excursion trains, were amongst the communications laid before the Lodge, and the usual arrangement for representation of the Lodge was made, several brethren announcing their intention of being amongst the visitors of the new Lodge to be consecrated on that occasion.

KNIGHTS TEMPLAR.

PROVINCIAL ENCAMPMENT.

WATFORD.—At a meeting of the members of this Encampment, held at Freemasons' Hall, in Watford, on Monday, July the 18th; present, the V.E. Fr. William Stuart, D.G.M., and Prov. G. Com. of Hertfordshire; Frs. George Francis, H. H. Burchell-Herne, Thomas Rogers, Capt. C. M. Layton, Jeremiah How, Charles Davey, Wm. Lloyd Birkbeck, James Burton, &c., the Encampment having been opened, and the minutes of the preceding convocation read, Capt. Layton, of the 25th regiment, P.E.C. of the Calpe Encampment, Gibraltar, was unanimously admitted a joining member. Fr. George Francis, E.C. elect, was presented by Fr. How to the V.E. Fr. Stuart, for installation, and was duly inducted into the chair. Comps. Thomas S. Barringer, of the Cyrus Chapter, and Henry George Warren, of the Polish Chapter, who had been balloted for at the previous meeting, being in attendance, were then admitted and installed as Knights of the Order, by Fr. Francis, Sir Knt. How acting as Expert, and Sir Knt. Hyde Pullen as Prelate. The E.C. then appointed as officers of the Encampment, Fr. Wm. Lloyd Birkbeck, 1st Capt.; Fr. H. Tootell, 2nd Capt.; Fr. T. A. Ward, Prelate and Chancellor; Fr. Burchell-Herne, Reg.; Fr. C. Davey, Expert; Frs. Barton and Barringer, Captains of Lines; and Fr. Warren, Standard Bearer. Fr. Thomas Rogers was unanimously re-elected Treasurer; and Thomas, Equerry. All business ended, the Frs. adjourned to the banquet, at which Fr. Francis presided; and in course of the evening, in proposing the health of the D. Grand Master of the Knights Templar, Fr. Francis referred to the great service rendered to every branch of Masonry by Fr. Stuart, but more especially in the province of Herta. He had attended and assisted in the business of the day, but his state of health did not allow his presence at the banquet. Fr. Burchell-Herne proposed the health of the E.C. of the Watford Encampment, Fr. Francis. They were fortunate in having a brother, who by his great attainments in Masonry had rendered valuable aid, and in Lodge, Chapter, and Encampment, was ever able and ever ready. The E.C. in a brief reply acknowledged the pleasure the abundant leisure he enjoyed afforded him in attending the meeting of his brethren. He then proposed "The Officers" appointed that day, and in referring to the merits of each, expressed his assurance of their faithful discharge of the duties that devolved upon them. Fr. Francis then gave a welcome to their visitor, Fr. Hyde Pullen, who as the D.G.M. of the Isle of Wight, had a wide reputation in the world of Masonry. Fr. Pullen in reply said he had availed himself of the opportunity that day afforded of renewing his acquaintance with the Watford brethren, having a pleasing remembrance of his previous visit. The E.C., in giving "The newly installed Knights," especially referred to Fr. Warren, who from his position as a Masonic critic, had an extensive acquaintance with the different bodies, and had done their Encampment the honour—and he certainly must say it was an honour—of receiving the light of the Knight Templar degree at Watford. The E.C. passed some complimentary remarks on the Freemasons' Magazine, and the general good spirit with which it was conducted, and concluded by expressing the pleasure the Knights had in receiving Fr. Warren amongst them. Fr. Warren having responded, the E.C. said they could not separate without expressing his thanks to Fr. How for the assistance he had rendered them in the performance of their rites and ceremonies that day; and that brother having acknowledged the greeting, a parting glass to all poor and distressed Knights Templar concluded a pleasant and satisfactory day.

ANCIENT AND ACCEPTED RITE.

SUPREME COUNCIL.

The Supreme Council of the 33rd degree for England and Wales held their quarterly communication at their Grand East, London, on Tuesday, the 12th instant. A Consistory of S.P.R.S. was afterwards held, at which the Ill. Bro. Dr. Thomas Bell Fletcher, of Birmingham, and Ill. Bro. the Rev. W. H. Wentworth Bowyer, were advanced to the 32nd degree. A Sov. Tribunal of Gr. Ins. Inq. Com. was then opened, and Ill. Bro. Dr. H. J. Hinxman, of Blackheath, and Ill. Bro. Dr. J. S. Keddell, of Sheerness, were admitted to that degree.

METROPOLITAN CHAPTER OF SOVEREIGN PRINCES ROSE CROIX OF HERODEM.

The half yearly convocation of this august Chapter was held at Freemasons' Tavern, on Tuesday, July 12th, and the attendance was much more numerous than on any former occasion. The Chapter was opened by the Ill. Bro. Dr. William Jones, M.W. Sov., and Ill. Bros. Dr. George Harcourt and Dr. George Keddell, his Generals. There were also present the Ill. Bros. H. Vigne; J. A. D. Cox; H. A. Bowyer, and G. B. Cole, Sov. G.I.G. of the 33° of the Supreme Council of the Ancient and Accepted Rite of England and Wales, also the Ill. Bro. Ferrier, 33° of the Grand Orient of France. The Ill. Bros. R. J. Spiers, H. C. Vernon, Hyde Pullen, Rev. Wentworth Bowyer, Dr. H. Goolden, and Dr. B. A. Kent, S.P.R.S. of the Consistory of the 32°, also Bro. Elisha Cooke, of the 32° of the Consistory of Louisville, U.S.; the Ill. Bros. Major H. Clerk, W. E. Walsley, Dr. Hinxman, and others of the Sov. Tribunal of the 31°, Lemanski, Spencer, Cauthon, How, Ranger, W. Smith and others.

The several brethren were announced by Bro. How, as Herald, and introduced to the M.W. Sov. in due form; the ceremonies being under the direction of the Ill. Bro. Hyde Clarke, S.P.R.S. 32° of the Grand Orient of France and England, assisted by Bros. Bernard and Braithwaite.

There were several brethren approved of for admittance into the degree, and the following being present, they were installed as Knights of the sublime degree of Rose Croix:—Bros. Charles Beaumont, William Blenkins, John Bernard Behrends, W. H. Cole, Capt. Glynn Grylle, C. Forbes Smith, Rev. C. M. Style, and T. M. Talbot. The ceremonial was most satisfactorily carried out on this occasion, and several improvements have been made by the committee entrusted with that important duty, under the active management of Bro. Hyde Clarke; the more noticeable was the perfection of the musical portions, which were conducted by the Ill. Bro. E. H. Horeley, Grand Organist, who was assisted by Bros. Fielding, Lockey, and Winn, and this certainly added to the imposing effect of the ritual.

The business of the installations being concluded, the report of the committee appointed to take into consideration sundry matters for improving and perfecting the Chapter, was read, and on the motion of Bro. Hyde Clarke, was adopted, and the committee was re-appointed.

The Ill. Bro. Dr. H. Goolden, the Treasurer, in presenting his accounts made some observations on the state of the funds, which were inadequate to the requirements of the Chapter, and concluded his remarks by giving notice of a motion to raise the annual subscription to one guinea.

The Chapter was closed in solemn form at seven o'clock, and the brethren adjourned to

THE BANQUET.

Bro. Jones, M.W. Sov., presided, surrounded by about thirty-six brethren.

On removal of the cloth the M.W. Sov. gave "The Queen," which toast is always received in this degree with enthusiasm, her majesty's father the late Duke of Kent, having especially patronized the Rose Croix, and presided as the M.W. Sov.

The M.W. Sov. in proposing "The Supreme Grand Council," referred to the excellent qualifications of the brethren who occupy that high office, and who, whether in Masonry or by their social position, have by their true Masonic virtues gained the esteem of all, and with the toast he coupled the name of Bro. G. B. Cole.

The Ill. Bro. Cole, in responding, said however gratified he might be in thus being selected, he could not but mention, as one more fitted for the distinction, Bro. Cox, who by his devotion to the Order and attention to the ceremonies was more entitled to it; but as he had been named, he would in reply for the Supreme Council say they were most anxious to further the cause of the high degrees; and with reference to what had already been done for the Chapter, the Supreme Council had lent its aid, and any further suggestions for improvements should have every consideration.

The Ill. Bro. Cox proposed "The Supreme Councils of France and other countries throughout the world," and in connexion the names of the Ill. Bros. Perrier and Eliaha Cooke.

The Ill. Bro. Perrier, in acknowledging the toast, referred to the great principles of Masonry being in France in the hands of one most capable of protecting and preserving them—the Prince Murat. In Ireland, the devotion of the Duke of Leinster was well known.

Bro. Cooke, in response for the Masonic body in the United States, and for the complimentary way in which his name had been associated with the toast, regretted he had not words to express his feelings for the honour he had received. He felt it more especially as he had never before had opportunity of witnessing the ceremonial so fully carried out as on that occasion. He was most grateful for the kind reception he had met in England, as everywhere the right hand of fellowship had been given to him.

The M.W. Sov. next gave "The Sublime Princes of the Royal Secret of the 32°" and with it connected the name of the Ill. Bro. Hyde Clarke, to whose care and knowledge they were indebted for the perfection with which the ritual had been carried out that day.

The Ill. Bro. Hyde Clarke, after acknowledging the complimentary remarks of the M.W. Sov., said that the Supreme Council having committed to him the conduct of the ceremonies, he was pleased to find his labours acknowledged. The Supreme Council had aided his efforts, which were directed to attaining his desire of making the Metropolitan the model Rose Croix Chapter; he referred to the active aid of Bro. Cox who, as one of the Council, had greatly assisted him. He thought they might say that day they had been enabled to have the rite celebrated with greater approach to perfection, and although not perfect, yet that something had been done. Bro. Clarke then alluded to his being about to leave England for a couple of years, and on his return he hoped, after the beginning of improvement, he should receive a satisfactory reply, to a question, What have you done? He next addressed himself to the brethren who had that day been admitted to the rite, and assured them that they had not witnessed an idle ceremony, but a most sublime allegory, and informed them that never since the days of Bro. Preston had this degree been so well carried out. Ere he concluded he wished to remind them that one duty ought never to be omitted—the collection of alms—the sacred calls of charity in every Masonic assembly should always be remembered. Obtaining permission to offer a toast, he proposed "The M.W. Sov., who then presided over them;" he referred to Bro. Jones' high attainments as a Mason in every degree, and especially to the dignified manner in which he had conducted the business; the high rank he had arrived at was the acknowledgment of his efficiency.

The Ill. Bro. Jones, in a brief reply, acknowledged the toast.

The Ill. Bro. Capt. Bowyer proposed the next toast, which was "The M.W. Sovs. of other Rose Croix Chapters," and in connecting with it the name of Bro. Hyde Pullen, he referred to the high Masonic attainments of that worthy brother, and his successful establishment of the Vectis Chapter.

The Ill. Bro. Hyde Pullen, in responding, regretted his want of language sufficiently eloquent to do justice to his feelings, in being thus particularly alluded to. He referred to his being fortunately Sovereign of the Chapter in the Isle of Wight, in the immediate neighbourhood of the residence of the Sovereign of the Order, with whose friendship he was honoured, and by whose instruction he was favoured. He was sure, had Dr. Leeson been present and witnessed the ceremonial, he would have been most gratified.

The M.W. Sov. next noticed the presence of another Ill. Bro. of the 32°, Bro. Spiers, whose long attachment to Masonry and efficient services, especially as D. Prov. Grand Master of the province of Oxford, known throughout the world.

The Ill. Bro. Spiers, in responding, said he could not but feel gratified in his being so noticed. He regretted that circumstances over which he had no control had prevented his attendance at the Metropolitan Chapter; he had been many years a member, but his province made many claims on his time.

To "The Visitors," Bro. William Smith, of the Invicta Chapter, replied.

The M.W. Sov. then gave "The health of those brethren who had been admitted to the degree that day," exhorting them to bear in mind the impressive allegorical lessons, and inculcate the virtues of faith, hope, and charity. With the toast he named Bro. Charles Beaumont, who in a few words tendered his grateful thanks for admission into the illustrious Order.

The M.W. Sov. then called attention to the claims of one to whom the Chapter was indebted for the care and judicious disbursement of its funds—the Ill. Bro. Dr. Goolden, who, as their Treasurer, was entitled to their warmest thanks.

To this the Ill. Bro. Goolden replied, and referred to what had been done for the improvement of the Chapter, and also to certain requirements.

The M.W. Sov. then, in acknowledgment of the services rendered by the Officers of the Chapter, referred to their several merits, and as his first General had left, he noticed the second Officer, and in Bro. Dr. Keddel they had a most efficient Mason, and who had that day been admitted to the 31°. Bro. Keddel replied, and referred to the fact of himself, a country Mason, having attained the high rank he held, as a proof of industry obtaining its reward.

The M.W. Sov. said that ere they separated he desired to acknowledge the service rendered by the Ill. Bro. Charles Horsley in his admirable conduct of the musical arrangements, and also to tender the thanks of the Chapter to the brethren whose vocal aid had so well assisted him, Bros. Fielding, Lockey, and Winn, which Bro. Horsley acknowledged.

The final toast, "To all poor and distressed Masons," concluded a most satisfactory meeting.

SCOTLAND.

GLASGOW.

TESTIMONIAL TO BRO. DONALD CAMPBELL.

On Thursday, July 7th, a number of the friends of Bro. Campbell, Treas. of the Celtic Society, met in the Restaurant Royal, Bank-place, Glasgow, for the purpose of presenting him with a full length portrait of himself, the work of Mr. Dewar, a local artist. Wm. Campbell, Esq., of Tilliechewan, late president of the Celtic Society, occupied the chair. The chairman gave the health of the guest, Bro. D. Campbell, and in doing so alluded to his services in connection with the society, in which they felt an interest, and to his industry and unwearied labours on its behalf.

Bro. Campbell in reply, said—Words are inadequate to express my feelings, not only, sir, from the kindly tone of language with which you have declared yourself, and the too flattering eulogium which you have passed upon me, but also the hearty response with which your sentiments were greeted. I say I am unable to find words to convey to you how much you have honoured me by this great, this invaluable testimony of your esteem and regard, a testimonial which I shall always feel a pride in having in my possession, as an evidence of the many warm and kind friends with whom I have had the pleasure of associating in matters connected with the Glasgow Celtic Society. When the suggestion was first made of having a society in connection with the city of Glasgow, I at once, and most willingly, contributed my mite towards its formation, intending then to remain a private member, and leave to those more qualified the duty and responsibility of managing its affairs; but when at the urgent request of some of the leading provisional executive I was induced to permit myself to be nominated as your Treasurer, it was in the belief that the duties would be slight, for certainly I had no idea that, in the short space of time that has elapsed since its formation, it would turn out the gigantic machine which it has proved itself to be, but having accepted the office I resolved that nothing would be wanting on my part to discharge the duties incumbent upon me as Treasurer, and if I have failed in any part thereof you must believe me sincere when I say that, if failure there be, it has been from want of ability, not want of will. I entertain, perhaps, too strong an opinion of what is due by those who accept of office, for I have always considered the acceptance as equal to a pledge of faithfully discharging the duties connected therewith, and whatever is to be done, ought, if it be within the reach of human nature, to be well done. I do most fervently trust that the beginning which the society has made, and the advantages which have already accrued from it, are but an earnest, a prelude to still greater advancements, and that ere long, combined with the energy, perseverance, and industry of its executors, and supported by the influence and encouragement of its members it will continue to prosper, and attain such a pinnacle as could not have been dreamed of by even its most sanguine projectors. I have been led away, with my anxiety for the society, from the subject which has brought us here this evening, and believe me that I do most gratefully thank you for this renewed expression of your friendship, and to assure one and all of the subscribers that this testimonial is one which I shall faithfully treasure as a lasting memorial of my connection with the society. Most of the members I personally knew, and was acquainted with, but their and my connection with the society has cemented acquaintanceship into friendship—friendship which I fervently trust will remain unbroken during the tenure of our sojourn on earth. Gentlemen, from the bottom of my heart I once again do most gratefully and fervently thank you for this magnificent present.

Baillie McGregor gave "The artist, Mr. Dewar," and in doing so spoke highly of the merits of the portrait as a work of art.

Mr. Dewar having replied, other toasts followed, peculiar to the gathering of Highlanders, and the proceedings were as business-like as they were characterized by Celtic warmth.

The presentation thus made does infinite credit to the subscribers. In Bro. Campbell, as the object of their regards, they have recognized a man of wide sympathies, of intense humanity, and fine enthusiasm. Well known as a distinguished ornament in the Masonic world, he is no less popular as a generous and public spirited citizen, in whom everybody has a friend—the poorest a benefactor. Mr. Dewar has hit off Bro. Campbell right well. In the "garb of old Gaul," he is represented as leaning upon a piece of rock, edging itself out above a thistle or so, in front of a lake in the midst of a heath. The plaid is inimitable as a work of art. The landscape, in which Bro. Campbell is the prominent figure, is well conceived and finely coloured, and although exception might be taken to the picture in minor detail, it is on the whole a production an honour to Mr. Dewar, and a credit to the art achievements of the city.

MASONIC FESTIVITIES.

KENT.

THEATRE ROYAL, MARGATE.—On Monday, the 18th instant, the performances at this theatre were under the immediate patronage of the Provincial Grand Master, Bro. Purton Cooper, Q.C., and the Provincial Grand Lodge of Kent, and a few minutes after eight o'clock the house was crowded by the brethren and their ladies, with an admiring crowd of other spectators, the Masons appearing in their full paraphernalia. The performances consisted of Tobin's excellent comedy "The Honey-moon," which was played exceedingly well; indeed a provincial theatre can seldom boast so good a working company as Bro. Thorne, the enterprising lessee, has brought together—the dresses and scenery are both good and elegant, and the house has been very tastefully and prettily re-decorated for the present season. A variety of singing and dancing followed, and the whole concluded with Charles Selby's "Bonnie Fish Wife," in which Miss Oliver's original character was sustained by Miss Emily Thorne, the daughter of the manager, who looked as pretty and sang the music as well as her London predecessor. The whole of the characters, both in the comedy and the farce, were very judiciously sustained without the least vulgarity, and the audience were greatly pleased. We can assure visitors to Margate that Bro. Thorne's efforts to please them deserve their support, and we hope will obtain it.

THE WEEK.

THE COURT.—Her Majesty, with her children and the Prince Consort, have been all the week at Osborne enjoying the sea breezes in the most complete privacy. The Duchesse of Kent is stopping on a visit to the Queen, and Prince Alfred has also arrived on leave of absence from the Bergalis. Rides and drives daily in the neighbourhood of Osborne, and an occasional water excursion in the Fairy, diversify the royal amusements. Her Majesty has received no company all the week.

FOREIGN NEWS.—The Emperor of the French arrived at St. Cloud on Sunday. If we may judge from the tone of the Siecle, which is the organ of the working classes, the peace which the emperor has concluded will not be well received by the advocates for the independence of Italy in France. On Monday an interview took place between M. Walewski, Lord Cowley, and Prince de Reuss, who acts as Prussian ambassador in the absence of Count Pourtales, and M. de Kisseleff, their excellencies having received an invitation from the French foreign minister requesting them to call upon him. On Tuesday the emperor gave audience to the members of the senate and the legislative body, and received the felicitations of their respective presidents, and in replying thereto explained the reasons which had induced him to stop in his successful career in Italy, and to conclude a peace. The peace is the subject of various epigrams by the Parisians, the expression of the liberals being that the emperor had gone to Italy to shuffle the cards. None of the matériel of war is to be removed from Italy.—Throughout Italy a feeling of alarm and distrust has resulted from the peace; and an address to Victor Emmanuel is circulated throughout his kingdom, and has already received numerous signatures. The address is couched in terms of loyal condolence. A telegram from Turin, of the 15th inst., states that Turin was illuminated, and that the king and the emperor presented themselves several times on the balcony of the royal palace, and were enthusiastically cheered. The emperor left at six in the morning for Nusa. The latest intelligence from Turin shows alarming indications of the popular feeling in reference to the peace, which has so bitterly disappointed the expectations of the people. Count Cavour was the "observed of all observers," and was received with enthusiasm. The Sardinian governor of Lombardy has warned the bishops of Milan and Pavia against officiating, lest they might be insulted by the people. The excitement in Milan is represented as of the most intense character—a general disgust being manifested at the so called peace. The governor of Lombardy has addressed a circular to the editors of the journals, calling upon them to assume sentiments of moderation, and warning them that he will order the suspension of any journal which may utter invectives against the recent events, by which, at the same time, the king and his august ally may be attacked. The new Sardinian ministry is formed. Sig. La Marmora is Minister of War and President of the Council; General Dabormida, Foreign Affairs; Sig. Ratazzi, Interior; Sig. Egtana, Finance; Marquis Monticelli, Public Works; and Sig. Miglietti, Justice. —The Emperor of Austria arrived at Laybach on Saturday, and at Laxenburg the same evening. The Austrian Lloyd's steamers recommenced running on Saturday. An imperial manifesto, signed at the Castle of Laxenburg, has been published. It frankly explains that the motive for the conclusion of peace was the holding back of the natural allies, whose mediation promised less favourable conditions than a direct understanding. The manifesto also states that reforms conformable to the spirit of the times shall be made in the public laws and administration. From Vienna we learn that M. de Hubner will shortly resume his post as Austrian ambassador at Paris. In an extraordinary sitting of the Federal Diet, Austria communicated the preliminaries of the peace, and proposed that the contingents should be returned and the federal fortresses restored to a peace footing.—The Royal Chief Bank of Berlin has lowered its discount for bills from 5 per cent. to 4 per cent., and the Lombards discount from 6 to 5 per cent. The Prussian Gazette publishes a leading article to prove that Prussia had prevented a universal war by the policy she adopted during the last few months. The proposals for mediation made by Prussia were far more favourable than the preliminaries of peace which have now been agreed upon. Prussia has no occasion to be dissatisfied with the unexpected turn matters have taken. Whilst discontinuing her military measures she awaits the further development of affairs with calmness.—The following order of the day to the army has been published by the Prince Regent:—"At the moment when war broke out between two neighbouring great powers, I had ordered the army to be placed in readiness for war, in order to maintain that position of power which belongs to Prussia. The danger which threatened us then is over. While you were still marching to occupy positions I had ordered for you, the belligerent powers suddenly concluded peace. Your advance had shown our firm resolution to maintain our frontiers and those of Germany inviolate, whatever might be the destinies of war. You have shown the readiness I had expected from you, and have maintained in general a dignity worthy of the name of Prussia. You have made many personal sacrifices, and I express to you my full satisfaction." The Prussian Gazette says that Marshal Wrangel has been relieved from the command in chief of the army which was to have been concentrated on the Rhine.—The Federal Council of Switzerland has charged Major Latour with an extraordinary mission to Naples. He will repair to his destination via Marseilles to meet the so-called Swiss, who have been dismissed in consequence of the recent disturbances. He will order them to state to what nation they belong, and has received positive instructions to put an end if possible to a state of things which is so painful to his country, and to render a return to their native land possible to those who may desire again to become subjects of Switzerland.—Royal letters patent, dated the 18th inst., order that the extraordinary assembly of the states of Holstein is not to take place.—Intelligence of the death of the Queen of Portugal has been received.—The Greek government is stated to have decided on the abolition of the sliding scale for the corn duties.—The Persia, which left New York on the 6th, has arrived at Liverpool. She brings no political news of importance. The anniversary of the American independence was celebrated as usual throughout the States. In Mexico the position of the contending parties is represented as unfavourable, and crowds of emigrants were returning to California. Mr. H. Northall, the acting British vice-consul at the port of Gloucester, Massachusetts, had committed suicide.

COLONIAL.—The Magdalena has arrived at Southampton from the West Indies. She reports that there is some chance of the Paramatta (the running on shore of which has been announced) being saved. As soon as intelligence was announced at St. Thomas's, all the company's fleet left for the scene of the catastrophe, but were of no service. West India Islands generally healthy. Trade dull. Crops below average.

HOME NEWS.—Cabinet councils have been held twice this week at Lord Palmerston's official residence in Downing-street.—A banquet was given to the Earl of Derby and the Right Hon. B. Disraeli, at Merchant Tailors' Hall, on Saturday evening. As a demonstration of the perfect harmony which reigns among the Conservative party, and of the attachment they bear to their chiefs, it was as successful as their best friends could desire.—The City Commissioners of Sewers met on Wednesday at Guildhall. The general purposes committee presented a report on a minute referred to them respecting an intention of the Metropolitan Board of Works to apply to parliament for powers to levy rates by their own collectors. The general purposes committee thought there was no ground for a step. Report agreed to. A petition to the House of Commons against the bill for preventing the erection of illuminated indicators was agreed to, and the court adjourned.—The return of the Registrar-General gives a very unfavourable view of the health of the metropolis for the past week, the deaths numbering 1,400, an excess of 300 over the estimated average. The mortality from diarrhoea has rapidly increased during the last four weeks, and last week the disease was fatal to 264 persons, the larger proportion of them being infants and young children. Dr. Letheby reports a slight increase in the mortality of the City.—At the Court of Bankruptcy, another petition has been presented against the Metropolitan Saloon Omnibus Company, praying for a winding-up order, which, it is thought, will not be resisted.—At the Winchester Assizes, Henry Benjamin Haynes, a private in the 9th foot, was convicted of the wilful murder of Mary McGowan by cutting her throat, under shocking circumstances. The learned judge (Baron Bramwell), when the jury returned a verdict of guilty, passed sentence of death upon him, adding that he could not hold out the least hope of mercy. The prisoner heard his doom unmoved.—Michael Herring was charged before Alderman Phillips, at Guildhall, with having entered the house of Mr. Dale, 8, Shoe-lane, and seized Harriet Edwards, his servant, by the throat, when she was rescued from his violence by two workmen in the house. The prisoner was pursued and taken, but he declared his innocence. He was remanded.—At the Middlesex Sessions, Mary Ann Ullmer and Amelia Switzer have been convicted of robbing their master, Alexander Dalrymple Bell, of articles of silk. The case was chiefly remarkable on account of the prisoner Ullmer's daughter being brought forward as a witness to convict her. The assistant judge commented with just severity on the conduct of Ullmer, who had employed her own daughter in the disposal of the stolen property. The prisoners were sentenced to two years' hard labour.—A man named Wilthew, living at Jarrow, near Shields, on Tuesday morning murdered his wife by cutting her throat, and he afterwards inflicted a deep wound on his own throat, but it is of such a nature that he is expected to recover. It is stated that he voluntarily admitted that he had committed the crime charged against him. Jealousy is supposed to be the cause, but there appeared to be no reason for it. There was nothing in his recent conduct to lead to a suspicion that he intended to commit such a crime. The police have taken charge of him and the razors with which he did these foul deeds.—The fluctuations in the funds yesterday were generally unimportant, and consols for money and the account left off at 95½ to ½. The tendency in the other markets were not encouraging, and quotations exhibited an appearance of dulness in the later hours of business. The increased purchases of silver for remittance abroad have created renewed withdrawals from the bank, and £90,000 was taken with this object yesterday. The effect of these transactions, in the absence of arrivals, is to increase uneasiness lest a fresh drain should set in.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.—In the HOUSE OF LORDS, on Monday, the Earl of Malmesbury asked whether the despatch which appeared in the papers that day, addressed by Lord John Russell, on the 22nd of June, to the government at Berlin, advising Prussia not to enter into the war, was authentic. Lord Wodehouse said the despatch was in substance correct. The Earl of Malmesbury pointed out the difference between his course and that of Lord John Russell. He said that he simply informed Prussia that England would give her no assistance if she went to war; Lord John Russell appeared to acknowledge a necessity for Prussia to go to war. Lord Cranworth called the attention of the house to the fourth report of the commissioners for consolidating the statute law, which led to a long discussion. On Tuesday, Lord Stanley of Alderley presented a petition from bankers, merchants and others in favour of direct telegraphic communication between this country and her possessions abroad. It was most important, he contended, that we should have in our hands a direct telegraphic communication with India. The Earl of Ellenborough said it was intolerable that we should be dependent on foreigners for such communications. Earl Granville admitted the importance of the subject, which should, he said, receive the fullest consideration.—In the HOUSE OF COMMONS on Monday, the Chancellor of the Exchequer brought forward his financial statement, of which the following are the salient points:—The estimates of Mr. Disraeli for last year calculated the income of the country at the sum of £68,920,000, but the actual amount received £65,477,000. The expenditure was actually £64,668,000, leaving, in round numbers, a surplus of £800,000. The defences of the country had led to an augmentation of the army and navy estimates to the extent of £5,180,000, and the question to be considered was, how was this to be met, whether we should raise the money by borrowing or by taxation. The right honourable gentleman contended that it would not be right to borrow in time of peace to meet so small a deficiency, and as the minister for India would probably have to go into the market for a loan, he had no wish to enter into competition with him. He proposed a modification of the present malt credits by taking away six weeks' credit out of the eighteen now allowed them, allowing, however, 4 per cent. on the cash paid. He thought it wrong that government should, in effect, find the maltsters capital to trade with, and as soon as matters should properly adjust themselves, another step might be taken in the same direction. By this means he hoped to bring a sum of £780,000 this year into the exchequer, which would leave about four millions to be provided. He proposed to raise this sum by an augmentation of the income tax. An additional 4d. in the pound would yield over the four millions, and in proposing that amount he proposed to re-introduce the distinction between incomes over and incomes under £150 per annum. He proposed that an additional 1½d. should be placed on incomes under £150 a year, while those over should pay an additional 4d.; and he also proposed that this increase should have a retrospective effect from the commencement of the financial year. There would, he calculated, be a small surplus of £253,000. The right hon. gentleman concluded by submitting two resolutions to the committee relating to the income tax, and one resolution relating to the malt duties, but said he would not ask for any opinion upon them until the discussion should be resumed on a future evening. Mr. Roebuck spoke feelingly of the hardship and gross injustice of the tax to professional men, who might be exposed by paralysis to a large loss of their ordinary income. It was unfair to tax professional income and property in a similar ratio. On Tuesday, Mr. Buxton called the attention of the house to that portion of the report of the commissioners on the organization of the Indian army which refers to the amount of force to be maintained in future. He thought there was enormous risk in placing arms in the hands of 300,000 natives. Lord Stanley said he did not believe it was possible to lay down any rule as to the amount of force which would be required in India. At present the native force was very large, but that was owing to the exceptional state of affairs in India at the moment, and gave no criterion as to what might be requisite in future. Colonel Sykes contended that 50,000 British troops would be amply sufficient for India, and the finances of the country would not bear a heavier burden. Mr. Bright said that at the present moment this Indian question was of more importance than either that of the Reform Bill or the budget, and therefore it was that he wished to press it strongly on the Secretary for India. Sir C. Wood expressed his anxiety to bring the whole financial state of India before the house. On Wednesday Mr. Black moved the second reading of the Edinburgh, &c., Annuity, Tax Abolition Bill, and described the tax as one founded on injustice, compelling the majority to pay for the benefit of the minority. They had looked out for a substitute, and had proposed what they considered a fair and adequate one. Sir G. C. Lewis said the question was by no means a new one, for former governments had agreed in the principle of bills similar to that now before the house. He should vote for the second reading of the bill on the understanding that it should go no further during the present session. The Lord Advocate hoped the discussion would not be continued, but that both sides of the house would unite in endeavouring to effect a settlement of this question. Mr. Newdegate could not vote for the second reading of a bill which proposed the total abolition of this tax without providing a substitute. If the government were prepared to take service under the hon. member for Birmingham, he would do all in his power to make them wear the livery of that service. Mr. Black then said he would accept the government proposition; but Mr. Bright advised the hon. gentleman not to trust in government. A government had undertaken to bring in a church-rate bill, but their interference had only made a mess of it, which disgusted both sides of the house. The house then divided, and the second reading of the bill was carried by a majority of 162 to 108. The Adulteration of Food, &c., Prevention Bill, the Metropolis Carriage-ways Bill, and the Public Improvements Bill, were severally withdrawn. The Imprisonment for Small Debts Bill was read a second time.

PUBLIC AMUSEMENTS.

DRURY LANE THEATRE.—The enterprising lessee of this theatre has determined upon giving the million the benefit of the splendid company which he has brought together, by reducing his tariff of admission to a price within the reach of the very humblest. Half-a-crown, two shillings, one shilling, and, for the gods, sixpence—are all that the great "E. T." demands for the enjoyment of the dulcet strains of Titiens, Giuliani, Guarducci, and Mongini, with their legion of co-operators. Whether this can ever pay, we doubt; and have come to the conclusion that it is merely a grateful donation to the public from the manager as a return for the mountains of gold which he is notoriously known to have extracted from them; added to an irresistible impulse of benevolence prompting him to make the whole world of London participators (if they please), in those refined gratifications which have hitherto been confined to the aristocracy alone.

HAYMARKET THEATRE.—Our worthy Bro. Buckstone took his benefit as announced, this day week, and notwithstanding the sultry weather, the house was crowded. The principal novelty was a facetious, but withal sensible address from the manager, which we regret our space will not permit us to give.

ADSLPH.—The press upon our space must be our apology for deferring our notice of the new and successful burlesque, "The Babe in the Wood." Several other novelties have been produced.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

ERRATUM.—By a printer's error in our report of the Prov. Grand Lodge of Sussex, we were made to describe Bro. Dobie as a Prov. Grand Registrar, instead of Past Grand Registrar. The Editor was away from town at the time of going to press.

CLASSICAL THEOLOGY.

APOLLO AND MAY.

"Inventum medicina meum est, opiferaque, per orbem Dicor, et herbarum est subjecta potentia nobis."—Metam., i.

To those who are conversant with the writings of the poets, May is the most lovely month of the year: Virgil places the creation, "when first arose this world's all beautiful frame," in it. Lucretius says it is "led on by Venus." Milton goes to "Pan,

"Knit with the graces and the hours in dance," to bring the "eternal spring." The feelings and scenes of "the spot,

"Where spring its earliest visit paid," in those seasons gone by, the May days of our youth, ought never to be forgotten—like the sunshine and the shower in after life their reminiscences will enliven the gloom of our solitude and cheer our mourning, or enlighten or delight the little rising waves around us as we sink into the ocean of life. The month takes its name from Maia, one of the Pleiades and the beautiful mother of Hermes the god of rhetoric and oratory, according to the Greeks (better known to us by his name of Mercury); and for this reason the offering of sacrifices was made to him in this month; which, nevertheless, as it regards us here, belongs to no other than the perfect and powerful, ever young and ever glorious Apollo himself, who was advanced for his brilliant talents and inventions to the highest honour and worship.

But we have not to consider how he became immortalized; but rather how he was made one of the "gods of the nations."

We have ourselves our own liking for poetry in art as well as in nature; either as seen in a sculpture, a painting, or a poem. Wherefore the personal representation of a faculty or of a likeness, for instance—an image of science or of a sage, of faith, or of a fate—we can highly appreciate and value; and in this respect we are often running after and courting and being enamoured of the heathen gods and goddesses. Indeed, in the absence of the fourth commandment, we on the whole might be making unto ourselves "any likeness of any thing that is in the heaven above, or that is in the earth beneath, or that is in the water under the earth," to bow ourselves down "to them," and "serve them." Nay, like the infidel and the savage, as a people unto this day, we might not be forgetting to reconcile the universal great Spirit of Evil with gifts, and with supplications, and with prayers. We should not perhaps have given it a pagoda to live in, but it would have had its temple, were it not for what we are about to explain.

In speaking of the Evil Spirit, as likewise of the Holy Spirit, the meaning is generally received in the singular instead of its plural sense, as if there were only one good and one bad spirit in the world mystified by an ubiquity, in which case there could be no angels of either denomination, dark or light, which we believe there are; and we wish to make "the Truth and the Word plain." It did not escape the observation of Erasmus, when he was in this country, that our "ancient custom of blowing horns on the first (old date) of May," was retained from some festivals in honour of Diana; nor did he fail to notice the ceremony of depositing a deer's head (also an Ethnic observance in honour of that goddess), "on the altar of St. Paul's church," which was built, as appears from a record in a Cottonian manuscript, "by King Ethelbert, of Kent, upon the site of a temple of Diana, in the time of Melitus, the first bishop of London."

Now, we see—without the Almighty Trinity in Unity—had not the Romans subjugated the Jews—we should still be hearing the rebellious complaint, "We will certainly do whatsoever thing goeth forth out of our own mouth, to burn incense to the queen of heaven, and to pour out drink offerings unto her, as we have done, we, and our fathers, our kings, and our princes, in the cities of Judah, and in the streets of Jerusalem; for then had we plenty of victuals, and were well, and saw no evil. But since we left off to burn incense to the queen of heaven, and to pour out drink offerings unto her, we have wanted all things, and have been consumed by the sword and by the famine." We say, we should in all likelihood, in this country, have had some Nebuchadnezzar setting up his image, and decreeing, "Whoso falleth not down and worshippeth shall the same hour be cast into the midst of a burning fiery furnace." At all events, in every point of probability (albeit we would render honour where honour is due), we should have a Pagan priesthood consecrating the statues that are set up in Europe, and where they are equestrian we should be made, or should be found fools enough, not only to worship the rider, but also the horse. This, to our thinking, is a convincing evidence of the necessity of Christianity, even if it had not overthrown the false, and triumphed in the true religion, in which is the saving of souls by redemption, and by the new spirit given. It may be by the fiery trial, but as far as the seraphimic attainment may be reached there is now no other way.

We wish every man to think for himself, and for no man to judge between another man's conscience and God. Yet we think we should be lauding dulness in not being able to foresee, in the vast strength and power and spread of Christianity, the universal religion; and that we can only look to Freemasonry to prevent it from plunging itself (God knows where) into war and bloodshed within its own domain.

Apollo is represented in his statue, holding sometimes a shield with one hand, and the Graces with the other. However, he is usually painted with his harp, and a shield, and his bow and arrows; to signify, mythologically, his threefold power—in heaven, where he is called Sol, on earth, where he is named Liber Pater, and in hell, where he is styled Apollo (Apollyon)—in which way, with idolatrous nations, under different names, we can trace him up to this hour. His harp typifies that he keeps all things in a state of delightful harmony in heaven; his shield shows that he is mindful of the health he gives to the creatures of earth, that he protects them against many ills, and that he maintains them in safety; his bow and arrows indicate his ability to strike from afar, and that whomsoever he smites he sends into hell, or, as here meant, the place of judgment and purgatory, the abode of the souls of the dead. Something of this is typified in the lines which stand at the head of this article, taken from Ovid, who further states:—

"— Per me concordant carmina nervis;
Certa quidem nostra est, nostra tamen una sagitta
Certior, in vacuo quæ vulnera pectore fecit."

Spenser in his "Faëry Queen" presents us to—

"— fair May, the fairest maid on ground,
Decked all with dainties of her season's pride,
And throwing flowers out of her lap around;—"

as borne on the shoulders of the "Twins of Leda;" in allusion, we presume, to the sun entering Gemini; but, under a hypercritical reservation and reversion, we conjecture it ought to be 'of Latona.'

Cicero says, "Although there were many Apollos, all that they did is ascribed to one of them only—to him who was born of Jupiter and Latona," the twin brother of Diana.

He is called Cynthius from the mountain Cynthus, in the island of Delos, from whence Diana is also called Cynthia—and Delius, from the same island, because he was born there, as it is related, under a palm or an olive tree, when his mother was pursued by the serpent Python, whom the incensed Juno had sent and set against her to persecute her all over the world, after having cast her out of heaven, and obliged the earth, by an oath, to give her no habitation wherein she could be delivered in safety. The island, at this time, was a floating isle, or lay beneath the sea, but emerged and became fixed and immovable, by the order of Neptune, for the lady's use; and, from its thus becoming visible, it received its name of Δήλος, and became the theme of much mystical fancy. We have, therefore, our fair right to believe, while we read of Diana being the midwife to her mother in bringing her twin brother into the world, that that son lost no time in wreaking vengeance on his mother's terrible and ravining persecutor.

The god was the inventor of arrows and of the bow, and the first who taught men to kill at a long range—at least so it is said, and that thus armed he went out to combat with his enormous, scaly, and deadly foe—nor not his alone and his mother's enemy, but the dreadful and dreaded scourge of all the land. Thousands gathered afar off to see the fight. A multitude was silent—a multitude mourned—a multitude was in the power of the beast. For the first time they saw the monster smitten; it writhed with contortions of fury and pain; it tore up trees, it rent down rocks; its breath grew thicker and hotter, like smoke and fire; it scorched what it could not burn, as shaft after shaft hit their mark, ripping up its flesh and striking between its horny plates, and entering their whole length beneath: then a multitude cheered, and the encouraging cry of his mother, "Strike him with thy darts, my son! strike him, O Pæan!" was caught up and repeated until it was re-echoed as the one shout of all the spectators. It was dead. And hence, by his name of Pæan, arose the custom of invoking his aid in sickness and in danger, and of calling the hymns, in honour of his praise, Pæans. Also in all the songs of triumph, at the celebration of great victories, the people cried out "Io Pæan!" However, in blending fable with history and taking their scriptures for the groundwork of their building, the ancients raised a fabric of poetry and of prose, in which their heroes and heroines figured and fluttered, appeared and disappeared, both as the Dii Consentes and Adscriptitii and the Patellarii and Ἡμῶν, or in other words as the first, second, and third class of supramundane persons. Just as if we, who may know a little about Milton and Klopstock, should take our book of Job and select therefrom one of the "sons of God," and call his name Ariel—very well! But we would rather say, suppose we took another personage and gave him the cognomen of Faust or Mephistophiles and made him the principal character in a historical novel or a tale of romance, be it so. Thus, in the place of a "certain gentleman in black," and of our Robin Goodfellow, by way of a Comus, and of Mab and the fairies, the ancients had their more refined gods, nymphs, and goddesses. Thank God we no longer make them to worship them, yet they are made still, they preside over many things; we have said we cannot do without them. Mentioned, or seen, where are they not? In our studio they are present; in our atelier they are to be found; go into our theatre, they are there; in our very church, behold them; look on high—even the very heavens are marked out by their names!

As there is only one sun, some think the Latins therefore gave him the name of Sol; and for the same reason the Greeks called him Apollo. Nevertheless, the poets in their lays, as far back as when Homer wrote, go far to convince us that they knew something more than we do of the "angels that kept not their first estate;" and of the war in heaven. We are reminded of many fine things which have been said or sung about Apollo, who was deprived of the privileges of his divinity, and exposed to the calamities of earth for destroying the Cyclops, in his indignation and revenge for the death of his son Æsculapius. Distressing want compelled him to look after the cattle of Admetus; while there, we are told by Pausanias, to pass away his time, being wearied with leisure, he devised and constructed the harp. We do not wish to deny the divineness of the instrument; the world is in want of heavenly things! Is heaven in want of earthly things? The gods taught men, so they say, their inventions; but what they formed and made on earth they carried away with them into heaven.

The sweet sound of the harp, perchance sweeter and more invigorating than wine, hippocras, or a more plebeian nectar, exhilarated the labourers in their work of building the walls of Troy. At any rate the poet found it requisite to drink much wine to describe how they were built, and in his own light and airy way, brings down the god of the muses, as if thereby to signalize that they were erected alone by poetry and melody:—

"Ilion aspicias, firmataque turribus altis, Mœnia, Apollineæ structa canore lyraë."—Ovid.
"Troy shalt thou see; its walls divine admire; Raised by the 'music of Apollo's lyre.'"

We may as well add that the city became the metropolis of all Asia. It was taken and sacked and almost entirely destroyed, by being burned, somewhere about A.M. 2871. It was thought that Æneas and Antenor betrayed it. However, up to this time, from the commencement of the war, there fell of the Grecians, 886,000, and of the Trojans, 676,000; and among these 1,562,000 who were slain, were many of their generals in chief; a few of their names will more than suffice if we recall them, for, of course, they are well known. By the treachery of Paris, Achilles lost his life; Hector, whom he slew, styled "patriæ columen," the pillar of his country; Paris himself; and, after him, his brother Deiphobus, whom Helena married, and afterwards betrayed to Menelaus to reconcile her to his favour again. This beauty, having been made as it were the golden apple of discord—and Menelaus, by his efforts to regain her having been its cause—between them they thus formed the beginning and end of the war, by which the king of Troy, Priamus, not only lost his kingdom, Hecuba his queen, and all his children, but likewise his own life.

Notwithstanding all we have said and shall have to say in our series, we see it is requisite we should mark out more distinctly the genealogy and names of the sun: we shall, therefore, resume this subject in another paper.

BIRTH OF THE STEAM ENGINE.

WHO has not stood on an eminence in the night and seen in the farthest darkness two red spots, flickering, menacing, goblin-looking orbs, peering from below and casting from them the shadows which the night dew holds before them like a curtain? They seem to approach with cat-like stealth. Presently is heard a shriek, and the gazer stops his ears as the shrill echo winds round the hill. He next sees a dark serpent-like form, whose motion seems to grow quicker as it approaches, and then the thunder of its wild flight makes itself heard, grows louder, and soon dies away in the distance. But for all this it is a benevolent monster, that snake-like giant. If we could subject it to an autopsy, its interior would reveal a strange conglomeration of opposites. Beneath one rib is the youth, full of high hope and enterprise, nothing daunted at being swallowed up for a while; next to him the sallow and meditative face of age. In this corner is the young bride with her garland of orange blossoms set so daintily beneath her pretty little bonnet; in that the widow in her weeds. On this side is the soldier, bearded like a pard; on that the meek looking clergyman; lower down, the gambler and the bankrupt running from justice and their creditors; and last, in that lugubrious looking truck, is the corpse, perhaps of youth, or meditative age, of bride, or widow, or soldier, or clergyman, or thief aforesaid, being carried to "that bourne whence no traveller returns." Thus flies this iron monster over the land from morning till night, freighted with hopes and disappointments, joys and sorrows, crimes and virtues, the paragon of modern science—the steam engine.

It forms no part of our design to enter upon minute details—these can only be useful to the scientific student; but rather to describe the progress from one improvement to another, illustrating as we proceed, a few of the results that have been brought about by its agency. We noticed, in our last, some antecedents of the steam engine. It happened, singularly enough, that in the very year that old Jonathan Hulls published his proposal to furnish vessels which could by the agency of steam be conveyed in and out of port, was born the child whose matured genius was to reduce to practical utility the dreams of the enthusiasts. About the year 1763, Watts was a young man, carrying on the business of a mathematical instrument maker in Glasgow. A model of a steam engine, such as the steam engine was at that time, was brought to him for repair. In the experiments which it became his duty to make, the shrewd artificer soon observed that which aroused his attention and directed him more particularly to the principles of its construction and the purposes of its use. Great men have been led to their discoveries by common incidents. Newton's falling apple was the key which opened up to the eye of genius the laws of the upper universe. Galileo's pendulum led him to discover the truths in connexion with earth's density, and to weigh it, so to speak, in his hand. The simple device by which the needle manufacturer of our time is enabled to arrange his wares for the market, in a former time suggested the loadstone and the mariner's compass. To natural but insignificant changes may be traced the discovery of the means by which mankind might be preserved and improved. So it was with Watt. He observed that the quantity of steam consumed at each stroke of the piston was many times more than the cylinder could contain. This struck him as an anomaly, and he at once meditated a remedy. The immense quantity of water required to effect condensation, also created surprise, and led him to make certain experiments by which some of the most important phenomena connected with latent heat and evaporation were evolved. The student hastens to a professor in the Glasgow University who had some theory on the subject, and from whom he received encouragement to prosecute his inquiries. These kind words increased his energy, and he worked with a more exalted feeling of his business. He had, perhaps, no visions of the great things he was destined to achieve. He did not foresee the mighty agency that was to grow up under his hand, but he worked on patiently, confidently, and hopefully, inspired by those noble principles which it is the province of our glorious Craft to inspire, and of which Craft Watt became an illustrious member.

When the steam engine was applied only to the purpose of pumping water out of coal mines, as we have already explained, it was simply necessary to raise the pump rod, the weight of which was sufficient to cause it to descend, and in the interval give the steam machine a rest, sufficient to prepare it for the next exertion. Watt had no such consideration for the repose of the iron monster. Saving of time is a saving of money, and as the creature ate more coals and drank more water than was necessary for the sustenance of active and energetic health, the mechanician determined to supply it with a kind of second stomach, which was to be found in a separate condensing vessel. By this means condensation became immediate without suffering any diminution from obviating causes, such as had previously existed. The functions of the creature were now performed without obstruction. It required but another improvement to give a new motion, and the quiet mathematical instrument maker was not long in finding out the means for its accomplishment. The first experiments were failures, but each failure brought its light with it, and so from experiment to experiment a sum of expedients and means to ends were discovered, which intelligently combined and ordered, gave to the labourer ultimate success. We hear now more frequently of cranks, throttle valves, governors, fly wheels, connecting rods. This was called a double acting condensing steam engine, and is in reality the first parent of the modern locomotive. This engine performed every function after having been supplied with its allowance of coals and water. It effected an enormous saving both of time and material. But all this was not enough to give the inventor an interest in his discovery. At the end of twenty years from the date of his first experiments, Watt and his partner found that the manufacture of these engines had not been a source of profit to them, but had entailed upon them a loss of capital amounting to about £50,000; an application had to be made to parliament to extend the patent, which the legislature was with difficulty induced to grant until the year 1800. Although there have been many improvements since the time of Watt, there has been no change or alteration of the principles upon which he worked. Next in order came the expansion steam engine, the rotatory steam engine, the marine engines, which as they now form the bulwarks of our navy and our commerce, we may pause a few moments to describe.

Brethren who may be travelling on the silvery bosom of sweet smelling Thames to a Greenwich dinner this fine weather, will generally find the skylights of the engine room open, and if they are disposed to gratify their curiosity, or gather information upon this subject, they will have abundant opportunity. Looking down into this marine dungeon, if they are not deterred by the presence of an oleaginous vapour that is by no means agreeable, they will see two enormous wedges of metal rising and falling alternately, and as each one falls or rises there is a rumble coincident with a perceptible effort the more apparent if the river be smooth. For the benefit of such as have not paid attention to the skeleton of this steam marine horse which pushes them along, we give a short description, premising that we do not intend to be either as luminous or as lucid as Professor Owen is said to be upon the organization of the megatherium, but briefer by a long way, which compensation we offer as amply sufficing for the use of hard words and harder names. A shaft then, we will say, is carried across the vessel, being continued on either side beyond the timbers. At the extremities of this shaft, on the outside of the vessel, are attached a pair of wheels constructed like undershot water wheels, having fixed upon their rims a number of flat boards, called paddle boards. As the wheels revolve, these paddle boards strike the water, driving it in a direction contrary to that in which it is intended the vessel shall be propelled. The moving force imparted to the water, thus driven backwards by reaction on the vessel, propels it. Now, on the shaft in the interior are fixed two cranks—the wedges of metal spoken of—placed at right angles to each other, so that whenever one of them is thrown into the highest or lowest position, the other is horizontal. These cranks are worked by strong iron rods, called connecting rods, which may be seen attached to them, and which are themselves either driven directly by the pistons of the steam engine, or are worked by those pistons, in this particular the medium of working being precisely the same as in the ordinary land engines. The two cranks being placed at right angles, it follows that when one piston is at the top or bottom of its stroke, and the crank is driven by it into the highest or lowest position, the other will be at the middle of its stroke, and the crank driven by it will be in a horizontal position. One of the pistons is therefore always in a position to produce the most advantageous effect on the crank at the moment that the other piston loses its power, and in the same manner it may be seen that while the power of the one piston is augmented from zero to its highest effect, the power of the other is decreasing from its greatest effect to zero, thus the combined action of the two pistons is nearly uniform in its efficiency. If one engine only were used, the motion of the wheels would be unequal, being most rapid when the piston is at the middle of the stroke, and slowest at the extremities.

Watt had scarcely fulfilled his mission, when another person was attracting notice in the north of England. He was a young collier, a labourer, a hewer of wood, a drawer of water, but destined one day to be a king among men. It now became a question whether steam power could not be applied to land traffic to pull heavy loads along the ground, so that horse flesh and man flesh might be spared. Sober, industrious, assiduous, persevering, the young labourer had achieved the great sum of eighteen shillings per week, with a compliment from his master, who had begun to estimate his value. But the first practical application of the steam engine as a locomotive power took place in 1804 on a railroad at Merthyr Tydvil, in South Wales. This clumsy progenitor of the high metallised racers on our principal lines, that are now christened after the planets, was simply a boiler and chimney, with a cylindrical tube, or, properly speaking, gut, which did all the business of atmospheric elimination. Its wheels were clogged with a view to give it greater impetus, and for years after it was thought that increasing the resistance to each revolution increased the force given to the steam engine. In 1814 this idea was exploded. Meanwhile the hewer of wood, the drawer of water, the labourer and miner, had become famous as an engineer. Statesmen were proud of him, princes honoured him, the busy crowd made way for him, for the humble workman had become a power in the state. People began to dream of some new mode of travelling, some wild project to which only a journey to some planet were comparable, but speculation was morbid, its eye was jaundiced, its aspirations were exorbitant.

The next stimulus which the progress of this invention received arose from a project of constructing a railway from Liverpool to Manchester, for the purpose of general traffic. When this project was under consideration, it was not decided what moving power was most eligible. It was seriously proposed by some to have the engines stationary, pulling each successive load by means of ropes laid between short stations—so far had our fathers progressed in their knowledge of the power and uses of the marvellous agent which was developing itself before their eyes. Another method was recommended, the same which has been adopted down to our own day, namely, that of the engine pulling its load as does the horse. For a long time the dispute was held to admit of no resolution, the timid prognosticating no end of broken necks, and the more courageous ridiculing the timid with right good will. The wisdom which could suggest that each station should be connected by ropes, and that in each station should be a stationary engine which should pull the immense loads with ropes from station to station, was however fated to succumb. To enable the Chamber of Commerce to decide which of these methods was the most advisable to adopt, the directors of the Liverpool and Manchester line employed George Stephenson, the hewer of wood aforesaid, now the prince of engineers, to travel to every railway in the kingdom; and associated with him Mr. Locke, Mr. Walker, and Mr. Rastrick, the three engineers next in eminence, all of whom should institute minute inquiries, and report on the preferable mode of managing the future railroad. The experience gathered in this tour left them little choice between the relative methods. An elaborate report was drawn up and submitted to the magnates of Manchester and Liverpool. The discussion was reopened. The timid shook their heads and were silent. The report of the engineers had left them no ground for argument. The decision was at length given that the transport of merchandize should be effected by locomotive engines. Until this period railways had almost entirely been confined to the transport of mineral products. They scarcely deserve the name, and certainly not the importance which is now attached to the word railway. They were only found in mining districts, and convenient to obscure harbours resorted to by ships employed in that particular traffic. The ends to be obtained by a railway thirty miles inland, connecting the largest manufacturing towns in the greatest manufacturing country in the world, with the greatest, most opulent, and most active commercial port, were of a nature so much more extensive and important that it was considered that more than ordinary means should be resorted to to obtain a moving power commensurate with the traffic which might be expected under such circumstances. Prizes were therefore proposed to be given under certain stipulations to those who could construct the most effective locomotive for the purposes of the new line. This proposal produced the greatest competition, a spirit of emulation was aroused, and machinists from every part of the kingdom contended for the honour of constructing the first locomotive that should be employed for the transit of goods and passengers. The day of trial came—statesmen, scholars, the representatives of science and art were present, a goodly and distinguished company. Among them was one a statesman of great promise, the pride of his fellow citizens, beloved for his private as he was honoured for his public virtues, and whose place was to know him no more. Engines of various forms, many of them of surpassing elegance of design were exhibited and admired. The prize was awarded to an engine by Robert Stephenson, the son of the great George. The first of locomotives was called the "Rocket." In its first trip it attained the then astonishing speed of twenty-five miles per hour, but it was to be put to a severer test. Mr. Huskisson was knocked down, and his wounded body was conveyed by the same engine fifteen miles in twenty-five minutes, being a rate of thirty-six miles per hour. But in vain. The wounded man was dead, and many who shouted with triumph at the going forth of the first locomotive, received it on its return with lamentation and mourning.

Such was the birth of the steam engine—such the incidents that accompanied its early days. Our fathers recollect the time when they looked upon the uncouth machine with astonishment and awe; and our children may possibly regard the express of these days as a slow coach when compared with what they shall have achieved for the steam locomotive.

OPERATIVE MASONRY AND FREEMASONRY.

[The following observations on the organization of a Lodge, its government, and the ceremonies of opening and closing, are by Bro. STEPHEN BARTON WILSON, P.G.D., and were delivered by him in the form of an Oration at the Consecration of the Wellington Lodge (No. 1,087), Deal, on the 18th day of June, 1859].

MASONRY, according to the general acceptation of the term, is the art of hewing, squaring, and moulding stones into the forms required for the purposes of building; and of raising, setting, and uniting them by means of joints, level, perpendicular or otherwise, and by the aid of cement, slate, iron, lead or copper; which various operations are founded on the principles of geometry and mechanics, requiring much practical dexterity, and directed to the service and convenience of mankind. But Freemasonry, embracing a wider range, and having a far nobler object in view—the cultivation and improvement of the human mind—may with more propriety be denominated a science; for although employing the terms of the former (and its lessons for the most part are veiled in allegory and illustrated by symbols) there is not a character or emblem in use amongst the Craft but serves to inculcate the principles of morality and virtue amongst all its genuine professors.

"Freemasonry," says a learned author, "is a moral order, instituted by virtuous men, with the praiseworthy design of recalling to our remembrance the most sublime truths, in the midst of the most innocent and social pleasures." It is a system of morality veiled in allegory and illustrated by symbols, founded on brotherly love, relief, and truth.

By the exercise of brotherly love, we are taught to regard the whole human species as one family, the high and low, the rich and poor, created by one Almighty Being, and sent into the world for the aid, support, and protection of each other; on this principle Freemasonry unites men of every country, sect, and opinion, and by its dictates conciliates true friendship amongst those who might otherwise have remained at a perpetual distance.

To relieve the distressed is a duty incumbent on all men, particularly amongst Masons, who are linked together by one indissoluble chain of sincere affection; hence, to sooth the unhappy, sympathize in their misfortunes, compassionate their miseries, and restore peace to their troubled minds, is the grand aim we have in view. On this basis we establish our friendship, and form our connexions.

Truth is a divine attribute, and the foundation of every Masonic virtue; to be good men and true is a lesson we are taught at our initiation; on this grand theme we meditate, and by its unerring dictates endeavour to regulate our lives and actions. Hence hypocrisy and deceit are or ought to be unknown to us, sincerity and plain dealing our distinguishing characteristics, whilst all join in promoting each other's welfare, and rejoicing in the prosperity of the Craft.

A Lodge of Freemasons consists of a certain number of brethren assembled together to expatiate on the mysteries of the Craft, having the Holy Bible on the pedestal to instruct them in the sacred duties they owe to God, to society, and to themselves; the square and compasses to regulate their lives and actions according to the true principles of justice; the charter or warrant from the Grand Lodge, by virtue of which they are authorized to meet to transact the business of Freemasonry; the Book of Constitutions, wherein are laid down the general statutes of the institution; and the by-laws to guide them in their duty as members of an individual Lodge.

Any number of regularly registered Freemasons, not less than seven, being well skilled in the work and mysteries of the Craft, and of good report amongst their brethren, may petition the Grand Master for a dispensation, authorizing them to organize a Lodge for Masonic purposes. When organized, a Lodge consists of the Worshipful Master, Senior and Junior Wardens, Treasurer, Secretary, Senior and Junior Deacons, Inner Guard, and Tyler; and as many members as a majority of the brethren may determine upon (although more than thirty will generally be found inconvenient). The Junior Warden is the ostensible Steward of the Lodge; the fees and dues payable by the brethren ought to be collected by the Deacons, and placed on his pedestal, and after being compared with the Secretary's account and found correct, such portions as shall have been paid for registration, certificates, and the fund of benevolence, must be deposited in the hands of the Worshipful Master, who is responsible for their legal appropriation, and the remainder transmitted to the Treasurer. It is also a part of his duty to call the brethren from labour to refreshment, and to superintend the affairs of the banquet, and it frequently happens that one or two of the other members are selected and appointed, under the denomination of Stewards, to assist him in this department of his duties. It also frequently happens that an expert brother is appointed to officiate as Master or Director of the Ceremonies, but he is an officer of convenience, not of necessity.

The Worshipful Master is distinguished by the square; the Senior Warden by the level; the Junior Warden by the plumb-rule; the Treasurer by a key; the Secretary by two pens in saltire, bound together by a ribbon; each of the Deacons by a dove bearing an olive branch; the Inner Guard by two swords in saltire, and the Tyler by a sword. These insignia are suspended from a collar, and worn by the several brethren whilst acting in the discharge of their respective offices.

After a Lodge has been regularly organized, in order to avoid irregularities it should be solemnly constituted by the Grand Master, with his Deputy and Wardens; or, in the absence of the Grand Master, by his Deputy, who shall choose some Master of a Lodge to assist him. If the Deputy be absent, the Grand Master may appoint some other Grand Officer or Master of a Lodge to act as Deputy pro tempore. The Lodge is then consecrated according to the ceremonies proper and usual upon these occasions, when the new Master enters immediately upon the exercise of his office, and in due form installs his Wardens into their proper places. The other officers of the Lodge are then appointed and invested in antient form. The Lodge being thus duly constituted and consecrated, may then be pronounced in legitimate working order.

It is customary for each Lodge, once in every year, at a stated period, to select from amongst those who are Past Wardens, an expert Craftsman to preside over them in the capacity of Master; he must have been regularly elected by the Master, Wardens, and brethren in open Lodge assembled, and presented to a Board of installed Masters, that he may receive from his predecessor the benefit of installation, the better to qualify him for the discharge of the duties of his important trust. It must, however, be distinctly understood that a Warden cannot be considered eligible to be elected to the Master's chair until he has held and actually executed the duties of his office for one entire year, i.e., from the usual time of installation in one year to the same period in another. But although either the Senior or the Junior Warden shall have executed the duties of their respective offices for the full period, he will not be eligible for election to the Master's chair unless he possesses those qualifications which are essentially necessary to that important office, for the Constitutions enjoin that all preferment amongst Masons should be grounded upon real worth and personal merit, and that no brother shall be elected Master of a Lodge, or appointed to any office therein, merely on account of seniority of rank; therefore every candidate for the office of Master should be of good report, true and trusty, and held in high estimation amongst his brethren and fellows; he ought to be exemplary in conduct, courteous in manners, easy of address, but steady in principle; able and willing to undertake the management of the work, and well skilled in the antient charges, regulations, and landmarks of the Order.

Having been thus duly elected at the regular meeting of the Lodge at the stated period, he may be installed at the next meeting, provided the minutes of his election be previously confirmed. He then becomes entitled to the appellation of Worshipful Master, and every brother is enjoined to use it when addressing himself to the chair, because it is an office of dignity and respect.

The first duty which the Worshipful Master is called upon to perform after being placed in the chair, is to invest his predecessor with the insignia of his rank as a Past Master, which is the diagram of the forty-seventh proposition in the first book of Euclid's Elements of Geometry, appended within the square. This proposition is generally ascribed to Pythagoras, and ranks in the first class of geometrical truths—many different demonstrations are given of it by various geometers, but none are more simple and elegant than that of Euclid; to this however may be added that a semicircle, or any plain rectilineal figure described on the hypotenuse can be shown to be equal to the sum of the semicircles or the like, and similarly described figures; on the two other sides of the triangle it can also be shown that the triangle, formed by a line drawn from and connecting the great and lesser squares, is equal to the triangle formed by a line drawn from and connecting the great and intermediate squares. This proposition being of the highest importance to geometry, has therefore been selected and well applied to distinguish a Past Master of the Order, who, by his zeal, assiduity, and skill, has gained the highest distinction it is possible to attain in the Lodge, and who, from his important and distinguished position, ought to be a pattern for imitation to the inexperienced and younger members of the Craft.

The rites and ceremonies of Freemasonry form the distinctive peculiarity of the institution. In their nature they are simple, in their end instructive. They naturally excite a high degree of curiosity in a newly initiated brother, and create in him an earnest desire to investigate their meaning and become acquainted with their object and design. It requires, however, both serious application and untiring diligence to ascertain the precise nature of every ceremony which our ancient brethren saw reason to adopt, in the formation of an exclusive system which was to pass through the world unconnected with the religion and politics of all times, and of every people amongst whom it should flourish and increase. But the zealous and assiduous Mason, with the assistance of an intelligent Master in the chair (and none but intelligent brethren should ever be placed in that responsible situation) will not fail to derive instruction from every ceremony he may witness, and improvement from every ordinance with which he may become acquainted.

The first business which occupies the brethren when assembled at their stated meetings, is what is technically termed the opening of the Lodge, when, at the well known signal, the officers and members, and visiting brethren, clothed in their appropriate insignia, repair to their respective stations, and await the command of the Worshipful Master; the avenues of the Lodge are secured, and the ceremony of opening proceeds.

The ceremony of closing differs from that of opening only in the necessary change of phraseology, and in certain precautionary measures. The brethren are all expected to assist in the performance of both duties, and much of the beauty and harmony of the scene depends on their quiet deportment and strict attention to the business before them. In this, as well as other Masonic ceremonies, everything approaching to levity or rudeness in speech or action, is to be deprecated and avoided. A Freemason should never forget that he is a gentleman; and that all the peculiarities he witnesses, or in which he is required to participate whilst in the Lodge, are designed to illustrate and inculcate some great moral truth. The peculiar beauty of our ceremonies is, that they all tend to cultivate and improve the mind, and consecrate the affections to virtue.

The labours and duties of the Lodges should begin and end with prayer. The brethren cannot be too often reminded of their dependence on the Great Architect of the universe for every blessing they enjoy. Prayer is an ancient and beautiful custom of the institution; it was the constant practice of our forefathers; it is enjoined by the Constitutions, and cannot with propriety be dispensed with.

It has been beautifully said, that the Worshipful Master opens the Lodge at sunrise, with solemn prayer; the Junior Warden calls the brethren from labour to refreshment when the sun attains its meridian height; and the Senior Warden closes the Lodge with prayer at sunset, when the labours of our ancient brethren ended. The great luminary of creation rises in the east to open and enliven the day with a mild but genial influence, and all nature rejoices in the appearance of his beams. He gains his meridian lustre in the south, invigorating all things with the perfection of his ripening qualities; and with declining strength he sets in the west to close the day, leaving all mankind at rest from their labours. This is a type of the three most prominent stages in the life of man—infancy, manhood, and age. The first, characterized by the blush of innocence, is as pure as the tints which gild the eastern portals of the day; the heart rejoices in the unsuspecting integrity of its own unblemished virtues, nor fears deceit because it knows no guile. Manhood succeeds; the ripening intellect arrives at the meridian of its powers; and at the approach of old age, man's strength decays, his sun is setting in the west; enfeebled by sickness or bodily infirmities, he lingers on till death closes his eventful day, and happy is he if the setting splendours of a virtuous life gild his departing moments with the gentle tint of hope, and close his short career in peace, harmony, and brotherly love.

UNIFORMITY OF WORKING.

AMONGST the members of the Craft under the English constitution, travellers or other brethren enjoying opportunities of visiting a variety of Lodges, must be greatly astonished at the want of uniformity in working. Peculiar alterations are made in our ritual by the insertion of forms borrowed frequently from Scotch, Irish, American, and other foreign sources, without the slightest regard to the ancient landmarks of the Order, and totally ignoring the authority of the Grand Lodge, which forbids innovations of any kind. Brethren initiated in these Lodges, whilst receiving their Masonic education, have communicated to them a mixture of truth and error, which can never, except by good fortune and skilful teaching, be separated. Meeting after meeting confirms the erring impression, until at last, scarce a vestige of the proper working remains. The end no doubt is the same, and the possessor of Masonic secrets will, it is to be hoped, have an ample knowledge of the science, no matter how conveyed. But something more than that is required by the Constitutions, and we should not only instruct candidates in the same mysteries, but our method of imparting the instruction should also be the same, so that a person initiated in the most remote Lodge from England, ought to enjoy equal advantages with his (at present more fortunate) brethren at home. Regular Lodges of instruction are particularly useful, but under the present regulations, much cannot be hoped from them. Brethren residing in England may, with slight exertion, render their knowledge of our approved ritual almost perfect; but the multitude of brethren, located out of the United Kingdom, do not enjoy the same facilities, and without the existence of one recognized authority, to determine the merits of rival Lodges, no complete and general system of Masonic instruction can be established. It might be suggested to the members of the Grand Lodge, that they should form a committee to revise the entire present ritual, and create one from which no deviation should be at any time allowed; that a council be selected from amongst the most approved and efficient brethren who have served as Masters of Lodges, to whom this revised ritual be entrusted; that the council consist of — members, to bear office for such period as may be deemed expedient, and vacancies in its numbers be filled up by the Grand Lodge; that the council shall have full powers of adjudication upon matters connected with the ritual, and be, in other words, a Lodge of Instruction, acting with supreme and recognized authority; that certain days in the month be set apart for examination, at which a majority of the council to attend, and any Worshipful Master or Past Master under the English Constitution be allowed to present himself; should those examinations be satisfactory, the brethren to be entitled to a certificate of proficiency, under such Masonic rank and jewel as may be decided upon; that brethren so qualified should be requested to point out to the Worshipful Master, when visiting a strange Lodge, any deviation from the authorized ritual. This plan, of which the present article is a crude and hasty sketch, seems to promise fair. In a few years, brethren possessing the required proficiency would be scattered over the globe, giving by their own perfected knowledge, assurance to the skilful and assistance to the incorrect.

M.M., INDIA.

THE QUAKER MASON.—It is contrary to the discipline of the Society of Friends to allow any of their members to join the Masonic fraternity. Nevertheless, not a few of that persuasion have at different times and places entered the Order. Among others there was once a Quaker who had six sons, all of whom were Freemasons. By some means, Levi, for that was his name, finally found his way into our mystic pale. The Friends found it out, and sent a committee of two, Abraham and Joseph, to express their concern to the erring brother, and secure from him an assurance of fidelity to the articles of discipline. Abraham called with his associate on Levi, when, as it is reported, something like the following dialogue took place:—Abraham, the spokesman, after having stated that they had come as a committee from the Friends, said, "Levi, we understand that thou art a Freemason." "I have had that reputation for twenty years." "But will thou tell us, Levi, whether thou art a Mason?" "No, Abraham, I will not tell thee whether I am or not." "Shall we tell the meeting, Levi, that thou dost renounce Freemasonry?" "No, Abraham, I will not. I will see thee condemned first." The committee left him and reported to the meeting; but Levi continued to preach, and was no more molested after that.

REVIEWS OF NEW BOOKS.

The British Empire in India, by E. H. NOLAN, Ph.D. London: James S. Virtue, Ivy Lane.

THIS work has now reached its twenty-ninth number, and Bro. Nolan has lost none of his vigour in treating his subject, whilst he is rapidly approaching that period of Indian history within our own recollection. He has now arrived at the era of Warren Hastings and Junius—ending the third quarter of the last century. From that period England has played a still more important part in "annexation" in India—not, we fear, always wisely on the part of John Company, but of sufficient importance to establish the fame of any country as to military successes—successes followed by a monster rebellion, met with a power and determination which few believed even this great country to be capable of, and resulting in the closer union of India with England under the government of Queen Victoria—and the destruction of the Company which though great in commerce, and great in its power of conquest and annexation, proved itself altogether wanting in foresight, even though warned for many years by its own officers of the volcano on the brink of which it was standing. The typography and engravings are as excellent as at the commencement of the work, and as they are in every work which Mr. Virtue undertakes to publish.

The Book of the Chapter; or Monitorial Instructions in the Degrees of Mark, Past, and Most Excellent Master, and the Holy Royal Arch. By ALBERT G. MACKEY, M.D., &c. &c. New York: Robert Macoy, Beekman-street.

SOME among our American brethren seem determined that, as far as writing and printing books may be carried to the extreme verge of disclosure of Masonic secrets, there shall be no lack on their part of means whereby the outer world may study to its heart's content the forms and ceremonies of the Craft. To the notions of some English Masons (and we are free to confess ourselves among the number) this sort of thing has been carried a great deal too far, and we cannot honestly say that we derive any pleasure from seeing that on paper—open to the gaze of any stranger who may chance to meet with the books in question—which in our humble opinion ought to be confined to the arcana of the Lodge or Chapter, and which should only be discussed among brethren, and brethren of experience into the bargain. True, we are told that none of the essentials of Masonic secrets are disclosed; but this is a matter of opinion—we have read in modern treatises upon Masonic subjects sufficient to make clear to the view of any uninitiated observer (possessed of a small degree of intelligence above the average) many things which no faithful brother could conscientiously publish. But granting that no "secrets" are laid open to the vulgar gaze, is it advisable to afford the means of supplying subjects for stupid jests and adverse criticism? What object can possibly be gained by the perusal of these works by the genuine brother? If he wishes for information on the meaning or origin of our ceremonies, he has the opportunity of attending Lodges and Chapters of Instruction; and in every large town there are to be found many skilled Craftsmen who take pride and pleasure in imparting their knowledge to the aspirant, and in throwing light upon what is obscure or mysterious in our ritual. Knowledge gained in this way, will be infinitely more treasured, more easy of attainment, and of greater value to the recipient, than anything he can learn from the bulk of the recent specimens of Masonic book-making.

The singular argument is advanced by the defenders of these treatises, that nothing is published in them which has not been sanctioned by former writers; that is to say, that modern lapses from the strict Masonic law are venial, because in the last century there were also found imprudent and careless brethren who forgot their charge to "be silent," as well as to "hear" and to "see." Preston and Webb, we are told, produced useful works, but imperfect, because they did not go far enough. To us it seems possible that even Preston and Webb, devotees as they were of the Order, might possibly have incurred censure from some of the sages at whose feet they studied, who little thought that the knowledge which they imparted to the working student was to be rudely exposed to the open glare of day and to the criticisms of the ignorant and the profane. Is it a worthy office in the dutiful child of Masonry to rend still further the veil which shields his parent, or would it not better become him to use his utmost efforts to repair the injuries inflicted by previous too daring hands?

We have said that to some English Masons these books upon Masonry have appeared unseemly innovations; as far as our means of information extend, they are not regarded in the same light by our Transatlantic brethren; on the contrary, they enjoy a certain popularity, the best evidence of which is their increase of late years. Whether this is to be attributed to a desire for information on the part of the reading portion of the Masonic public, or whether the ambition of successful lecturers prompts them to enlarge upon the subjects which they have so often handled in the Lodge with the applause of the brethren—we cannot say—certain it is that these volumes, year by year in the United States, continue to be printed, published, and, we suppose, to be read. Of the authors of this speciality, the most distinguished in a literary point of view, is doubtless the worthy brother whose name stands at the head of this article, Dr. Mackey, the author of the "Principles of Masonic Law," and who is also well known in the United States as the compiler of the "Lexicon of Freemasonry," and as the editor of some periodicals of a high class.

The "Book of the Chapter," as our readers will perceive from the title, does not confine itself to the mere degree of the Royal Arch, as it obtains in England and in those countries which are ruled by the English constitutions. In the United States there are three intermediate steps to this supreme degree after attaining the rank of Master Mason. These are the Mark Master, Past Master, and Most Excellent Master; and these grades are universally recognized in the working of the Scottish and Irish Craft, as well as in many French and other continental chapters. Though perhaps not of sufficient importance to be regarded as distinct degrees, there are doubtless to be found in them some points of value which would not be ill placed in our own ritual, and this opinion with regard to the Mark, in particular, appears to be daily gaining ground. The volume before us commences with a dissertation upon the Mark, which is styled the fourth degree; and after a sketch of the symbolical design, and a historical summary, proceeds to give certain portions of the opening of the Lodge. These are followed by the lecture in two sections, in the course of which Bro. Mackey introduces various illustrations and speculations; and in this as well as the other chapters of the book, gives the charges and prayers of the degree in full. The same particulars are given in the next parts of the work as to the "Past Master" and "Most Excellent Master" degrees, including a description of the working tools and paraphernalia.

The latter half of the volume is occupied with the consideration of the Royal Arch degree itself, which is certainly gone into with sufficient minuteness. In his description of the symbolical design, and other particulars, Bro. Mackey freely alludes to the design and signification of the ceremonies, and proceeds to give the historical summary, which, we take leave to say, ought to be given for the benefit of the Royal Arch Masons only. After the description of the clothing and emblems, come the charges, and then the lecture, comprising as it does much of the ceremony, with the peculiar attributes and furniture, and the various prayers at opening and closing. We find considerable variation in the American working from our own, though of course the grand principles are the same; the officers of the Chapter are differently costumed, and bear titles very dissimilar to those in use among us. The duties of the ceremony are also not apportioned precisely in the same manner.

"Royal Arch History" is considered by our author in three lectures, the subject of the first being "The Destruction of the Temple"; the second, "The Captivity at Babylon"; and the third, "The Return to Jerusalem." These contain nothing very new or striking, being a recapitulation of these events as described in the Bible, with due attention paid to their chronological arrangement.

The conferring of the rank of First Principal, or as it is styled in the American Chapters, the "High Priesthood," is ranked by Bro. Mackey as a separate degree and called by him the eighth in succession. He gives the description of the "Convention" by which this rank is conferred, with the prayers, charges, and scriptures proper for the occasion.

The ceremony of consecrating a new chapter is given almost in extenso, with those of the installation of officers, grand visitations, processions, installations of Grand Chapters, and on other occasions; and the volume concludes with a useful section devoted to the constitutional rules drawn up from the ancient landmarks and usages of Royal Arch Masonry.

The style of the work is pleasing, and this will certainly be considered a very favourable specimen of the "Monitorial" class of works, by those who conceive that any necessity exists for such books. It has, however, some very striking defects, which another edition will probably see remedied; we may for instance mention that, though the book is elegantly printed upon good paper, it is disfigured by some trumpery wood cuts which would disgrace a child's primer; these are of no manner of use to elucidate the text, and, we can only suppose, have been inserted to help to fill up some space, as the most peculiar taste could not consider them in the light of embellishments. Indeed, some of them are mere caricatures, and perfectly suitable for the pages of a comic periodical—a figure of a high priest is represented in a crinoline that would do justice to Broad-way or Regent-street, the head of the august individual being encased in a hollowed out pumpkin, as well as we can make out—while the wonder of the world—the glorious temple of Solomon, is represented as a kind of long two storied barn with a shot tower or gasworks chimney at one end of it. We would also counsel the abolition of some miserable ungrammatical rhymes (whence derived we know not) which are dignified with the title of Masonic "Odes" and "Hymns," and inserted in various parts of the work. We should be sorry to think that the august and time honoured ceremonies of this sublime degree are ever disfigured by the interpolation of this doggerel, which the most solemn music would fail to elevate to a dignity worthy of the occasion. Surely the first object of a commentator on such a subject as this should be to divest it of any thing approaching to frivolity.

Popular Music of the Olden Time; a Collection of Ancient Songs, Ballads, and Dance Tunes, illustrative of the National Music of England. With short Introductions to the different Reigns, and notices of the Aïrs from Writers of the Sixteenth and Seventeenth Centuries. Also a short Account of the Minstrels, by W. CHAPPELL, F.S.A. 2 vols. London: Cramer, Beale, and Chappell.

ABOUT twenty years since, Mr. Chappell published his collection of "National English Aïrs," which was the first and only work deserving the name of a collection of the songs, ballads, and dance tunes of "merry England in the olden time." Six years afterwards the edition was exhausted, and our author, who has until the present moment been collecting fresh materials, and revising the old, found it much easier to rewrite the work than to incorporate the immense mass of new matter his reading and research had brought to bear on the subject; hence he may be said to have produced a new work, and has entitled it Popular Music of the Olden Time, the former work being an outline and skeleton of the present.

In noticing this work, it becomes a necessary part of our duty to caution our readers against falling into the error of considering it, from its title, as a mere music book. The Popular Music of the Olden Time, it is true, gives us the music of all the old ballads, songs, and dances, that were the favourites of our ancestors; but it does something more—it has appended to every example a running commentary, treating of the history of the words of each song, and of its tune; added to which our old dramatists, writers on manners and customs, theologians, musicians, historians, and all other writers of eminence and their works have been ransacked, and their treasures brought to bear upon the various subjects, and they were various enough in those days, that formed the staple of the numerous ballad and song writers, so that the Popular Music of the Olden Time is a work of great literary importance and untiring research.

Mr. Chappell has divided his work into chronological periods, commencing with Saxon minstrelsy and ending with tunes of the time of George II., as well as classifying in one section all the tunes to which no date could be assigned through uncertainty as to their internal evidence.

In a notice like the present, it is absolutely impossible to do justice to such a work, so, opening the first volume at random, we will give an extract, to show how Mr. Chappell has exhausted his subject. At page 130 we find a heading, "Trip and Go;" and Mr. Chappell tells us—

"This was one of the favourite Morris dances of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, and frequently alluded to by the writers of those times.

"Nashe, in his Introductory Epistle to the surreptitious edition of Sidney's Asphel and Stella, 4to., 1591, says, 'Indee, to say the truth, my stile is somewhat heavy gated, and cannot dance Trip and go so lively, with 'Oh my love, ah my love, all my love gone,' as other shepherdes that have bene Fooler in the morris time out of minde.' He introduces it more at length, and with a description of the Morris dance, in the play of Summer's last Will and Testament, 1600:

"VER goes in and fetcheth out the Hobby-horse and the Morris dance, who dance about.

"Ver.—About, about! lively, put your horse to it; rein him harder; jerk him with your wand. Sit fast, sit fast, man! Fool, hold up your ladle there."

• The ladle is still used by the sweeps on May-day.

"Will Summer.—O brave Hall! † O well said butcher! Now for the credit of Worcestershire. The finest set of Morris dancers that is between this and Streatham. Marry, methinks there is one of them danceth like a clothier's horse, with a wool-pack upon his back. You, friend, with the hobby-horse, go not too fast, for fear of wearing out my lord's tile-stones with your hob-nails.

"Ver.—So, so, so; trot the ring twice over, and away.

"After this, three clowns and three maids enter, dancing and singing the song which is here printed with the music."

"Trip and go seems to have become a proverbial expression. In Gosson's Schoole of Abuse, 1579—'Trip and go, for I dare not tarry.' In The two angry Women of Abington, 1599—'Nay, then, trip and go.' In Ben Jonson's Case is Altered—'O delicate trip and go.' And in Shakespeare's Love's Labour Lost—'Trip and go, my sweet.' The music is taken from Musick's Delight on the Cithern, 1666. It resembles another tune, called Beallam."

Mr. Chappell then prints the tune and the words, and as we cannot give the former, we will the latter:—

"Trip and go, heave and ho,
Up and down, to and fro;
From the town to the grove,
Two and two let us rove,
A maying, a playing;
Love hath no gainsaying:
So trip and go, trip and go,
Merrily trip and go."

Mr. Chappell then gives us nearly three pages on the morris dance; but we forbear to quote, because we should like our readers to read for themselves.

Let us take another extract. This time it shall be a popular song (vol. ii., p. 645):—

"SALLY IN OUR ALLEY.

"This extremely popular ballad was written and composed by Henry Carey.

"Carey's tune is to be found in his Musical Century, vol. ii., p. 32; in Walsh's Dancing Master, vol. ii., 1719; in The Beggar's Opera; The Devil to Pay; The Fashionable Lady; The Merry Cobbler; Love in a Riddle; The Rival Milliners; and on numerous half sheet songs."

The following is the author's account of the origin of the ballad:—

"A vulgar error having prevailed among many persons who imagine Sally Salisbury the subject of this ballad, the author begs leave to undeceive and assure them it has not the least allusion to her, he being a stranger to her very name at the time this song was composed: for, as innocence and virtue were ever the boundaries of his muse, so is this little poem. He had no other view than to set forth the beauty of a chaste and disinterested passion, even in the lowest class of human life. The real occasion was this: a shoemaker's 'prentice, making holiday with his sweetheart, treated her with a sight of Bedlam, the puppet-shows, the flying chairs, and all the elegancies of Moorfields, from whence, proceeding to the farthing pye-house, he gave her a collation of buns, cheer-cakes, gammon of bacon, stuffed beef, and bottled ale, through all which scenes the author dodged them. Charmed with the simplicity of their courtship, he drew from what he had witnessed this little sketch of nature; but, being then young and obscure he was very much ridiculed by some of his acquaintance for this performance, which nevertheless, made its way into the polite world, and amply recompensed him by the applause of the divine Addison, who was pleased more than once to mention it with approbation."

"Among the songs printed to Carey's tune are the following:—

1. "'Sally's Lamentation; or The Answer to Sally,' beginning—

"What pity 'tis so bright a thought
Should e'er become so common;
At ev'ry corner brought to nought
By ev'ry bawling woman.
I little thought when you began
To write of charming Sally,
That ev'ry brat would sing so soon,
'She lives in our Alley.'

2. "'Sally in our Alley to Billy in Piccadilly; with proper graces to the tune.'

"Of all the lads that are so smart
There's none I love like Billy;
He is the darling of my heart,
And he lives in Piccadilly,' &c.

3. "'Sally in her own clothes,' beginning—

"Of all the mauxes in the land
There's none I hate like Sally,' &c.

† The Tract of "Old Meg of Herefordshire for a Mayd Marian, and, Hereford townes for a Morris-dance," 4to., 1699, is dedicated to Old Hall, a celebrated taborer of Herefordshire, and the author says—"The people of Herefordshire are beholden to thee: thou givest the men light hearts by thy pipe, and the women light heels by thy tabor. O wonderful piper! O admirable tabor-man!" &c.

4. "Sally rival'd by Country Molly," commencing—"Since Sally's charms so long have been
 The theme of court and city,
 Pray give me leave to raise the song
 And praise a girl more pretty."

Mr. Chappell quotes two others, and adds—"There are many more printed to Carey's tune, but the above suffice to show how popular it was; and yet, about 1760, it was discarded." He then gives the two versions in juxtaposition with the whole of the original words.

Now we turn to what will more than ordinarily interest our readers (vol. ii., p. 668); it is headed—

"THE FREEMASONS' TUNE.

"This tune was very popular at the time of the ballad operas, and I am informed that the same words are still sung to it at Masonic meetings.

"The air was introduced in The Village Opera, The Chambermaid, The Lottery, The Grub-street Opera, and The Lover his own Rival. It is contained in the third volume of The Dancing Master, and of Walsh's New Country Dancing Master. Words and music are included in Watts's Musical Miscellany, iii. 72, and in British Melody, or The Musical Magazine, fol. 1739. They were also printed on broadsides.

"In the Gentleman's Magazine for October, 1731, the first stanza is printed as 'A Health, by Mr. Birkhead.' It seems to be there quoted from 'The Constitutions of the Freemasons,' by the Rev. James Anderson, A.M., one of the Worshipful Masters.

"There are several versions of the tune. One in Pills to purge Melancholy, ii. 230 (1719), has a second part, but that being almost a repetition of the first, taken an octave higher, is out of the compass of ordinary voices, and has therefore been generally rejected.

"In A complete collection of Old and New English and Scotch Songs, ii., 12 (1735), the name is given as 'Ye Commoners and Peers,' but Lveridge composed another tune to these words.

"In 'The Musical Mason, or Freemasons' Pocket Companion,' being a collection of songs used in all Lodges, to which are added the 'Freemasons' March and Ode' (8vo. 1791), this is entitled 'The Entered Apprentice's Song.'

"Many stanzas have been added from time to time, and others have been altered. The following is the old copy."

And then Mr. Chappell prints the tune, and gives the words according to the second edition of Anderson's Constitutions (1738).

Having done with particulars, we now beg to present our readers with a summary of what is to be found in each of the two volumes. Vol. I. of Popular Music of the Olden Time treats of a general introduction; minstrelsy from the Saxon period to the reign of Edward I.; music of the middle ages, and music in England to the end of the thirteenth century; English minstrelsy from 1270 to 1480, and the gradual extinction of the old minstrels; introductions to the reigns of Henry VII., Henry VIII., Edward VI., and Mary, followed by songs and ballads of those reigns; time of Elizabeth, songs and ballads of her reign; James I., songs, &c., of his time, and Charles I. Vol. II.—conjectures as to Robin Hood, ballads relating to him; puritanism in its effects upon music, and introduction to Commonwealth period; songs of the civil wars and time of Cromwell; reign of Charles II.; songs of Charles II., and William and Mary; Anglo-Scotch songs; reigns of Anne, George I., and George II., songs of their day; traditional songs of uncertain date; Christmas carols; appendix; and further remarks upon various things in both volumes characteristics of national English airs; and summary.

Before taking leave of the Popular Music of the Olden Time, we must not omit to mention that there are two excellent indexes, and six very interesting fac similes of old music; the printing and paper of irreproachable quality.

To such of our readers who love a gossiping book, even if they do not know a note of music, we strongly recommend an acquaintance with these volumes, which, as long as a love for old music and our nationality is fostered, must become the text book for many years to come; and we know of no more handsome and intrinsically valuable a present to a respected friend than Mr. Chappell's Popular Music of the Olden Time, for, take it up at any moment, there is such a fund of anecdote, erudition, and acquaintance with our older literature, music, and customs, that the best read man cannot close these volumes without having, in the most cursory glance, gained some rare and quaint information.

INSTINCT.—Man, doubtless, has his instincts, even in common with the inferior animals, and many of these are the germs of some of the best feelings of his nature. What, amongst many, might I present as a better illustration, or more beautiful instance, than the storge or maternal instinct. But man's instincts are elevated and ennobled by the moral ends and purposes of his being.

NEW MUSIC.

Peace and Harmony; Masonic Song, dedicated by permission to the Worshipful Master, Officers and Brethren of the Lodge of Peace and Harmony. Words by Bro. G. M. PASSENGER, Music by Bro. G. PHILIP KLITZ, Organist, Nos. 152 and 462. London: Bro. CHARLES JEFFERYS, 21, Soho-square.

THIS is a capital song for Lodge purposes. It is composed in a somewhat familiar style, and bears snatches of melody that are not new to the musician, but easy of retention by those who can catch a tune to sing by ear. To be simple and original is a difficult matter in the present day, but Bro. Klitz has treated the words, which are truly of a Masonic spirit, as a musician knowing how to suit the popular taste without becoming scientific and uninteresting. Peace and Harmony ought to become a favourite with those singers among our fraternity who have but a limited range of voice and but little knowledge of the art. We hope to hear it on many occasions.

Poetry.

HAMPSTEAD HEATH.

BY CHARLES GRAY.

I've roved far over Britain—in foreign lands I've been,
 And grand and varied beauty have there delighted seen;
 But yet thy heath, fair Hampstead, is lovely to me still,
 As when in buoyant childhood I roamed o'er vale and hill.

Beneath yon fir-trees' shadow how often have I dreamed, Enchanted viewed the landscape their dark-crowned stems have Allowed my eyes to wander far o'er a sea of gold, [framed;
 More beautiful and glowing than miser ever told.

Or watched glad groups of children, in animated play,
 The sweet wild flowers gather or lure their finny prey;
 And on fine summer evenings or sunny holiday,
 The throngs that pour from London, wide o'er the heath to stray.

From crowded street, land, alley, from sun-eclipsed homes,
 Where God's unmeasured bounty—pure vital air—ne'er comes;
 To range mid Nature's beauties; to breathe the healthful gale;
 Beneath bright heav'n's clear expanse, joy, vigour to inhale.

Ye rulers, O! forget not, that energy and health
 Are Nature's richest blessings, a nation's sterling wealth;
 The source from which bright virtue and genius arise,
 With all the earthly treasures that men most dearly prize.

Behold yon o'ergrown city, with wide extended jaws,
 Our groves and smiling meadows remorselessly devours;
 Whose smoke pollutes the heavens, obscures the glorious sun,
 And England's noblest river has made a sewer to run,

With silent, stealthy footstep—insidious approach!
 E'en on this beauteous upland, fain would he now encroach;
 Forbid it, gen'rous wisdom—enlightened policy!
 Nor let such desecration, our children's children see!

IZAAK WALTON.

BY GEORGE MARKHAM TWEDDELL.*

THOU meek old angler, knight of hook and line!
 What glorious reveries methinks were thine,
 As 'neath the spreading sycamore you sat,
 To find a shelter from the vernal showers;
 Or wander'd in green lanes, with cheerful chat
 Making dull days seem pleasure's fleeting hours!
 Oh, how I love, in "fancy free," to roam
 By purling streams, in company with thee;
 Or, in some "honest ale house," see the foam
 Of nut-brown ale a mantling merrily
 Above the goblet's brim—whilst thou dost sing
 A quaint old song, and all the rafters ring
 With merry laughter at each harmless jest,—
 For of all wit the innocent is best.

MASONIC NOTES AND QUERIES.

[THERE can be no better time to address to our readers a few observations upon the aim of this department of the Freemasons' Magazine, than upon the occasion of the commencement of a new series.

It appears that the principle of our valuable cotemporary, Notes and Queries is not thoroughly understood by our brethren, and as we have only taken up so much of that idea as is applicable to Masonry, it may not be out of place here to give some little insight into what we wish to accomplish, and to ask those who contribute to these columns to do so on one uniform method, whereby our labours will be greatly simplified, and the utmost information elicited, on every subject under inquiry.

The Notes of this chapter are such as would occur to any brother in the course of his reading, and as no answer is required in the event of a fact or quotation stated, such communications will be ranged first as simple Notes.

Queries are of two kinds, those which we can reply to, and those which we cannot. In many instances we shall be enabled to afford the necessary information, and such answer will, to mark it as a reply, appear enclosed within brackets. To those questions which have no answer attached, we hope to be understood as wanting the necessary references or explanation, it being impossible for any person to solve such inquiries without patient search and investigation.

The arrangement for the future will be:—Queries without answers first; and those with replies last.

We hope our readers will not wait to see if we can add the information sought; but at once send an elucidation if they can, and where two or more are sent, they will both, or all, appear, unless they happen to coincide.

We would also urge the propriety of each Querist signing his name, nom de plume, initials, or some mark by which he may be distinguished, giving us, under cover, his real name, not for the purpose of publication, but only to insure good faith on the part of the large circle who are now gathering around us; and we would especially recommend some definite signature in preference to "P.Ms." and "P.Zs.," and others of that kind, as they are likely to cause confusion.

In making the above remarks, we disclaim any interference with the other departments of the Freemasons' Magazine, our department being confined to Notes and Queries on antiquarian, historical, and literary matters connected with the Craft, and, where possible, verified by quotations from the works consulted, all of which should be done briefly, and not in the form of letters, those properly coming under the general heading of the "Correspondence" department of the Magazine.

Brethren making inquiries respecting purely personal matters, interesting only to themselves, and not of general interest, will still be answered by the editor in their proper place, under "Notices to Correspondents".

THE ANTIDILUVIAN MASONIC PILLARS.

Permit me to add a note to the R.W. Bro. Kelly's communication in No. 2 of the present series, where reference is made to a MS. which states the sciences of geometry and Masonry were perpetuated after the flood, by means of two pillars set up by Enoch. In Josephus, (lib. i, cap. 2), the author affirms that the stone pillar was extant in Syria in his time, but he omits to say where.—PHILO-JUDEUS.

PROV. G.M. FOR CORNWALL, IN 1793.

John St. Aubyn was Prov. G.M. for Cornwall in the above year, and as such, in connection with the Prov. G. Sec., Francis Mirkins, signed an address to the Prince of Wales on behalf of the Grand Lodge assembled on the 7th of January, 1793.

FREEMASONRY IN SMYRNA.

At a time when the Grand Secretary has had to call the attention of Craftsmen to the spurious nature of the body styling itself the Grand Lodge of Smyrna, the following extract may be acceptable as giving some account of the introduction of Freemasonry there.

Alexander Drummond, who was British Consul at Aleppo in 1715, visited Smyrna in that year, and states, "At this carnival season they have an assembly here, to which Mr. Consul Crawley did me the honour to introduce me, and, as I had formed a Lodge of Freemasons in the place, the ladies had conceived a strange notion of my character; for I had been represented to them by some priest, as a conjurer of the first magnitude, who had the devil at my command, and raised the dead by my diabolical incantations. These terrible prepossessions, instead of frightening them, had only served to raise their curiosity, and when I entered the room they surveyed me with truly female attention: after they had satisfied their eyes with a most minute examination, they seemed to think I did not differ much from the other children of Adam, and became so familiar to my appearance, that one of the number was hardy enough to desire me to dance with her; and, as she escaped without danger, I was afterwards challenged by a pretty little blooming creature with whom I waltzed seven minutes during the course of the evening.

"As I have mentioned the Lodge of Free Masons, I cannot help congratulating myself upon the opportunity I had of making so many worthy brethren in this place, and of forming the only Lodge that is in the Levant."

Our worthy brother closes these remarks by a song, one verse of which is quoted—

"But now Britannia's gen'rous sons
A glorious Lodge have rais'd,
Near the sam'd banks where Meles runs,
And Homer's cattle graz'd."

From Alexander Drummond's Travels, fol., London, 1754.

THE INVASION OF ENGLAND.

Extract of a circular letter from the Grand Master of the Religious and Military Order of Knight Templars in England, to the Chapters of that confraternity.

"Dear Brother and Knight Companion,—As the nation is preparing to guard against an invasion from our enemies, if they should have the temerity to make an attempt, it is become my duty, at this important crisis, to request and require that such of you as can, without prejudice to your families, do hold yourselves in readiness (as Knights Templar) to unite with, and be under the command of the officers of the military corps stationed in your respective counties, as may be most convenient, taking the name of 'Prince Edward's Royal Volunteers.' When the important moment arrives, I shall offer my service in the navy or army; and whenever I have the honour to be received, shall inform you of my address; and although we are prevented, by adverse circumstances, from assembling together where I might have had the honour and happiness of commanding in person, yet our hearts will be united in the glorious cause, in conformity to the sacred obligations we are under. Let our prayers be addressed to the Throne of Grace; that as Christ's faithful soldiers and servants we may be enabled to defend the Christian religion, our gracious sovereign, our laws, liberties, and properties against a rapacious enemy. Let the word of the day be, the "will of God;" and let us remember, that a day, an hour of virtuous liberty, is worth a whole eternity of bondage.

"The Knights Companions are required to wear the uniform of the corps in which they serve as volunteers, with the Cross of the Order of the Knights Templar on a black riband between two button holes on the breast of the waistcoat.

"Your faithful Brother and Knight Companion,
"April 11th. "THOMAS DUNCKERLEY, G.M.
"A.D. 1794, A.O. 676."

Thinking the foregoing may be an incentive to the Knights Templar in these days of rifle clubs, so that we may have some champions of the higher grades amongst us, should occasion require, I was induced to send you the above.—F. M. A.

MASONIC LYING IN STATE.

In an account of the life of Bro. Brice, of Exeter, long renowned as the oldest and most enthusiastic Mason of Devonshire at the end of the last century, we read that on his death in 1773, "his corpse lay in Masonic state at the Apollo Inn at Exeter; and every person paid a shilling to be admitted, the amount of which amply defrayed the expenses of his funeral, which was performed agreeable to the exact and solemn form long established among Masons, more than three hundred of whom, together with as many inhabitants of the city, attended the remains to the grave in Bartholomew churchyard, an anthem composed on purpose being sung on the occasion."

Can any brother add other instances of Masons being exhibited in state after death? Also, was it usual to charge a fee for admission to see such a lying in state? and, Is there any monumental record to the memory of Bro. Price now standing in St. Bartholomew churchyard, Exeter?—P.G.

FOREIGN RITE.

I met with a brother who called himself a "Sublime Master of the Luminous Ring." What was he? What ring is meant? Is the style American?—W. W.

GRAND STEWARDS' LODGE.

When was the Grand Stewards' Lodge constituted?—A WORLD-RE-GRAND STEWARD.

[According to the Freemasons' Calendar, printed for the Company of Stationers, 1775, it is stated, "Stewards apply to the Grand Lodge for certain privileges, which are granted to them; and are constituted into a regular Lodge of Master Masons, June 24, 1735. * * Twelve Stewards appear in the Grand Lodge with their regalia, for the first time, but are not permitted to vote. Dec. 11. 1735].

LANGUAGE OF THE RITUAL.

I should be glad to know if there is any objection to a Lodge conducting its proceedings in a classical tongue, supposing all the members to be agreeable?—A YOUNG MASON.

[Our correspondent and his brethren would be entitled, we apprehend, to perform all Masonic rites in Cherokee, or any other language they understood, but there would be still the difficulty of a visitor presenting himself who in his ignorance of the language might, if not courteously met, say that the brethren not being good workers chose to amuse themselves and him, by a display of gibberish no one could comprehend. Seriously, however, our young Masonic brother has been forestalled, as in 1784, Dr. Brown, the well known Edinburgh physician, organized the Lodge of the Roman Eagle at Edinburgh, in which the whole of the Masonic work was conducted in the Latin tongue, and gave occasion to a wag, who was a visitor, opening with a grand classical harangue, and adroitly alluding to Matthew Prior, quoted him as follows, to the horror of the brethren of the Roman Eagle:—

"Hang Homer and Virgil their meaning to seek,
A man must have pok'd into Latin and Greek;
Those who love their own tongue, we have reason to hope,
Have read them translated by Dryden and Pope."]

OFFICERS OF THE GRAND LODGE OF LINCOLN IN 1793.

Who was the Reverend William Peters, who held the rank of Prov. Grand Master of the province of Lincoln in 1793? I am aware he was chaplain to the Prince of Wales.—T. PETERS.

[Bro. Peters was born in the Isle of Wight, but early removed to Ireland, and afterwards became an LL.B. of Exeter College, Oxford. His chief claim to be remembered was his devotion to the fine arts, and with this view he twice visited Italy. In 1763 the Imperial Academy of Florence elected him a member, and in this country he was chosen by the council of the Royal Academy as an R.A. Having gained the highest honours of art this country could bestow, he flung away his pencil, and entered the church in 1779. The pictures in Freemasons' Hall of the Prince of Wales, the Dukes of Cumberland and Manchester, and Lord Petre are from his hand. There is a picture by him, a copy of the San Gieralomo at Parma, which is still placed as an altar piece at the church of Saffron Walden, in Essex. He was also the main designer of the plates of Alderman Boydell's "Shakespeare." The church preferments of the Rev. William Peters were the Rectory of Knipton in Leicestershire, and Woolsthorpe in Lincolnshire, Prebendary of Lincoln Cathedral, and Chaplain to the Prince of Wales. He was made Prov. Grand Master for Lincoln when the Prince of Wales (George IV.), accepted the chair as Grand Master. The other officers, at the time our correspondent inquires for, were William Doddworth, M.D., D. Prov. Grand Master; Matthew Barnett, S.G.W.; Gervas Parnell, J.G.W.]

BRO. JOHN WATKINS, LL.D.

In answer to your question in the June number of the Freemasons' Magazine, page 1121, respecting Bro. John Watkins, LL.D., I beg to state that he was a native of Bideford. He resided for about twenty-five years in London, where he died and was buried about twenty years since. He was the author of a history of Bideford as well also as several works of a religious character. He left a widow and children who, I believe, are still living in London.—W. DERRY PEARSE.

ENGLISH AND AMERICAN MASONRY.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE FREEMASONS' MAGAZINE AND MASONIC MIRROR.

DEAR SIR AND BROTHER,—In your last issue (23rd instant) I notice a communication under date of July 3rd, signed "R.F.X.," relative to American brethren or sojourners claiming to be Masons, and hailing from some jurisdiction in the United States. The author inquires if I cannot name some one in London who can explain the differences existing between English and American Masonry, so that the social privileges and benefits of our Order may not be refused the American brotherhood who may chance to visit this country. I am highly gratified to learn that this subject is claiming the attention of our English brethren, and as my mission to this country is purely Masonic, having in view the grand object of opening a channel by which the European and American Craft may become better acquainted with each other, I will with pleasure, and free of charge, while in England, Ireland, or Scotland, when I have a favourable opportunity, rehearse the lectures, exemplify the work, and impart such other information, so far as my feeble abilities will permit, as may be conducive to the interest of the great and glorious work in which I am engaged.

These are my instructions from that great light in American Masonry, Bro. Rob Morris, Grand Master of Kentucky, whom I have the distinguished honour to represent, and with whom I have enlisted, "not as a twelve months' volunteer, but for the whole war."

I have already on several occasions, at the very kind invitations of the London brethren, rehearsed the lectures and explained some of the ceremonies as practised in the United States. Among the teachers of the English ritual who have kindly supported me on these several occasions I would name Bros. Stephen Barton Wilson, Thomas Alexander Adams, William Watson and Thomas Anslow, to whom, with yourself and many others, I am indebted for favours received, which will never be forgotten. I think it is but justice to say that I believe Bro. Wilson to be more familiar with what little information it has been my privilege to impart, as he has been present at all times when I gave the American lecture, with only one exception; and I am sure he will readily give information to less informed brethren who can make it convenient to call on him. And here I would beg leave to say to the Masons of England—you cannot be too strict with American Masons "as regards the universal test of Masonry." And further, if the examinations that have come under my observation since I have been in England, are a fair sample of the standard used in this country, that standard is not sufficient to protect you from American imposition.

I say this with all due deference to the intelligence and discretion of any English brethren. It may be very well in this country where every Mason has a Grand Lodge certificate, the form of which, together with the names and numbers of the Lodges and the Grand Secretary's signature, every Master is more or less familiar with—but in America, very few Grand Lodges grant certificates, and suppose they did, might they not fall into unworthy hands: could you tell whether the signatures were genuine or not? For instance, I have in my possession a certificate of the Grand Lodge of England with the seal attached, but without the signatures, and I ask what would prevent my forging that certificate and presenting it to a country Lodge in the United States, or any other foreign country, where they never saw one of your certificates, much less being familiar with the Grand Secretary's signature.

Thus, while admitting that a Grand Lodge certificate is an excellent document, and that every Mason should possess one, yet in many respects it is a dead letter. Is it not well, then, to be sure that a stranger is familiar with the inside of a Lodge before you admit him. If he is not, that is his fault and not yours, and if he finds that through his own laziness and for the want of a proper knowledge of our art he has failed to gain admission to Lodges, it will stimulate him to apply himself until he has acquired the necessary information; and I should be proud if no American brother could get admission to any but his mother Lodge until he had at least mastered the lectures as practised in the jurisdiction when he first saw the light. If this were the case we should not have so many indolent, indifferent drones hanging around, sucking the life out of our more industrious and useful Masons.

After having visited more Masonic Lodges than any other young man of my age in the United States, which has been my privilege to do since I have been a pupil of Bro. Rob Morris, I draw this conclusion—that the time is not far distant when the brother who does not think enough of Masonry to study it until he has familiarized himself with its ceremonies and lectures, besides having some knowledge of its principles, will not be admitted to the American Lodges, and thus be denied any participation in our social enjoyments.

Let us attain this position, and the Masonic Lodge will be as Bro. Morris describes it in one of his famous addresses, "a school where all hearts are bent upon the acquisition of knowledge." But I must close, and if I have assumed more than my due in asking a place for this feeble letter, I trust it will be accredited to the very great zeal of a young and devoted Mason. In the bonds of fraternal love, I remain, respectfully yours, 25th July, 1859.

MASONIC MISSIONS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE FREEMASONS' MAGAZINE AND MASONIC MIRROR.

SIR AND BROTHER,—Spare me a small portion of your valuable columns to correct an erroneous impression into which Bro. Cole seems to have fallen, respecting the necessity for the existence of a Lodge at Milford.

I know Bro. Cole, and although he is but a comparatively young member of the Craft, I can bear testimony to his Masonic acquirements in the working of a Lodge; but I am sure he will excuse me if I remind him that there is much more than that necessary to entitle any one to give an opinion on such an important subject. It requires a lengthened Masonic experience—a far more lengthened one than can as yet have fallen to his lot—to say whether a Lodge is necessary at this, that, or the other place in the province, or not. Milford is a port of importance; vessels of all nations are constantly to be met with, floating upon its peaceful waters, and with but ordinary care and attention I know of no place where a Lodge is likely to be more prosperous.

I am one of the oldest Masons in the country, the founder of the Milford and the Pembroke Dock Lodges, of both of which I am the Senior Past Master; not a public meeting of the fraternity has occurred during the last thirty years that I have not directed, nor an arrangement made upon which I have not been consulted. I mention this to show the active co-operation I have so long given and am still affording to the Masonic business of the district, and to prove my great experience in its details, which it cannot be denied must qualify me better than himself to give an opinion. I therefore unhesitatingly assert that Milford is one of the best places possible for holding a Lodge, and would my old and esteemed friends at that town and neighbourhood but emulate their former zeal, its prosperity would ever be such as to convince even Bro. Cole of the correctness of my judgment.

I am, Sir and Brother, yours very obediently,
Pembroke Dock,
20th July, 1859.

W. THOMAS,
Prov. G. Dir. of Cers.

MASONIC HALLS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE FREEMASONS' MAGAZINE AND MASONIC MIRROR.

DEAR SIR AND BROTHER,—There are few things more discouraging to an active man who is bent on doing good, and seeks means and opportunities of benefiting those around him, than to find that he cannot induce others to think as he does, or at least to display the same energy that he is disposed to exert for the furtherance of his favourite projects. He may be crotchety and unreasonable, and in that case it is wise on the part of others to abstain from participation in his schemes. It is far otherwise, however, when the desideratum which he is anxious to supply is generally acknowledged; when it is not a question as to what is desirable, but of will and power to accomplish it; and when apathy and indolence are the only obstacles to such hearty co-operation as would effectually remove all difficulties. Comparatively few are influenced by motives of pure philanthropy, the larger proportion of mankind needing some stimulus of the nature of self-interest, and even that is frequently ineffective unless it be of a strictly personal nature, appertaining to individuals rather than to bodies of men, and thus its useful operation is of course greatly restricted.

These remarks may be applied with more or less force to the exertions of yourself and others on behalf of Masonic Halls, for though undoubtedly a feeling in favour of them is gradually being excited, comparatively little has yet been done, and those who are favourably disposed are easily daunted by the pecuniary and other difficulties which arise. The obstacles are of various kinds and degrees. Often want of funds is pleaded as an excuse. Others act on the laissez faire system, and feel that what has done for their predecessors is good enough for them. Some young Masons, animated by a laudable zeal, and anxious to remedy the evils of the present system, bestir themselves, but have to encounter jealousy on the part of the old members, who claim a sort of prescriptive right to rule. There are some even, who, though it is confidently hoped that their number is very limited, openly acknowledge their opinion that the banquet is Freemasonry. In many cases, location for many years has led to an identification between a hotel and a Lodge; and it is difficult to take any step which may give offence to a kind host who has perhaps in time past been the means of keeping the Lodge together through periods of depression and neglect—removal would therefore be an act of ingratitude. A case of this kind occurs to my mind, where long connexion and past services deservedly have great weight; in this instance, twelve years ago a Past Master of the Lodge offered to present new furniture to the extent of £100, whenever its preservation should be secured by the provision of a suitable room restricted to Masonic purposes; yet to this moment nothing has been done from the causes just assigned, and it is probably now too late to claim the performance of the promise.

The preceding observations are prompted by a scheme to which you have kindly lent the aid of your pen and your columns, for the erection of a Masonic temple by the members of Lodge La Césaire, in Jersey, in which I take an interest, but to which I do not belong. Difficulties of the various kinds alluded to must and will arise, and though, as you have predicted in your notice of the report which was presented on the subject, there can be no doubt of ultimate success, the task will require all the energy that can be devoted to it. It was part of the plan for raising the necessary funds, to issue circulars to every Lodge in England and Wales, stating the circumstances, and soliciting a trifle from each to place a few stones in the building. What success will attend this appeal remains yet to be seen. Some of the younger brethren, whose practical knowledge of Freemasonry is limited to their own sphere, and who fondly hope that all elsewhere are animated by the same zeal as themselves, are sanguine as to the result. Others of more experience shake their heads, regret that they are compelled to come to a different conclusion, are willing that the experiment should be tried, but nevertheless are by no means hopeful of this part of the scheme. The circulars having been issued several weeks ago, have now reached the various Lodges in the country; this may therefore be deemed a favourable period to call the attention of such members of the Craft as have an opportunity of reading the Magazine to the subject, and respectfully to solicit their co-operation, even if only to the extent of a sovereign, or less, in order to evince their sympathy with a Lodge which is determined on a vigorous effort for independence, willing also to assist in fighting the battle against the hotel influence, and to make considerable sacrifices in the cause.

It would be unreasonable to expect the simultaneous erection of Masonic Halls all over the country. In some districts the step has been taken. Surely the victory there achieved, the experience of the ease and comfort thus obtained, should lead to sympathy and aid to others who desire to tread in their steps. They must, by the occupation of a building essentially their own, be free from many expenses to which they were formerly liable, and thus be in possession of reserve funds, which may, to a small extent at least, be applicable to render some assistance to their less fortunate brethren.

Allusion has been made to the necessity for exciting a personal interest, and proving that the use of a separate and distinct Masonic building is good policy as a matter of economy, independently of higher motives. It can easily be shown that this exists, and that in the end a pecuniary benefit will arise from a judicious temporary outlay. In some localities there may be no possibility, from a limitation of Lodges in the neighbourhood, or other local causes, of erecting a hall for some years to come. In such instances, it is their interest to assist others more favourably situated in this respect, in order that when their own time should come, they may confidently rely on similar aid. It may perhaps be estimated that on an average the sum of £900 will be requisite for the erection of a Masonic temple. In populous towns, with several Lodges, it would amount to more, because they would require larger rooms, accommodation for holding Lodges of Instruction or committee meetings, at one and the same time, and they would probably aim at greater conveniences in other respects.

while in some towns of limited extent a smaller sum than that named might suffice. The promoters of each individual scheme may fairly be expected to raise one third by voluntary contributions. Another third may be raised by mortgage. Is it too much to hope that a large proportion of the Lodges throughout the country might be calculated upon as contributors of from half a sovereign to a sovereign each, and that thus the remaining £300 might be collected? In this case, taking the lesser sum named, if each Lodge were to set aside £5 per annum for the purpose, assistance could be given for the erection of ten halls every year, and thus, in a comparatively short period, there need not be a Lodge in the country held in a building not consecrated to the purpose; because where there are two or more Lodges in the same town, they might unite in the expense and responsibility of the erection, and might afterwards enjoy the joint use of it. Small sums thus dispensed from time to time would not be felt as a burthen, or as pressing too heavily on a Lodge or on any of its members, and there would be a moral certainty of a return in time of need. Even, however, should the latter not be the case, or should no necessity for reciprocal assistance arise, it is much to be able to perform a graceful act, which must have a tendency to benefit the Craft, by elevating its status, not merely in a particular locality, but wherever its benefits are diffused.

But there is still another view of the case, which presents strong motives of self-interest. How many men of the very class we desire to see members of our fraternity, keep aloof from us, solely because they like not our associations, and not unreasonably distrust the principles of any society which leads them habitually to places devoted to sensual gratification, necessary it is true for the accommodation of the public, but discreditable to a body of men who boast that the system they uphold is for the inculcation of pure morality, and the support of everything which has a tendency to raise mankind in the social scale, and to lead them to a better appreciation of the object of the Almighty in placing them in this sublunary sphere of existence, and of the duties they owe to Him and to their fellow creatures. If we desire to maintain our position, to satisfy the external world of our claim to consideration, to attract to us the wise and good, we must especially provide that all our associations shall be such as to command the respect of those whose favourable judgment of our pretensions we desire to gain, and take care that our practices shall in no way be repugnant to our professions.

It is perhaps no bold assertion, that in proportion as we withdraw ourselves from all demoralizing or even equivocal influences, so will our numbers increase, and a larger number of men of position and character will be led to range under our banners, who otherwise would not entertain the idea of it; thus, even peculiarly, our Lodges would be in a better condition, and more able to perform those Masonic duties of charity and brotherly love, which are leading features of our system, by the co-operation of men whose means accord with the dictates of their hearts, and the principles of the Craft, irrespective of any saving effected by greater moderation in social indulgences, the latter point being worthy of serious consideration.

It has been suggested that temporary assistance might be offered to Lodges in the erection of buildings by the Board of General Purposes. Another mode of effecting the object presents itself, which has been successful under other circumstances, and of which it appears possible for the Craft to take advantage with the same chances of benefit. Why may not associations be formed of such Lodges as entertain so laudable a desire? In England there are numerous building societies, by means of which many of the working classes have by small periodical payments become possessed of land or houses within a short term of years. There seems no reason why the principles on which such associations are conducted may not be applied in our case, and thus in turn there may be secured to all Lodges which unite for the purpose, a local habitation, and it may be hoped, a respectable name and character. Scattered as we are over the country, the greatest difficulty would be in the initiatory steps to form such a society. The suggestion is offered therefore in confidence, that if it be worth anything, it will be taken up by some one in authority in the Craft, and laid before Grand Lodge, by whom arrangements for the purpose might be delegated to the Board of General Purposes, or to a committee especially appointed for the purpose.

In conclusion, allow me to sum up by calling the attention of your readers to the claim on their kind aid contained in the circular alluded to; by requesting a small sum, if only as an expression of good will, with a hearty God speed; by urging every Lodge in the country, as means and opportunities arise, to make a similar effort; by reminding them that it will tend to exalt the Craft in public estimation beyond any other measure that could be adopted; by pointing out that it is a politic step, as one that will ensure even a pecuniary benefit, to say nothing of higher motives, by attracting within our pale many who otherwise withhold their support and sanction to what they believe in itself to be good, but open to abuses from causes which might easily be removed.

Yours faithfully and fraternally,

July 23rd, 1859.

THE MASONIC MIRROR.

MASONIC MEMS.

THE next Provincial Grand Lodge for the western district of South Wales, is not likely to be convened before September or October next. It will be held either at Llanelli or Carmarthen. A change of Provincial Grand Officers will take place on the occasion.

A YEOVIL correspondent writes—"An application recently made by some Crewkerne brethren, and recommended by the officers and brethren of No. 412, for a warrant to open a new Lodge, had been refused as prejudicial to the interests of the Craft. This is matter of deep regret to those zealous brethren who for years have been striving to resuscitate the cause in that town. Their efforts, long ineffectual, seemed on the point of being crowned with success, and there can be no doubt that, had the charter been granted, two or three months only would have sufficed to add a flourishing Lodge of some thirty members to the province."

THE Westbourne Lodge of Instruction will in future meet on alternate Tuesdays, at Bro. Bailey's, Manor House, Westbourne-terrace.

The Provincial Grand Lodge of the Eastern Division of South Wales is appointed to be held on the 5th proximo, under the presidency of the Prov. Grand Master, Bro. Chas. Kemey's Tynte, grandson of Col. Tynte. Prov. Grand Master for Somersetshire.

METROPOLITAN.

ROYAL MASONIC INSTITUTION FOR BOYS.

THE following is a list of the several committees of the institution for the years 1859-60:—

GENERAL COMMITTEE.—The following brethren, and all life governors. They meet at the offices in Great Queen-street on the first Saturday in every month, at four o'clock in the afternoon precisely—William Thomas Adrian; Benedict Albano; Richard Carter; William M. Best; Henry Cowland; Henry Grant Baker; Alfred Day; Joseph Ede; Robert Farren; William Gath; A. H. Hewlett; J. W. Monnery; John P. Marks; J. N. Sheen; Dr. G. R. Rowe; W. Thiselton Dyer; Thomas Tombleson; Thomas Waring; William Watson; Benjamin Winstone.

HOUSE COMMITTEE.—Meet at Lordship Lodge, Lordship-lane, Tottenham, on the last Friday in every month—William Henry Absolon; George Cox; Rev. J. E. Cox; J. Duff Filer; Benjamin Head; J. S. S. Hopwood; Rev. William H. Lyall; William Paas; Charles Robinson; William Pulteney Scott; Thomas Waring; William Young.

AUDIT COMMITTEE.—Meet at the offices on the last Saturday in January, April, July, and October, at two o'clock precisely—Henry Empson; George Haward; Peter Matthews; Algernon Perkins; John Symonds; Henry George Warren.

BEADON LODGE (No. 902).—This Lodge met on Wednesday, at the Star and Garter, Kew Bridge. In the absence of the W.M., Bro. Denyer, the immediate P.M., Bro. C. Potter, officiated. Having opened the Lodge in the three degrees, he conferred the degree of M.M. on Bro. Ilgees; and that of Fellow Craft on Bro. Fry. The Lodge having been resumed to the first degree, Messrs. W. G. Jacob, W. Simonds, and S. King, were initiated into the Order, with a correctness that excited the admiration of all present. The brethren then proceeded to the election of W.M. for the ensuing twelve months, and the result of the ballot was in favour of Bro. Collins, S.W. Bro. John Scott was unanimously elected Treasurer; and Bro. Daly re-elected Tyler. At the close of the business the brethren partook of a dinner, which did credit to Bro. Rackstraw. The toasts usual at Masonic meetings were given and properly responded to. Some excellent singing by Bros. T. W. Adams, Platt, Airey and others, contributed much to the enjoyment of the evening, which was brought to an early close, to enable the metropolitan brethren to leave by the ten o'clock train. The visitors present were, Bros. Alfred, P.M., No. 25; Newton, P.M., No. 25; Wade, W.M., No. 103; Walkley, P.M., No. 367; Wyatt, P.M., No. 166; and others.

ROYAL ALFRED LODGE (No. 1082).—This Lodge, which is under the inaugural Mastership of the V.W. Bro. Joseph Smith, G. Pur., was summoned to meet at the Star and Garter hotel, Kew-bridge, on Friday, the 22nd instant, in consequence of Bro. Tull, the host of the Rising Sun, Fulham, having stated to the W.M., that he was desirous that the Lodge should discontinue its meetings at his house. The Royal Alfred members having been convened to meet at Bro. Rackstraw's, at Kew, on the day above mentioned, there was a full attendance of the members of this young Lodge. The business consisted in raising Bro. Charles Jeffereys, the author and music publisher, and admitting Bro. Alfred Davies, of the Domatic Lodge, No. 206, as a joining member. Some other gentlemen were put down for initiation, but owing to private engagements, and the change of the location of the Lodge, it was thought best that they should not present themselves on this occasion. After the business the Lodge was called off from labour to refreshment, and the banquet, which gave unmixed satisfaction to all present, being in Bro. Rackstraw's usual good style, being ended, the subject of the removal of the Lodge was taken into consideration, and it was unanimously resolved that the Royal Alfred Lodge, No. 1082, should henceforth hold its meetings at Bro. Rackstraw's, the Star and Garter, Kew-bridge. Among the visitors were Bro. Todd, P.M., No. 29, Bro. Andrews, P.M., No. 725, and Bro. P. Davis, of No. 206. In the course of the evening, the usual loyal and Masonic toasts were given, and Bro. Todd, in responding to the health of the visitors, dwelt with much force upon the very superior working of the Lodge, and his happiness in being a second time a visitor of the Royal Alfred, which contrasted so strongly with the first visit he paid, in improved accommodation and position. The brethren generally expressed their satisfaction with Bro. Rackstraw's provision and desire to make them comfortable, and it was generally felt that the Royal Alfred Lodge had found a permanent home under a roof tree where it must ultimately flourish. The Tyler's toast having brought to an end a pleasant and happy meeting, the brethren adjourned at a reasonable hour to meet the train.

INSTRUCTION.

ROBERT BURNS LODGE (No. 25).—At this Lodge of Instruction, on Friday, 23rd inst., the ceremony of installation was very correctly rehearsed by Bro. T. D. Caulcher, W.M. elect of the Prince William Frederick Lodge, No. 1055. Afterwards the whole of the sections of the first lecture were worked by Bro. W. Walley, W.M., assisted by Bros. T. A. Adams; W. Watson; States; Newton; Great Rex; Caulcher; Riley; Legasick; Sedgwick, &c. The experiment of keeping this Lodge open during the summer months has more than realized the hopes of the promoters, the best evidence of which is the full attendance of members on each night of meeting.

ROYAL ALFRED LODGE (No. 1082).—At our visit on Thursday, 21st inst., we were pleased to find Bro. J. Smith, G. Pur., as W.M., who selected as the work for the evening, the ceremony of raising and the lectures of that degree. Several sections of the first lecture were also worked in a manner highly creditable for so young a Lodge. We are informed that the parent Lodge will in future meet at the Star and Garter, Kew Bridge, instead of the Rising Sun, Walham Green.

PROVINCIAL.

BERKS AND BUCKS.

AYLESBURY.—Buckingham Lodge (No. 861).—The regular meeting of this Lodge was held at the White Hart Hotel, on Monday, July 18th, when there was a very good attendance of the members. The principal business before the Lodge was, "to recommend a petition for a Royal Arch Chapter to be attached to the Lodge." After some discussion this subject was (on the motion of the J. W., the Rev. O. J. Grace), adjourned to the next meeting. A letter from the Grand Lodge, respecting irregular Lodges at Smyrna, was read by the Secretary, and entered in the minutes of the Lodge. Several notices of motions were then given, the most important of which was, that an additional by-law be added to the already existing rules, by which brethren may be allowed to become life members of the Lodge. This motion is proposed by P.M. the Rev. J. C. Farmbrough, Prov. G. Chaplain of Berks and Bucks; and seconded by P.M. the Rev. J. B. Readle. The business of the Lodge being over, the brethren adjourned to refreshment.

CHANNEL ISLANDS.

JERSEY.—Lodge La Césarée (No. 860).—An emergency meeting was held on Friday, July 22nd, rendered necessary (as has of late often been the case), by the amount of work in hand. On this occasion the circular of summons contained the names of three candidates for initiation—two for the second, and three for the third degree. The chair was taken by the W.M., Bro. Le Crae, at six o'clock, the Wardens, Bro. Bauloins and Bro. Binet, occupying their respective places, and Bro. Perrot, one of the Deacons, undertaking the duties both of himself and his colleague, who was absent. As a young Mason, who has only recently been placed in office, his efficiency deserves especial mention. The Lodge was opened in the second degree, and Bros. Leigh and Moss were afterwards passed by the W.M. Bro. Ratier, the Orator, was preparing to give the explanation by aid of the tracing board, but as the labours of the evening were heavy, it was postponed to the next occasion. Bros. Gallichan, Le Feuvre and Smith were then subjected to the usual examination, and afterwards duly raised by Bro. Schmit, P.M., in a most impressive manner. An address on the sublime degree was then delivered by the Orator with all the fervour which characterizes his orations. The candidates for initiation did not present themselves; nevertheless the sitting occupied four hours, and the Lodge was not closed till after ten o'clock, allowing but a short time for refreshment and social intercourse. It must be mentioned that the Lodge was honoured by a visit from the R.W. Bro. Kelly, D. Prov. G.M. for Leicestershire, who expressed his gratification at the prosperity of Lodge La Césarée, and at the efficiency, correctness, and solemn character of the working.—H. H.

CUMBERLAND.

WHITEHAVEN.—Sun, Square, and Compass Lodge (No. 138).—This numerous Lodge met in their new Hall on the 27th ult., to celebrate the festival of St. John. The following brethren were appointed officers for the ensuing twelve months, by the newly installed W.M., Bro. James Dees:—Bros. James Jackson, P.M.; John Davis, S.W.; Wm. B. Gibson, J.W.; James White, S.D.; George Ryrie, J.D.; G. W. Kenworthy, I.G.; Wm. Cowie, Sec.; Joseph Fletcher, Treas. The installation ceremony was previously performed by Bro. J. Fletcher, P.M. The brethren, about sixty in number, dined together afterwards. This Lodge possesses the nucleus of a library, £10 worth of Masonic books having been presented to it by the W.M., Bro. Dees, in March last.

HAMPSHIRE.

PROVINCIAL GRAND LODGE AT SOUTHAMPTON.

On Tuesday, the 19th inst., a very numerous meeting of the Freemasons of the province of Hampshire, took place at the Freemasons' Hall, in Bugle street, Southampton. This was the annual gathering of the Provincial Grand Lodge. The last annual meeting was held at Basingstoke, and next year the Grand Lodge will meet at Aldershot.

The Grand Lodge was close tiled at an early hour in the morning. There were many distinguished members of the Craft in attendance, the Right Worshipful Prov. Grand Master, Admiral Sir Lucius Curtis, Bart., presiding, supported by Bros. Thomas Willis Fleming, Prov. G.M. of the Isle of Wight; Wyndham S. Portal, P.G.W. of England; Hyde Pullen, D. Prov. G.M. of the Isle of Wight; C. E. Deacon, D. Prov. G.M. of Hants; Rev. G. R. Portal, Prov. G. Chap.; W. W. B. Beach, M.P., Prov. S.G.W.; W. C. Humphrys; Henry Ford (mayor of Portsmouth); J. R. Stebbing, Prov. G. Sec., pro tem.; also F. Perkins, R. Hulbert, G. W. Clarke, A. Fletcher, R. Parker, H. Abraham, H. Clarke, T. Falvey, G. Lungley, C. Sherry, J. Naisb, C. Copeland, Lisle (Prov. G. Pur.), &c., and many others from various parts of this county and other more distant parts.

The Lodge having been opened in due form, and with solemn prayer by the Prov. Grand Chaplain, business was at once commenced by the Grand Secretary, Bro. Stebbing, reading the minutes of the last annual meeting held at Basingstoke, in July, 1858.

Bro. Stebbing suggested that the minutes he had just read be confirmed in the usual way, with the exception of that part referring to the charities subsequently re-discussed at the meeting in the Lodge of Economy; this would prevent any clashing. Bro. Stebbing next read the minutes of the Lodge of Emergency held by the Province of Winchester on the 28th of March last, and further suggested that any wished for discussion at this point be upon the confirmation of these minutes.

THE MASONIC CHARITIES.

Bro. Stebbing called the attention of the Grand Lodge to the resolutions already adopted in respect to the formation of a charities committee.

Bro. the Rev. G. R. Portal said, as the matter at present stood, there was no charity committee member for this province.

Bro. Stebbing said there appeared a little difficulty, no doubt. Supposing they adopted the resolution brought forward at the Lodge of Emergency, a charity steward would be sent from each Lodge and those would help form the committee. There had been two resolutions moved, opposed to each other. The question had been whether the Master of a Lodge should act on the committee, or a special member of each Lodge in addition. The number originally proposed for the committee was seventeen, and the resolution carried by the Lodge of Emergency made it up to thirty-one. It was, however, thought the larger number was too many for good working, but the strongest discussion was directed to the point, whether the W.M. or a specially appointed member shall serve.

Bro. H. Ford, W.M., No. 391, and mayor of Portsmouth, said, having proposed the motion that had been carried at the Lodge of Emergency, he now begged to move that such part of the proceedings of the Lodge of Emergency be confirmed. His motion had been as follows:—"That approving generally of the suggestions contained in the report of Bro. Lyall and Symonds, it is resolved that so much of it as recommends the appointment of a special member from each Lodge, to be called the charity steward, as an addition to the committee, be adopted; and that the committee be instructed to guide themselves by the general spirit of the recommendations of the report in question, and that the R.W. Prov. Grand Master be respectfully requested to act on the committee."

The effect of this would be, to adopt the larger number, thirty-one, on the committee; not only having the W.M. as a charity member, but also appointing a delegate from each Lodge.

A Brother, whose name our correspondent could not catch, seconded the resolution.

Bro. Beach, Prov. S.G.W., said, for the purpose of arriving at a practical decision on the question, he would move as an amendment that the smaller number be adopted in forming the committee. The smaller number, he considered, would be found the most practical and efficient in working, and were the much easier to be got together.

Bro. C. Sherry, P.M., No. 90, seconded the amendment of Bro. Beach.

Bro. G. M. Passenger, S.W., No. 152, called attention to the fact that, after much discussion, the motion at the Lodge of Emergency was unanimously carried. He believed it was a mistake to suppose that the best committee could be got from the smaller number of brethren. They would seldom get the attendance of more than fourteen or sixteen, and that would not be found more than enough.

Bro. H. Abraham observed that it was only surmise when the number of the committee was reckoned as thirty-one; because out of the fourteen names as last agreed to be added, some would be W. Masters already nominated; so that the real number would be reduced to twenty.

Bro. Deacon offered a few remarks, in the course of which he said his experience told him that small committees worked better than large ones.

The amendment having been formally read by Bro. Stebbing, as follows:—"That the minutes relating to the charities, at both meetings, be rescinded, and that the appointment of a charity steward from each Lodge, as suggested in the last resolution, do constitute the charity committee, together with the Prov. Grand Master, Deputy Grand Chaplain, Grand Treasurer, and Grand Secretary." (Bro. Beach remarked that he merely moved it to provoke a discussion).

Bro. Ford spoke in reply. He said at the last meeting of the Grand Lodge at Winchester, after a considerable period spent in discussion, and carefully directing their minds to the subject, they had arrived at a resolution expressing it to be a desirable thing that the charities committee should consist not only of the principal officers of the province, but the Masters and also a delegate, so that each Lodge should have two representatives on such committee. He only wished brethren to understand that at the last Grand Lodge that was the opinion come to after much consideration. He ventured to say that that day there had not been made a single observation militating against the propriety or the prudence of the resolution so agreed to. He hoped and trusted that Grand Lodge would not now alter that decision. In fact, nothing had been said scarcely requiring an observation from him, in reply, and as he thought nothing had been advanced calculated to induce the brethren to alter their decision, he would conclude by expressing a hope that they would hesitate before they did so.

The R.W. Prov. Grand Master having put the question, there appeared on a division to be twenty-three for the motion, and ten against it. The resolution of the Lodge of Emergency was therefore confirmed. A large number of brethren did not vote at all.

GRAND LODGE AND THE PROVINCES.

Bro. Ford, W.M. No. 391, and mayor of Portsmouth, said he wished to make a proposition to Grand Lodge, but in consideration of the great heat of the day, and the probable anxiety of all to adjourn to another place, he would not detain them with any lengthened observations. His wish was neither to provoke a long discussion nor to give rise to any acrimonious feeling, but he knew there existed considerable dissatisfaction as to the representation of the provincial Lodges in the Grand Lodge at London, and he much wished something could be devised to place matters on a better footing.

The R.W. Prov. Grand Master: We cannot interfere with the appointments of the Grand Master.

Bro. Ford continued: If, Right Worshipful sir, you think that is intended, I fear you do not exactly understand what my motion is. He (Bro. Ford) did not in the least way propose to interfere with the functions or privileges of any of the Grand Officers of England or the Provinces. The fact was, there existed a growing desire in that province that the country members should have some better representation in Grand Lodge. To give effect to that wish he did not see that it was necessary to trespass upon any of the rights of the Most Worshipful Grand Master. Such a thing would be unmasonic, and he should shrink from it. The resolution he wished to have put was as follows:—"That a committee of this Prov. Grand Lodge be appointed to consider and report to a future meeting as to the best mode of improving the representation of the provinces in the Grand Lodge of England." He would most respectfully represent that this resolution did not interfere or trespass upon the privileges of the Grand Master. On the contrary, if such a suggestion were adopted, all little feelings of unpleasantness would vanish, and things would besides be placed upon their proper footing.

The R.W. Prov. Grand Master said he did not think he could receive the resolution.

Bro. Stebbing, addressing the Lodge, said, he begged to submit that a similar course to that now asked for had just been adopted in respect to the subject of charities, and that on a point of Order, the R.W. Master was justified in receiving the motion of the worshipful brother if he thought fit. One of the objects of that motion would doubtless be to suggest that as every member of Grand Lodge was entitled to attend quarterly communications, the notices now sent only to the Masters of Lodges a few days before the meeting, should be sent, with particulars of business to be done, direct to every brother so entitled to attend; and then, he would engage to say that one hundred and fifty members of Grand Lodge, from that and a neighbouring province of which few now saw a notice, would regularly attend, and that great Masonic senate would not then be practically the Grand Lodge of London alone, as it now was, but of the provinces also; and he might add, that from the great talent and energy existing amongst Masons in the provinces, great good would come of their more frequent association in Grand Lodge. The motion, also, might very properly be proposed in that province where no discord had ever existed, and where nothing unseemly ever occurred. (Loud cries of hear, hear). He sincerely hoped the R.W. Prov. Grand Master would allow the proposition to be submitted to the meeting, and he was convinced that the report of such a committee would be invaluable, and that Grand Lodge would be unanimous in passing the proposition. (Loud cheering.)

Bro. the Rev. G. R. Portal, Prov. G. Chaplain, said, he felt it to be due to his office to lay before the R.W.M. and the Lodge his reasons why the motion should be heard. The time had come when brethren must speak out. We know (said the rev. brother, addressing the chair) that you, Right Worshipful sir, are no party man, and that you hold the balance equally between the highest and the lowest; but the fact is, a great number of provincial Masons are not satisfied with the share they have in the transaction of business in Grand Lodge. I took the trouble to ascertain on one occasion the attendance of London and provincial brethren, when there were forty-six only from the provinces, and two hundred and fifty London brethren present. The small attendance of the provincial brethren did not arise from any want of interest in the proceedings; but the distance from London and the want of personal notice of the intended business of Grand Lodge, and other difficulties intervened. All that is now wanted is, to appoint a committee to make suggestions for some improvement in the arrangements. Perhaps it will be suggested to pay members from private funds, so as to ensure their attending Grand Lodge, and taking part in business affairs. It will be for the R.W. Prov. Grand Master to say, when the committee have drawn up their report, whether it was proper or not; therefore, I trust the motion will not be refused. Though you, Right Worshipful sir, may disapprove of the scheme, still we may lay our heads together for improvement.

Bro. Deacon, D. Prov. G.M., said their proceedings had hitherto been marked by perfect unanimity, and as this motion might possibly interrupt the same, he did not wish to see it introduced. The Worshipful Master, the two Wardens, and the Past Masters were all members of Grand Lodge, and if they did not attend it was their own fault. If members had no funds for necessary expenses, let their Lodge provide such for them. He hoped brethren would not adopt Bro. Ford's suggestion, and he was inclined to think that Bro. Ford himself had not fully considered the bearing of the motion he held in his hands.

Bro. Ford said he was sure the brother who last spoke had no grounds for imputing to him hasty or ill considered motives. He quite adhered to the words and the full import of the motion he had introduced; and he again most respectfully asked the R.W. Prov. Grand Master to take it into his consideration. He begged most distinctly to deprecate in the most powerful words, any improper intention, or any wish to bring about discord in any way whatever. (Hear.)

The R.W. Prov. G.M. observed that the W.Ms., the Wardens, and the P.Ms. of all Lodges were members of Grand Lodge and expected to attend. If it was required, and Lodges thought proper to remunerate certain brethren for giving their attendance at Grand Lodge, he did not know anything in the Book of Constitutions to prevent their so doing, as long as they paid up their dues to Grand Lodge. If Lodges sent representatives and remunerated them, they would then have that power in their own hands which they now complained of not possessing. He thought that the question having reference to the attendance of the W.Ms. and Wardens in Grand Lodge ought rather to be brought before private Lodges than the Provincial Grand Lodge, and therefore he could not receive the resolution.

Bro. Stebbing and others then expressed their readiness to submit to the direction of the R.W. Prov. Grand Master, and the subject dropped.

HANDSOME TESTIMONIAL.

Bro. A. Fletcher, W.M. of No. 462, here rose, and addressing the chair, said:—Right Worshipful sir, by your kind permission it has to day been assigned to me, as a most pleasing duty, to make this presentation, and although it might have been more effectually performed by others who, for a longer period than myself, have had the pleasure of the acquaintance and friendship of the worthy brother to whom we wish to do honour, yet no one more highly appreciates his excellence than I do. His valuable services have at all times been cheerfully and ably rendered for the good of our noble and glorious institution, an institution venerable for its antiquity, sacred in its character, and benevolent in its purposes. In compliance with the request of the officers and brethren of the Lodge of Peace and Harmony, I have now the honour, in the capacity of W.M. of that Lodge, of presenting to our worthy Bro. Stebbing, P.M., a testimonial from them.

Then, addressing himself to Bro. Stebbing, Bro. Fletcher said:—

Bro. Stebbing.—I am commissioned by the brethren of the Lodge of Peace and Harmony, to beg your acceptance of that portrait as some testimony, though a very humble and inadequate one, of their affectionate regard for you as a man and a Mason; and we sincerely hope you will allow it to grace this hall as a token of the great estimation in which you are held, and as a proof of the entire approbation of your conduct, and a grateful remembrance of the numerous benefits you have conferred on the Craft. We feel assured that your untiring effort in promoting the benefits of Freemasonry will receive its honourable reward, and we always rejoice in the opportunity of hailing you, Bro. Stebbing, as our parental adviser. (Hear, hear). We earnestly pray that you may always be enabled to carry out those noble principles which you have ever so ably advocated and illustrated by precept and example. Three years since there was scarcely a sufficient number of members to enable the Lodge to be opened; but you took office, and the Lodge at once sprung from its obscurity into prosperity, like a Phoenix from its ashes. New vigour was imparted to it, and your success was perfect and complete. (Hear, hear). It has acquired now a strength of over sixty members, and to you we feel ourselves indebted, and beg, therefore, to express our gratitude by the presentation of this beautiful portrait, which may serve to convince you of our sincerity. I, myself, can safely say that you are in heart a true Mason, and that to you every child of sorrow is a brother, self only being forgotten. (Hear, and cheers). I have said too little to satisfy my own personal feelings. I am deeply convinced of my inability to do justice to the sentiments of my brethren or my own, but at the same time I pray you to excuse the imperfection of my address, and trust you will receive what I have said in the same spirit as it is offered. I dare not trust my feelings any farther; delicacy forbids me to say more, but truth and justice will not allow me to say less. (Hear). In conclusion, I sincerely implore the protection of the Supreme Architect of the Universe on our excellent Bro. Stebbing. May he long continue with us here, and be crowned in his future career with every earthly blessing; and when his mortal race is run, may he be received into that immortal Lodge prepared for all good men in Heaven above. (Loud cheers).

The portrait, which hung immediately over the head of the respected brother, was seen to be a most effective and striking likeness. It represented, at full length, the worthy brother in the attitude of addressing a Lodge meeting, he being in full Masonic costume. The talented artist was Bro. Gaugain, upon whom the work of art reflects great credit. Upon a pedestal, the following inscription appeared, at the lower part of the picture—"Presented to Brother Joseph Rankin Stebbing, W.M., No. 1087, P. Prov. S.G.W., P. Prov. G. Sec., P.M., Nos. 152, 462, and 555, at the Provincial Grand Lodge of Hampshire, held at Southampton, 1859, by the Lodge of Peace and Harmony, No. 462, of which he was W.M. in the years 1856 and 1857."

Bro. Stebbing, on rising to respond to the compliment, was very warmly received by the whole of Grand Lodge. Evidently deeply affected by the proceedings, he then addressed the assembly, and gave vent to his almost overpowered feelings in the following eloquent, manly, and straightforward speech:—Saluting the chair, Bro. Stebbing said—I am most deeply gratified with the distinguished mark of respect thus generously presented to me by the members of the Lodge of Peace and Harmony, of which I have now been a subscribing member for upwards of sixteen years. It is quite true, that for some years, the Lodge being formerly held at Romsey, I had not taken any very active part in its proceedings; but I should not be doing justice to those to whom it is due if I did not say that in the Lodge's greatest difficulties Bros. Miles, P.M., and Adams, P.M., laboured very hard and kept the members together. When, however, shortly before the removal of the Lodge from Romsey, I was asked to take the chair of the W. Master, and endeavour to raise it from its apathy, I did not for a moment shrink from the task, and I must say the offer came under circumstances most flattering to myself. Then, with the able assistance of the brethren, all of whom were equally entitled to credit, we gradually made progress, and, in four years, a Lodge of only five members increased to one of sixty. Our success was then established, and I must say now that I hardly at that moment knew which was most gratifying to myself, the revived and increased prosperity of the Lodge, or the high and generous compliment that was paid to me. I am now extremely anxious to acknowledge, with becoming gratitude, the great kindness of the R.W. Master, in allowing the business of this day to be interrupted for the purpose of this presentation; that Sir Lucius has permitted the formality to take place at a gathering so important and numerous as the annual meeting of the Grand Lodge of Hampshire; and that before the Grand Officers of the province, with whom I have so long and so agreeably acted as Prov. Secretary, I should be thus so highly honoured and distinguished by this most valuable token of regard—the spontaneous kindness of a private Lodge. I very cordially agree with the complimentary proposition that the portrait shall remain on the walls of this Masonic Hall, where I have passed some of my happiest hours, and where I hope the Great Architect of the Universe will grant me the privilege of enjoying many more; and I take this opportunity of acknowledging that the mode in which the members of my Lodge have sought to do me honour, is essentially agreeable to my feelings. I cannot possibly hope for any form of compliment more flattering than that adopted by my brethren. I only trust, that whilst I live this portrait will continue to be regarded as a friendly recollection of myself, and be allowed to remain here to a long future in testimony of the well intentioned services of the humble individual who has on this and some other occasions been so kindly distinguished by his brother Masons. In this hall I ardently desire the portrait to be preserved. I, who have formed so many valued friendships, and have spent so many happy hours within its portals, can but be delighted that it may always remain in a building dedicated to Masonry; and I humbly hope and trust that when the Almighty is pleased to remove me hence, it will serve occasionally to remind you of my attachment to Masonry, and my constant desire to cultivate the brotherly love and practical benevolence taught to the votaries of our noble Order, and ever conspicuous in the true and faithful student in the Craft. (Cheers). To Masonry I have been devoted; I have endeavoured to learn some of its pursuits, and practise some of its principles—(hear)—and I know that Masonry has made me a better man, and tended to render me more useful in the class of life to which it pleased God to call me. I feel I have very imperfectly carried out the high and noble principles which are inculcated in the ancient and honourable institution, so admirably represented by the brethren assembled here this day; but I know full well that the more I devote myself to the principles of Masonry, the happier and more useful I become; the institution which teaches its members to be true to each other, inculcates the duty of helping every object of distress, and of aiding the poor and needy in every part of the world, of every class, and every clime. Masonry, it is true, has its quaint ways and its old customs, its traditions, and its old unchangeable associations. Some of these are both admirable and useful, and some are not altogether such as would be instituted in the present age; but it has, with all this, the undeviating and unceasing charity that gives permanence to the Masonic institution, and that practical benevolence which is ever doing good. Masonry warms the hearts of its faithful followers, and expands the narrow views of bigotry, so that it looks beyond the prejudices of society, and the narrow limits of mere acquaintance, to recognize in every brother a friend, and in every country a home, giving an injunction to the initiate to be, on the one hand, obedient to the laws of any country that affords him its protection, but never to lose sight of the allegiance due to the sovereign of his native land. These principles and these truths have impressed me long since with the excellencies of Freemasonry, and I have become an ardent follower in its ranks—and having spent more than half my life amongst Masons, I was thus probably placed in a position enabling me to gain this gratifying mark of the regard of the Order. I feel utterly unable to thank you for the very great distinction this day conferred upon me; my overpowered feelings will not allow me to express all I feel, but with a very grateful heart I can assure you all I shall never forget your kindness, or the many acts of friendship and brotherly love bestowed upon me on so many occasions. It is impossible I can ever forget your many acts of good nature. In conclusion, I beg to thank the Worshipful Master of the Lodge of Peace and Harmony, Bro. Alexander Fletcher, for the very friendly and eloquent address with which he has presented the testimonial; and I also beg to tender my warmest expression of satisfaction and obligation to Bro. P. Gaugain, the able and talented artist brought from London to paint the portrait. I hope, in future years, the picture might be looked upon with respect and kindness, and if so, as far as Masonry is concerned, I shall feel I have not lived in vain. Bro. Stebbing then resumed his seat amidst the warm applause and general congratulations of the assembled brethren.

The interesting fact was mentioned that Bro. Gaugain was the oldest living Past Master of the Royal Gloucester Lodge, and celebrated in his numerous professional engagements for never failing in a likeness.

The remaining duties of a routine character having been completed, the final business of the Lodge was proceeded with, namely, the appointment by the R.W. Prov. Grand Master of his subordinate officers for the ensuing year, as follows:—Bros. Deacon, D. Prov. G.M.; F. Perkins, No. 152, S.G.W.; H. Ford (mayor of Portsmouth), No. 319, J.G.W.; Wortley, No. 319, and Portal, No. 90, Grand Chaplains; Heather, G. Treas.; G. H. Clarke, G. Sec.; Barnes, No. 428, G. Reg.; Lungley, No. 555, S.G.D.; King, Nos. 319 and 387, J.G.D.; Dawes, No. 1025, G. Dir. of Cera.; G. P. Perkins, No. 152, Asst. G. Dir. of Cera.; W. Smith, No. 462, G. Sword Bearer; G. P. Klitz, Nos. 152 and 462, G. Org.; A. Fletcher, No. 462, G. Purs.; W. Ranger, Nos. 555 and 152, G. Supt. of Works; Bannister, Nos. 717 and 428, G. Standard Bearer; Huggins, No. 90, Williams, Parrott, and White, No. 1025, How, No. 995, and Feltham, No. 428, G. Stewards; Lockyer, No. 152, and H. Grant, No. 90, G. Tylers.

When conferring the collar of office upon the new Prov. Grand Secretary, Bro. G. Clarke, the Prov. Grand Master expressed his hope and belief that, although young for so important an office, Bro. Clarke would follow in the steps of his excellent predecessor (Bro. Stebbing), and earn the goodwill of all with whom he might officially be brought in contact.

The Prov. Grand Lodge was then closed in antient and solemn form.

There was a very large and influential gathering of the brethren in the afternoon, at Spear Hall, Portswood, the residence of Bro. G. Lungley. The grounds were devoted to the purposes of a fête. The banquet was partaken of by two hundred ladies and gentlemen. Sir Lucius Curtis presided. The viands and wines were provided by Bro. Gibbs.

The R.W. Prov. Grand Master gave the usual loyal and other toasts, which were responded to in a hearty manner.

Bros. Wyndham S. Portal, the Rev. G. R. Portal, W. W. B. Beach, T. W. Fleming, and others, made some very effective speeches, and were warmly applauded.

The health of the R.W. Prov. Grand Master having been drunk with enthusiasm (proposed by Bro. Fleming), Sir Lucius rose to respond. He said, so often did it fall to his lot to reply to their kindness in drinking the toast, that he really now felt very diffident in addressing them, and what added so much to his present difficulty was the galaxy of beauty which surrounded him. (Cheers.) The Prov. Grand Master of the Isle of Wight had told them that they had known him (Sir Lucius) longer than he had himself. He begged to say Bro. Fleming was under a mistake. They had known him as their Prov. Grand Master nineteen years, but two years before that, or twenty-one years ago, he had the pleasure of knowing the Prov. Grand Master of the Isle of Wight, when he was but a boy. He was delighted with the company he had met that day, and he was sure they all felt great pleasure in the company of the ladies, at least one thing was effected—their presence kept them all in good humour and order. They had enjoyed a most pleasant day, and partaken of excellent refreshments, and now, as Bro. Stebbing (whom he respected and loved as a brother) would say, they were enjoying a little oratory. (Cheering.) He could truly say that during the time he had presided over that province there never had occurred any difference between himself and his brother Masons. They had all joined in one strong and united pull, and he trusted that as long as he occupied the same position they might be bound together; and when he was removed from presiding over them, he knew he should leave them with regret, and also that they would be enabled to say, "He's gone, what a hearty good fellow." (Loud cheers.)

The excellent band of the second Royal Cheshire Militia was in attendance throughout the proceedings, and gave much satisfaction by their performances. Dancing was participated in by many of the company in the evening, and a most delightful day's enjoyment was wound up with a display of fireworks.

SOUTHAMPTON.—Royal Gloster Lodge (No. 151).—This Lodge held its usual monthly meeting at Freemasons' Hall, Bugle-street, on Thursday, the 14th instant. The Lodge was opened in form by the W.M., Bro. F. Perkins, who was supported by Bro. Pullen, D. Prov. G.M. of the Isle of Wight, and several visiting P.Ms., in addition to the officers of the Lodge, and a very large attendance of members. Bros. Lomer and Biddlecombe were raised to the degree of M.M. Mr. A. Weston was then initiated by his relative, Bro. Storr, Prov. G. Dir. of Sers., Jersey, the permission of the W.M. having been obtained. The Secretary, Bro. Clarke, read a letter from the Grand Lodge, respecting the irregular Lodges of Smyrna. Bro. G. W. Clarke proposed a motion, expressive of the pleasure the brethren experienced at the presence of so distinguished a visitor as Bro. Pullen, not only on account of his high rank in Masonry, but because of the eminent services he had rendered to the Order, and his well known kindness, courtesy, and philanthropy. The motion was adopted unanimously. Bro. Pullen expressed his pleasure in having this opportunity of visiting the Royal Gloster Lodge for the first time, and at the kind expression of feeling towards him, and trusted the effort they were making to render the Prov. Grand Lodge meeting on Tuesday, the 19th, worthy of the province, would be crowned with success. Other business of purely local interest having been transacted, the Lodge was closed at a late hour, and nearly forty brethren sat down to dinner. In returning thanks for the toast of his health, Bro. Pullen addressed the Lodge in a highly Masonic manner, afterwards proposing the health of the W.M. in a speech complimentary to the Lodge and the chair. The W.M. said that he hoped the Lodge would go on in its career of prosperity with the same rapidity as at present; it was the only compensation he sought in return for the time, trouble, and anxiety the responsibility of his office entailed upon him, and nothing gave him more pleasure than to preside at their board, surrounded as it was by so many brethren, among whom were so many eminent and worthy members of the Craft. The health of Bro. Stebbing, W.M. of the Lodge of Twelve Brothers, was proposed and responded to in his usual able manner. The brethren separated early, after a pleasant evening.

SURREY.

REIGATE.—Surrey Lodge (No. 603).—The usual July meeting of this Lodge was held on Saturday, the 16th inst., Bro. J. Ll. Evans, P.G.S.B. of England, W.M., supported by Bros. Sisson, S.W.; Holman, as J.W.; Smith, S.D.; Lainson, J.D.; and Lees, I.G. Visitors—Bros. Woods, Asist. G. Dir. of Cers. of England; and Bro. Swan, P. Prov. G.S.B. of Surrey. The Lodge having been opened in due form in the third degree, Bro. East was raised to the sublime degree of M.M. The Lodge was then resumed in the first degree, when Mr. Henry Rogers, who had been allotted for at a previous meeting, was introduced and initiated into the mysteries of Freemasonry. The next business was the installation of Bro. Sisson, W.M. elect, which ceremony was impressively performed by Bro. J. Ll. Evans. The W.M. having been proclaimed in due form, appointed as his officers—Bros. Burne, S.W.; Holman, J.W.; Morrison, S.D.; Lees, J.D.; C. J. Smith, Dir. of Cers.; and Carruthers, I.G. On the proposition of Bro. Hart, P.M., it was unanimously resolved, that in consideration of the great debt of gratitude the brethren owed to their late W.M., Bro. Evans, for his kind services in resuscitating this Lodge, and bringing it into its present excellent working order, he be elected an honorary member of the first class of this Lodge, and that a Past Master's jewel be presented to him. It was also resolved, on the proposition of Bro. Morrison, that Bro. C. J. Smith, Prov. G.S.B. for Surrey, be a delegate to represent this Lodge on behalf of the Masonic charities.

The Lodge having been closed in due form, the brethren adjourned to the banquet, presided over by Bro. Sisson, W.M. The usual loyal and Masonic toasts were duly honoured, and the brethren separated at an early hour in fraternal peace and harmony.

WORCESTERSHIRE.

DUDLEY.—Royal Standard Lodge (No. 730).—The installation of the W.M. of this Lodge took place on Tuesday, July 12th, at the Dudley Arms Hotel. Lodge was opened by Bro. W. Howells, P.M. No. 435, and P.G. Sec., Worcestershire, after which, Bro. F. Huet was raised to the sublime degree of M.M. Bro. Francis Saunders, S.W., was then duly installed as W.M., and proclaimed after ancient custom, after which he proceeded to invest his officers as follows:—Bros. Dr. Davison, S.W.; C. Westley, J.W.; J. Bateman, Treas.; W. Masefield, Sec.; M. Dennison, P.M., S.D.; G. Smith, J.D.; Thos. Steedman, Steward; F. Huet (raised the same evening), I.G., and J. Jeffs, Tyler. The report of the Masonic Ball Committee was read, by which it appeared that there was a balance in hand, for the charities of the town, of £7 odd. Lodge being closed, the brethren adjourned to banquet, to which fourteen sat down, and the usual loyal and Masonic toasts were duly given and honoured. The brethren separated at an early hour, having enjoyed a very pleasant evening, only marred by so slight an attendance of the brethren and visitors.

DUDLEY.—Vernon Lodge (No. 819).—The officers and brethren of this Lodge met at the Old Town Hall, Dudley, on Wednesday, the 20th inst. The Lodge was opened by the W.M. Bro. Hollier, (Mayor,) P.M. 313 and P. Prov. G.D.C. An application was made by Lodge La Cesarée of Jersey for a donation towards their new Masonic Hall; the question was deferred until the next meeting, owing to the absence of the Treasurer, as the donation will depend upon the state of the finances; the Jersey Brethren have the good wishes of No. 819, this being established on the same principles as the Howe, and its object being to separate Lodges from hotels; a letter was then read by the Secretary, relative to the late Dudley Masonic Ball, which stated that the gross receipts amounted to £48 9s., and the expenditure to £41 2s., leaving a balance of £7 7s. The committee recommended the following distribution of the surplus:—the Dispensary £2 2s.; Sick and Indigent £3 3s.; Lying in Charity £1 1s.; blankets £1 1s. The committee also alluded to the very small support received from the members of the Lodge in the town, as upon examination they find that out of 136 members they had only the support of eleven, and this at a ball given by and under the patronage of the Lodges in the town, and for charitable purposes only. The communication having been read, it was unanimously resolved—"that this Lodge conceive that in reference to the presence of so few of the members of the Dudley Lodges at the late ball, we are compelled to infer that there was either a great indisposition among the Masons, as such, to support a ball for general charities, or that the time for holding it was not happily chosen, rather than that there could be any desire to place Masonry itself at a discount: this Lodge would therefore suggest that a meeting of the whole of the brethren of the Dudley Lodge be called, previous to any future festivity, in order that the feeling of the members generally may be taken in reference to the objects proposed to be served, and some effort made to secure that Masonic unanimity which must be coveted as a means of success in any Masonic enterprise." It was also resolved that a copy of the above be forwarded to the said Ball Committee, with the expression of our fraternal regard. No other business offering, Lodge was closed in due form and with solemn prayer.

YORKSHIRE (WEST).

DEWSBURY.—Lodge of the Three Grand Principles (No. 251).—A Lodge of Emergency was held on the 27th June for the purpose of celebrating the festival of St. John the Baptist, and presenting a testimonial of the esteem of his brethren, in appreciation of his services as a P.M. and Treasurer of this Lodge, to the R.W. Bro. George Fearnley, M.D., D. Prov. G.M. of West Yorkshire. The testimonial consists of an elegant gold enamelled Past Master's jewel, bearing this inscription—"Presented to R.W. Bro. George Fearnley, M.D., D. Prov. G.M. of West Yorkshire, P.M. of the Lodge of the Three Grand Principles, No. 251, as a token of the esteem of the brethren of his Lodge. Dewsbury, June 27th, 1859," and a full length portrait of himself as D. Prov. G.M., painted by Bro. Samuel Howell, P.M., No. 317, Richmond, Surrey, and Nos. 342 and 763, Huddersfield; this is one of the most successful of Bro. Howell's many Masonic portraits. There was a large gathering of the brethren; the chair was occupied by the W.M. of the Lodge, Bro. Joseph M. Harrison, supported by the R.W. D. Prov. G.M.; Bros. R. R. Nelson, P.M., 251, Prov. G. Sec.; J. O. Gill, P.M., No. 251, P. Prov. S.G.W.; Charles Oldroyd, P.M., No. 251, P. Prov. G.S.B.; James Clay, P.M., No. 251; L. A. Shepherd, P.M., No. 251; J. H. Wilkinson, P.M., No. 251; W. Dixon, Prov. G. Treas.; Rev. Joseph Senior, LL.D., Prov. G. Chap.; R. H. Goldthorp, P. Prov. S.G.D.; J. Booth, P. Prov. S.G.D.; W. Cocking, Prov. G. Sup. of Works; Joseph Seed, Prov. G.S.B., &c., &c., the vice chairs being occupied by Bros. James Hunter, S.W., and R. Walkington, J.W. After dinner the usual loyal, patriotic, and Masonic toasts were drunk with enthusiasm, and the W.M. then rose to give the toast of the evening, the R.W. George Fearnley, M.D., D. Prov. G.M. of West Yorkshire, and in very affecting terms alluded to the many valuable services rendered by Bro. Fearnley to the Lodge, tracing his bril-luculent career from his initiation to his appointment as D. Prov. G.M. and Prov. G. Supt. of R. A. Masonry. He showed the brethren how merit had won its way to high Masonic rank, pointing to this as an example worthy of imitation to the brethren; and after expressing to the worthy brother the esteem in which he was held, placed on his breast the jewel, hoping he might live many years to wear it amongst them, and concluded by calling upon Bro. J. O. Gill to present the portrait in the name of the subscribers, which task Bro. Gill performed in his usual happy and pleasing manner, expressing the kindly feeling of the brethren to the worthy Doctor. Bro. Fearnley on rising to respond was received with enthusiastic cheers, and was deeply affected by the repeated expressions of regard. He said that he could not express the feelings of his heart at this unexpected mark of their approbation of his poor services as a P.M. and Treasurer of the Lodge; unexpected it certainly was, for until that beautiful jewel was placed on his breast he had no idea that such a testimonial was intended—of course he had had to sit for the portrait, and was aware of that mark of their esteem. He expressed his deep feeling of gratitude to them for the very high estimate they had placed on his inefficient services, and concluded with a very complimentary speech to the brethren of his Lodge. Bro. R. R. Nelson, P.M., (Prov. G. Sec.), Secretary, then presented to the S.W. of the Lodge, "a Governorship in perpetuity of the Boys School," which had been subscribed for by the members, mentioning at the same time that on a previous occasion the same honour had been conferred on the W.M. by a subscription from the Lodge funds, hoping that the brethren would continue to display as much zeal for the charities as they had done this last year. Bro. I. A. Shepherd, P.M., in the name of the brethren, presented to the W.M. for the use of the Lodge, three chairs for the Master and Wardens.

METROPOLITAN CHAPTERS.

TESTIMONIAL TO DR. LADD.

A NUMBER of Companions connected with the Domestic and United Pilgrims Chapter of Instruction, supped together at Comp. Ireland's, Falcon Tavern, Fetter-lane, on Wednesday evening, on the occasion of presenting Comp. Ladd with an elegant gold chronometer watch, of the value of sixty guineas, subscribed for by his pupils and friends in Royal Arch Masonry. The chair was filled by Comp. Henry Isaacs, the M.E.Z. of the Joppa Chapter, of which Comp. Ladd is J. In proposing the toast of the evening, Comp. Isaacs said, it gave him extreme pleasure to ask them to join him in drinking the health of their esteemed friend, Dr. Ladd. To use the words of a distinguished member of the order—Comp. Havers, Dr. Ladd might be looked upon as a public benefactor. There were, no doubt, many at the table who could recollect the time when there was scarcely a Chapter in London, the members of which could go through the ceremony of exaltation without extraneous aid, and when it was very rare to find the Principal capable of performing their duties—whilst he could now name twenty Chapters, the inferior officers of which were all proficient Royal Arch Masons, and capable of filling any office at a moment's notice. To what were they to attribute that change? To the zeal and ability with which Comp. Dr. Ladd had laboured to propagate the principles and practice of Royal Arch Masonry, in his capacity as the preceptor of the Chapter of Instruction. He had now a most pleasing duty to discharge—to present to their excellent Companion a slight testimonial of the affection and regard of his pupils and Companions. Turning to Comp. Ladd, he proceeded—"In presenting you, in the name of those I now represent, with this beautiful testimonial, allow me to express a hope that your life may be long spared to wear it, and to meet your Companions in Masonry. May its beatings, like those of the human heart, serve to remind you of those friends who have presented you with this watch, and who take the deepest interest in your welfare and happiness." Now, Companions, we will drink to the health and prosperity of Companion Ladd. "Let his name, familiar in our mouths as household words, be in our loving cups this day remembered." (Cheers.) Comp. Garrod then read the following inscription engraved on the watch—"Presented to Comp. Theodore A. Ladd, M.D., as a token of fraternal affection, and in recognition of his valuable and unwearied exertions in the cause of Royal Arch Masonry, July 26, 1859." Comp. Dr. Ladd, in acknowledging the compliment, assured the Companions he deeply appreciated the honour conferred upon him. He was grateful for the handsome and generous eulogium so beautifully expressed by Comp. Isaacs, and to the Companions for the enthusiasm with which they had received him, and he was totally unable to express his feelings at receiving from them so beautiful a testimonial of their regard for him. He could assure them that he more highly appreciated their elegant present because it was in a form most grateful to him, and one by which he should be continually reminded of their kindness as he had occasion to consult it in his professional avocations. He had always taken the greatest delight in Arch Masonry from his earliest admission into the order, and having seen how often the beautiful ceremony was imperfectly given, had, with other Companions by whom he had been cheerfully aided, done his best to improve the working. It had been to him a labour of love, having looked for no other reward than the approbation of his brethren and Companions. He thanked them from the bottom of his heart for their great kindness towards him which he should ever gratefully remember, and trusted that he might long continue to enjoy their esteem and friendship. A variety of other toasts were drunk, and a very pleasant evening was passed.

PROVINCIAL CHAPTERS.

NORWICH.—Perserverance Chapter (No. 258).—Upwards of twenty Companions of this Chapter, besides visitors, amongst whom was Comp. Paul Fourdrinier, W.M., of Unity Lodge, No. 15, London, met at the Runpant Horse Hotel, on Thursday, the 21st inst. In consequence of the unavoidable absence of Comp. Wm. Cooper, M.E.Z.; Comp. Wm. Wicks presided, must ably assisted by Comps. Jas. Dawburn, H.; Emanuel Hyams, J.; Rev. Saml. Titlow, Prov. Grand Chaplain, E.; and Hy. Jno. Mason, P.S. The Chapter being opened in solemn prayer, some brethren of Social Lodge, No. 110, were unanimously elected, and afterwards exalted to the sublime degree of the Holy Royal Arch. The ceremony throughout was very efficiently performed, the several Officers being well up in their duties. Comp. H. J. Mason delivered to the candidates, in his usual effective style, the three grand epochs of Masonry. In giving the mystic and symbolic signs and the explanation of the pedestal, he certainly eclipsed himself, for every one present expressed unqualified satisfaction and thanks for the great pains he must have taken in perfecting himself in so arduous an undertaking. Two brethren of Lodge No. 258 were proposed for exaltation, at the Chapter to be holden on the first Thursday in September next. The Chapter was then closed in due form, after which the Companions spent a very agreeable evening under the presidency of Comp. Wm. Wicks, P.Z.

SOUTH SHIELDS.—St. Hilda's Chapter (No. 292).—The annual convocation of the Companions of this Chapter was held at Comp. Carmon's, Golden Lion, on Wednesday, July 20th, at three, p.m., the following E. Companions presiding:—R. B. Ridley, Z.; H. Hobham (Newcastle), H.; and A. Davis, J.; supported by E. D. Davis, J. Toshach, I. G. Tulloch, and the other officers. The minutes of the last regular Chapter having been confirmed, the installation of the Principals for the ensuing year was proceeded with by Comp. E. D. Davis, who officiated in his usual efficient manner. The following are the principals and officers:—R. B. Ridley, M.E.Z.; A. Davis, H.; H. Hemison, J.; J. D. Leister, Treas.; J. Hinde, N.; J. N. Buckland, P.S.; T. Stockdale and W. Barlow, Asst. Secs.; T. G. Buchanan, Janitor, and J. Roddam, E. pro tem. for J. J. Oliver. The auditors' accounts having been presented for the past year and received, the Chapter was closed in antient form. The Companions afterwards adjourned to dinner, at which the M.E.Z. presided, supported by Comps. A. Davis, H. Hemison, J. Toshach, E. D. Davis, and J. N. Buckland. The usual Masonic toasts were duly given and honoured, and at intervals, songs, duets, and glees enlivened the evening.

AMERICA.

AMERICAN ITEMS.

THE work of altering the Winthrop House, Boston, to adapt it in part to Masonic purposes, has been commenced.

A LODGE has been organized at Camp Floyd, Utah Territory, under the name of "Rocky Mountain Lodge." John C. Robinson, M.; W. L. Halsey, Sec. It was organized by authority of the Grand Lodge of Missouri. There are about thirty Masons at that place, most of them officers in the army.

THE Grand Lodge of New York have recommended that each affiliated Mason in its jurisdiction contribute twenty-five cents to the Mount Vernon Fund.

THE General Grand Royal Arch Chapter and the Grand Encampment of the United States, meet this year (1859) at Chicago, Illinois, on the second Tuesday in September, which is the eighth day of said month.

THE WEEK.

THE COURT.—The Royal family are still at Osborne, and all in excellent health. The Queen and her daughters ride and drive out daily; and the Prince Consort with the young princes do the same. Occasionally a sail in the Fairy or the Victoria and Albert, makes a change in the pleasures of the royal party. The Duchess of Kent is at Osborne, and is improving in health. On Sunday, the Baroness de Speth was buried at Brompton Cemetery. The baroness had been for fifty-two years the affectionate and devoted friend and servant of the Duchess of Kent; by the royal family she was sincerely esteemed and beloved.

FOREIGN NEWS.—The Emperor of the French has appointed Pelissier Grand Chancellor of the Legion of Honour, and has granted to the mother of General Auger an annuity of 3000*fr.*, to be paid out of his majesty's privy purse. The Paris letters are not of a nature to tranquillise the minds of those who are anxious regarding the continuance of peace. There is a strong anti-English feeling existing in Paris, as shown in the journals. Much excitement has been occasioned in that city by recent domiciliary visits to several French noblemen. The Mouleur tells us that it is endeavoured in England to attribute to France the causes of our enormous national burdens—the fact being, however, that this is done merely to further the intention to increase our national defences; and in order to prove this assertion a comparison is drawn between the outlay on the respective armies of England and France. The Independence Belge says a general disarmament is contemplated; but warns England not to allow herself to be deluded by mock disarmaments, and to remember that when France was called upon before the late war to disarm, she replied that, not having armed, she could not be required to disarm, and this on the very eve of the commencement of war. The Patrie publishes an article, which concludes thus:—"France has done everything to free England from the nightmare of invasion in order to restore her to calmness and repose. If we do not succeed England can only lay the blame on herself for the fears which agitate her, and which, if prolonged, would become an affront to our sincerity, feelings, and actions." Count Pourtales has arrived at Paris.—The peace which was to settle everything has settled nothing; and in the Italian states, people are all anxiously asking what will be the next move on the board. The Italian papers are all in favour of independence for Italy, but it does not appear that the Italians are prepared to fight for their liberty. In the meantime efforts are made by the government of Milan to check the freedom with which the press of Lombardy comments on the peace of Villafranca. A Milan journal boldly tells the people that if they are not allowed to learn the truth from the journals they must petition for their rights, and it gives a form for this purpose, which has been extensively circulated and signed. It is addressed to the King, and sets forth the rights of the people in very clear terms. The Pope has addressed a protest to all the European powers with reference to Italian affairs, in which he states that the refusal by Piedmont of the dictatorship offered to the king by certain towns in the legation was a mere deception, for the Piedmontese had occupied several towns there, and were preparing quarters for the reception of Piedmontese troops. In Modena, public feeling is openly expressed, antagonistic to the return of their late rulers. A letter from Milan records an extraordinary expression used by the Emperor Napoleon to the municipality of Milan—his majesty said, "Till we meet again, gentlemen, soon and more happy, adieu!" A rumour is current that the Sardinian commissioners in Tuscany, Modena, and Parma, will be immediately recalled. The municipality of Florence has expressed, in its deliberation of the 20th inst., a wish for the annexation of Tuscany to an Italian kingdom under the sceptre of Victor Emmanuel, or, in case the annexation, for reasons of high policy, should be impossible, that Tuscany should be governed by a prince of the House of Savoy. A great number of addresses are being signed in the Romagna against the return of the clerical government, and in favour of union with Sardinia. The country has resolved upon maintaining public order, and to repulse any attack of the Swiss troops in the service of the Pope; also that a regular voting should take place to express the wishes of the country.—The two hundred and seventy Swiss soldiers who lately revolted at Naples have been tried, and two of them condemned to death, the remainder being sentenced to hard labour for life.—The official Wiener Zeitung publishes a note, addressed by Count Rechberg to Baron Von Kuller, Austrian ambassador at Berlin, and adds that the projects lately published by the Prussian Gazette were at the time brought to the knowledge of the imperial government, but that merely the intention of attempting mediation was made known to Austria.—According to advices from Lussin, the French have completely evacuated Lussin and the Gulf of Quarnaro, and the French fleet has sailed. Baron Hubner, formerly Austrian ambassador at the Court of the Tuileries, has arrived at Rome, and will replace Count Colloredo as Austrian ambassador at Rome.—The semi-official Correspondencia Autografa of Madrid, comments in a style that evinces considerable jealousy on the works going on at Gibraltar, with a view of strengthening the fortifications.—From Berne we learn that it is likely the conference will take place at Zurich at the end of this month; the parties represented being France, Austria, and Sardinia.—The Arabia has arrived at Liverpool, bringing dates from America to the 14th inst. There is no political news of any importance, and in commercial and monetary matters there is no change.—By the arrival of the Vanderbilt at Southampton, and the North American at Liverpool, we have advices from New York to the 16th inst. The political news from the States and Canada is again of no importance. The accounts of the crops are favourable. A negro insurrection is reported to have broken out in Puerto Cabello.—A declaration is said to have been received at Vienna from the king of the two Sicilies, expressive of his adhesion to the proposed confederation. It is also stated that the Grand Duke of Tuscany intends to abdicate in favour of his son, and retire to an estate which he possesses in Bohemia.—It does not appear that the public mind in Paris has become more tranquil, notwithstanding the reported arrangement for a general disarmament; indeed, a renewal of war by France is generally expected, and as her preparations are chiefly naval, it is thought they must be directed against England.—A telegram from St. Petersburg informs us that a treaty has been concluded between Russia and China. Russia may send ambassadors to Peking, christian missionaries are to be protected, and there is to be a monthly mail service between the two countries.

HOME NEWS.—The usual cabinet councils have been held twice this week.—The Registrar General's return shows a very considerable advance in the rate of mortality in the metropolis during the last week; the total number of deaths was 1605, an increase over the preceding week of 205, and exceeding by 435 the estimated average. An increase of eight degrees of heat no doubt tended to produce this mortality, inducing diarrhoea, to which disease 415 of the deaths is attributable. Four deaths are also recorded as due to the direct action of the heat. The births during the week were 1,608. Dr. Letheby also reports an increase of mortality in the city.—On Tuesday morning a destructive fire took place in the London Docks, by which an immense amount of property was destroyed, and one man lost his life from falling into the dock, where he perished before he could be taken out. The fire occurred in the brandy vaults, and from the suffocating nature of the smoke from the burning liquor some of the engineers and labourers in the dock had to be taken to the hospital. The braudies are reported to be insured. The men employed in extinguishing the fire exerted themselves in the most praiseworthy manner. The dock authorities have ordered an inquiry into the cause of the fire.—The city Commissioners of Sewers met on Tuesday at Guildhall. Dr. Letheby presented reports on the nuisance from putrid meat in Newgate Market, on the desecration of Bridewell burial-ground, and on the mortality of the city. A letter was read from Mr. Charles Pearson, expressing his thanks for his temporary appointment as solicitor to the commission. The court then adjourned.—At Guildhall, Lyon Goldsmith, a cigar dealer, of Finsbury-pavement, has been finally examined on a charge of obtaining goods on credit within three months of his bankruptcy, with a view to defraud his creditors. Mr. Peter Brown, of whom the bankrupt had bought goods, was cross-examined as to his dealings with him, after which the magistrate (Alderman Salomons) said the evidence justified him in sending the case for trial, but he would accept bail for the bankrupt in two sureties of £500 each.—Paul and Amelia Decupere, stated to be husband and wife, were charged at Bow-street on remand with robbing their furnished lodgings of pictures and other property to the value of £20. The prisoners were committed on three charges. Inspector Tanner, of the detective force, stated that about three months ago he had the prisoners in custody respecting their possession of a picture which had been stolen from the exhibition at Amsterdam. The picture was valued at £3000. The prisoners were not sent to prison, nor sent to Holland, as there was no extradition treaty between this country and Holland, but the picture was sent back to Amsterdam.—At Clerkenwell police-court, Robert William Woodrow was brought up, on remand, on a charge of stabbing Mrs. Harriet Emma Barker, with a knife, with intent to murder her. Her testimony, and that of others, established the case so clearly against the prisoner, that he was fully committed for trial at the Central Criminal Court.—An inquest was held last week at Jarrow, on the body of the unfortunate woman, Susannah Wiltew, who was lately murdered by her husband in that place. The evidence given on a former occasion having been read over, and fresh evidence taken, the jury returned a verdict of "Wilful murder" against the husband, who was committed to take his trial at the next Durham assizes.—At the Westminster Police-court, Cristoforo Buono Core was again brought up on a charge of attempting to poison one Filippini, the first assuming the title of "Fire King;" the latter that of "Emperor of Fire;" but a necessary witness not appearing the prisoner was discharged, and Filippini was then charged with perjury in making the accusation. Some evidence was taken against him, after which the prisoner was remanded.—The Court of Aldermen sat on Wednesday for the despatch of business, when the Lord Mayor called the attention of the court to a bill in Parliament for the regulation of the office of Queen's Remembrancer, and suggested a reference of the matter to a committee.—A policeman found a gentleman, fashionably dressed, in a convulsed state on one of the benches in St. James's Park, and although he was immediately taken to St. George's hospital, and every effort made to save him, he sunk and died under the effects of poison within half an hour of his admission. There was nothing upon him to show who he was.—Consols varied between 94½ and 94½ 5, but they eventually closed yesterday 94½ 3. The heaviness was attributed to the apprehensions still entertained with regard to the policy of the French emperor, and the anxiety respecting the forthcoming Indian loan.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.—In the HOUSE OF LORDS on Monday Lord Lyndhurst defended himself from certain attacks made on him by Bright relative to his great speech on the defences of the nation. He denied that anything he had stated could legitimately give offence to the Emperor of the French. Lord Brougham called their lordships' attention to the subject of national education, and entered into an elaborate review of the system of instruction which now prevailed in this country. He advocated the extension of the government examinations to middle class schools. The Bishop of Lincoln and Earl Granville also offered some remarks on the subject.—On Tuesday the Public Health Bill was read a third time and passed. The Bishop of London called attention to a petition from the London Diocesan Church-building Society, complaining of the spiritual destitution existing in the manufacturing towns of the kingdom, and more particularly in the metropolis, and expressing alarm lest the report of a select committee appointed by their lordships should be followed by no result. After some observations from the Earl of Chichester, Lord Ebury, and other peers, the petition was laid on the table, and their lordships soon after adjourned.—In the HOUSE OF COMMONS, on Monday, Mr. Adderley called the attention of the house to the military defences of the colonies. He contended that we not only supplied men for the defence of our colonies, but also undertook the greater portion of the expense occasioned by that force. The colonies only bore one tenth of the cost of defending their own coasts, which was a most inadequate proportion for them to defray. Sir George Evans then moved the following resolution:—"That in the opinion of this house, taking into consideration the relations existing between some of the great military powers of the Continent, it is advisable that a commission be appointed, consisting of civilians and military and naval officers, to inquire into and collect information concerning the present condition of our national defences; to ascertain what improvements may be made therein in order to insure the utmost efficiency combined with economy; and to report thereon to her Majesty's Government." Mr. Danby Seymour called attention to the undefended state of the coast between Weymouth and Southampton. Mr. S. Herbert offered some explanations as to the arrangements entered into with various of our colonies, in order to show that an immediate settlement of such a matter should not be expected, but said that the utmost attention would be directed to the subject. In reply to Mr. Danby Seymour he said it would be impossible to defend every landing-place in the kingdom. In reply to the motion of Sir George Evans he said he could not agree to it. In substance, however, the gallant general's motion would be adopted, and a mixed commission would be appointed. Mr. Halliburton said the colony of Canada in which he had lived had hitherto protected itself, and would do so again; but the knowledge that, if needful, this country would lend its aid was in itself a protection. If, however, they withdrew their troops and left them to depend upon themselves, they should give them their independence. Lord Palmerston said he hoped Sir George Evans would be satisfied with the course proposed by the secretary at war. It was impossible to lay down any arbitrary rule as to the number of troops or ships to be sent to any colony, as that must always depend upon circumstances arising out of the terms on which we stood with other nations. General Evans's motion was negatived. On Tuesday, Sir J. Trevelyan having moved that the speaker should leave the chair, for the purpose of going into committee on the Church Rates Abolition Bill, Mr. Newdegate moved as an amendment that the house resolve itself into a committee to consider the propriety of establishing in lieu of church rates, thenceforth to be abolished, a charge on all hereditaments, in respect of the occupancy of which church rates have been paid within the last seven years. His object was to accept the decision of the house that church rates should be abolished where they had not been paid for the last seven years. Thus in the great towns they might be abolished, but that was no reason for abolishing them in those cases where they were not opposed, being at least 80 per cent. of the whole. The house divided, and the amendment of Mr. Newdegate was negatived by a majority of 191 to 99. The house then went into committee. On Wednesday, on the order of the day for the committee of the High Sheriffs' Expenses Bill, Mr. Wise moved, that the bill should be committed that day three months; and after some discussion the house divided, and the amendment was carried by a majority of 115 to 112. Sir C. Napier moved that an humble address be presented to her Majesty praying that she will be graciously pleased to appoint a commission to inquire into the management of Greenwich Hospital. Mr. Whitbread objected to the motion. Mr. Roebuck said that Greenwich Hospital was known as a nest of corruption, and he would not trust any government with the inquiry. The house divided, and Sir C. Napier's motion was defeated by a majority of 142 to 82. The house then went into committee of supply, and the discussion of the civil service estimates and civil contingencies occupied the remainder of the day.

COMMERCIAL AND PUBLIC COMPANIES.—The business of the port of London during the past week has been moderately active. The number of vessels announced inwards at the customs as having arrived from foreign ports was 208. There were four from Ireland, and 180 colliers. The entries outwards amounted to 116, and those cleared to 98, besides 22 in ballast.—The particulars of the bonds drawn of the Turkish six per cent. loan of £3,000,000, of 1854, have been published, and the only noticeable point in connection therewith is the decease of the two original contractors, viz., Baron Goldsmid and Mr. J. H. Palmer.—

At the meeting of the Australian Mining Company, it was agreed that the final dissolution shall be postponed until the expiration of the lease in 1861. In the meanwhile all the mining operations have been stopped, and the directors announce that it is their intention to make the most of the land. A balance in favour of this account, to the extent of £4806, is exhibited.—A statement has been just published concerning the Albert Life Assurance and Guarantee Company (originally established as the Freemasons') which must be considered satisfactory, as it indicates the extent of business, with the steady progress in the several departments. The life and guarantee returns are of the most encouraging character, the testimony of Professor De Morgan being adduced to prove the correctness of the statistics. On the 31st of December, 1858, the total income of the company was upwards of £117,000 a year, and the number of life policies in force exceeded 13,000, covering assurances to the amount of £3,204,819.

PUBLIC AMUSEMENTS.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.—On Tuesday night M. Meyerbeer's new opera, "Dinorah, or Il Pellegrinaggio di Ploërmel" was produced with a completeness and splendour unsurpassed by any previous essay at the Royal Italian Opera. The characters in the opera were sustained by Madame Miolan Carvalho (from the Theatre Lyrique in Paris), Madame Nantier Didié, Mademoiselle Marai, Signora Gardoni, Neri Baraldi, Tagliafico, and Graziani. Nothing could exceed the enthusiasm of the audience. The house was overflowing and presented a scene of excitement rarely witnessed. The excitement began from the overture, a composition remarkable, not only for its beauty, but its entire originality of construction, and which was loudly encored. The applause showered upon Madame Miolan was incessant and often rapturous; and it was abundantly bestowed on the other performers. The illustrious composer himself was loudly called for at the end of every act; and when he came forward, with an air of great quietness and modesty, led on by Mr. Costa, he was greeted with reiterated acclamations. In short, this new masterpiece of the great dramatic composer of the age is certainly as beautiful, and promises to be as successful, as any work he has ever written.

DRURY LANE THEATRE.—Another remarkable novelty, in the shape of Signor Verdi's grand serious opera, "I Vespri Siciliani," was produced on Wednesday night, for the first time in this country, with incontrovertible success. Mademoiselle Tietjens, by her splendid dramatic energy and brilliant execution in the part of Helena, proved that Signor Verdi might have done worse than select her for his prima donna. Her performance was remarkable throughout, and Signor Mongini won fresh laurels as Henri Arrigo, Helena's lover, and the victim of Giovanni di Procida (Signor Vialetti), the Sicilian patriot; Signor Fagotti exhibited his accustomed talent as De Montfort. The ballet divertissement, les Quatre saisons, was perfectly executed by Mademoiselle Boschetti and her companions, and the mise en scène was complete and splendid throughout. The general execution of the opera was creditable to all concerned. Signor Arditi presided in the orchestra.

NEW ADELPHI THEATRE.—Mr. Byron has produced at the Adelphi a "novelty," called "The Babes in the Wood," which is as well entitled to the "new and original" of the bills as many a two or three act drama. Our author has had no need to stray from the nursery legend; but he has used it, simple as he found it, as the backbone for a set of travesties upon scenes in Shakespeare in which the talents of the performers we have named, of course immensely assisted the plans of the author. The Babes, Tommy and Sally, are personated by Mr. J. L. Toole and Miss K. Kelly; the wicked uncle, Sir Rowland Macassar, by Mrs. Alfred Mellon; Mr. Paul Bedford and Mr. C. J. Smith are Smith and Brown, a pair of unmitigated melodramatic ruffians, who first undertake to perform their brutal office of chicken butchers, at the bidding of the wicked knight and his Lady Macbeth of a spouse, Lady Macassar (Mrs. Billington), and then, in due course, after a heinous parody on that famous scene from "King John," between Arthur and Hubert, fall out like true knaves, and leave the innocents to the mercy of the cock-robins, who do their spiring according to the fitness of such things. The burlesque was entirely successful.

CLASSICAL THEOLOGY.

APOLLO AND MAY.

THE spirit of truth is a holy spirit ; that is to say, it is a ghost in which there is no guile—consequently, if to keep silent is profitable, and to be heard is unprofitable, it will eschew the evil and choose the good. Howsoever let us not deceive ourselves in screening the truth, lest we find out “the truth is not in us.” Our religion wants no disguise ; there is no longer a call to enforce it under a parable ; it requires no longer a veil to hide its sublime, refulgent, and ineffable beauty. The spirit of truth rejoices in its loveliness—it never knew it was naked ; its shame is not in its being uncovered, but in its being hidden.

But is the world free from guile ? Do people like to hear the truth ? We answer in the words of the royal preacher ; he who saw “under the sun the place of judgment, that wickedness was there ; and the place of righteousness, that iniquity was there ;” and old as his counsel is, like good wine, it has improved by keeping :—“Suffer not thy mouth to cause thy flesh to sin ; neither say thou before the angel that it was an error ; wherefore should God be angry at thy voice, and destroy the work of thine hands ? Go thy way, eat thy bread with joy, and drink thy wine with a merry heart ; for God now accepteth thy works. Live joyfully with the wife whom thou lovest, all the days of the life of thy vanity which he hath given thee under the sun, all the days of thy life of vanity, for that is thy portion in this life, and in thy labour which thou takest under the sun.”

Peradventure with the exception of the Christian and of the Mahomedan, every nation under the sun has paid divine homage to the sun. The Alcoran forbids this, and how much the more so does the Pentateuch ; yet strange to say, in Hierosolyma, the city of Jerusalem, within the very most holy temple, there was the chapel or chamber dedicated to the sun ; exempli gratia, 2 Kings, xxiii. ; “And he took away the horses that the kings of Judah had given to the sun, at the entering in of the house of the Lord, and burned the chariots of the sun with fire.” And again, Ezekiel, chap. viii., “Then he brought me to the door of the gate of the Lord’s house, which was towards the north ; and, behold, there sat women weeping for Tammuz” (the sun*). “And he brought me into the inner court of the Lord’s house ; and, behold, at the door of the temple of the Lord, between the porch and the altar, were about five and twenty men, with their backs towards the temple of the Lord, and their faces towards the east ; and they worshipped the sun towards the east.” We can very well embrace the idea, but not the idolatry, of this barbarism of making the transeffulgent, glory crowned “king of day” the supercelestial God and majesty both of heaven and earth ; but how the Jews could have embraced the idolatry in the idea, or how Solomon, the king of Israel, was induced to build the high places, “which were on the right hand of the mount of corruption,” namely, “for Ashtoreth, the abomination of the Zidonians, and for Chemosh the abomination of the Moabites, and for Milcom the abomination of the children of Ammon”—we cannot comprehend ; it could only have been on account of their having partaken of the sacrament of idols.

The sun is the centre of the system to which our earth belongs : the earth moves round on its own axis in about twenty-four hours, in which small space of time it circumambulates its entire self, or orbéd circle ; that is, many parts of the earth, and all who inhabit them, are carried round with the world in the course of a day and night ; and yet, as it moves in a mass, on its points, its motion is so wonderfully slow that we can only compare it to its own connatural movement in an upper wheel of an upset cart,* set agoing and being twenty-four hours in turning itself, or in being turned once round ; this gyration gives the sun its apparent advance towards the west ; but it has too its own centric or heliocentric rotation ; only, instead of the number of hours the earth takes to make one revolution, the sun organically requires about as many numerical days ; consequently, if it were not lightened by its own efficiency or irradious atmosphere, but were, like the earth, dependent on an heliacal luminary for its light, its day and its night would each consist of one hundred and forty-four hours.

In these latter remarks there may be an exemplified teaching of astronomy ; yet, nevertheless, we are almost inclined to put faith in the symbols of the Indian and Egyptian zodiacs ; and with the Greeks assign to Osiris or Horus the Eye of the universe—that ever watching, never closing Eye, which sees all things, and comprehends all things, that are going on and are taking place, both in the heavens and on the earth. Yea, like the primæval and mediæval theocratical romancist, we might be tempted to give the diadem to Sol, and be half led away to believe their report of the gorgeous magnificence of his royal palace of the sun, and of the beauty of his dutiful daughters, Phaethusa, Lampetia, and Phœbe, preparing his chariot with its fiery steeds, the same, perchance, which were destined to run away with their ill advised brother Phaeton, therewith setting both the higher and lower worlds in one united conflagration ; nay, we could all but extend to Phœbus his own solitary diurnal and guiding course, now coming up from the east, and now going down in the west, through his kingdom of the stars. But, in leaving Ptolemy to follow Phaeton, do we beg the question ? There is but a slender partition between the sublime and the ridiculous. Jupiter, to put an end to the empyrosis and fervent burning up of the elements, struck Phaeton out of his whirled away chariot with a thunderbolt headlong into the river Po. All this we acknowledge is finely told in the Ovidian metamorphosis ; and by the fable we are taught what an awful end the ambitious may expect, when they soar higher than they ought. But when we have to reconcile to common sense the event of these three sisters in their incessant lamentation for their brother’s death upon the banks of that river being

* It does not matter of what size or circumference the wheel of the cart referred to may be, let its dimensions be supposed even equal to the earth’s orbit ; and its height, over its fellow wheel, not much more than sufficient for a horse, attached to one of its bars or spokes, to move under it ; thus, every time the horse is made to move round the cart the wheel will also go right round with it ; in which way—could it be possible for a horse to be trained to take twenty-four hours in pacing once round a small cart—the movement of the wheel would be scarcely perceptible. This quick rate of travelling at a slow speed may be immediately understood by placing the middle of a long pole on the head or over the shoulders of some person who is to hold it fast with both his hands, when, on turning himself leisurely round, it would be found upon the trial that another person would have to run to keep up with the ends of the pole.

Some of the Brachmans, or some sect of Hindoos, have long held the whimsical notion of a large frog having been placed by Brahma, when he created the world by the command of Brahm, in the centre of the earth, to whose careful superintendence we are solemnly informed, if our memory does not deceive us, he consigned the successive rotations of our globe. Certainly there may be some who ironically could point out how this geographical abstract in itself would account for the earth’s jerking motion. However, to the earth’s rotary motion, uninfluenced by the moon, we think may be attributed the phenomena of the tides.

About eleven hundred years ago, when the last of the Gebers were driven out of Persia, many of them settled along the western coast of India. They are among the most opulent class in Bombay, where they are styled fire worshippers, or rather Parsees. They say that more than four thousand years ago their prophet Zoroaster lighted the fire they still keep burning—they carried some of it with them. Their priests are called Magi. They believe in one Most High and Supreme Being. To the three other elements besides fire, they pay great veneration. Nevertheless they are the real sun-worshippers, their religion imposes the unalterable duty of its great commandment ; or of paying every morning, their orisons to the awaking sun. Zoroaster, as they reckon, must have lived not less than 5,500 years before Christ.

* Venus is the earth, and Adonis is the sun, vide the “Fable of Proserpina and Venus.”

turned by the pitying gods into poplar trees, still so sensitive of anguish, that they have, ever since, instead of tears, been "weeping amber," we find the teaching of the Pythagorean metempsychosis unavailable; nor is any philosopheme capable of sustaining so egregious an hypothesis, or of arriving at any reciprocal cognation of mythologies, illogical and irrational as they are, and yet so various and opposite in their contradictions. This however does not extend thoroughly through their polytheism, or improbate the penetrative subtleties of their doctrine of natural and metaphysical philosophy.

Diespiter, from Jupiter's Cretan name, signifying the author or paternal parent of light, is the imputed father of Apollo, which otherwise means creator of the sun; and again, from Λατοῖα, to lie hid, is derived the name of Latona, his mother; which infers that before the birth of Apollo, or the production of the sun, all things lay involved and unprofitable in darkness and chaos, and, as it were, in embryo; from which afterwards as from the womb of a mother proceeded the most glorious of the glorious luminaries. So likewise, as in these conclusions, there is obtained the same hypothetical result in admitting the thesis of his being the son of Hyperion, and nephew to Æther, begotten of an unknown mother; yet still retaining, as one with the sun, the name of his father, who was the son of Cœlus and Terra, or, as we should say in English, of the air and the earth. Now, upon logical demonstration, this is giving to the elements and to their nature a preternatural power they have never possessed; for if they had created one sun they would have created two or more suns. We acknowledge one solary system; but, indeed, beyond the parahelion our eyes have never seen anything like two suns.

The Persians called the sun "Mithras," and computed and esteemed him the greatest of their gods. His temples were built underground: he was worshipped in caves. His statue had the head of a lion, on which a turban or twisted scarf, styled a mitre, or rather tiara, was placed; it was attired in Persian robes, and with both hands was seen to hold an enraged bull by the horns. Those who were allowed to become his priests, and to understand his mysteries, were obliged first to undergo many great trials, many torments, stripes, colds and heats, disgraces and other hardships, to evince their fitness for the attainment of such office and honours. It was a severe religion: it authorized the infringement even of the Persian law, said to be inviolable. The kings of Persia were not interdicted in their use of wine on those days in which the sacrifices were offered to Mithras; for them to drink immoderately at any other time was strictly unlawful. In the code of the laws of Mahomet, whose mother was a Jewess and whose father was a Pagan, a like judicial commandment is enforced to a still greater extent; all his followers are prohibited the free use of any intoxicating beverage.

The poets of antiquity were crowned with laurel, and with the olive, a "fruit which loves the sun." This fruit was offered to Apollo, because it was thought to be conducive to divination, for which reason also was the swan among his sacrifices, it being believed to have from him the faculty of prescience; or, as we have it in the Tusculan Questions, "Quia prævidentes qui in morte boni sint, cum cantu et voluptate moriuntur"—foreseeing happiness in death, they die with singing and pleasure.

The Egyptians divided the day into hours, horæ, or "in horas," and called the sun Orus, or Horus, as belonging to Osiris, or as the son of Io: at all events, his symbol was a sceptre, on the top of which was an eye, to represent his power of seeing all things, and that through him all things are made visible. Griffins were sacred to him, because their eagle wings could uplift them to him; the cock, because it foretells his rising, and the grasshopper, not only because it hails his setting with a song, but as being so entirely dependent on him as to be seemingly called into life, and sustained by his rays. Wherefore, on certain days of festivities in honour of Apollo, it was with the Athenians a custom to fasten golden grasshoppers within and about their hair.

Although Pindarus, in his "Olympia," has gone so far as to assert that it rained gold, and that the earth arrayed itself with lilies and roses when Sol saw the face of Venus that it was beautiful and came to visit her in the island of Rhodes, so called from this occasion, ἀπὸ τοῦ ῥόδου, "à rosa;" we will not pause to examine the mystery of the fable or the grandeur of the lyric, which Horace himself has pronounced, long before us, to be inimitable, but en passant let us take a mental glance at the Rhodian statue of the sun, that well known wonder of the world, the famous Colossus. It was placed at the mouth of the harbour, and was seventy cubits high; one man with both his arms could not clasp either one of its thumbs; so vast and widely extended were its thighs, that a large ship in full sail could easily enter the port between them. It was twelve years in being completed, and cost three hundred Rhodian talents, perhaps about one hundred thousand pounds. Fifty or sixty years after its erection it was thrown down by an earthquake. Chares the pupil of Lysippus is said to have been the sculptor, about A.D. 288. When the Arabians took possession of the island they sold the fallen image to a Jew who with the brass of which it was composed loaded, it is believed, nine hundred camels. From this statue the Rhodians had the name of Colossians given to them, and for the same reason the amphitheatre of Vespasian is indicatively called the Colosseum, from a colossal figure of Apollo placed before it; but we must not forget that this place for public exhibitions of combats of gladiators and wild beasts, with other scenes of cruelty, has been styled "the most stupendous monument of Roman antiquity." Its original designation has long ceased, and many parts of it no longer exist, yet, strange to say, within its ruins fourteen chapels have been erected in representation of the different stages of the passion of our Saviour.

Another statue of the sun god is the Apollo Belvedere, found in the ruins of Antium, which was purchased by Pope Julius II., before his elevation to the Vatican, and placed by him afterwards in its Bel Videre, or as we have said, Belvedere, from whence it takes its name. We mention this specimen of sculpture as being one of the finest in the world, even now as restored by Giovanni da Montorsoli. It is more than seven feet high, and with the exception of its semitoga, or short cloak, caught up by the stretched out left arm, it is naked. It is supposed to represent Apollo watching the effect of the arrow just discharged from his extended bow at the Python. Let us, however, bear in mind that it is not an uncommon event abroad to hear of a death by a coup de soleil; we suggest Sol's real bow to be the bow of the sun, the sunbow or iris, and lightning his arrows.

In Abœa, an old town in the bay of Messene, Peloponnesus, the Abœan Apollo had an oracle more ancient than the one at Delphos; it was burnt by Xerxes about the time when his invading army of seventeen hundred thousand was vanquished by forty thousand Greeks.

The temple of Delos, once so magnificent and celebrated, whose remains are now scarcely to be traced, had its origin, it is said, at least fifteen hundred years before the birth of Christ, and is supposed to have been erected at the general expense of all the Grecian potentates of that time. Plutarch, in his life of Theseus, mentions its altar as one built entirely of the left side horns of beasts. At all events the learned of antiquity have believed it to consist of the horns of antelopes or wild goats, killed by Diana on Mount Cynthus, so firmly twisted one into the other, and consolidated without any kind of cement or nails, as, from its peculiar construction, to have been considered one of the wonders of the world. There was in this temple also a colossal statue of the god in marble, twenty-five feet in height. To judge by what formerly remained of its ruins, the building must have been large, and built of white marble; but there is no way of tracing its form. The statue was a beautiful piece of workmanship. Some foreign sea captain, only about two hundred years ago, it is said, visited this mythological birth place of Apollo, and displaced the statue from its pedestal with the intention of removing it; but finding it impracticable to carry it to his ship, he wantonly despoiled it of its head, arms, and feet, and carried them away no one knows where. This island is described as barren, rocky, and without inhabitants, but rich in ruins. The Mount Cynthus of the ancients, with its various remains and classical dedications, is there. The whole circuit of the island is scarcely more than eight miles.

But Castri—how are the mighty fallen! Yet still we can hardly credit the conjecture of that small village having been the poetical and remarkable city of Delphi; that those two pointed cliffs were the double headed Parnassus, and that stream among the rocks from its separating summit, was once known as the "Castalius fons," the imaginary retreat and sacred haunt of the Muses. The remains of the fountain exhibit a large and shallow square formed basin, with steps leading to it, cut in a rock of marble. There is no doubt, with some, of this having been the balneum in which the Pythia was wont to bathe herself and wash her hair, before she was conveyed to the tripod in the Apollonian temple. There are four dehbra, or shrines for heathen gods, in the rock; one of these niches has been converted into a chapel, and dedicated to St. John—it is an object perhaps of as much surprise to the antiquarian traveller as it was of veneration to the pilgrim. The others are vacant; some however, think they were places designed for vows and votive offerings. Be that as it may, here Apollo had his most renowned temple; here uttered his most famous oracles, said to be received first from Jupiter, with whom he was in direct communication, before they were delivered to those who consulted him. There was no other oracle thought to exist elsewhere equal to this. On the very spot, to cite tradition, where the two eagles, summoned by Jupiter, the one from the east, and the one from the west, alighting met, and therefrom called "umbilicus terre," the navel of the earth, his temple was founded.

We cannot with any subtle acumen explore the regions of mystical priestcraft, and tolerate the suspicion of a deliberate oracular system of falsehood and fraud, when we take a review of our sacred records, with profane and general history, and discover such men as princes and kings travelling far to hold a few moments' counsel with a Pythoness. Saul went to Endor; we do not mean to infer that he went any great distance—many went far, and he went far enough. We only want here to refer to a few particulars; no more than such as may be suitable to our subject and profitable to our readers. There is in 1 Samuel ix. this parenthesis—"Beforetime in Israel, when a man went to inquire of God, thus he spake, Come and let us go to the seer: for he that is now called a prophet was beforetime called a seer." We have just stated, Saul went to Endor. He had, however, with legitimate supplication inquired of the Lord; but "the Lord answered him not, neither by dreams, nor by Urim, nor by prophets. Then said Saul unto his servant, Seek me a woman that hath a familiar spirit, that I may go to her and inquire of her." Now this woman possessed (or the spirit) the power to raise up the ghost of Samuel, it may be imagined by what is called sciomaney. It was not so; she and her spiritual familiar could have had no power over such a spirit as was seen in Samuel, had not the spiritual Samuel, in his own uncircumscribed person, lent himself to Saul's reckless desire to look beyond the grave's withdrawn curtains upon its decreed events, so wisely hidden from the uninitiated and unvisited. This description of forbidden, although natural, anxiety to inquire after the secret knowledge which is involved in the future was carried to as great an infatuation among the Jews as it was idolatrously a mania with the nations they conquered, who sought these revelations in the mysteries of their imagery, in the offering through the fire, or by the sacrifice of blood to their idols. In fact, more or less, it was this kind of dealing with the powers of darkness that brought them to their shrines. And in like manner the mighty of the Jewish nation sought promiscuously their prophets, the priests of the high places, or of idol altars—for example, "And Jehoshaphat said unto the King of Israel, Inquire, I pray thee, at the word of the Lord to-day. Then the King of Israel gathered the prophets together, about four hundred men, and said unto them, Shall I go against Ramoth-Gilead to battle, or shall I forbear? And they said, Go up, for the Lord shall deliver it into the hand of the king." So, also, for the same reason, the rulers of the classic nations inquired of their oracles, as they considered them to be sacred. In the hopes of making what we have said plainer, we will now instance one of the holy prophets:—"And Jehoshaphat said, Is there not here a prophet of the Lord besides, that we might inquire of him?" He alluded to Micaiah, the son of Imlah, who was not among the four hundred other prophets. 1 Kings, xxii. Again, 2 Kings iii., "And the King of Israel said, Alas! that the Lord hath called these three kings together, to deliver them into the hand of Moab!" But Jehoshaphat said, Is there not here a prophet of the Lord, that we may inquire of the Lord by him? He is told that there is Elisha. "So the King of Israel, and Jehoshaphat, and the King of Edom went down to him. And Elisha said unto the King of Israel, What have I to do with thee? get thee to the prophets of thy father, and to the prophets of thy mother." We shall have again to treat of these prophets of Baal, as we go on.

Augustus Caesar was a constant attendant at the altar of Apollo, and a great votary of the oracle; it is said that it foretold to him the birth of Christ, and that, in consequence of that event it would cease to be an oracle, and that Apollo would have to "depart and give no more answers." On the whole, the Delphic oracle, or vaticinator and vaticinatrix, uttered oracles, that is to say, prophetically responded, prophesied, and foretold of things to happen, and happening afar off, with, at times, a most wonderful prescience.

The tripod (a vessel with three feet, circular, with holes,) was thought to have come, or to have been sent, from heaven. How it ever came to be lost in the sea we will not attempt to say; but the story goes that it was lost, and that some fishermen afterwards took it up in their nets, upon which it became the cause among themselves of much contention who should have it. They at last determined to steer for Delphos to consult the Pythonissa. She gave answer that "it should be sent to the wisest man of all in Greece." Thereupon it was sent to Thales of Miletus, who forthwith had it carried to Bias who was no less famous for his learning than his nobility of mind—he referred it to another of the seven wise men of Greece; this other sent it to a fourth, until so on, forwards and backwards, it passed through the hands of them all, who returned it again to Thales, who dedicated it to the Delphian Apollo. Some have supposed it to have been covered with the skin of the Pythian serpent, for which reason it was also called Cortina. The generally received opinion is that it was a golden vessel with ears, having three feet, on which the selected of the Phœbades or of the Pythiæ sat or stood when she prophesied, or pronounced her divinations. Phemonœ was the name of the first priestess Apollo had at Delphos, and she is said to have invented the heroic verse. The four chief properties, as arts, attributed to the sun god were—of prophesying, of shooting, of healing, and of music; all of which the ancient natural philosophers ascribe to the sun, and find therein their real representation. None among the gods met with more lasting homage, was more invoked, was more consulted, gave wiser advice, delivered more responses, or declared more oracles than this god in his temple of Delphi. Indeed all nations, near and far, resorted to him, until, we may truly say, all called him "the oracle of all the earth."

This was the state of things when Augustus Caesar was the second Roman emperor, and Herodes Magnus, who slew the infants, was King of Judæa, when tyrants could torture and murder whom they desired out of spite or at their pleasure, and there was no real jurisdiction that could save the innocent from their passions, nor any religion that was a check upon those passions, no visible aid, no Almighty hand and outstretched arm—till there arose one who was to be the Saviour of mankind in more ways than one, through whom, from age to age, the human race is becoming more and more harmonized by his beautiful laws, and more like the angels which regeneration will make us—Jesus hominum Salvator.

There is an old Latin saying, quot homines tot sententie, which, to our ideas, has some general and particular truth in it, for with many men there are certainly very often many opinions—none more striking and various than those respecting religion and politics. As to the first, this would not be the case were it not mystified by its exponents; as to the second, it must always be so while men and times continue to alter. In the former we see progress, in the latter we find change; that improved and great end we must all come at last as we survive the refining, purifying, and momentous translations which must and can be acquired if they are wished to be attained and if we are determined to have them.

Some etymologists derive the word Pythia from the serpent Python; others from the Greek verb, to consult, πυθεσθαι, or which is perhaps more correct, from Πυθω, a name of the city of Delphi. But be its origin what it may, this oracle was very ancient; it was established at least a hundred years prior to the Trojan war, when the goddess Themis first gave the responses here, but afterwards resigned that privilege to Apollo. In early times the Pythian games were celebrated every nine years; eventually they took place every five years. In the contest of the flute, which was instituted by the Amphictyons, they played the Πυθικοι νομοι in memory of Apollo's famous victory over the serpent of Πυθω—according to some antiquarians, this mode had six parts. Their dance was divided into five parts, regulated by the lyre. Combats, horse racing, and chariot racing, formed a conspicuous part of these games, part of which took place in April, and part in May. The prize of the musical performances was either in silver or gold. But at the gymnastics, the conqueror considered his crown of simple laurel or branch of palm the greater prize. Also, at the Pythian games there were prizes for intellectual merit. It will be seen that these games must have been spectacles of great utility and interest.

The oracles were not all delivered in anything like the same manner; in some places they were by interpretation or dreams, or by events, or the answer was written in verse or in prose, that is, at first mostly in verse, as a poet was a synonymous appellation for a prophet; at other times the gods themselves revealed their decrees by voice, or as we should say by simulated voices, after the manner of the false prophets.

Those who consulted the Delphic oracle were obliged to bring great and costly presents, and therefore, as we have implied before, this temple was richer than any other, whence the "wealth of Apollo" became a saying. They also offered sacrifices. The care of these sacrifices was under a committee of five priests, called "Οσίοι," which means "The Holy;" who were ministers of the Pythoness, of whom we read that she was not sometimes above a bribe. However, these oracles were deemed proverbially infallible. They tell us of old that in the Pythium or sanctuary of this temple there was a deep well or cavern, from which issued a thin, pale vapour, that rose high into the air. The cave was on Mount Parnassus; those who breathed its exhalations were suddenly seized with poetic rapture or a divine enthusiasm, futurity opened to their view; they were among the poets if they only fell asleep near it. On the cover of the tripod, which was placed close to the mouth of the cave, the Pythia usually sat; but if so, she could not have been in that state of fury, with "dishevelled hair and foaming mouth," occasioned by the intoxicating nature of the air damp, or gas, emitted from the cave's mouth, as some writers have stated. No modern traveller has discovered this chasm and vapour. Besides the Delian oracle was only one of the five celebrated oracles mentioned by Herodotus, which were consulted by Cræsus in preference to many others, and we read not of any intoxicating exhalations in their temples. But to those who know what "reading thoughts" mean, our explanation of a Pythonissa as a woman possessed with a spirit of soothsaying, or of a familiar spirit, as the word implied, will go far to elucidate the thorough particulars of the case, and of the theosophy we have in review. We give to Tully the honour of having "supposed the vapour;" his followers "saw it."

THE FAMILY OF THE GUNS.

THE interesting but unamiable individuals indicated by the heading of this paper, are of insatiable appetite, have been concerned in many evil designs, and have been by turns the agents of monarch and conspirator. They assume various forms, but are charged with inborn wickedness. The very birds of the air start with instinctive dread as they pass, nor is the eagle less terrified than the vagrant crow in the fallow. They eat up every green thing, every living thing, every monument, every memorial of virtue or honour. They break into the house of peace, destroy the firstborn of domestic love, corrupt the springs of human action, and stamp out under their remorseless tread the sacred flame that feeds the lamp of charity. The name of the father of these fiends is War; and we cannot do better than turn our attention to his ancestors, who are well known and very much prized by his regal and plebeian clients.

When the ancient of the human race invoked the aid of this terrible ally, he was by no means so dangerous as he has since become. Men were first prone to carry out his behests with their fists, and nothing much came of such operations beyond rather copious, but comparatively harmless, blood-letting. The use of clubs, spears, stone throwing, and other malignant innovations was not long in becoming pretty general. But these were not sufficient to satisfy the genius of destruction. He must have weapons that should strike his foe to death at a distance. The sling, the dart impelled by the hand, the long bow and the cross bow, directed by the practised eye and worked by strong arms, gifted with deadly aim, soon became the favourites of the war demon, and he was pleased that his pupils were no longer content with doing bodily injury to their neighbours, but succeeded in killing them outright.

That grim ascetic, old Roger Bacon, will have a great deal to answer for, we fancy, when as we are told, and firmly believe, the spirits who repose from the battle of life before they shall be summoned to receive the award due to their actions here below, will be again living witnesses of the consequences of that unlucky combination of chemicals which goes to make up what in our days is known as gunpowder. There was a Bartolomeo Schwartz too, another monk, who first suggested the application of this trinity of destruction against human beings. The learned have not very faithfully chronicled the progress which this discovery made, but they are pretty well agreed upon certain main facts. Thus it seems to be generally thought that the great gun or cannon, as he is frequently called (for he delights in a plurality of names like many others of our time) became the object of special attention somewhere about the year 1535, in the reign of the good Queen Bess, who patted him with her white hand more frequently than it has been customary for ladies of her rank to do since, or had ever been before. It must not however be thought that the great gun had never been heard of previously. This would be a profound mistake. Indeed we are told that at the battle of Crécy, so long before as 1346, there were four guns employed which filled the eyewitnesses with astonishment. Another authority mentions 1366 as the probable date when they came to be objects of fear and terror. It was said that some simple looking Germans brought to the Venetians, who were then besieging Gandefossa, two small pieces of artillery—this is the name now taken by the tribe—together with a supply of gunpowder and leaden balls, by which the latter soon made themselves felt. At this time gunpowder was exactly ninety-six years old, having been, as some allege, described in some old monkish volume about the year 1270. We are aware that this is open to some doubt, for it is contended by some antiquarians that gunpowder had been a friendless orphan in Arabia, but was ultimately adopted by some frizzle bearded crusader. And others aver that it had been seen many centuries before, dwelling harmlessly among the Chinese, and somewhat later held a sinecure under the Brahminical Hindoos who had—to their credit be it written—the sense to keep their unruly ward from doing much harm beyond blowing off a few experimental fingers, or shattering occasionally a too intrusive arm.

The guns at this period must have been very harmless machines as compared with what they have since become. We read, however, that they had produced a very numerous but somewhat rickety family as late as 1638, when Charles I. was king of England. A division of the family about this time was known as the matchlocks, and clumsy enough they were, requiring, when used, to be supported upon props. King Charles the Second, however, took the guns under his especial protection. This monarch established, by a royal charter, a college of physicians for the guns under the style and title of the Royal Incorporated Society of Gunsmiths, and from that day the guns have become a more vigorous, active, energetic, but we regret to add, a more obstructive race than they had ever been before. They had previously been discharged by means of a rude match, by which their intended effects were made very uncertain. The next step was by attaching a match to a wheel which revolved. A firestone was next discovered which produced fire by percussion; but this instrument was very uncertain, for it was found to strike fire when it was not wanted, and to miss fire at precisely the same times. The flint succeeded this discarded servant, but was found to be no better for the situation, and was dismissed in turn. A whole legion of pigny imps were now administered with great success, and these have undergone so many modifications that it would be impossible to enumerate or describe them within the limits we have proposed to ourselves in this memoir. However, under the hands of the gunsmiths the family of the guns assumed a high position of respectability, and have become the arbiters of almost every quarrel that assumes large proportions.

As with most families of ancient lineage, the derivation of the patronymic of this destructive tribe has become a point of learned dispute. The accomplished Selden, in speaking of this family, says that "Sometimes we put a new signification upon an old word, as we know that the word gun was in use in England, for an engine to cast a thing from a man, long before gunpowder was known." Others of the learned say that the word is derived from an obsolete term signifying to yawn or gape. This opinion is supported by contexts from eminent writers. Milton speaks of guns gaping with hideous orifice; and again as "deep throated" engines. Shakspeare is also indebted to this distinguished tribe for many of his most effective metaphors.

It furnishes a curious illustration of the care and skill bestowed upon the improvement of these bellicose individuals by the devotees of science, to remark that Galileo wrote his "Dialogues of Motion," to illustrate the idiosyncrasies of artillery. Sir Isaac Newton suggested theories of dynamic force and motion, that were suggested to him by a close observance of the effects produced upon a series of experiments. Mathematicians scarcely less eminent directed their attention to the laws by which the gun worked out its results. Some of these are curious, and deserve to be recorded.

The first writer, however, who undertook to examine this subject with a view to practical improvement, made some rather singular discoveries, which had been previously overlooked, or were, from the nature of the circumstances, inaccessible. The body or barrel of a musket, as it is called in professional parlance, was found to be very irregular in the performance of its functions. The barrel of an old musket was therefore secured upon a block of wood, and fired at a board one foot square at sixty yards distance. It was found that the said invalid gun missed the board only once in sixteen times, yet, when fired at a distance of seven hundred and sixty yards, the ball was driven wide of the mark sometimes more than one hundred yards. Nor was there any certainty as to the direction which this aberration might take, for the obstinate instrument would sometimes insist upon sending the ball one hundred yards to the right, and, the next moment, would send it an equal distance to the left. Nor was this all. The line in which it was pointed, the direction upwards and downwards was also equally uncertain, the ball in some discharges having struck the ground two hundred yards nearer to the musket than it did at others. These derangements led to new theories, and to some very curious anatomical experiments. The idea first suggested itself that the ball forced against the sides of the barrel of the gun obtained an eccentric motion. It was also found that much of the expansive force of the gunpowder was wasted in being permitted to escape through the spaces left by the ball not fitting truly the bore of the musket. It next struck the professors that the ball should be somewhat larger than the bore, and be hammered down so as to be perfectly airtight. But this violence produced superficial inequalities, which in their turn produced a result different from what was expected, but still a very decided improvement upon the old plan. The time, however, required in administering this increased amount of food proved to be a fresh drawback. The deflection so fatal to accuracy of aim was found to be obviated by giving to the ball an additional and rotary motion upon its axis. This led to the process of rifling, which has become now all but universal. This operation consists in making a number of grooves, cut in a spiral direction, which gives the ball in its passage through the barrel the motion required. The effect of this improvement was sufficiently encouraging to give increased zeal and ingenuity to the gun doctors. The next step was to make the ball in an egg shape, by which the motion was made more regular and equalized, and thus give greater range, greater accuracy, a more sustained velocity, and a terribly increased force, until at length the deadly projectile was enabled to accomplish its destructive mission at a distance of miles. While we write, more than a thousand human beings have fallen in a few hours under the doom of this agent of modern civilization. The gun has mown down the flower of every nation in the world. It has become the weapon of the destroying angel, and woe to the man or the nation who calls it to his aid without a just cause or a righteous purpose.

But it is happily a source of consolation that the very voracity of the gun family warns off the adventurous spirits who would play with them to their neighbour's injury. Playing with edged tools is notoriously dangerous, so is playing dominoes with a tiger, swimming a match with a shark, squirting at an elephant, and such other innocent amusements. The last of the gun family is said to be the best looking of his tribe; he is sleek and shining, there are no menacing lines about his mouth, no diabolical expression in the flashes of his eye, but his breath is deadly nevertheless. It scatters a thousand bolts of fire about at any desired point. It will root up a tree, knock down a great house, or sink the largest ship at three miles. This will it do with unfailing accuracy, and will repeat the deed many times within a given period. Surely it is therefore a providential law which evolves peace and good will, even out of the fears of men, and places upon the shoulders of the ambitious the responsibility of entering upon war.

THE WORK OF IRON, IN NATURE, ART, AND POLICY.

FROM "THE TWO PATHS," BY JOHN RUSKIN, M.A.

WHEN I venture to speak about my own special business of art, it is almost always before students of art, among whom I may sometimes permit myself to be dull, if I can feel that I am useful: but a mere talk about art, especially without examples to refer to (and I have been unable to prepare any careful illustrations for this lecture), is seldom of much interest to a general audience. As I was considering what you might best bear with me in speaking about, there came naturally into my mind a subject connected with the origin and present prosperity of the town you live in: and, it seemed to me, in the out-branchings of it, capable of a very general interest. When, long ago (I am afraid to think how long), Tunbridge Wells was my Switzerland, and I used to be brought down here in the summer, a sufficiently active child, rejoicing in the hope of clambering sandstone cliffs of stupendous height above the common, there used sometimes, as I suppose, there are in the lives of all children at the Wells, to be dark days in my life—days of condemnation to the pantiles and band—under which calamities my only consolation used to be in watching, at every turn in my walk, the welling forth of the spring over the orange rim of its marble basin. The memory of the clear water, sparkling over its saffron stain, came back to me as the strongest image connected with the place; and it struck me that you might not be unwilling, to-night, to think a little over the full significance of that saffron stain, and of the power, in other ways and other functions, of the steely element to which so many here owe returning strength and life;—chief as it has been always, and is yet more and more markedly so day by day, among the precious gifts of the earth. The subject is, of course, too wide to be more than suggestively treated; and even my suggestions must be few, and drawn chiefly from my own fields of work; nevertheless, I think I shall have time to indicate some courses of thought which you may afterwards follow out for yourselves if they interest you; and so I will not shrink from the full scope of the subject which I have announced to you—the functions of Iron, in Nature, Art, and Policy. Without more preface I will take up the first head.

I. Iron in Nature.—You will probably know that the ochreous stain, which, perhaps, is often thought to spoil the basin of your spring, is iron in a state of rust; and when you see rusty iron in other places, you generally think not only that it spoils the places it stains, but that it is spoiled itself—that rusty iron is spoiled iron.

For most of our uses it generally is so; and because we cannot use a rusty knife or razor so well as a polished one, we suppose it to be a great defect in iron that it is subject to rust. But not at all. On the contrary, the most perfect and useful state of it is that ochreous stain; and therefore it is endowed with so ready a disposition to get itself into that state. It is not a fault in the iron, but a virtue, to be so fond of getting rusted, for in that condition it fulfils its most important functions in the universe, and most kindly duties to mankind. Nay, in a certain sense, and almost a literal one, we may say that iron rusted is living; but when pure or polished, dead. You all probably know that in the mixed air we breathe, the part of it essentially needful to us is called oxygen; and that this substance is to all animals, in the most acute sense of the word, "breath of life." The nervous power of life is a different thing; but the supporting element of the breath, without which the blood, and therefore the life, cannot be nourished, is this oxygen. Now it is this very same air which the iron breathes when it gets rusty. It takes the oxygen from the atmosphere as eagerly as we do, though it uses it differently. The iron keeps all that it gets; we, and other animals, part with it again; but the metal absolutely keeps what it has once received of this aerial gift; and the ochreous dust which we so much despise is, in fact, just so much nobler than pure iron, in so far as it is iron and the air. Nobler, and more useful—for, indeed, as I shall be able to show you presently, the main service of this metal, and of all other metals, to us, is not in making knives, and scissors, and pokers, and pans, but in making the ground we feed from, and nearly all the substances first needful to our existence. For these are all nothing but metals and oxygen—metals with breath put into them. Sand, lime, clay, and the rest of the earths—potash and soda, and the rest of the alkalies—are all of them metals which have undergone this, so to speak, vital change, and have been rendered fit for the service of man by permanent unity with the purest air which he himself breathes. There is only one metal which does not rust readily; and that, in its influence on man hitherto, has caused death rather than life; it will not be put to its right use till it is made a pavement of, and so trodden under foot.

Is there not something striking in this fact, considered largely as one of the types, or lessons, furnished by the inanimate creation? Here you have your hard, bright, cold, lifeless metal—good enough for swords and scissors—but not for food. You think, perhaps, that your iron is wonderfully useful in a pure form, but how would you like the world, if all your meadows, instead of grass, grew nothing but iron wire—if all your arable ground, instead of being made of sand and clay, were suddenly turned into flat surfaces of steel—if the whole earth, instead of its green and glowing sphere, rich with forest and flower, showed nothing but the image of the vast furnace of a ghastly engine—a globe of black, lifeless, excoriated metal? It would be that—probably it was once that; but assuredly it would be, were it not that all the substance of which it is made sucks and breathes the brilliancy of the atmosphere; and, as it breathes, softening from its merciless hardness, it falls into fruitful and beneficent dust; gathering itself again into the earths from which we feed; and the stones with which we build;—into the rocks that frame the mountains, and the sands that bind the sea. Hence, it is impossible for you to take up the most insignificant pebble at your feet, without being able to read, if you like, this curious lesson in it. You look upon it at first as if it were earth only. Nay, it answers, "I am not earth—I am earth and air in one; part of that blue heaven which you love, and long for, is already in me; it is all my life—without it I should be nothing, and able for nothing; I could not minister to you, nor nourish you—I should be a cruel and helpless thing; but, because there is, according to my need and place in creation, a kind of soul in me, I have become capable of good, and helpful in the circles of vitality."

In these days of swift locomotion I may doubtless assume that most of my audience have been somewhere out of England—have been in Scotland, or France, or Switzerland. Whatever may have been their impression, on returning to their own country, of its superiority or inferiority in other respects, they cannot but have felt one thing about it—the comfortable look of its towns and villages. Foreign towns are often very picturesque, very beautiful, but they never have quite that look of warm self-sufficiency and wholesome quiet with which our villages nestle themselves down among the green fields. If you will take the trouble to examine into the sources of this impression, you will find that by far the greater part of that warm and satisfactory appearance depends upon the rich scarlet colour of the bricks and tiles. It does not belong to the neat building—a very neat building has an uncomfortable rather than a comfortable look—but it depends upon the warm building; our villages are dressed in red tiles as our old women are in red cloaks; and it does not matter how worn the cloaks, or how bent and bowed the roof may be, so long as there are no holes in either one or the other, and the sobered but unextinguishable colour still glows in the shadow of the hood, and burns among the green mosses of the gable. And what do you suppose dyes your tiles of cottage roof? You don't paint them. It is nature who puts all that lovely vermilion into the clay for you; and all that lovely vermilion is this oxide of iron. Think, therefore, what your streets of towns would become—ugly enough, indeed, already, some of them, but still comfortable looking—if instead of that warm brick red, the houses became all pepper-and-salt colour. Fancy your country villages changing from that homely scarlet of theirs which, in its sweet suggestion of laborious peace, is as honourable as the soldiers' scarlet of laborious battle—suppose all those cottage roofs, I say, turned at once into the colour of unbaked clay, the colour of street gutters in rainy weather. That's what they would be, without iron.

There is, however, yet another effect of colour in our English country towns which, perhaps, you may not all yourselves have noticed, but for which you must take the word of a sketcher. They are not so often merely warm scarlet as they are warm purple;—a more beautiful colour still: and they owe this colour to a mingling with the vermilion of the deep greyish or purple hue of our fine Welsh slates on the more respectable roofs, made more blue still by the colour of intervening atmosphere. If you examine one of these Welsh slates freshly broken, you will find its purple colour clear and vivid; and although never strikingly so after it has been long exposed to weather, it always retains enough of the tint to give rich harmonies of distant purple in opposition to the green of our woods and fields. Whatever brightness or power there is in the hue is entirely owing to the oxide of iron. Without it the slates would either be pale stone colour, or cold grey, or black.

Thus far we have only been considering the use and pleasantness of iron in the common earth of clay. But there are three kinds of earth which in mixed mass and prevalent quantity form the world. Those are, in common language, the earths of clay, of lime, and of flint. Many other elements are mingled with these in sparing quantities; but the great frame and substance of the earth is made of these three, so that wherever you stand on solid ground, in any country of the globe, the thing that is mainly under your feet will be either clay, limestone, or some condition of the earth of flint, mingled with both.

These being what we have usually to deal with, nature seems to have set herself to make these three substances as interesting to us, and as beautiful for us, as she can. The clay, being a soft and changeable substance, she doesn't take much pains about, as we have seen, till it is baked; she brings the colour into it only when it receives a permanent form. But the limestone and flint she paints, in her own way, in their native state; and her object in painting them seems to be much the same as in her painting of flowers; to draw us, careless and idle human creatures, to watch her a little, and see what she is about—that being, on the whole, good for us—her children. For nature is always carrying on very strange work with this limestone and flint of hers—laying down beds of them at the bottom of the sea; building islands out of the sea; filling chinks and veins in mountains with curious treasures; petrifying mosses, and trees, and shells; in fact, carrying on all sorts of business, subterranean or sub-marine, which it would be highly desirable for us, who profit and live by it, to notice as it goes on. And apparently to lead us to do this, she makes picture-books for us of limestone and flint; and tempts us, like foolish children as we are, to read her books by the pretty colours in them. The pretty colours in her limestone books form those variegated marbles which all mankind have taken delight to polish and build with from the beginning of time; and the pretty colours in her flint-books form those agates, jaspers, cornelians, bloodstones, onyxes, cairngorms, chrysoprases, which men have in like manner taken delight to cut, and polish, and make ornaments, from the beginning of time; and yet, so much of babies are they, and so fond of looking at the pictures instead of reading the book, that I question whether, after six thousand years of cutting and polishing, there are above two or three people out of any given hundred, who know, or care to know, how a bit of agate or a bit of marble was made, or painted. How it was made, may not be always very easy to say; but with what it was painted there is no manner of question. All those beautiful violet veinings and variegations of the marbles of Sicily and Spain, the glowing orange and amber colours of those of Siena, the deep russet of the Rosso antico, and the blood-colour of all the precious jaspers that enrich the temples of Italy; and, finally, all the lovely transitions of tint in the pebbles of Scotland and the Rhine, which form, though not the most precious, by far the most interesting portion of our modern jewellers' work;—all these are painted by nature with this one material only, variously proportioned and applied—the oxide of iron that stains your Tunbridge springs.

But this is not all, nor the best part of the work of iron. Its service in producing these beautiful stones is only rendered to rich people, who can afford to quarry and polish them. But nature paints for all the world, poor and rich together; and while, therefore, she thus adorns the innermost rocks of her hills, to tempt your investigation, or indulge your luxury—she paints, far more carefully, the outside of the hills, which are for the eyes of the shepherd and the ploughman. I spoke just now of the effect in the roofs of our villages of their purple slates; but if the slates are beautiful even in their flat and formal rows on house-roofs, much more are they beautiful on the rugged crests and flanks of their native mountains. Have you ever considered, in speaking as we do so often of distant blue hills, what it is that makes them blue? To a certain extent it is distance; but distance alone will not do it. Many hills look white, however distant. That lovely dark purple colour of our Welsh and Highland hills is owing, not to their distance merely, but to their rocks. Some of their rocks are, indeed, too dark to be beautiful, being black or ashy grey; owing to imperfect and porous structure. But when you see this dark colour dashed with russet and blue, and coming out in masses among the green ferns, so purple that you can hardly tell at first whether it is rock or heather, then you must thank your old Tunbridge friend, the oxide of iron.

But this is not all. It is necessary for the beauty of hill scenery that nature should colour not only her soft rocks, but her hard ones; and she colours them with the same thing, only more beautifully. Perhaps you wondered at my frequent use of the word "purple," speaking of stones; but the Greeks, and still more the Romans, who had profound respect for purple, used it of stone long ago. You have all heard of "porphyry" as among the most precious of the harder massive stones. The colour which gave it that noble name, as well as that which gives the flush to all the rosy granite of Egypt—yes, and to the rosiest summits of the Alps themselves—is still owing to the same substance—your humble oxide of iron.

And last of all:

A nobler colour than all these—the noblest colour ever seen on this earth—one which belongs to a strength greater than that of the Egyptian granite, and to a beauty greater than that of the sunset or the rose—is still mysteriously connected with the presence of this dark iron. I believe it is not ascertained on what the crimson of blood actually depends; but the colour is connected, of course, with its vitality, and that vitality with the existence of iron as one of its substantial elements.

Is it not strange to find this stern and strong metal mingled so delicately in our human life, that we cannot even blush without its help? Think of it, my fair and gentle hearers; how terrible the alternative—sometimes you have actually no choice but to be brazen faced, or iron faced!

In this slight review of some of the functions of the metal, you observe that I confine myself strictly to its operations as a colouring element. I should only confuse your conception of the facts, if I endeavoured to describe its uses as a substantial element, either in strengthening rocks, or in influencing vegetation by the decomposition of rocks. I have not, therefore, even glanced at any of the more serious uses of the metal in the economy of art. But what I wish you to carry clearly away with you is the remembrance that in all these uses the metal would be nothing without the air. The pure metal has no power, and never occurs in nature at all, except in meteoric stones, whose fall no one can account for, and which are useless after they have fallen: in the necessary work of the world, the iron is invariably joined with the oxygen, and would be of no service or beauty whatever without it.

Iron in Art.—Passing from the offices of the metal in the operations of nature to its uses in the hands of man, you must remember, in the outset, that the type which has been given you, by the lifeless metal, of the action of body and soul together, has noble antitype in the operation of all human power. All art worthy the name is the energy—neither of the human body alone, nor of the human soul alone, but of both united, one guiding the other: good craftsmanship and work of the fingers, joined with good emotion and work of the heart.

There is no good art, nor possible judgment of art, when these two are not united; yet we are constantly trying to separate them. Our amateurs cannot be persuaded but that they may produce some kind of art by their fancy or sensibility, without going through the necessary manual toil. That is entirely hopeless. Without a certain number, and that a very great number, of steady acts of hand—a practice as careful and constant as would be necessary to learn any other manual business—no drawing is possible. On the other side, the workman, and those who employ him, are continually trying to produce art by trick or habit of fingers, without using their fancy or sensibility. That also is hopeless. Without mingling of heart passion with hand power, no art is possible. The highest art unites both in their intensest degrees; the action of the hand at its finest, with that of the heart at its fullest.

Hence it follows that the utmost power of art can only be given in a material capable of receiving and retaining the influence of the subtlest touch of the human hand. That hand is the most perfect agent of material power existing in the universe; and its full subtlety can only be shown when the material it works on or with is entirely yielding. The chords of a perfect instrument will receive it, but not of an imperfect one; the softly bending point of the hair pencil, and soft melting of colour, will receive it, but not even the chalk or pen point, still less the steel point, chisel, or marble. The hand of a sculptor may, indeed, be as subtle as that of a painter, but all its subtlety is not bestowable nor expressible: the touch of Titian, Correggio, or Turner, is a far more marvellous piece of nervous action than can be shown in anything but colour, or in the very highest conditions of executive expression in music. In proportion as the material worked upon is less delicate, the execution necessarily becomes lower, and the art with it. This is one main principle of all work. Another is, that whatever the material you choose to work with, your art is base if it does not bring out the distinctive qualities of that material.

The reason of this second law is, that if you don't want the qualities of the substance you use, you ought to use some other substance: it can be only affectation, and desire to display your skill that lead you to employ a refractory substance, and therefore your art will all be base. Glass, for instance, is eminently, in its nature, transparent. If you don't want transparency, let the glass alone. Do not try to make a window look like an opaque picture, but take an opaque ground to begin with. Again, marble is eminently a solid and massive substance. Unless you want mass and solidity, don't work in marble. If you wish for lightness, take wood; if for freedom, take stucco; if for ductility, take glass. Don't try to carve feathers, or trees, or nets, or foam, out of marble. Carve white limbs and broad breasts only out of that.

So again, iron is eminently a ductile and tenacious substance—tenacious above all things, ductile more than most. When you want tenacity, therefore, and involved form, take iron. It is eminently made for that. It is the material given to the sculptor as the companion of marble, with a message, as plain as it can well be spoken, from the lips of the earth-mother, "Here's for you to cut, and here's for you to hammer. Shape this, and twist that. What is solid and simple, carve out; what is thin and entangled, beat out. I give you all kinds of forms to be delighted in;—fluttering leaves as well as fair bodies; twisted branches as well as open brows. The leaf and the branch you may beat and drag into their imagery; the body and brow you shall reverently touch into their imagery. And if you choose rightly and work rightly, what you do shall be safe afterwards. Your slender leaves shall not break off in my tenacious iron, though they may be rusted a little with an iron autumn. Your broad surfaces shall not be unsmoothed in my pure crystalline marble—no decay shall touch them. But if you carve in the marble what will break with a touch, or mould in the metal what a stain of rust or verdigris will spoil, it is your fault—not mine."

These are the main principles in this matter; which, like nearly all other right principles in art, we moderns delight in contradicting as directly and specially as may be. We continually look for, and praise, in our exhibitions, the sculpture of veils, and lace, and thin leaves, and all kinds of impossible things pushed as far as possible in the fragile stone, for the sake of showing the sculptor's dexterity. On the other hand, we cast our iron into bars—brittle, though an inch thick—sharpen them at the ends, and consider fences, and other work, made of such materials, decorative! I do not believe it would be easy to calculate the amount of mischief done to our taste in England by that fence ironwork of ours alone. If it were asked of us, by a single characteristic, to distinguish the dwellings of a country into two broad sections; and to set, on one side, the places where people were, for the most part, simple, happy, benevolent, and honest; and, on the other side, the places where at least a great number of the people were sophisticated, unkind, uncomfortable, and unprincipled, there is, I think, one feature that you could fix upon as a positive test: the uncomfortable and unprincipled parts of a country would be the parts where people lived among iron railings, and the comfortable and principled parts where they had none. A broad generalization, you will say! Perhaps a little too broad; yet, in all sobriety, it will come truer than you think. Consider every other kind of fence or defence, and you will find some virtue in it; but in the iron railing none. There is, first, your castle rampart of stone—somewhat too grand to be considered here among our types of fencing; next, your garden or park wall of brick, which has indeed often an unkind look on the outside, but there is more modesty in it than unkindness. It generally means, not that the builder of it wants to shut you out from the view or his garden, but from the view of himself; it is a frank statement that as he needs a certain portion of time to himself, so he needs a certain portion of ground to himself, and must not be stared at when he digs there in his shirt sleeves, or plays at leapfrog with his boys from school, or talks over old times with his wife, walking up and down in the evening sunshine. Besides, the brick wall has good practical service in it, and shelters you from the east wind, and ripens your peaches and nectarines, and glows in autumn like a sunny bank. And, moreover, your brick wall, if you build it properly, so that it shall stand long enough, is a beautiful thing when it is old, and has assumed its grave purple red, touched with mossy green.

Next to your lordly wall, in dignity of enclosure, comes your close set wooden paling, which is more objectionable, because it commonly means enclosure on a larger scale than people want. Still it is significant of pleasant parks, and well kept field walks, and herds of deer, and other such aristocratic pastoralisms, which have here and there their proper place in a country, and may be passed without any discredit.

Next to your paling, comes your low stone dyke, your mountain fence, indicative at a glance either of wild hill country, or of beds of stone beneath the soil; the hedge of the mountains—delightful in all its associations, and yet more in the varied and craggy forms of the loose stones it is built of; and next to the low stone wall, your lowland hedge, either in trim line of massive green, suggestive of the pleasures of old Elizabethan houses, and smooth alleys for aged feet, and quaint labyrinths for young ones, or else in fair entanglement of eglantine and virgin's bower, tossing its scented luxuriance along our country waysides:—how many such you have here among your pretty hills, fruitful with black clusters of the bramble for boys in autumn, and crimson hawthorn-berries for birds in winter. And then last, and most difficult to class among fences, comes your handrail, expressive of all sorts of things; sometimes having a knowing and vicious look, which it learns at race-courses; sometimes an innocent and tender look, which it learns at rustic bridges over cressy brooks; and sometimes a prudent and protective look, which it learns on passes of the Alps, where it has posts of granite and bars of pine, and guards the brows of cliffs and the banks of torrents. So that in all these kinds of defence there is some good, pleasant, or noble meaning. But what meaning has the iron railing? Either, observe, that you are living in the midst of such bad characters that you must keep them out by main force of bar, or that you are yourself of a character requiring to be kept inside in the same manner. Your iron railing always means thieves outside, or Bedlam inside;—it can mean nothing else than that. If the people outside were good for anything, a hint in the way of fence would be enough for them; but because they are violent and at enmity with you, you are forced to put the close bars and the spikes at the top. Last summer I was lodging for a little while in a cottage in the country, and in front of my low window there were, first, some beds of daisies, then a row of gooseberry and currant bushes, and then a low wall about three feet above the ground, covered with stone-cress. Outside, a corn-field, with its green ears glistening in the sun, and a field path through it, just past the garden gate. From my window I could see every peasant of the village who passed that way, with basket on arm for market, or spade on shoulder for field. When I was inclined for society, I could lean over my wall, and talk to anybody; when I was inclined for science, I could botanize all along the top of my wall—there were four species of stone-cress alone growing on it; and when I was inclined for exercise, I could jump over my wall, backwards and forwards. That's the sort of fence to have in a Christian country; not a thing which you can't walk inside of without making yourself look like a wild beast, nor look at out of your window in the morning without expecting to see somebody impaled upon it in the night.

And yet farther, observe that the iron railing is a useless fence—it can shelter nothing, and support nothing; you can't nail your peaches to it, nor protect your flowers with it, nor make anythink whatever out of its costly tyranny; and besides being useless, it is an insolent fence;—it says plainly to everybody who passes—"You may be an honest person—but, also, you may be a thief: honest or not, you shall not get in here, for I am a respectable person, and much above you; you shall only see what a grand place I have got to keep you out of—look here, and depart in humiliation."

This, however, being in the present state of civilization a frequent manner of discourse, and there being unfortunately many districts where the iron railing is unavoidable, it yet remains a question whether you need absolutely make it ugly, no less than significant of evil. You must have railings round your squares in London, and at the sides of your areas; but need you therefore have railings so ugly that the constant sight of them is enough to neutralize the effect of all the schools of art in the kingdom? You need not. Far from such necessity, it is even in your power to turn all your police force of iron bars actually into drawing masters, and natural historians. Not, of course, without some trouble and some expense; you can do nothing much worth doing, in this world, without trouble, you can get nothing much worth having, without expense. The main question is only—what is worth doing and having:—Consider, therefore, if this be not. Here is your iron railing, as yet, an uneducated monster; a sombre seneschal, incapable of any words, except his perpetual "Keep out!" and "Away with you!" Would it not be worth some trouble and cost to turn this ungainly ruffian porter into a well-educated servant; who, while he was severe as ever in forbidding entrance to evilly-disposed people, should yet have a kind word for well-disposed people, and a pleasant look, and a little useful information at his command, in case he should be asked a question by the passers-by?

We have not time to look at many examples of ironwork; and those I happen to have by me are not the best: ironwork is not one of my special subjects of study; so that I only have memoranda of bits that happened to come into picturesque subjects which I was drawing for other reasons. Besides, external ironwork is more difficult to find good than any other sort of ancient art; for when it gets rusty and broken, people are sure, if they can afford it, to send it to the old iron shop, and get a fine new grating instead; and in the great cities of Italy, the old iron is thus nearly all gone: the best bits I remember in the open air were at Brescia;—fantastic sprays of laurel-like foliage rising over the garden gates; and there are a few fine fragments at Verona, and some good trellis-work enclosing the Scala tombs; but on the whole, the most interesting pieces, though by no means the purest in style, are to be found in out-of-the-way provincial towns, where people do not care, or are unable, to make polite alterations. The little town of Bellinzona, for instance, on the south of the Alps, and that of Sion on the north, have both of them complete schools of ironwork in their balconies and vineyard gates. That of Bellinzona is the best, though not very old—I suppose most of it of the seventeenth century; still it is very quaint and beautiful.

The common forms of Swiss ironwork are less naturalistic than the Italian balconies, depending more on beautiful arrangements of various curve; nevertheless, there has been a rich naturalist school at Fribourg, where a few bell-handles are still left, consisting of rods branched into laurel and other leafage. At Geneva, modern improvements have left nothing; but at Annecy, a little good work remains; the balcony of its old hôtel de ville especially, with a trout of the lake, presumably the town arms—forming its central ornament.

I might expatiate all night—if you would sit and hear me—on the treatment of such required subject, or introduction of pleasant caprice by the old workmen; but we have no more time to spare, and I must quit this part of our subject—the rather as I could not explain to you the intrinsic merit of such ironwork without going fully into the theory of curvilinear design; only let me leave with you this one distinct assertion—that the quaint beauty and character of many natural objects, such as intricate branches, grass, foliage (especially thorny branches and prickly foliage), as well as that of many animals, plumed, spined, or bristled, is sculpturally expressible in iron only, and in iron would be majestic and impressive in the highest degree; and that every piece of metal-work you use might be, rightly treated, not only a superb decoration, but a most valuable abstract of portions of natural forms, holding in dignity precisely the same relation to the painted representation of plants, that a statue does to the painted form of man.

PRACTICAL PATRIOTISM AND AMERICAN SYMPATHY.—An "Italian patriot" met a person near the North American office yesterday, and asked for charity—a small sum of money to enable the Italian patriot to get his grandfather from Naples, where he is confined in an "iron prison, with eighteen padlocks on his legs." In proof of his story, Italian patriot produced a paper of authentication, signed by the captain of the Neapolitan barque Regina, and calling upon all "humanitarians" to provide themselves with step-ladders to heaven, by aiding the bearer. Humanitarian read the paper, dropped several tears, and then told Italian patriot he would like to "aid him" to the extent of a dollar, but had nothing smaller than a ten dollar bill. Patriot informed humanitarian that he would change bill and take a dollar out. Humanitarian said "all right," and handed Italian patriot a ten dollar note. Italian took bill and placed it in a wallet so covered with dirt that an assessor would probably class it as real estate. Having done this he handed nine dollars to humanitarian, and left his blessing as an acknowledgment. About an hour afterwards Italian patriot applied to the Recorder for a warrant against humanitarian for passing counterfeit money. A warrant was given, but thus far nothing has been seen of humanitarian who wished to aid in getting Italian patriot's grandfather from that iron prison in Naples. We fear that humanitarian has sold Italian patriot, and that Italian patriot's grandfather will have to wear those eighteen padlocks for some time to come. This is a queer world, as Italian patriot will find if he continues in these parts much longer.—Philadelphia North American.

BRO. EDWIN FORREST, the tragedian, at a late meeting of the Grand Lodge of Freemasons of New York, presented the Lodge with a cheque for $500, being the amount of the verdict recently awarded him in the libel case against N. P. Willis. The sum goes toward the fund for the relief of widows and orphans of Freemasons.

Poetry.

SONG.

BY WILLIAM ALLINGHAM.

I WALK'D in the lonesome evening,
And who so sad as I,
When I saw the young men and maidens
Merrily passing by?
To thee, my love, to thee—
So fain would I come to thee!
While the ripples fold upon sands of gold,
And I look across the sea.

I stretch out my hands, who will clasp them?
I call, thou repliest no word;
O why should heart-longing be weaker
Than the waving winds of a bird!
To thee, my love, to thee—
So fain would I come to thee!
For the tide's at rest from east to west,
And I look across the sea.

There's joy in the hopeful morning,
There's peace in the parting day,
There's sorrow with every lover
Whose true love is far away.
To thee, my love, to thee—
So fain would I come to thee!
For the water's bright in a still moonlight,
As I look across the sea.

CLEVELAND.

BY GEORGE MARKHAM TWEDDELL.*

CLEVELAND! I know no nook of earth like thee!
No mountain scenes e'er charm me like mine own;
The altars of benignant Liberty!
The palace where the Muses have their throne!
Upon thy cliffs I love to take my stand,
And view the ocean, as it rolls below;
Roaring like lions on some distant strand;
Contending like an hero, when the blow
Of fierce invader's level'd at his head,
And all around the gory trunks are laid
Of comrades, from which life's for ever fled:
And in thy valleys, 'neath some old rock's shade,
I love to linger at the close of day,
In dreams of future good to pass my life away.

BONNY MAY.

BY CHARLES SIOMAN.

My bonny May, my bonny May,
I'm ever sad when thou'rt away;
Frae early dawn, till e'ning grey,
I mind thee aye, my bonny May,—
Though in the lift the lavrock's heard,
I canna thole the winsome bird;
For absent from my bonny May,
There's nought on earth can make one gay.

Her mou's a mine o' pearlins white;
Her een arc as the stermes bright;
And when in Sabbath garbe bedight,
She sheds around a sunny light—
Her brow's as quarried marble fair,
Like nut of hazel is her hair;
Then oh, my May, my bonny May,
Return, and change my night to day.

MASONIC HALL, AT STUTTGART.

OUR ARCHITECTURAL CHAPTER.

IN Freemasonry, with the exception of the attempt making for the erection of a new hall for the Lodge La Césaire in Jersey, and which we trust will be soon carried out, we have scarcely anything to note for our Architectural Chapter, though we are now looking forward with some interest to the report of the Board of General Purposes regarding the remodelling of the property in Great Queen-street, so as to make it more thoroughly Masonic than it has hitherto been, and more befitting the character and position of the Craft. The report, we presume, will be brought before Grand Lodge in September, though we can scarcely hope it will be then taken into consideration. Indeed, the importance of the subject will probably suggest some delay, if not the setting aside by the Most Worshipful Grand Master of a special evening for the report to be discussed, after due time has been given to the Craft to consider it in its various details.

In our number of the 25th May, Bro. F. W. Breitling briefly described the hall of the Lodge Wilhelm zur aufgehenden Sonne (William to the rising Sun) at Stuttgart, and we now present our readers with an engraving of the hall, from a drawing with which we have been obligingly favoured by Bro. Breitling. The engraving itself explains the position of the hall or Lodge room, at the back of the building, the lower part being devoted to the purpose of a banqueting hall, which communicates with the garden. In the front part of the building, on the ground floor, are on one side the apartments of the house steward, with kitchen, and other domestic offices; and, on the other side, the reception and preparation rooms, the upper story being devoted to rooms for committees' conversation.

The most interesting subject to our architectural readers, apart from Masonry, is the discussion which has again arisen relative to the new government offices, the designs for which have just been placed in the reading rooms of the House of Commons. As long since as 1856 a committee of that house was appointed to consider the condition of the Foreign Office which had long been in a dilapidated condition, and whether it would be advisable to remove the War Office from Pall Mall to Downing Street, so as to bring it in more immediate proximity to the other government offices. This committee was presided over by the first commissioner of public works, Lord Llanover, (then Sir Benjamin Hall), and reported in favour of a new Foreign Office with the War Office in immediate proximity—adding a recommendation that the designs should be thrown open to public competition. The first commissioner having obtained the sanction of the government, issued a notification inviting designs, and in order to obtain them of sufficient merit, offering premiums to the amount of £5,000. At the same time he wished, in conformity with the report of the committee, to be empowered to purchase the ground lying between the Thames on the east, the Park on the west, Downing-street and the back of Richmond-terrace on the north, and Great George-street and Palace-yard on the south. But the government limited the scheme to the acquisition of the property between Downing-street and Charles-street, at the same time empowering the first commissioner to obtain designs for laying out the larger area for the establishment of public offices. Then came the beautiful exhibition of designs of 1857, and the award of prizes which gave general, though not—as it never could be expected to do—universal satisfaction.

tion. A bill was next introduced to enable the government to purchase the site and proceed with the works. The bill passed through committee and was deemed safe, when Lord John Manners and his friends opposed it, and it was thrown out. Nothing further could then be done, and shortly afterwards a change took place in the government.

Lord Llanover being succeeded by Lord John Manners as first commissioner, another committee of the House of Commons was appointed, of which Lord Llanover and Lord John Manners were both members, and as nearly as possible the same site as that previously opposed by the last named noble lord, was agreed to, it being further arranged that one of the three successful designs should be adopted. Lord John gave the requisite notices, and a bill was brought in for obtaining the site, which will no doubt this session receive the royal assent. In the meantime, rumours became rife that Lord John, who is well known to have peculiar views with regard to Gothic architecture, had determined to throw the first two designs on one side, and that the author of the third had received directions from Lord John to make out working drawings, prepare a model, and make an estimate. The Government, however, has been again changed, and certain members of the House of Commons not so deeply impressed with the necessity of resorting to the Gothic upon all and every occasion, without regard to the purpose for which the building is designed, as the noble lord appears to be, called for the plans to be again brought before them. They were consequently produced, and are now exposed to public view in the ante-room of the House of Commons, where any one may see them. They stand No. 1, No. 2, and No. 3—the latter being the design of the favoured architect of the late first commissioner—and which does not meet with that approbation from others which it elicited from his lordship. A few days afterwards, one of the reading rooms of the House of Commons was filled with a large pasteboard model of the structure, and a more decided opinion seemed to set in against it. The Observer informs us that all that now will be done with it “will be, to pay a heavy bill to the architect,” for which a vote will have to be asked from the House of Commons, and probably lead to a discussion not very complimentary to the taste of Lord John. The Observer thus sums up the results of the opposition to the bill of Lord Llanover in 1857. “Two years will have been lost, and great injustice been done to the two first architects. A bill of probably four or five thousand pounds or more will have to be paid, besides expenses incurred to keep up the present dilapidated buildings. The owners and occupiers of property to be acquired have had nearly three years more to cook their accounts for compensation. Two sets of parliamentary notices have been given instead of one, and consequently two surveyors and two parliamentary agents’ bills have to be paid instead of one, besides various other charges necessarily consequent on the delay.”

The Building News, however, appears in a perfect ecstasy of delight with this much discussed design, and says:—“The great opponents of Gothic architecture will be glad to hear that there are no mullions or other impediments to light. Sculpture is generously yet judiciously introduced, and not the dry wry-necked figures with which Gothic architecture is too often unjustly associated, but such as can be executed without sacrifice of beauty or of truth. There does not seem a single requirement either of climate or of comfort which has not been met with the corresponding elasticity of the style. There is none of the trivial stone panelling which, fashioned to enrich, disfigures the Westminster Palace; but borrowing the rich fulness and boldness of the foreign Gothic, Mr. Scott has, with wondrous skill, welded it to its more stubborn development in England. Unhampered as was Sir Charles Barry, with the choice of a style, he has taken Gothic art when it reached its ripe manhood, and by these designs he has shown that to no worthier hands could the much-coveted task have been committed. Should the building be erected as we here see it, it will be the finest of its style which has for four hundred years been reared in England”—an opinion from which we unequivocally record our dissent.

On the 21st, a new church dedicated to St. John the Evangelist, was consecrated at Putney by the Bishop of London. The church, built from the designs of Mr. Charles Lee, is in the early English style, having clerestory, aisles, transepts, and chancel, with open timber roof, and poppy headed open seats. The exterior is faced with ragstone, with Bath stone designs. The cost will be about four thousand six hundred pounds, of which two thousand five hundred pounds (in addition to the site) has been subscribed by Mr. John Temple Leader, formerly M.P. for Westminster. There are sittings for five hundred adults, without galleries.

In connection with architecture, we may state that a strike has taken place in the building trade, owing to a demand of the men to be allowed only to work for nine hours instead of ten, at the same rate of wages. The strike has commenced at Messrs. Trollope’s, and the master builders, in order to suppress it, have held a meeting, and resolved upon closing all their shops on the 6th August, a committee, however, being appointed to consider the best means of opening the doors to such men as may be willing to work independently of the rules of any society. In the course of the proceedings, Sir Samuel Peto, M.P., stated that the strike which his firm had to contend with during the erection of the Houses of Parliament cost his firm between fifteen and sixteen thousand pounds.

A strike, which in the winter months would have been of greater consequence than at present, has also taken place in the various metropolitan gas works, the men demanding a rise of about twenty per cent. on their present wages.

MASONIC NOTES AND QUERIES.

EXTRACTS FROM THE “FREEMASONS’ CALENDAR,” FOR THE YEARS 1775 AND 1776.

Age of Initiates.—The old Regulation IV. decreed that “No Lodge shall make more than five new brethren at one time, nor any man under the age of twenty-five, who must be also his own master, unless by a dispensation from the Grand Master, or his Deputy.” [N.B. Masons are now admitted at the age of twenty-one; but there appears to be no authority for this alteration.]

Clothing.—New Regulations, March 17, 1731. None but the Grand Master, his Deputy, and Wardens, who are the only Grand Officers, shall wear their jewels pendant to blue ribbons about their necks, and white leather aprons lined with blue silk; which sort of aprons may also be worn by former Grand Officers, and by Provincial Grand Masters, during the continuance of their Provincialship.—[N.B. The Grand Treasurer, Secretary, and Sword Bearer, are now permitted to wear the clothing of Grand Officers, as are also Provincial Grand Officers in their several provinces.]

Clothing II.—Masters and Wardens of particular Lodges may line their white leather aprons with white silk, and hang their jewels at white ribbons about their necks.—[N.B. Members of private Lodges are now permitted to wear the same clothing.]

Charity Fee from New Lodges.—December 27, 1729. Every new constituted Lodge shall pay two guineas to the general charity.—[N.B. Every new constituted Lodge, within the bills of mortality, now pays four guineas to the charity.]

Membership and Visiting Rights.—No brother shall belong to more than one Lodge within the bills of mortality, though he may visit them all, except the members of a foreign Lodge.—[N.B. This regulation having become obsolete, was neglected for several years; but it has been again confirmed by a resolution of the Grand Lodge within these ten years. (1775).]

Appointment of Grand Secretary.—The Grand Secretary is now appointed by the Grand Master, and not by the Grand Lodge. (Regulations made in Oct., 1768).—LEX MASONICA.

IRISH RECOGNITION OF THE HIGH DEGREES.

According to the Freemasons’ Calendar, published yearly at Dublin, the issues of the years 1848-57 being now before me, I find the Grand Lodge of Ireland to acknowledge the following:—Supreme Grand Council of the 83°; Order of Mizraim; Knights of the Sun; Philosophical Masons; Prince Masons of Ireland; and that the Grand Lodge of Ireland, on Oct. 4, 1838, "Resolved, that the Grand Lodge recognize the constitution of the Supreme Grand Council of Rites for Ireland, and act in unison with it, as with the Supreme Royal Arch Chapter and the Supreme Grand Encampment of High Knights Templars."

And on February 1st, 1844, it was also "Resolved, that this Grand Lodge strictly prohibits, as unlawful, all assemblies of Freemasons in Ireland, under any title whatsoever purporting to be Masonic, not held by virtue of a warrant or constitution from this Grand Lodge, or from the other Masonic bodies recognized by and acting in unison with the Grand Lodge of Ireland."—W.M. BN.

TWO MASONIC WORTHIES.

Seeing, in the last "Masonic Notes and Queries," an account of Bro. Brice, of Exeter, it struck me that I had some recollection of the name, and, on reference, found the following particulars; also a few lines respecting John Holt, of Birmingham.—W. LLOYD, Birmingham.

"In Memory of ANDREW BRICE, of Exeter, Printer, who departed this transitory life in hope of an eternal one, on Sunday, the 7th November, 1773, and whose earthly remains were interred in Saint Bartholomew Yard, on Sunday, the 14th, following, attended by upwards of 200 Free and Accepted Masons, who testified their sincere regard for him by a procession from the New Inn Apollo, to his grave, amid a numerous concourse of spectators.

"The following elegy on his death was written for and performed on the occasion—

"From this vain world of noise and strife,
I enjoy a new-born heavenly life,
Our dearest Brother fled!
His body we commit to earth,
His soul to God, who gave him birth,
To raise him from the dead.

"Chorus.—To the powers divine all glory be given,
By men upon earth, and by angels in heaven.

"The sweet remembrance of the just Shall flourish while he sleeps in dust,
Our hope in heaven secure.
The wicked's mem'ry shall decay,
And vanish, like a shade, away,
Nor thought of any more.

"Chorus.—To the powers divine, &c.

"In the grand awful Lodge above
Dwell concord, harmony, and love,
Eternal peace and rest.
Our God is merciful and kind;
Then seek in time, and you will find
A blessing 'mongst the blest.

"Chorus.—To the powers divine, &c."

"In memory of JOHN HOLT, of Birmingham, brush maker, who died March 12th, 1769, aged 38 years.

"No flattering titles deck this humble stone,
This verse is sacred to the truth alone.
Here lies (exceed the character who can)
An upright Mason and an honest man.

"The body was attended by a great number of brethren, properly clothed with the formalities of the Order, and interred in St. Bartholomew Yard, amid a multitude of spectators."

DATES OF ROYAL ARCH CHAPTERS.

It is a pity that the Freemasons' Calendar and Pocket Book does not give the dates of the constitution of Royal Arch Chapters, in the same way that it does those of Lodges. Having stumbled over a record that states the Royal Arch Chapter of Concord, at Durham (being No. 146 in the list inserted in this year's pocket book) was constituted by the Grand and Royal Arch Chapter of England, Aug. 5, 1787, Comps. Finch, Z.; Sample, II.; Bright, J.; Pennington, Castle, Stott, C. Sojourners; and Nicholson, Janitor—I send, hoping this may induce others to furnish you with similar information.—NORTHERN LIGHT.

BENIGN INFLUENCE OF FREEMASONRY.

Under the above heading (page 494, vol. 62, of The European Magazine, 8vo., London, 1812,) is the following narration:—"On the evening of the 6th ult., (November), as the sloop, Three Friends, of Youghall, J. Campbell, master, was coming out of Southampton, she was captured at the Start-point by a French privateer, the Juret, Louis Marencourt, of St. Malo, captain. On finding the cargo to consist of brick and hoops, orders were given to scuttle and sink the ship; but on Captain Marencourt perceiving among Mr. Campbell's papers a certificate from his Masonic Lodge, the Frenchman countermanded his orders for sinking the vessel, entertained him with great hospitality, gave him a paper by which the sloop and cargo were to be his; and made him promise, under his hand, that he would endeavour to procure the release of a certain French captain, now in Dartmouth prison, which Mr. Campbell is resolved on taking the necessary steps to obtain."—† * †.—[We shall be obliged to our correspondent, "† * †," to furnish us with any more anecdotes of the above kind that he may meet with in the course of his reading.—ED.]

DR. MILLER OF DONCASTER.

I was looking over some old files of Yorkshire papers lately, and my attention was arrested by one of the pieces in the "Poet's Corner," being entitled "The Queen of France's Lamentation before her Execution; written by Dr. Miller, Master of St. George's Lodge of Freemasons, Doncaster." I presume the lines to refer to the unfortunate Marie Antoinette, but who was Dr. Miller, the author?—No YORKSHIREMAN.—[Our correspondent is right as to his conjecture; and if he has the old series of the Freemasons' Magazine (vol. i., p. 433) of the year 1793, he will see the same production inserted there. It scarcely needed the happy signature our querist has adopted to convince the world that he is "No Yorkshireman," or else he would have known something of Dr. Miller; but as it is our duty to give as much information as possible, we will help him to a few particulars. Dr. Edward Miller was the son of a paviour of Norwich, and was apprenticed to his father, but his dislike of the occupation became so great that he absconded, and came to London, where he contrived to place himself under the celebrated Dr. Burney, the musical historian. He was elected organist of Doncaster parish church in 1756, and held that post for fifty-one years. In 1716, he took his degree of Mus. Doc. in the University of Cambridge, and ultimately died in the year 1807. His theoretical knowledge of music was very extensive, and he published many musical works, but his fame rests chiefly on a very valuable work, entitled The History and Antiquities of Doncaster and its Vicinity, which he published in 4to., in 1804. He also wrote a poem, entitled, The Tears of Yorkshire on the Death of the Most Noble the Marquis of Rockingham.]

MOPSES.

There is a French work, L'Ordre des Franc-Maçons trahi, et le secret des Mopses révélé, 12mo., Amsterdam, 1771. What, and who were the Mopses referred to in this work?—A LEVESQUE.—[When Clement the Twelfth had issued his papal bull, in 1738, condemning, forbidding, and excommunicating all the rites of Freemasonry, and calling upon all the Roman Catholic brethren to renounce their obligations, many Freemasons in the Romanist states of Germany, unwilling to leave the Order, and yet anxious to conform to ecclesiastical authority, formed, in the year 1740, what they called a new association, under the name of "Mopses," and this was put forward as more particularly devoted to the papacy, but, in fact, was nothing else but Freemasonry under a more mild name. It was very successful, and many of the princes of Germany were its Grand Masters. The society derived its title from the Teutonic Mops, a young mastiff, which was intended to be a symbol of the mutual fidelity and attachment of the brethren, in the same manner that these virtues are held to be characteristic of that faithful animal. This subject was lately referred to in an elaborate article in our last series on the continental rites, and on some pseudo Masonic orders].

MASONIC TOPOGRAPHICAL NOMENCLATURE.

Why are many books and letters of Masons in the last century dated from fictitious localities? I have seen two French works dated "Jerusalem"! and J. Cuistos appends to a letter his address, as "Valley of Jehosopha, year of the foundation of Temple of Solomon, M. MDCCCIII."!—G. A. PERRY.

BRO. ELISHA D. COOKE.

At p. 15, line 63, col. 1, of the Freemasons' Magazine are the following words, "and also the degree of Royal and Select Master." Is that part of pure and ancient Masonry? What degree is it? To what rite does it belong?—REX.

FREEMASONRY IN SMYRNA.

In our last number, page 70, we make Alexander Drummond say he "waltzed seven minuets during the course of the evening." Waltzing did not come into fashion for many years afterwards, and all who understand dancing know the term should be "walked a minuet." This was an error of the corrector of the press, and printers' readers should be men of common sense.

REVIEWS OF NEW BOOKS.

Idylls of the King. By ALFRED TENNYSON, D.C.L., Poet Laureate. 8vo. Moxon and Co. (260 pp.)

It has long been a matter of notoriety, in literary circles, that Mr. Tennyson had fixed on the legend of King Arthur as the subject for a long poem. With that view the laureate has visited numerous localities identified with the legendary history, has carefully gone over many ancient histories of the wizard Merlin, the King Arthur, and the Knights of the Round Table, and that portions of the poem had been placed in the printer's hands, proofs revised and corrected, many of which had been cancelled, and others entirely re-written, and that the work was ready for the press a year ago, but from some unaccountable cause held back. Rumour has, however, stepped in and supplied the reason, which is said to be, that when the author was about to print the book—or even after it had been sent to press—some friend to whom it was submitted expressed an opinion that the Idyll "Vivien" was unfit for publication. This view made the poet nervous and apprehensive, and so disgusted him that there was reason to suppose the work would never see the light. Time and reflection, together with the opinions of others who saw the objectionable portion in another light, at last prevailed, and Mr. Tennyson finally sent the book to press, and it has at last appeared with many beauties and some imperfections on its head.

The volume before us is divided into four poems, with a thread of connection between them; these poems bear the names of "Enid," "Vivien," "Elaine," and "Guinevre." In this arrangement it is obvious that the poet lacks the concentration and sustained power requisite for telling a long story, and it costs him a manifest effort to keep up the stately march requisite for the effect of an epic of a hundred lines. There is too a want of rugged grandeur in the verse when dealing with a subject as large and wonderful as Stonehenge; for our author revels most when an opportunity offers itself to run off into liquid warblings, such as the three love songs in the Idylls. The verse is excellent, and bears more of the stateliness and "retarding art," belonging to the highest walks of poesy, than any other production of Mr. Tennyson's muse; but there is a sweetness that closely verges on the cloying, and a want of strength which should have been displayed when dealing with the rude and massive stories of the Round Table.

In the poem entitled "Enid" we have the story of Geraint's courtship and his union with her, briefly told. In his fear that a taint may attach itself to the purity of her heart, from court scandals which are rife about Sir Lancelot and Queen Guinevre, she is removed to his country home, where they give themselves up to the happiness of wedded love. After a time his vassals and retainers murmur that the brave knight has tied up his valour in his wife's fair locks, and ask when he means to abandon his silken dalliance and lead them forth as of old? Enid hears this and grieves for her lord's name and fame; and, whilst he one day appears to be sleeping on his couch, she reproaches herself with keeping him from martial glory and knightly deeds, and he overhears her say—

"O me, I fear me I am no true wife," an ejaculation which he, of course, misconstrues. Thereupon he calls for his horse and arms, and in rough dudgeon sets out to seek adventure, with Enid equipped as his squire. He treats her coldly and unkindly, but she returns good for evil till an accident clears up his doubts of her love; he makes friends again, and they live and love peaceably to the end of their days. From this part of the poem we quote the song Geraint hears her singing when he falls in love with her:—

"ENID'S SONG."

"Turn fortune, turn thy wheel and lower the proud;
Turn thy wheel thro' sunshine, storm, and cloud;
Thy wheel and thee we neither love nor hate.

"Turn, fortune, turn thy wheel with smile or frown;
With that wild wheel we go not up nor down;
Our board is little, but our hearts are great.

"Smile, and we smile, the lords of many lands;
Frown and we smile, the lords of our own hands;
For man is man and master of his fate.

"Turn, turn thy wheel above the staring crowd;
Thy wheel and thou are shadows in the cloud;
Thy wheel and thee we neither love nor hate."

Our poet gives us an exquisite touch of nature—of that most mysterious kind of all—woman's nature, conveying a lesson to man, when dealing with a susceptibility that he cannot understand yet often acknowledges. When Geraint has been disabused from the inference he had drawn, and satisfied of the possession of the entire love of Enid, and when only an assurance from her is needed, to set his mind at rest:—

"And Enid could not say one tender word
She felt so blunt and stupid at the heart."

The question will naturally arise, which of us have not, at times, misunderstood the silence of our dearest friend, who was merely "blunt and stupid at the heart," from excess of emotion?

In some of Mr. Tennyson's imagery there are yet far-fetched allusions, take, for instance:—

"Arms on which the standing muscle sloped,
As slopes a wild brook o'er a little stone,
Running too vehemently to break upon it."

In this, the contour of a muscle, which is stretched across a bone, is not, to the eye, so obviously like the curve of a rippling brook. In another instance we can detect the figure of Geraint riding into the court-yard of the castle, where—

"His charger trampling many a prickly star
Of sprouted thistle on the broken stones."

And it is also very appropriately said of a woman's dress:—

"How fresh the colours look,
How fast they hold, like colours of a shell
That keeps the wear and polish of the wave."

In another place we are told how a lover meets the lady of his love:—

"And glancing all at once as keenly at her,
As careful robins eye the delver's toil,
Made her cheek burn and either eyelid fall,
But rested with her sweet face satisfied."

The second poem, entitled "Vivien," which is by far the shortest, is the story of the false and heartless damsel who makes love to the old sage Merlin, in the "wild woods of Broceliande," and extracts from him the knowledge of a charm "of woven paces and of waving hands," which she henceforth puts in force against her teacher, and binds him in a hollow oak, "as dead, and lost to life, and use, and name, and fame, for ever," and then sends him to sleep with it, crying, "I have made his glory mine." It is to this part of the book, and the two following poems, that objection have been taken, these three treating more or less of an impure attachment; and it was to have been wished that Mr. Tennyson had chosen some purer theme where lords and ladies, knights and squires, could have moved without a back ground of vice. But the subject once chosen, there is no room for finding fault with the Poet Laureate's treatment of it. He does not linger in the unwholesome air, or dwell unnecessarily on the evil which his story presupposes. Dismissing this, the only fault of magnitude, we quote:—

"VIVIEN'S SONG."

"In love, if love be love, if love be ours,
Faith and unfaith can ne'er be equal powers:
Unfaith in aught is want of faith in all.

"It is the little rift within the lute,
That by and by will make the music mute,
And ever widening slowly silence all.

"The little rift within the lover's lute,
Or little pitted speck in garner'd fruit,
That rotting inward slowly moulders all.

"It is not worth the keeping; let it go;
But shall it? Answer, darling, answer no.
And trust me not at all, or all in all."

In the same poem, when Vivien teases the grey enchanter for a sight of the book containing the potent charm she is desirous of possessing, there occurs the following simile:—

"Smiling as a master smiles on one
That is not of his school, nor any school
But that where blind and naked Ignorance
Delivers brawling judgments, unashamed,
On all things all day long, he answered her."

"Elaine" loves Sir Lancelot, who goes to king Arthur's diamond tourney in disguise; and when he has gone she dies of a broken heart, and floats dead down the stream to the palace of the queen, in time to clear up a jealous quarrel between the latter and Sir Lancelot.

"Guinevre" is simply the story of the discovery of the love between the queen and Sir Lancelot, the queen's flight to Almesbury, the king's reproof and forgiveness, and her departure

"To where, beyond these vices, there is peace."

A sad picture is drawn of Queen Guinevre in her retreat, when she "had fled the court, and sat

There in the holy house at Almesbury
Weeping, none with her save a little maid,
A novice; one low light betwixt them burned,
Blurred by the creeping mist, for all abroad,
Beneath a moon unseen, albeit at full,
The white mist, like a face cloth to the face,
Clung to the dead earth, and the land was still."

Guinevre also has some very fine reflections on her life and duty, which she thus sums up:—

"Ah, great and gentle lord!
Who warrs, as is the conscience of a saint
Among his warring senses, to thy knights—
To whom my false voluptuous pride, that took Full easily all impressions from below,
Would not look up, or half despised the height
To which I would not or I could not climb.
I thought I could not breathe in that fine air
That pure severity of perfect light—
I wanted warmth and colour, which I found
In Lancelot—now I see thee what thou art,
Thou art the highest and most human too,
Not Lancelot, nor another. Is there none
Will tell the King I love him, though so late?
Now—ere he goes to the great battle? none:
Myself must tell him in that purer life,
But now it were too daring. Ah, my God!
What might I not have made of thy fair world,
Had I but loved thy highest creature here?
It was my duty to have loved the highest:
It surely was my profit had I known:
It would have been my pleasure had I seen.
We needs must love the highest when we see it,
Not Lancelot, nor another."

There are, as in the foregoing extract, many passages which show the poet sympathises with the painter's sister art. One will suffice:—

"And all night long his face before her lived,
As when a painter, poring on a face,
Divinely through all hindrance finds the man
Behind it, and so paints him that his face,
The shape and colour of a mind and life,
Lives for his children, ever at its best
And fullest: so the face before her lived,
Dark—splendid—speaking in the silence, full
Of noble things, and held her from her sleep."

Among the more forcibly depicted, and concisely given descriptions, the following character of an old and fallen earl, by himself, is one of foremost beauty; he says:—

"I myself sometimes despise myself;
For I have let men be and have their way;
Am much too gentle—have not used my power:
Nor know I whether I be very base
Or very manful, whether very wise
Or very foolish; only this I know,
That whatsoever evil happen to me,
I seem to suffer nothing heart or limb,
But can endure it all most patiently."

Mr. Tennyson appears to be an admirer of Wordsworth, and he applies to the "bird of eve," Wordsworth's favourite idea of the cuckoo, as a "wandering voice":—

"The sweet voice of Enid moved Geraint,
And made him like a man abroad at morn,
When first the liquid note beloved of men
Comes flying over many a windy wave
To Britain, and in April suddenly
Breaks from a coppice gemmed with green and red,
And he suspends his converse with a friend,
Or it may be the labour of his hands,
To think or say, 'There is the nightingale.'"

So also, another Wordsworthian idea is preserved, only in a more rich and glowing form:—

"Friend to me,
He is all fault who hath no fault at all,
For who loves me must have some touch of earth;
The low sun makes the colour."

In the closing poem which depicts Arthur, in the tender yet severe majesty of his Christian and kingly forgiveness, and Guinevre, in her touching humility of repentance, Mr. Tennyson rises considerably and continually to the elevated dignity of the te d'Arthur; but as we have been lavish with quotations, we gladly refer the reader to the poet's pages, assuring him that the scene there drawn is one of pure and holy grandeur.

The style throughout the Idylls of the King is more allied to Mr. Tennyson's Princess than any other of his works. But, if we look on this production as a whole, the Idylls of the King constitutes no new phase of the poet's mind. It will open no new questions, and will make few, if any converts. Mr. Tennyson's former admirers will admire him still, and those who have declared their dislike, or indifference, will remain unshaken in their opinion. The Idylls of the King cannot be ranked as the Poet Laureate's greatest work, but they are not unworthy of him.

The Universal Decorator. Edited by J. W. Ross. Parts I. and II. (New Series). London: Houlston and Wright, 65, Paternoster-row.

The growing taste for art, which has been developed in so surprising a manner in the lower and middle classes of English society during late years, is one of the most striking characteristics of our age. Thanks to the judicious efforts which have been made by earnest and able teachers and patrons, a sound taste has become so extended, that just criticism in matters of virtue and decorative appliances is not confined, as formerly, to the upper and wealthy classes, but has numerous representatives in those classes whose means are limited, and whose social rank is humble. One natural result of this new teaching has been an appreciation of elegance of design and colour in the common utensils of daily household use and in the domestic furniture of our dwellings; and while utility is still the paramount requisite, an agreeable form or tint is considered by no means a trifling consideration. Manufacturers have been obliged to march with the age, and to consider the altered habits of their consumers; and thus in almost every object in common use we find traces of the growing necessity for the cultivation of art among workmen and their employers.

That this is a highly gratifying state of things cannot be doubted; for it is certain that the appreciation of beauty in nature or in art, is a sure sign of an elevated and refined intellect. Among the journals which have taken an active and successful part in this great movement, the publication before us is particularly deserving of notice; and is, we are happy to say, appreciated by the public, having now entered upon a new series, which has been enlarged and improved from the old one. We regret that our space does not permit us to particularize its merits; suffice it to say that we can safely recommend it as a safe guide to the artist or the workmen, when their own ideas fail or require refreshing. Here we find excellent essays upon the importance of the study of design; upon the mutual interests of artists and manufacturers; with biographical and architectural articles. Technical information is given of a valuable nature, with regard to the peculiar requirements and various trades; and to make it a perfect exponent of the views for which it was established, the work gives us, each month, a series of very beautiful and highly finished designs (some of them most pleasingly coloured) for carvings, sculpture, stained glass, jewellery, furniture, vases, panels, and many other purposes.

First Steps in Photography. By GILBERT FLEMING. London: G. Fleming, 498, New Oxford Street.

This is certainly what it professes to be, a concise and practical treatise on the collodion process, which will prove most useful to the beginner in producing positive and negative views, or portraits, &c. The cleaning the plate, cooling the plate, rendering the plate sensitive, exposure in the camera, developing the picture, the fixing process, printing from the glass negative, are all familiarly explained, so as to be easily understood by the merest tyro in the art; whilst the chapter "On some of the Principal Causes of Failure in Photography" will prove of great value in enabling the amateur to avoid them.

LONDON IMPROVEMENTS.—The oldest auction rooms in London, those under the Piazza, Covent Garden, occupied alone by the Messrs. Robins for upwards of half a century, will before long hold a place only in the records of the past; the "hammer" has fallen upon the last "lot" in these ancient rooms, and another and a spacious hotel, is to be erected in their place. Those of our readers who are so minded, will find some curious memoranda regarding these old auction rooms in our friend "John Green's" reminiscences of Covent Garden and its neighbourhood, where, in the days of yore, all the wits, fashionables, and celebrities, used to congregate. In consequence of this sweeping change, our brother, James Robins (one of the successors of the celebrated George Robins) has been "induced to go to the East," and has established himself in offices at No. 43, Moorgate-street, Bank.

THE MASONIC MIRROR.

MASONIC MEM.

BRO. JOSEPH GUNDRY, of Bridport, having been appointed by the M.W. Grand Master the Earl of Zetland, Provincial Grand Master for Dorsetshire, in the room of Bro. Willett, deceased, has determined to hold his first Provincial Grand Lodge in the Town Hall at Bridport, on Thursday, the 11th inst. There will be a procession to church, and after the duties of the Grand Lodge are gone through, the brethren will dine together at the Bull Hotel. As no Prov. Grand Lodge has been held in this Province during the last two years, a strong muster of the brethren is expected.

ROYAL FREEMASONS' SCHOOL FOR FEMALE CHILDREN.

A quarterly general Court of this institution was held on Thursday, the 14th July, at the office, 16A, Great Queen street, the W. Bro. J. Udall, P.G.D., V.P., in the chair. Present: Bros. Barnes, V.P.; Braithwaite, V.P., G. Barrett, Du Pré, Hewlett, Hopwood, P.G.D., Levinson, Patten, P.G.S.B., Sheen, Singer, Symonds, Roberts, Taylor, &c., &c.

The minutes of the last quarterly court and the several meetings of the General Committee held since, were read and confirmed, and the minutes of the several meetings of the House Committee for the said period, were read for information. The minutes of the Audit Committee held on the 5th July were read and confirmed; the quarterly accounts of the general expenditure of the institution, including salaries, wages, &c., up to Midsummer last, amounting to £549 1s. 5d., and also an account for erecting a garden wall, were directed to be paid.

The Treasurer was instructed to purchase £500 stock in the Three per cent. Reduced Annuities, and to add the same to the funds belonging to the institution.

On the motion of Bro. Symonds, and seconded by Bro. Hopwood, it was resolved that the following alterations be made in the by-laws:—

Rule 10—After the words, "the Chair is taken," and before the words, "at twelve o'clock," insert, "at four o'clock precisely, excepting when there is an election by ballot for the admission of children, when the chair shall be taken as heretofore at twelve o'clock."

Rule 23—Omit "twelve," and substitute "four o'clock."

Rule 12—Omit "one," and substitute "after the business of the General Committee is closed."

The effect of these alterations will be that the chair will be taken at four o'clock instead of twelve at future quarterly general Courts, excepting when children are to be elected by ballot; that the General Committee will meet at four o'clock instead of twelve on the last Thursday of every month; and that adjourned quarterly Courts will meet after the business of the General Committee is closed.

The Court declared six vacancies, to be filled up by election in October, occasioned by the following children leaving the Institution at the expiration of their terms:—

Fanny Freeman Smith ... Father's Lodge, No. 357,	Taunton.
Emma Charlotte Hurrell " " No. 264,	London.
Julia Read " " No. 168,	London.
Sophia Reinhardt France " " No. 727,	Wakefield.
Mary Ann Brewster " " No. 109 and 49,	London.
Emma Cox " " No. 425,	Oxford.

The following candidates, whose petitions had been examined by the General Committee, were recommended to the Court to be placed on the list of candidates for election in October, and were so placed accordingly.

Emily Jane Nixon, daughter of the late Bro. John Nixon, surgeon, of the St. John's Lodge, No. 409, Wigton, Cumberland.

Mary Ann Campbell, daughter of the late Bro. Stephen Campbell, of the Silurian Lodge, No. 693, Usk, Monmouthshire.

Mary Ann Emma Williams, daughter of Bro. Wm. Williams, hatter, of the Angel Lodge, No. 59, Colchester.

Emily Ann Morris, daughter of the late Bro. George Morris, licensed victualler, of the Enoch Lodge, No. 11, London.

Alice Freeman, daughter of the late Bro. David Freeman, post master and tax collector, of the East Surrey Lodge of Concord, No. 680, Croydon.

Jemima Thomasin Laws, daughter of Bro. Geo. Laws, late licensed victualler and barge master, of the Lodge of Sincerity, No. 203, London.

Lavinia Watts, daughter of the late Bro. James Watts, stationer and printer, of the Amphibious Lodge, No. 322, Heckmondwick, Yorkshire.

Adela Annette Gray, daughter of the late Bro. Charles Henry Gray, formerly a merchant in Liverpool, London, the East Indies, and China, of the St. George, No. 6, Corner Stone, No. 5, London.

Ann Kilpin, daughter of the late Bro. John Palmer Kilpin, tailor, of the Pomfret Lodge, No. 463, Northampton.

Bro. J. Udall gave notice of the following motion,—“That the number of children to be admitted to the school be increased from the present number, viz., 70 to 80.”

The proceedings were brought to a close by a vote of thanks to Bro. Udall for his conduct in the chair.

METROPOLITAN.

JORDAN LODGE (No. 237).—On Wednesday, the 20th ult., a Lodge of Emergency was held for the initiation of Mr. W. G. Martin, the eminent musician, Mr. H. C. Stroud, of the Quartett Glee Union, and Messrs. Wynyard and Finglass. The ceremony was ably performed by the W.M., Bro. J. Robinson, assisted by the officers, Bros. Laughton, S.W.; Goldsbro, J.W.; Dyer, S.D.; Swan, J.D., and Farnham, I.G. Neither the heat of the weather, nor the attractions of the country, prevented a full attendance of the brethren, some of whom had travelled a considerable distance in order to be present. The well known and universally respected father of the Lodge, Bro. Patten, P.G.S.B., was as usual at his post among the Past Masters, of whom were also present Bros. Watts, Arliss, and Spooner. There was a good muster of visitors, including two American brethren, who expressed themselves highly gratified with the working, and with their truly Masonic reception. The business being ended, the evening was passed in that love and harmony so characteristic of the Craft, and so fully appreciated and practised by the brethren of the Jordan Lodge.

PRINCE FREDERICK WILLIAM LODGE (No. 1,055).—A meeting of this Lodge was holden at the Knights of St. John's Tavern, St. John's Wood, on Wednesday, the 27th ult. The Lodge only obtained its warrant eleven months ago, since which period twenty-three candidates have been initiated, so that it can number, within the first year of its existence, including the founders and joining members, nearly fifty subscribers to its funds. It has paid upwards of £100 for furniture and other contingent expenses, still leaving a goodly balance in the Treasurer's hands. The Lodge was opened precisely at two o'clock, by the W.M., Bro. T. D. Caulcher, all his officers being in their respective places. The minutes of the last Lodge were read and confirmed, and the audit committee presented their report, which was unanimously adopted. After some other routine business, the retiring W.M. (Bro. T. D. Caulcher) installed his successor (Bro. Hardy) into the chair, in a very impressive manner. The Worshipful Master then invested the officers, accompanying each investiture with a suitable address, and particularly complimented the Secretary, Bro. H. A. Stacey, for the way in which he had performed the duties of that office during the last twelve months, and sincerely congratulated him on his re-appointment. In the course of the evening, Bro. W. Watson, P.M., in addressing Bro. Caulcher, the immediate P.M., assured him how much satisfaction it gave him to present, in the name of the Lodge, a P.M.'s jewel, as a token of regard and esteem, which he had fairly earned by the admirable manner in which during his year of office he had carried out the important duties of the chair, and presided at the banquets. Bro. Caulcher, in reply, returned his sincere thanks to the brethren for the handsome embodiment of their good wishes towards him, which he should ever continue to prize and value. The brethren afterwards dined together. “The Queen and the Craft,” “The M.W. Grand Master,” “The Deputy Grand Master,” and the other usual toasts having been drunk, Bro. Caulcher, P.M., proposed “The newly installed W.M.,” and in doing so, said that the earnest he had already shown, by his zeal on behalf of Masonry, was a guarantee that the Lodge under his guidance would flourish and prosper. The Worshipful Master briefly returned thanks, and said it was with no small feeling of pride he occupied his present position for the first time. He would not promise too much, he would only say that he would endeavour to carry out the principles and tenets, not only in strict accordance with the laws of Freemasonry, but, if possible, so as to please everybody. Other toasts were given and responded to, and a most delightful evening was brought to a happy close at eleven o'clock.

MERCHANT NAVY LODGE (No. 1083).—This Lodge held an emergency meeting at the Jamaica Tavern, West India Dock Road, on Thursday, the 28th July. The Lodge having been opened in due form, Captain Johan August Hjorth, of the Swedish Merchant Navy was, on a ballot, duly accepted, and being in attendance, was introduced and initiated into the first degree in solemn and antient form. The Lodge was then closed in harmony.

INSTRUCTION.

MERCHANT NAVY LODGE (No. 1083).—This Lodge of Instruction was holden on Thursday, the 28th ult., at the Jamaica Tavern, after the closing of the parent Lodge, which was previously holden at the same place. Bro. Fairbairns officiated as W.M., Bro. F. Johnson, as S.W., Bro. Moss, as J.W. The first, second, and third sections of the first lecture were then very ably worked by Bros. Potts and Moss.

PROVINCIAL.

DEVONSHIRE.

PLYMOUTH.—Lodge of St. John (No. 83).—This Lodge, at its regular meeting at the Masonic Hall, on Tuesday, 5th July, very forcibly illustrated the advantages to be derived from meeting in private rooms, by confirming a vote of ten guineas to be divided amongst the four London Masonic institutions, and the South Devon hospital at Plymouth. At a Lodge of emergency, on Tuesday, 12th July, a gentleman previously balloted for, was initiated in a manner highly creditable to the officers generally. Where all did their duty well, it seems almost invidious to particularize, but honourable mention should be made of Bro. Harfoot, S.D., who delivered a lecture on the first tracing board so admirably as to command the thanks of those present, for the high intellectual treat he had afforded. The Lodge may well be proud of the talents of its Senior Deacon.

HAMPSHIRE.

WINCHESTER.—Lodge of Economy (No. 90).—The general monthly assembly of this Lodge was held at the Masonic Hall, adjoining the Black Swan Hotel, on Wednesday evening. Bro. Durant, P.M., presided on the occasion, assisted by Bros. La Croix, S.W.; Larkin, J.W.; and among the P.M.s were Bros. Everett, Sherry, Oakshott, and Cowen. After the Lodge had been duly opened, and the minutes of the last meeting confirmed, the W.M. pro tem. requested the Secretary to read some business communications to the Lodge. The first of these was from the Grand Secretary, the V.W. Bro. W. Gray Clarke, in reference to the fact that some spurious Lodges had been formed at Smyrna, which had assumed the unauthorized title of "The Grand Lodge of Turkey," and cautioning all regular Lodges against acknowledging or admitting any parties claiming admission on the ground of having been initiated in such irregular Lodges. The communication having been formally read, a minute of the same was ordered to be entered on the books of the Lodge. The second communication consisted of a letter addressed to the W.M., officers and brethren, from the Lodge "La Césaire," No. 860, Jersey, soliciting subscriptions towards a fund about to be raised for the purpose of erecting a Masonic temple in the island. The consideration of the application was deferred to a future meeting. Bro. C. Sherry, P.M., then gave notice of a motion for discussion at the next monthly meeting, to the effect, that he would bring forward for adoption a form of memorial to be presented to the Board of General Purposes, asking them to take into their consideration the present representation of provincial Masons in the Grand Lodge of England, with a view of affording them a fair share in the election of all boards connected with the Order; and requesting the board to bring the question before the Grand Lodge. A discussion followed, relative to the revision of the by-laws of the Lodge; some additions were proposed and approved, subject to the confirmation of the next meeting. This being the whole of the business of the evening, the Lodge was closed with the usual formalities.

NORTHAMPTONSHIRE AND HUNTINGDONSHIRE.

PROVINCIAL GRAND LODGE.

The annual meeting of the Provincial Grand Lodge was held at Oundle, on the 20th July. The Board of Management of the Provincial Benevolent Fund assembled at twelve, and examined and audited the accounts of the previous year.

The Provincial Grand Lodge was held at the Town Hall, and opened at one o'clock, in accordance with summons, under the presidency of the D. Prov. Grand Master, Bro. Thos. Ewart, who ably sustained the duties of the chair in the unavoidable absence, through illness, of the Right Wor. hishop Prov. Grand Master, the Marquis of Huntley. The Lodge having been opened in due form, the minutes of the preceding Grand Lodge were read and duly confirmed.

Bro. G. M. Fox read a statement of the present condition and progress of the Provincial Benevolent Fund, which elicited the warmest approbation. The motion that the accounts be passed was carried unanimously.

The offices of Secretaries to the Benevolent Fund having become vacant, Bros. G. M. Fox and J. Marshall were unanimously re-elected joint Secretaries for another five years.

The office of Prov. Grand Treasurer having also become vacant by the lamented death of our respected Bro. Christopher Markham, it was proposed by Bro. Higgins, and seconded by Bro. the Rev. G. Robbins, that Bro. Henry Markham, assisted by Bro. Boeme, be appointed Prov. Grand Treasurer, and also Treasurer of the Benevolent Fund; which motion was carried unanimously.

The sum of ten guineas was voted to the Masonic Girls School, to constitute the D. Prov. Grand Master a governor of that institution for fifteen years.

The sum of ten guineas was also voted to the Masonic Boys School, to constitute the Prov. Senior Grand Warden a life governor to that institution.

The sum of ten pounds was voted to the widow of our late Bro. Beresford, of the Socrates Lodge, Huntingdon, she having been left in a very distressed condition.

A donation of ten pounds was given to Bro. James Marshall, an old and worthy member of the Pomfret Lodge, Northampton, who had fallen into poor circumstances.

The sum of five pounds was also given to the widow of the late Bro. Hapler, of the St. Peter's Lodge, Peterboro'.

Bro. G. M. Fox gave notice that he should, at the next provincial meeting, propose for consideration the propriety of altering the present mode of subscriptions to the Prov. Grand Lodge, substituting a certain sum per head for each member of a Lodge, in lieu of the present system of each Lodge paying two pounds.

The Grand Lodge was closed in antient and solemn form, and the brethren, being placed in order by Bro. Innes, Director of Ceremonies, walked in procession to the Talbot Hotel, where an excellent dinner was served by Bro. Wright, and the remainder of the day was spent in a very agreeable manner.

SOMERSETSHIRE.

PROVINCIAL GRAND LODGE.

The annual meeting was held at Glastonbury, on Tuesday, July 26th, that day being also appointed for the consecration of a new Lodge, "The Pilgrim," No. 1074, the warrant for which had been granted some months since by the M.W. Grand Master. A neatly fitted up Lodge room was prepared at the Pilgrim and George Hotel, which presented a striking and beautiful appearance, being adorned with the banners of the various Lodges in the province in exceedingly good taste by Bro. Platt, of Beaufort Buildings, London, to whom the general arrangement of furnishing the Lodge was confided. The splendid banner bearing the device of the "Pilgrim," manufactured by that brother, under the immediate direction of Bro. Dr. Pope, elicited the approbation of all present. An event in itself so interesting to the fraternity, but especially important to the locality, could not fail to attract a very large gathering of the brethren of this and surrounding provinces—but the interest was not confined to the Masonic circle alone. The Bristol and Exeter Railway officials having put on excursion trains at very low fares from both ends of their line and also the various branches, many hundreds availed themselves of the opportunity of visiting the once magnificent abbey of Glastonbury, which covered forty acres of ground. It was founded in 605; the greater part, however, is so modern as the twelfth and fourteenth centuries—the ruins consist of some fragments of the church, a Norman chapel, built in 1190, and the abbot's octagonal kitchen, a most hospitable structure in design and extent. The abbot lived in almost regal state, and sat among the barons in Parliament. All this greatness was brought to a close at the dissolution of the monasteries in 1539, when the last abbot, Richard Whiting, was hanged in his robes, with two of his monks, by order of Henry VIII., for refusing to surrender the abbey to the royal power. The Pilgrim and St. George's Inn was formerly the Abbey hospitium, and it was here the newly constituted Lodge met to receive the Prov. Grand Lodge, which was opened by Bro. J. W. Randolph, D. Prov. G.M., who was supported by the following brethren:—H. C. Vernon, Prov. G.M., Worcester; H. Shute, Prov. G.M., Bristol; C. J. Vigne, P. Prov. S.G.W., Somersetshire; R. E. Peach, P. Prov. S.G.W.; White, P. Prov. S.G.W.; Welsh, P. Prov. J.G.W.; Ashley, Prov. J.G.W.; Oakley, P. Prov. J.G.W.; Oliver, P. Prov. S.G.D.; W. Robinson, P. Prov. S.G.W.; T. Cave, P. Prov. J.G.W.; R. W. Falconer, Prov. G. Treas.; Rev. R. Thomas, Prov. G. Chaplain; Bluet, Prov. G. Org.; H. W. Levett, P. Prov. G. Supt. of Works; W. A. F. Powell, D. Prov. G.M., Bristol; Harris, Prov. G.S.W., Bristol; G. Chick, P. Prov. S.W., Bristol; J. A. Page, Prov. G.J.W., Bristol; J.A. Clark, Prov. G. Reg., Bristol; W. Heal, Prov. G.S.B., Bristol; Henry Bridges, P. Prov. S.G.D.; C. Halliday, P.M., No. 367; W. Walkley, P.M., No. 367; J. K. Gundry, P.M., St. Augustine Lodge, No. 885, New Zealand; C. Milsom, W.M., No. 61; E. Horwood, W.M., No. 221; W. Salvan, W.M., No. 357; Clapcott, S.W., No. 412; Platt, J.W., No. 168; A. Walkley, J.D., No. 367; J. B. Invertee, J.W., No. 48; J. J. Claperton, S.W., No. 412; C. George, I.G., No. 48, &c., &c.

Assisted by his officers and the brethren present, Bro. Randolph proceeded to consecrate the Pilgrim Lodge, No. 1074, and invest the officers named in the warrant and others as follows:—Bros. Dr. Pope, P.M., No. 367, W.M.; T. S. Howe, S.W.; Capt. H. P. Crampton, J.W.; T. H. Roach, S.D.; J. Cornwall, J.D.; T. Robinson, I.G.

The ceremony of consecration by the D. Prov. G.M. who officiated in the regretted absence of the venerable Prov. G.M., Colonel C. Kemey-Kemey Tynte, was very impressively performed according to antient custom, the Prov. G. Chaplain reciting the several prayers during the ceremony.

This installation of the first W.M., Bro. Dr. Pope, succeeded the consecration, but was much curtailed in consequence of his having already passed the chair of No. 367; and in investing him with the W.M.'s collar, the D. Prov. G.M. said, that he had it on good authority, on which he could rely, that he (Dr. Pope) was an excellent working Mason, and that no brother performed the ceremonies of the Craft more skillfully.

These ceremonies ended, the visitors and brethren, not being members of the Prov. Grand Lodge, retired, and the business of the province was proceeded with, viz., the reading and confirmation of the minutes of the previous Prov. G. and Lodge and the presenting the report of the Prov. Grand Treasurer.

A grant of £20 was voted to the widow of a brother of No. 327, and the following brethren were appointed and invested Prov. Grand officers by the D. Prov. G.M.:—Bros. P. H. Crampton, No. 1074, Prov. S.G.W.; Charles Melsom, No. 91, Prov. J.G.W.; Rev. R. J. F. Thomas, No. 412, Prov. G. Chaplain; R. W. Falconer, No. 528, Prov. G. Treas.; C. Babbage.

No. 157, Prov. G. Sec.; J. G. L. Bullerd, No. 1074, Prov. G. Reg.; T. H. Roach, No. 1074, Prov. S.G.D.; J. J. Clapcott, No. 412, Prov. J.G.D.; J. Lovibond, No. 157, Prov. G. Supt. of Works; W. Smith, No. 61, Prov. G. Dir. of Cers.; F. C. George, No. 48, Prov. G. Asst. Dir. of Cers.; T. Meyler, No. 327, Prov. G.S.B.; R. Mitchell, No. 327, Prov. G. Pura.

Bro. Peach wished to bring forward a resolution condemnatory of the proposed alterations in the property of the Craft in Great Queen-street, so as to give greater accommodation for the transaction of Masonic business, on the ground that it would be a misappropriation of the funds of the institution, but the R.W.D. Prov. Grand Master refused to allow it to be put, on the ground that the Prov. Grand Lodge was not asked to give an opinion on the matter, the circular of the Board of General Purposes having been sent to each private Lodge, where the members had had an opportunity of expressing their opinions.

After some further business was transacted, the Prov. Grand Lodge was closed in ample form. At four o'clock the brethren re-assembled at a banquet, distinguished alike for its elegance and abundance, and the kind attention given by Bro. Poachey to the assembled guests.

The usual Masonic toasts were given and drunk with enthusiasm. Among them was that of Bro. Dr. Pope, the W.M., and founder of the Pilgrim's Lodge, which was received with rapturous applause, and drunk with Masonic honours.

Bro. Pope having thanked the brethren for the high eulogium they had paid him that day, and for their kindness in drinking his health, said he had long been warmed with a desire to see a Masonic Lodge established in the ancient Isle of Avalon; for when he considered the antiquity of the place, and the high historic associations connected with it—celebrated as the cradle of Christianity, and the world-renowned monastery that flourished here for centuries, inasmuch as it is recorded in history that the first Christian church in Great Britain was here built—he naturally concluded that such a spot was most suitable for a Masonic Lodge, that those who were in a state of darkness might behold the light, and enjoy the blessings of brotherly love. The popular world, who were ignorant of its advantages, and could not participate in its blessings, must ever remain strangers to those inestimable secrets which were the peculiar and characteristic glory of the Craft. For as the renowned Benjamin Franklin said: "Freemasonry, I admit, has its secrets; it has secrets peculiar to itself. These are of no small value; they speak a universal language, and act as a passport to the attention and support of the initiated in all parts of the world. They cannot be lost so long as memory retains its power. Let the possessor of them be expatriated, shipwrecked, or imprisoned; let him be stripped of everything he has got in the world, still those credentials remain, and are available for use as circumstances require. The good effects which they have produced are established by the most incontestable facts of history. They have stayed the uplifted hand of the destroyer; they have softened the asperities of the tyrant, they have mitigated the horrors of captivity; they have subdued the rancour of malevolence, and broken down the barrier of political animosity and sectarian alienation. On the field of battle, in the solitudes of the uncultivated forest, or in the busy haunts of the crowded city, they have made men of the most hostile feelings, the most distant region, and the most diversified conditions, rush to the aid of each other, and feel special joy and satisfaction that they have been able to afford relief to a brother Mason." He then concluded his speech by expressing a hope that when future generations had passed away, the Pilgrim's Lodge, Glastonbury, would be found in the ascendant and that its festivals would be honoured by the presence of as numerous and distinguished an assemblage as was then met to celebrate its natal day.

All the furniture is in thorough keeping with the name of the Lodge, with the monastic architecture of the town, and the antiquity of the "Pilgrim's Inn," in which the Lodge is held. The chairs of the W. Master, the Wardens and Deacons, are copies of the celebrated Glastonbury monks' chair, elaborately carved in oak, and enriched with shields bearing gilt emblems and devices of the intended occupants. The canopy and drapery of the room are blue and gold, the curtains of finest velvet and bullion fringe. Near the entrance to the room are two massive Corinthian columns, imitating white veined marble, with elaborately carved and gilded capitals, surmounted by terrestrial and celestial globes. The Bible used in the Lodge room is one of the old "Breeches" Bibles, curiously bound with heavy brass clasps, and kindly presented by Br. John Cornwall, of Ashcott. The working implements are partly made from the root of the Glastonbury Holy Thorn, partly of rich black bog oak, imbedded for countless centuries beneath the site of the present town of Taunton. Evidently the furnishing of the Lodge has been a labour of love, as unquestionably it is a work of taste and beauty.

STAFFORDSHIRE.

WOLVERHAMPTON.—Lodge of St. Peter (No. 607).—The monthly meeting of this Lodge was held on Thursday, the 7th of July, Bro. Chas. King, P.M., in the chair. There was a good attendance of brethren, who wore crapes on their badges, jewels, &c., for the late W.M., and the Lodge room was also in mourning. After the Lodge was opened by the W.M. presiding, a ballot was taken for Mr. Harrison Fendelow, who having been unanimously elected, the ceremony of initiation was performed by the W.M., Bro. King, who also gave the charge to the candidate in an impressive manner. A circular from the Prov. Grand Secretary was then read, summoning the members and inviting the brethren to attend the next Prov. Grand Lodge, at the Shire Hall, Stafford, on the 2nd of August. Bro. Henry Gibbons, late of No. 606, Menturia Lodge, Hanley, was admitted a joining member. An address, couched in feeling and appropriate terms, on the death of the late W.M. of the Lodge, Bro. T. Stanway, was read by Bro. King, P.M., which was listened to with deep attention by the brethren, and created an impression which will be long ere it be effaced from their recollections. In January last, this young and promising brother was installed W.M., but was compelled at an early hour to leave the Lodge, from illness, which was protracted until June, when he sank under it. His zeal for the Craft, and the deep and earnest interest he always evinced for Masonry, even in his hours of illness, added to his kind and genuine good disposition, much endeared him to his brethren. It was proposed by Bro. King, seconded by Bro. Betts, and passed unanimously, "That a letter of condolence be sent by the Lodge to the widow of the lamented brother." The concluding business of the Lodge consisted in a proposition by Bro. T. W. Cooper, seconded by Bro. Betts, and confirmed, that a Lodge of Instruction be held under the auspices of St. Peter's. This has been since commenced, and promises to be a great and useful auxiliary to St. Peter's Lodge. The meetings of the Lodge of Instruction are held every third Friday evening.

ROYAL ARCH.

SUPREME GRAND CHAPTER.

THE quarterly convocation of the Supreme Grand Chapter was held in the Temple, on Wednesday evening, there being present Comps. J. Ll. Evans as M.E.G.Z.; H. L. Crohn as H.; W. P. Scott as J.; W. G. Clarke, E.; Jos. Smith as N.; N. Bradford as P. Soj.; J. Udall and Gole as Asst. Sojs.; Comps. Havers, Roxburgh, Pocock, Pattison, and about a dozen other Companions.

Grand Chapter having been opened in due form, the report of the Committee of General Purposes was read. It stated that a petition had been received, praying for a charter for a new Chapter, to be called the Northumberland Chapter, to be attached to the Maitland Lodge of Unity, No. 804, held at Maitland, New South Wales, with Comp. J. Garrick as First Principal; Wm. Briggs, Second Principal; and James Ephraim Wolf, Third Principal. The petition was in every way regular, with the exception that some of the Companions signing it were not registered in the books of the Supreme Grand Chapter. The accounts showed that since the last Grand Chapter there had been received £152 2s., making, with the balance then in hand, £559 16s. 6d.; and expended, £295 12s. 2d., including the purchase of £200 three per cent. consols. There were now in the Grand Treasurer's hands £264 4s. 4d., and the amount of stock standing to the credit of the Grand Chapter was £2,400.

The report was received and adopted, after which, the charter prayed for was granted, subject to the registration of the Companions not already registered. Comp. Smith then rose to propose that the sum of £300 consols be transferred from the account of the Grand Chapter to that of the Girls School; £300 to the Boys School; £300 to the Aged Masons' Fund, and £300 to the Widows' Annuity Fund, making £1,200 consols to be so transferred. Comp. Smith supported his motion by showing that the Grand Chapter had £2,400 in consols, without any claims upon it, and that the amount was annually increasing; and he thought that there could be no better application of their surplus funds than the support of their Masonic charities.

Comp. Carpenter, of No. 206, seconded the resolution.

Comp. Crohn opposed the resolution on the ground that they ought not to vote away so large a sum in a Chapter at which so few of the Companions were present; and, therefore, moved as an amendment that the sum of £100 be granted to each of the charities.

Comp. Nicholas Bradford seconded the amendment.

On the motion and amendment being put,

Comp. Roxburgh stated that he could neither agree with the original motion or the amendment. He thought that they should not go to the extent proposed by Comp. Smith, as they might require some portion of their funds for contemplated alterations in the property, when the Grand Chapter might perhaps be asked for their assistance in carrying them out; neither did he see any ground for voting so small a sum as that proposed by Comp. Crohn, and he should be glad if the last named Companion would alter his amendment by substituting £200 for £100.

Comp. Crohn having signified his assent to the proposed alteration, Comp. Gole at some length opposed all the propositions. He complained that Comp. Smith had not made out any case for the proposed vote, or shown that the charities were in want of this additional support. In like manner, Comp. Crohn had altogether failed to make out any case in support of his amendment; whilst he was altogether at a loss to understand the ground upon which the Grand Registrar proposed the middle course, though he urged the time might come when they might want their funds for some other purpose. He trusted Grand Chapter would not sanction the motion without further and much stronger reasons than any hitherto advanced.

Comp. Smith briefly replied, and with the consent of the seconder of the original resolution, expressed his willingness, for the sake of unanimity, to substitute £200 to each of the funds for £300. Comp. Gole appeared equally to find fault with everybody and everything, and as he had evidently got into a fog, there they had better leave him.

The amendment of Comp. Crohn having been withdrawn, the original resolution was carried unanimously, and the Chapter was closed in due form.

COLONIAL.

GRAND LODGE OF CANADA.

THE following is a portion of an excellent address of the M.W. Bro. Colonel W. Mercer Wilson, Grand Master of Canada, at the Grand Lodge held at Kingston, on the 13th July. What we have omitted refers to local matters, and is without interest on this side of the Atlantic:—

"In reviewing the Masonic incidents of the past year, the first in importance and interest which has transpired since I last addressed you, was undoubtedly that auspicious and ever to be remembered event, the union of the Craft, which took place in the city of Toronto on the evening of the 14th day of July last; an event not only of the greatest importance to the Masons of this province, but one which has elicited expressions of mingled satisfaction and delight from our sister Grand Lodges, and which proved to the Masonic world that the Masons of this jurisdiction, deeply impressed with the belief that the union was essential to the prosperity of the Order, could cast aside and forget the unhappy differences which had kept them so long apart, and ignoring all personal and local feeling, did unite for the purpose of promoting the great objects for which we as Masons are all associated. I congratulate you, brethren, upon the happy consummation of this great event, and upon the many gratifying incidents which have already resulted from this happy union.

"At a special meeting of the Grand Lodge convened by me on the 19th of January last, an official communication from the Grand Lodge of England, containing a recognition of this grand body, as having Masonic jurisdiction over Canada West, was laid before the brethren then assembled, when a resolution calling the attention of our English brethren to the error which had been committed, in thus attempting to limit our territorial jurisdiction, was unanimously adopted; and your Grand Secretary intended to forward a copy of it to England. Knowing the importance which our brethren generally attached to a full recognition from England, and feeling most desirous myself that no matter of minor importance should keep us longer apart, I addressed a letter, to the Right Hon. the Earl of Zetland, the most Worshipful Grand Master of Masons in England, in which I endeavoured to explain certain matters which appeared to me not to have been clearly understood by the members of the Grand Lodge of England. This letter reached his Lordship the day previous to the March meeting, and was by him laid before the Grand Lodge with the remark, that although it was an unofficial letter addressed to himself, and in some respects private, that its importance justified him in laying it before them with the other communications which had been received. After some discussion the whole question was by resolution left in the hands of the Grand Master, with full powers to take such action in the matter as he might consider most consistent with the honour of their Grand Lodge, and most courteous to the Grand Lodge of Canada. I have great pleasure in announcing to you, that the correspondence which then took place between the M.W. Grand Master and myself has been of the most pleasing and fraternal character, and that all the obstacles to the fullest and most fraternal intercourse between the brethren of our respective jurisdictions are now, and I trust for ever, removed.

"It is also my pleasing duty to inform you that at the May meeting of the Grand Lodge of Scotland, a resolution recognizing this Grand body was unanimously adopted, and that information of this gratifying fact has been officially announced to me.

"In March last, I received a kind and fraternal letter from the M.W. the Grand Master of Masons in the State of New York, announcing our formal recognition by the Grand Lodge; these letters, with my replies, will be found in my correspondence."

Referring to matters of Masonic jurisprudence, the M.W. Grand Master said:—"On the question—To what extent are the privileges of a Mason affected who has been excluded from his Lodge for the non-payment of dues? By referring to the Book of Constitutions, under the head of 'Private Lodges,' section 25, you will find the general law bearing upon this subject, and by a note at the foot of the page, you will also find an explanation of the terms 'excluded' and 'expelled.' The view which I have taken of this question, is similar to what I believe to be the practice of the Grand Lodge of England, and is also in accordance with the opinions expressed by Dr. Mackey and many other intelligent writers upon this subject, and that is, that exclusion from a Lodge for non-payment of dues, does not affect the standing of the member excluded, in his relations to the Craft in general—were it not so, there would, it appears to me, be but little difference between the penalties of exclusion and expulsion—and yet, how broad is the distinction between them! From the disabilities of the former, the member is at once relieved by paying up his arrears, while from the latter he can only be relieved by the action of Grand Lodge, the one affects simply his engagements with his own Lodge, the other his relation with the Order everywhere, and is the highest penalty known in Masonry; it is of course scarcely necessary for me to say, that there is a broad distinction to be drawn between the mere exclusion of the member of a Lodge for non-payment of dues, and his exclusion for gross, immoral, or infamous conduct—the conclusion to which I have arrived in my own mind is, that the mere non-payment of dues should not carry with it such a penalty as would deprive a brother of those privileges which are generally regarded as inherent in him as a Mason.

"I feel it to be my duty on the present occasion, to direct the attention of Masters of Lodges to the necessity which exists for more frequently causing to be read in open Lodge for the information and instruction of the Craft, the 'ancient charges'; these contain a concise but succinct summary of a Mason's duties, and have been in the possession of the fraternity for many generations, and are regarded by us as containing the fundamental laws which govern the Order. These laws and principles should upon every opportunity be pressed upon the attention of the brethren, and every violation of them should be condemned and punished. Strict discipline and honest dealing are essential to the preservation of the high character and standing of the Order, and should ever distinguish its members; and yet, in breach of that very confidence which the nature of our own institution creates, how often are we pained to hear of instances where this has been grossly abused! Prompt and exemplary punishment should follow such conduct, and the unworthy member should be at once dealt with by his Lodge.

"In perusing the printed proceedings of our sister Grand Lodges in the neighbouring union (from which I derive much information and pleasure) I observe that the subject of establishing a General Grand Lodge, as a High Court of Appeal in all matters Masonic, has occupied their attention, and has elicited much discussion and comment and that a convention of Grand Officers, hailing from the various Masonic jurisdictions in the United States, will take place at Chicago in the month of September next, for the purpose of taking into consideration the propriety of establishing such a body.

"I have not been able to give the subject that attention which its importance demands, but my present opinion is, that although much good might result to the Craft generally from a general meeting of its rulers, the creation of a general grand body would be neither expedient nor proper. Grand Lodges, it appears to me, should ever retain supreme authority in their respective jurisdictions, and should not be subject either to the dictation or control of any authority whatever. I am not aware whether this Grand Lodge has been invited to send representatives to the proposed convention, and I only introduce the subject to you as one possessing a general interest, leaving you to take such action in the matter as you deem expedient.

"The committee on work, I am pleased to say, has made considerable progress. It is necessary for me to inform you that this subject has engaged much of my attention during the last three years. The establishment of a correct standard I regard as the most important duty now devolving on this Grand Lodge; and when we consider that this system, when once determined upon and approved, is to be the rule and guide, not only for the present members of our order, but for all future generations of Masons in this jurisdiction, its great importance becomes apparent. In my researches among the records of the order for light upon this subject, I have found much that has amply rewarded my labour, and from intelligent brethren in England and elsewhere, I have also acquired much valuable information. We have, as you are aware, adopted what is technically called the English mode of work, as a basis, and I have come to the conclusion that to England we must look for the pure and ancient work.—After the union of the two Grand Lodges in 1813, a Lodge of Reconciliation, composed of the most intelligent Masons from both of the former bodies, was named by the United Grand Lodge. These brethren met and agreed as to the exact form of work to be adopted; and in 1814, this system, after the most careful examination and the fullest deliberation, was exemplified and solemnly sanctioned by the Grand Lodge of England; and I would now suggest for your consideration the propriety of a careful examination of the work, before you venture to decide upon a standard for Canada."

In concluding, the M.W.G.M. observed:—"Having thus brought before you the various matters more particularly connected with my own department, I will now conclude by congratulating you upon the present proud position of the Order. Peace reigns within our borders, and the Craft in every quarter of the habitable globe are quietly but industriously engaged in advancing the tenets and principles of the fraternity; and in again resigning into your hands the exalted position which I have so long occupied amongst you, I would, in the words of a distinguished brother, earnestly and affectionately recommend to you as the most efficient means of ensuring the permanency and extending the influence of the Craft, the more earnest cultivation of that beautiful code of morals which runs like a rich vein through the entire system of Freemasonry; well assured that nothing can tend so effectually to crown the science with the verdant wreath of public approbation as the virtuous life and guileless demeanour of its assiduous professors.

THE WEEK.

THE COURT.—The royal family remain at Osborne, in the enjoyment of good health, and of complete privacy. Very few visitors have been received this week, with the exception of members of the Queen's family.

FOREIGN NEWS.—In Paris the Moniteur note has not had any effect in restoring confidence in the bond fide intentions of the Emperor of the French. It is worthy of note that the French government papers are waging an anti-English crusade. The new policy of the Emperor of the French is one of conciliation, with ultimate objects perhaps not so conciliatory. French officers just returned from Italy believe that war will break out within a twelvemonth. Some people, judging from the history of the past ten years in France, consider that the Emperor Napoleon is the secret originator of the prevalent disorder and disorganization throughout the Italian peninsula, the ultimate object seeming to be the establishment of a Napoleonic dynasty under pretence of restoring order. The Independence Belge contains a statement that requires confirmation—viz., that sanguinary fights had taken place at Marseilles, between English men-of-war's men and French sailors. The municipality of Paris have presented an address to the emperor, thanking him for the glory he has conferred on France by his victories, and for his moderation in stopping the effusion of blood, and giving peace to Europe. A frightful accident has taken place on the Lyons railway, at a place called Darcey. Two trains came into collision, one of them being filled with troops, when twenty men were killed or wounded. The French army is to be reduced by means of furloughs to 400,000. The reduction in the navy is not stated. The Moniteur announces the dissolution of the army of observation on the Rhine, but that the camps of Chalons and Elfaut will remain undisturbed. Preparations are being made in Paris for the fête Napoleon, and it is said that considerable alterations have been made in the programme, from the emperor's fear of a democratic outbreak. Anti-English demonstrations continue to take place in the south of France. It is said the Italian duchies are to be occupied by French troops. The Debate publishes a table showing the respective losses of the allied armies and the Austrians in the different engagements which took place during the campaign in Italy, according to which the Austrian loss in killed and wounded was 38,650; that of the allies 24,350; making a difference against the former of 14,300. This statement is "cooked" to suit French vanity. The French loss in prisoners is stated at 300 only; that of the Austrians at 16,000.—M. Ratazzi, the new minister of the interior at Turin, has sent an important circular to all the governors and head functionaries of the provinces of the kingdom, and somewhat vaguely gives in his adhesion to the idea of the future independence of Italy, and calls on all the functionaries of the kingdom to render their assistance in preserving public order, and in aiding public progress. A Milan correspondent states that the Italian papers in the interest of Austria exult in the idea that Lombardy will belong once more to Austria. The Official Gazette of Verona goes so far as to say, "sooner or later we shall cross the Mincio." Garibaldi has issued a proclamation in which, while he openly gives honour to "Napoleon and the heroic French nation," he ominously adds: "We must not abandon our sacred motto, Italy and Victor Emmanuel."—A grand naval review was held at Cronstadt on the 23rd July by the Emperor Alexander. The fleet consisted of 21 men of war and frigates, chiefly steamers, and a number of gun boats.—A letter from Vienna of the 27th ult. states that the King of the Belgians is expected at Toplitz, not to take the waters, but with a view to political objects. It is supposed that he will have an interview at that place with the Emperor of Austria and the Prince Regent of Prussia.

INDIA.—The arrival of the Bombay mails with news to the 5th July telegraphed from Aden. Among the European troops the spirit of disaffection appears to be extending. At one station the men are in open mutiny and have entrenched themselves in the barracks. A general order published, allows those who enlisted for the late Company's forces to take their discharge. The Benares, from Australia, is also reported, with Sydney dates to the 14th June.

HOME NEWS.—The usual Cabinet Councils have been held this week at Lord Palmerston's official residence.—The Grand Duchess Marie of Russia arrived at Dover on Sunday afternoon. Her royal highness is accompanied by several members of the Imperial family, and a distinguished suite. It is said that the duchess purposes to take up her residence at Torquay for some time.—A meeting was held at Gloucester, on Saturday, to promote the abolition of the "mop" system under which agricultural and domestic servants are now hired. An Agricultural Servants' Registration Society was formed, of which Earl Ducie is to be president. It is not proposed that the servants shall lose their annual holiday, but a day is to be fixed for that purpose.—The attitude of working men and their employers being just now of some moment, on account of the great strike among the building trade which is threatened, we direct the attention of our readers to the report of an application, at the Thames Police-court, on behalf of the managers of the Central Gas-works, Bow-common, against five men, ringleaders in a strike. The magistrate granted the summonses.—On Monday afternoon, a serious collision took place at Fenchurch-street railway terminus, which caused much injury to several passengers. It seems that just as the Tilbury engine was passing clear of the station it came into violent collision with a North Woolwich train, which was coming in. Being Monday, there was an extra number of passengers, and their cries were fearful. The force of the collision threw the Tilbury train off the line, and the carriages were reported to be shattered. Medical assistance was promptly rendered.—A telegraph from Dublin informs us of the death of Judge Plunket. By his death one of the judgeships of the Bankruptcy Court, worth

£2,000 per annum, becomes vacant.—The Registrar General's return shows a decrease in the mortality of the metropolis during last week, the total number of deaths being 1419, a decrease as compared with the number last week, which was 1605. The births during the week were 1808.—A desperate attempt at murder has been made at Bradford, a master shoemaker, named Duffield, having inflicted several stabs in the body of his wife, who has barely escaped with life.—A terrible item of intelligence reaches us by telegraph from Sheffield. A man has been shot at and dangerously wounded for refusing to join a saw-grinders' union. The same man's house has been previously attempted to be blown up with gunpowder by these regenerators of society.—An accident, causing much alarm and serious personal injury, has occurred at South Shields. The ceremony of laying the foundation stone of a chapel, which was partly executed, had collected a number of spectators on a platform. One of the beams suddenly gave way, precipitating one hundred and fifty persons to the ground.—John West, police constable 114 B, has been indicted for stealing a watch, value £2, from the person of John Green, while he was sitting half asleep at his own door. He was found guilty, and sentenced to 12 months' hard labour.—At the Westminster Police-court, on Wednesday, Francesco Filippini was committed for trial, and bail refused, on the charge of conspiracy and perjury. The case arises from an accusation of poisoning against Christoforo Buono Core, the Italian salamander at Cremorne.—The Funds, after advancing from $\frac{1}{2}$ to $\frac{3}{4}$ per cent. yesterday, returned to their former position, and were last quoted $94\frac{1}{2}$ to 95. Foreign Stocks and Shares were steady; the latter presenting symptoms of increased firmness. The demand for money was well supported at $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., and the applications at the Bank showed an increase, although the rates out of doors were not much above the minimum. A further parcel of Australian gold was sent into the vaults of Threadneedle-street, showing that late arrivals have sufficed to supply the continental demands, though the greater portion is still purchased for export.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.—In the HOUSE OF LORDS on Monday the Earl of Derby asked Lord Granville what course he intended to take with bills before Parliament, in order to meet the general hope that the session would not be protracted beyond a fortnight? Earl Granville said it would be difficult, indeed impossible, at present to fix a day for the close of the session. Lord Teynham asked whether, in preparing a measure for parliamentary reform, the Government would take into consideration the expediency of not proposing any property or pecuniary qualification to entitle a person to be registered as a voter? To which Earl Granville replied that it would be premature to offer any explanation of the intentions of the Government on the subject. On Tuesday Lord Brougham, in calling attention to the workmen's strikes taking place in various parts of the country, expressed his opinion that some check ought to be put upon such combinations as tended to prevent those who were so disposed from quietly following their employment. After some bills had been forwarded a stage, their lordships adjourned.—In the HOUSE OF COMMONS on Monday, the house having gone into committee on the Indian loan, Sir C. Wood proceeded to make his financial statement for India. He said he did not wish to draw a gloomy aspect of the future of India, for he could see no reason why she should not again recover all her former prosperity. At present, however, it must be confessed, she presented a melancholy contrast to her position prior to the mutiny. The mutiny had swept over the land like a whirlwind, and he regretted that in addition he had that day received intelligence that to the calamities of the stoppage of public works and financial disasters, they had yet another in the mutiny of a portion of the European troops in India. The right hon. baronet went on to say that since April, 1857, all the accounts were matters of estimate. The debt of India at that period was £59,462,000, bearing interest to the extent of £2,525,000. The military expenditure was £12,561,000. On the 30th of last April, this debt had swollen to £81,680,000, with interest to the amount of £3,564,000. For 1859–60 it was estimated that the expenditure would be £46,131,500, while the revenue was only estimated to be £35,850,000, leaving a deficiency of £10,250,000. To this was to be added a further charge for railways, amounting to £2,250,000, making a total deficiency of £12,500,000. Of this amount nearly £500,000 had been already raised in England by Lord Stanley by way of loan, and £2,000,000 had been raised in India, leaving a sum of £5,700,000 yet to be supplied. He proposed to raise the remainder of Lord Stanley's loan, and to borrow an additional £5,000,000, which would leave him a small surplus of about £1,500,000, as it was not necessary that the whole of the money should be immediately expended. He felt it necessary to state, in justice to those who might be disposed to lend their money, that there was a probability that for two or three years the revenues of India would be unable to meet the expenditure, perhaps to the extent of four or five millions per annum. With respect to the revenue, instructions had been sent out to India to raise the salt duty at Madras, Bombay, and the North-Western Provinces. From this he estimated an increase of £300,000. It was also intimated to the Governor General that a revenue might be derived from stamps, from licences to dealers, and if possible from succession duties. He could not estimate what these would produce, but certainly some few hundred thousands; but after all this should have been accomplished there would still be a deficiency to be provided for by loan. The right hon. gentleman stated that the revenues of India were in an unsound state, and it was the intention of the government to send out to India a competent person to place them on a footing similar to that which prevailed in this country. Lord Stanley agreed in much that had fallen from Sir C. Wood, and without under-estimating the nature of the difficulties they had to contend with in India, he felt bound to say that he considered those difficulties as only temporary. As there was not a very sanguine prospect of an increase to a large amount in the revenue, they could only look to a reduction of the expenditure as the chief means of balancing the account. The position of India was so critical, that it might be that on a future day the necessity might arise of considering whether this country might lend its aid to India in the shape of a guarantee for a loan. Mr. Bright repudiated the idea of any guarantee from this country for a loan, as it had no control over the expenditure of India. He thought we were now reaping the fruits of our insane annexation policy. Sir C. Wood replied; when a bill was agreed to for a loan of £5,000,000. On Tuesday the Income Tax Bill was read a third time and passed. The Police Law Amendment Bill passed through committee. Sir G. C. Lewis withdrew for the present the Roman Catholic Charities Bill, and will bring in another on the same subject early next session. In the meantime he would propose a continuance of the Exemption Bill. Several members expressed their approval of such a course, while others dissented from it. The order for going into committee on the bill was discharged. In the evening sitting, Sir G. C. Lewis said he intended to bring in a continuance bill of the Roman Catholic Exemption Bill next evening. Mr. Hutt would give it every opposition in his power. Colonel French called attention to the Norwich election. Lord Bury had accepted office under the crown, and was re-elected. Since that the election committee had reported both Lord Bury and Mr. Schneider, by their agents, guilty of bribery. The gallant colonel wished to know if, under these circumstances, Lord Bury could sit and vote. Sir G. C. Grey said Lord Bury did not intend to take his seat, and the Speaker referred Colonel French to the law of Parliament on the subject, which he said was very clear and distinct. Mr. M. Milnes moved that an humble address be presented to her Majesty relative to the assaults and cruelties committed on merchant seamen engaged in traffic between this country and the United States of America. Mr. J. Ewart seconded the motion. Sir G. C. Lewis, while acknowledging the importance of the subject, said it did not come within the territorial law of the country. Still, if such things could be brought under the extradition treaties, he could see nothing but advantage to accrue from it. The motion was agreed to. On Wednesday, new writs were issued for Taunton, in the room of Mr. Labouchere, raised to the peerage, and for Devonport, in the room of Sir E. Perry, appointed to the Council for India. The Law of Property and Trustee Relief Amendment Bill was passed through committee. The vote of £2,000 for a National Portrait Gallery was carried by a majority of 141 to 35. A discussion took place on the vote of £2,000 for the purchase of Sir G. Hayter's picture of the "First Reformed Parliament," which is already paid for. On a division there appeared equal numbers for and against, and the chairman giving his casting vote in its favour, it was passed. A vote of £9,900 for the erection of temporary premises, at Kensington Gore, for the reception of the pictures from the Vernon and Turner Galleries, was carried by a majority of 43. £5,000 was also voted to Mr. Barber in consideration of the sufferings he had undergone and his distressed circumstances. After the remaining business had been disposed of, the house adjourned.

PUBLIC AMUSEMENTS.

HAYMARKET THEATRE.—The only novelty of the week was the production yesterday of a new farce by Mr. C. Mathews, entitled "Out of Sight, Out of Mind," which we must defer noticing till next week.

PRINCESS'S THEATRE.—This week the performances consisted of the "Corsican Brothers," and "A Midsummer Night's Dream." The former of these pieces has been celebrated for years as the most effective melodrama ever produced on any stage, while "A Midsummer Night's Dream" is famed as one of the most graceful and elegant of the Shaksperian revivals which have been seen at the Princess's Theatre.

OLYMPIC THEATRE.—"Why Did You Die?"—a very pleasant farce, written years ago by Mr. Charles Mathews, was revived on Monday night. This comical piece requires good acting in all the parts, and is therefore well suited to the Olympic company. Mrs. Leigh Murray as a lady of the high bred order, Mr. Addison as a grumpy husband, Mr. G. Vining as a dashing young gallant of the modern school, Mrs. Emden and Mr. H. Wigan as the English maid and the Irish footman, and Miss Cottrell as the pretty niece, are all fitted with characters suitable to their talents.

STRAED THEATRE.—"Captain Charlotte," with Miss Mary Wilton, has been produced as a change this week; and the costume and acting of that young lady have carried off a somewhat meagre farce very triumphantly. In the "School for Coquettes," the fair manageress, resumes her sway over her admiring audience, who, however little they may think of the comedy, do not fail to express their warm admiration of the charming heroine. The "Lady of Lyons" burlesque continues its mirth provoking career. The situations are so absurd, and the guise in which they are depicted so facetious, that we much doubt if the venerable Lytton Bulwer himself, were he present, could refrain from joining in the universal cachinnation. The dialogue of this extraordinary production is bristling with the most unpardonable puns, and even "Owen Meredith" himself might learn something new in the way of rhymes by studying Mr. Byron.

Obituary.

THE KING OF SWEDEN AND NORWAY.

BR. OSCAR (Joseph Francis), King of Sweden and Norway, and of the Goths and Vandals, was the supreme head of the Masonic Order in Sweden and Norway. The late king was the son of King Charles John XIV., the famous Marshal Bernadotte, Prince of Ponte Corvo, by his consort (who is still living), Eugénie Bernardine Desirée Clary, Queen Dowager, sister-in-law of Joseph Bonaparte, King of Naples, and afterwards King of Spain. King Oscar was born the 4th of July, 1799, and was much beloved by his father. To him Bernadotte, then three years Crown Prince of Sweden, addressed his memorable and affectionate letter from Lubeck after the terrible struggle at Leipsic in 1813. Bernadotte became King of Sweden the 5th of February, 1818, and Oscar succeeded him on the throne the 8th of March, 1844, and was crowned at Stockholm on the 28th of September of the same year. He married the 19th of June, 1823, Josephine Maximilian Eugénie, the daughter of the celebrated Prince Eugene de Beauharnais, Duke of Leuchtenberg, and the first cousin of the present Emperor of the French, by whom he leaves three sons, Charles his successor; Oscar, Duke of Ostrogothia; and Augustus, Duke of Dalecarlia; and one daughter, the Princess Charlotte Eugénie. King Oscar died on the 8th inst., at Stockholm, after an illness which had incapacitated him from taking any active part in the government of his kingdom since the month of September, 1857. He is succeeded by his eldest son, Charles, Prince Royal, Duke of Scania, who was, on the proposition of the king, his father, appointed regent by the representative bodies of Sweden and Norway, the 25th of September, 1857, when his father's illness rendered such office necessary, and who now becomes king as Charles XV. His majesty was born the 3rd of May, 1826, and married, the 19th of June, 1850, the Princess Louisa, daughter of Prince William of the Netherlands, by whom he has a daughter, the Princess Louisa Josephine Eugénie.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

ROYAL BENEVOLENT INSTITUTION FOR AGED MASONS.—In our number of July 16, we stated in our leading article that an aged brother had been for twenty-two years a recipient of the benefits of the above institution. This was manifestly an error, since the same article states that the fund had only been established seventeen years.

BRO. DESQUESNES.—Your communication has been duly received and shall be considered next week.

"R. R."—We have not seen the notice to which you refer.

"O. P. Q." is thanked for his suggestion.

"X."—The verses are not, perhaps, critically speaking, elegant, but we quite agree with their sentiment, and so, we think, do most of our readers.

"G. G."—Col. Tynte was prevented from attending by illness, to the great regret of the brethren (see our report).

LONDON, SATURDAY, AUGUST 13, 1859.

MASONRY IN AFRICA.

In Africa, twelve Lodges under the constitution of the Grand Lodge of England are in active existence; their number bearing but little proportion to the white population of so vast a division of the world; four of these are situated on the West Coast, and the remaining eight at the southern settlements, usually called the Cape of Good Hope. At present they are all under the direct control of the Grand Master; for though some years ago a Provincial Grand Master exercised authority in Southern Africa, the office is, and has been for a considerable period, vacant. Few of our colonial possessions stand more in need of resident Masonic government; independently of the laxity and want of discipline which is likely to occur without the constant supervision of a regularly constituted authority, the remoteness from England, more especially of the southern settlements, renders the necessary correspondence with the Grand Secretary, on every slight and unimportant subject not specially provided for in the Constitutions a vexatious and irksome task; not that the Masons in Africa would suffer by a comparison with brethren in other colonies; and as far as the Cape itself is concerned there are few countries, if any, under the jurisdiction of the Grand Lodge of England where Masonry is better acted up to, either in theory or practice; if the next meeting of the British Lodge, No. 419 (Cape Town), were to be held in London, and favoured by a numerous attendance of our metropolitan Past Masters, we question, from what we hear, whether even those veterans in the Craft would discover any irregularity or deviation from the established ritual. It will however be admitted that inconvenience, to use no harsher word, occasionally arises from the absence of a local court of appeal. Dispensations, certificates for erratic brethren, warrants for new Lodges, and complaints of a Masonic nature, which will sometimes demand redress even in the best regulated communities, are causes sufficient in themselves to call for provincial government. Frequent correspondence with Freemasons' Hall, London, more particularly to brethren located in the eastern provinces of the Cape colony, is a matter of grave moment. The mail steamer leaves England on the 6th of each month, arriving at Cape Town about the 21st of the following month, returning thence with the home mail after the lapse of a few days; letters despatched to Cape Town can thus be answered by the return mail, but any addressed to the frontier towns cannot be replied to until the following month. To give an instance of possible procrastination:—let it be supposed that Bro. W. Gray Clarke, Grand Secretary, writes to the Worshipful Master of No. 987, Fordyce Lodge, (meeting at King William's Town), in the eastern frontier; the letter leaves England on the 6th of January, arrives at Cape Town on the 21st of February, and is received at King William's Town on the 26th; the Worshipful Master of No. 987 cannot transmit a reply to our Very Worshipful Brother until about the 25th of March, and the Grand Secretary is not in possession of the required information before May; so that although it may be of a very urgent nature, Bro. Clarke has nothing for it but to wait patiently the four months. On the West Coast things are not quite so bad, and though provincial government is required, the Masons there are not subjected to equal inconvenience with their more distant brethren at the Cape.

To the want of vigour which such a state must necessarily generate is to be attributed the tardy progress of Masonry in Africa; and a possible decadence looms in the future. Able and energetic rulers, vested with proper authority, and assisted as they would be by nearly every Mason in their districts, could do much to revive the drooping spirits of unsuccessful brethren, men who hitherto have laboured for the cause alone and unsupported, and naturally feel discontented at the barren result.

Africa requires two District Grand Lodges, which for the present will suffice, though in a few years the spread of Masonry may be such as to demand additional provinces. They should be called the Provinces of Western and Southern Africa; the former to comprise Nos. 867, 416, 599, and 468; and the latter, Nos. 419, 473, 545, 871, 884, 987, 1,013, and 1,040. The Provincial Grand Master of Western Africa should be resident at Cape Coast Castle, and his Deputy at Sierra Leone, the latter having authority to grant dispensations, &c., delegated to him. A Cape Town brother should preside over the province of Southern Africa, and a Deputy Provincial Grand Master ought to be by him selected from amongst the most experienced Masons living on the eastern frontier; for example, at Graham's Town, King William's Town, or Beaufort, in whom should be vested the discretionary power of granting dispensations, warrants, &c. Lodge No. 1,040, situate at Port Natal, would certainly be somewhat isolated, if these arrangements were carried into effect, though even it would profit by the change; communication with Cape Town is not a matter of many days, and when the brethren at Pieter Maritzburg and D'Urban shall have added a few more Lodges to the present roll, which will in all probability soon be done, they will be justly entitled to a province of their own. At no very distant date, it is to be hoped that Southern Africa will be divided into four Masonic provinces, viz., Cape Town, Albany, British Kaffraria, and Natal.

The establishment of District Grand Lodges would be a great boon to Masons in Africa, and our colonial brethren might then enjoy the advantages of provincial rank; and a permanent and grateful feeling of regard for the parent Grand Lodge—which, whilst vigilantly watching over the interests of the Craft in the mother country does not disdain to extend a fostering care to her far distant progeny—would be the natural consequence.

It is to be hoped that the legislators of the Craft may see the necessity of an extended system of provincial government; and in the event of such an occurrence, we trust that the claims of African Lodges will not be overlooked.

FALLACIOUS VIEWS OF THE CRAFT.

THE newspaper press of the present day, from its intrinsic literary merits, as well as from the beneficial influence which it exercises upon our social system—alternately by its fearless censure, exposure, and satire of that which is corrupt and evil, or by advice, encouragement, and praise, judiciously bestowed where they are deserved—has fairly earned the enormous influence which it undeniably possesses over the actions, and even the thoughts of a large portion of our countrymen. The daily and weekly journals of this metropolis comprise among the ranks of their contributors a body of essayists of ability and information for which we may in vain search the previous history of literature to find a parallel; the spirit of the age indeed demands this, for so improved and so extended has education become of late years that the public is now too enlightened to accept with favour the efforts of inferior writers; and any journal which omits to secure the highest talent available for its means must inevitably be thrust aside and passed in the race with so many brilliant contemporaries.

So universally acknowledged are this ability and this great power for good and for evil, that the praise, or the strictures of "the fourth estate" cannot now pass unregarded by any rank or power in the state however exalted or however strong in themselves. If it be possible to make any exception to this rule it would be in the case of our venerable Order, which from its peculiar constitution and its extended sway over the whole surface of the inhabited globe, might well look with indifference upon any expression of the opinion of the outer world, taking a local or (if that were possible) even a national form. Foremost among the principles of the brethren of our Craft, however, are the advocacy and propagation of knowledge and enlightenment among men; and considering as we do that the press of a free country is the most powerful agent by which this noble cause can be assisted, we pay all due deference to its utterances—and receive its praises with the same equanimity with which we should regard misrepresentation or unfavourable criticism.

We have been led into these remarks by an article we have met with in a daily metropolitan journal, which while possessing the advantage of cheapness, is inferior to few, if any, of its contemporaries, in ability and information. In the Daily Telegraph of Aug. 3, there appeared a leader upon Freemasonry, which as many of our readers may not have seen, we reprint in its entirety. The writer, it will be perceived, while speaking of the Order in the most respectful terms has, either from want of proper inquiry into the subject, or from defective information derived from questionable sources, arrived at very incorrect conclusions with regard to Freemasonry; and while he is evidently desirous of paying a well deserved tribute of admiration to those results of the practical working of the Craft which are patent to the whole world, he greatly misconceives the principles upon which the institution is founded. While we are gratified by the expression of respect for the Craft displayed in this essay, we think that few skilled Craftsmen will feel flattered at the comparatively commonplace estimate which the writer has formed of our antient mystery.

Our contemporary does not seem in the least degree imbued with that half curious, half incredulous notion of the mystic tie which has been the foundation of so many vague speculations, so many vulgar sneers, and so many romantic absurdities; he rather appears to incline somewhat to describe the Order as a superior kind of benefit society—a notion which we are aware is entertained by many, though (if we may be pardoned for saying so) not the best-informed among the public. The following is the article in question:—

“Organizations for friendly or charitable purposes are of very ancient date. They existed among the Greeks, especially in the free state of Athens; they existed in Rome, and from the eternal city passed down to the modern world. In the eighteenth century they assumed a very peculiar form, and aimed at producing extraordinary effects, nothing less than the regeneration of society, the establishment of universal freedom, and the diffusion of plenty and contentment throughout the world. It remains for some historian capable, by his learning and impartiality, of doing justice to the subject, to reveal what Freemasonry, which stands at the head of all friendly societies, really was during the eighteenth century and earlier. By its enemies it has been systematically misrepresented, its objects have been ridiculed, its ceremonies travestied, its sacred aim and purpose profaned. Its only real fault in those days was aiming at too much. There was a philosophy among the brethren, a philosophy lofty and expansive, which induced them to hope that, by the strict application of the law of brotherhood, all mankind might be emancipated and invested with the dignity which nature intended it to possess. The writers of the period and of that immediately succeeding, applied themselves rather to libel than to explain the design of Freemasonry and other cognate associations. It was out of the womb of charity that they sprang—it was to develop the principle of charity that they existed. They went back to the religions of old times, and found amid their fragments and ruins proofs that all men are brethren, and that the primary duty of life is to give efficacy to the doctrine of union and mutual support. Springing into activity, in juxtaposition with despotism, they found it impossible to avoid awakening the hostility of governments, and hence the ferocious persecutions which the members of friendly societies encountered in the last age. They beheld the powerful associating together for the oppression of the weak, and they laboured to induce the weak to associate for their own protection, and perhaps, in some instances, to retaliate on the upholders of the antagonist principle.

“This was the great purpose of Freemasonry on the continent; it had a grand and catholic object, it aimed at noble results; and whatever the ignorant may think, produced them, in a great measure, since the superior condition of society in these days is unquestionably traceable to the labours of Freemasonry. The great French revolution, which performed in the moral atmosphere the duty of a mighty thunderstorm, was an application, more or less uncouth, of Masonic doctrines. These taught the equality of man, not for purposes of discord and civil dissension, but in order to procure the execution of justice indiscriminately to all members of the community. Class legislation, the privileges of particular orders, the traditional rights of individuals, they vehemently denounced, inculcating at the same time a profound reverence for genius, for virtue, for religion, for morality. Their chaotic strivings were merely meant to inaugurate the reign of enlightened and equal laws, which should raise the humble from the dust, and bring down the arrogance of the proud.

“Throughout Europe the principles thus brought forward have since been put in play, more or less completely, by the associations of Freemasons, Odd Fellows, Druids, Foresters, and so on. Their institutions may be perverted, but the system they aim at realizing is deserving of all praise. The end they would attain is the refinement and elevation of the poor and ignorant, first, by associating them with men of education; and, next, by affording to them in sickness and old age the means of escaping the most humiliating consequences of poverty. To be a pauper, is to forfeit many of the rights and nearly all the dignity naturally belonging to a man. The pauper reaps where he has not sown, devours where he has not planted. His aliments come to him not as a right, but as an alms, and are doled out to his wants with humiliating and degrading economy. Through the influence of friendly societies a man is enabled to administer to his own wants in age, in sickness, and in unavoidable misfortunes. The bread he eats by this means is the bread of honest labour—the bread for which he has himself toiled, and which he earned when he had strength, precisely that he might be able to eat it when his strength failed, and when the evil days of weakness should come upon him.

“It is the duty of civilization to look with approval on all associations of this class, which are calculated to foster the feeling of independence, and render men their own benefactors. It is not unpleasant to be beholden to the person you love; and if it be true that most men love themselves most of all, then to be beholden to themselves must be the pleasantest of all feelings. A great Pagan king said it is more blessed to give than to receive, and if asked, he certainly would have added, it is better to provide for yourselves than to be provided for by others. Friendly associations enable men to do this, while they by no means deprive them of the pleasure of giving. The man who puts by a shilling, with an eye to the future, is more likely to put by a second, than he who has never saved a penny. Real economy is never niggardly. Its hands are meant for use, for distribution, for charity. But when there exists a common fund, to which a thousand men contribute, which is watched over by a thousand minds, and known to be designed for the comfort in sickness of a thousand sufferers, a great deal more in proportion may be accomplished than could ever be effected by a thousand separate individuals acting without plan, keeping the fruits of their economy apart and aiming each exclusively at his own personal advantage.

“Freemasonry—to which we refer because it is the most perfect of all friendly associations—is animated by a really universal spirit, which abjures all distinctions of country, race, and creed. The Mahomedan, meeting on the burning plains of Asia, with a Christian foe on the field of battle, has been known to kneel by his side, to raise him from the earth, to bind up his wounds, to bear him tenderly to his own tent, and there to wait on him like a brother, because he had discovered that he was a Freemason. The Hindoo, the Christian, the Buddhist would do the same. This imparts to the Order something like a religious character, though distinct from sects and creeds. It would be well if we looked into the history of Masonry during the last age, and inquired how much of its present excellence is due to the efforts then made towards raising it into a catholic system, organized for the political regeneration of the world. Its mystery, its secret apartments, its rites celebrated in darkness or extreme gloom, the flashing of swords, the burning of incense, the jargon, the mummeries, the mysticism prevailing—all these things had their use, though they might occasionally be misemployed. Society in all countries requires to be galvanized freely before it can be improved. Civilization is too often synonymous with droning vapidness, verging upon the dreaminess of Utopia. Men need to be roused, shaken, alarmed, and made to feel that all individuals are surrounded in this world by mystery—that they know not whence they came, or whither they go—that they have more duties than the church explains to them—and that among these the greatest by far is that of succouring each other in distress, without making any inquiries about beliefs, or governments, or races, or languages. The only qualification necessary is to be a man—rank, title, distinctions, are nothing in the theory of Masonry, and it was by dwelling too exclusively on this cardinal truth that the vast secret associations of the last age drew suspicion and discredit upon themselves. Nevertheless, their aim was pure, and the philosophy which guided their aspirations and researches of the highest and noblest kind. We might learn much from our predecessors, who, on the other hand, might perhaps have envied us our enlightened diligence and practical good sense. The societies of the present day, though many in name, are but one in purpose, since they aim at nothing but bettering the condition of those classes which civil and political institutions are too apt to neglect, or sweep past in their rapid and extensive movements."

With some of the remarks quoted above we have no cause of disagreement. That the superior condition of modern society owes much to Freemasonry; and that the claims of the brotherhood are felt in every country and by every race—that the laws of the Order are observed by the Hindoo, the Buddhist, and the Mahomedan as well as by the Jew and the Christian—all this is well known and has been acknowledged by the world at large with admiration and wonder from the earliest times. Other inferences and statements of the writer, however, are based upon incorrect data, and these we will proceed briefly to notice. As far as our brethren themselves are concerned, this course is in a measure unnecessary; but we are not unaware that this journal has many readers who are not Freemasons, and we think it belongs to our legitimate province to correct any erroneous impressions which may go forth respecting the institution, especially in a case when we know that the well intentioned but unfounded statements are certain of a large circulation.

In the first place—our contemporary, throughout his remarks, considers the great institution of Freemasonry chiefly as the first in rank and the best of benefit or friendly societies. Our institution bears no sort of resemblance to these societies, for an individual joins a friendly or benefit association with the express purpose of making a provision for future misfortune, for sickness, or for old age, in which cases he has a just and lawful claim to pecuniary assistance from the institution which he has contributed to support; whereas no man can be initiated into the antient Craft without expressly declaring that in entering the body of Masons he has no hope or expectation of gain or pecuniary reward, either immediate or remote; without a total and solemn disclaimer of all motives of self-interest no man is allowed to be made a Mason—and therefore it is not possible to show any resemblance between our Order and those provident societies which are so justly praised in the article before us. It is quite true that Masonry may be termed a benevolent society in one sense, because universal benevolence is inculcated by its precepts, but the practice of charity and good will is not to be confined to the brotherhood—the wants and the misery of the stranger should be compassionated as well as those of our own poor or unhappy. It is true that each Lodge has to pay a stated sum for each of its members annually to a Fund of Benevolence through which is dispensed to the needy brother some part of the superfluity of his more fortunate comrades, but this is given and accepted as a free brotherly gift, and the recipient has no stated claim whatever upon the fund. Within the last century also, the example of the numerous institutions for the education of the young has been followed by the Craft, who have thought fit to establish schools in which the children of decayed or deceased brethren can receive an excellent education under the supervision of their fathers' fellow Masons. In none of these can we trace any carrying out of the principle of the benefit society; and if there be any fancied resemblance, that is due to modern improvements, and has nothing whatever to do with the antient traditions and charges upon which Freemasonry is based. Charity, in fine, is highly valued among Masons, and strictly enjoined, but this virtue is but one of the handmaids that wait in the sublime Masonic temple.

That the history of Freemasonry yet remains to be written, and of Freemasonry much earlier than the last century, we cordially agree; there being no work of extent and value commensurate with the subject in existence, as far as we are aware. Considering the number of learned and able men who have adorned our Craft, we are free to confess that we consider this as somewhat remarkable. Certain it is, however, that all we have to show in the place of a history of Freemasonry is a bald record of official transactions for less than two centuries, and the early and interesting incidents of the Craft in this country are overlooked and almost forgotten, while they are overlaid with absurd interpolations and even fictions, disbelieved by the brethren, and ridiculed by the enemies of the Order. Our contemporary should be informed, however, that "cognate" associations to Freemasonry do not, and never have existed. The royal art stands alone and unapproachable; nothing in the least degree similar has ever been known in the history of the world; nor is it probable the intelligence of man will ever produce a rival to it.

The numerous political secret societies of the last century were totally unmasonic in their bearing and in their objects, though many profligate adventurers were bold enough to make use of Masonic titles and even to incorporate some of the preliminary forms of our ritual in their short lived associations. Some brethren more ambitious than sagacious, in the time of the banished Stuart princes, endeavoured to make converts to the cause of the white rose among Masonic Lodges, in Scotland particularly, and men high in the Order known to be Jacobites, were it is said plied hard with entreaties to use their efforts to convert the Masonic organization into a political engine. This it was evident was totally impossible, and these intrigues met with their inevitable discomfiture, since the grand principles of the Order are fixed and unalterable, and the institution would cease to be Masonic as soon as its members consented to devote themselves to any other labour than that marked out for them by its antient laws and constitutions. The great French revolution produced, doubtless, after an interregnum of bloodshed and misery, results which conduced to the progress of liberty and enlightenment; but we cannot admit herein any comparison to the doctrines of Freemasonry, which aims at the improvement of the human race by peaceful means, and is opposed to violence. Again, though Freemasonry teaches that all men are on a level as regards their common humanity, it has never interfered with social gradations of rank, nor are any rights of individuals traditional or real, interfered with by the teaching of our Craft.

A remarkable statement is made by our contemporary on the correctness or fallacy of which we confess ourselves unable to give an opinion. He asserts that the Odd Fellows, Druids, and Foresters, have succeeded in propagating the principles of their institutions throughout the Continent. We have, it is true, but scanty knowledge of these bodies, and are quite unacquainted with their proceedings; but we certainly were under the impression that their operations were confined to England and the United States. With the remarks in the article before us on the advantages to the industrious classes of friendly provident societies, we entirely concur; we should be glad to see them increased in number and efficiency.

Our contemporary's remarks upon the rites of Masonry are ingenious, and upon the whole fair enough, as a matter of theory—though such expressions as "jargon" and "mummery" jar somewhat upon our ears. As to the recommendation to inquire into the history of Masonry in the past age, we have ample reason for believing that little was done during that period to raise the character of the Order, or to extend its influence. On the contrary, we have the records of many mischievous attempts at innovation and corruption, from which insidious proceedings Masonry undoubtedly suffered at the close of the last century, and by which her usefulness was diminished. The efforts of true and worthy brethren have dispersed those clouds of folly and prejudice, and our glorious Order now shines out in undiminished brightness for the admiration of the wise and just, and for the general benefit of the human race. D.

A TRIP FIVE THOUSAND MILES OFF.

FOR ten long weeks we had been inmates of that most secure of prisons—a ship; for seventy long days we had trodden nothing firmer than our heaving deck, nor smelt aught sweeter than the fresh sea breezes which played wild tunes among our cordage as they wafted us on our way. Once or twice we had the pleasure of seeing land, Madeira looming on us, a land of silver mist, which gradually clearing off revealed the outline of the bold hills and the soft green of the sheltered valleys where so many invalids are annually restored to health; then came Teneriffe, with its cloud capped peak, and further on the Cape Verd Islands, wrapped in the misty atmosphere that renders them so verdant, and whose neighbourhood has gained so unenviable a notoriety as a favourite haunt of pirates. But we passed them all by as fair pictures, and pursued our way diligently beneath the steady influence of the trade winds, until now, having completed our five thousand miles, we were hourly looking to see the land of our destination—the Cape of Good Hope.

At length day and it broke together on our view, where ending a chain of lofty hills, the two precipitous hummocks which form the extreme point of the southern Cape rose wild and stern and darkly defined against the morning sky, even as they met the eye of the first mariner who ploughed those seas, and even as they had stood for many thousand years before, braving the fierce storms of the vast south Atlantic ocean. Hill beyond hill, like terrestrial billows, the land spread out before us, appearing to rise yet higher as it receded from the sea; while through the transparent atmosphere the gleaming ridges of grass or rock were distinctly visible down the steep hill sides, alternating with the darker hue of the wooded ravines between them. Some thirty miles northward the hills terminated, to recommence some ten miles further down, pale and blue in the distance.

In the intervening space stretches the broad expanse of Table Bay, up which, as in an estuary, the waters of the south Atlantic roll nearly thirty miles into the land. As we sailed up the bay wider and wider it spread around us, until it resembled one of those spacious lakes that gladden the dark forests of the western continent. Grouped in front of the town some eighty or a hundred vessels lay at anchor, their sizes ranging from the noble Indiaman of fifteen hundred tons to the miniature coaster of fifteen.

In honour of our arrival every vessel bore a flag, and so varied was their blazonry, it seemed as if every nation in Europe was there represented, while the stripes and stars floating from the peak of the American whaler, and the ambitious globe from that of the Brazilian trader, proved that our transatlantic brethren were not absent from the maritime congress. However, more than half the vessels displayed the flag that has "braved a thousand years the battle and the breeze," and next numerous were the horizontal stripes of Holland. Through the marine maze we threaded our way to our appointed station; then came the tremulous sensation and the welcome sound of the descending anchor, and we lay opposite the object of our thoughts and hopes—Cape Town.

What a fair scene it presented to our view! Before us rose up, nearly three thousand six hundred feet into the air, the almost perpendicular sides of the Table Mountain, with the broad flattened summit that had won it so appropriate a name. The upper part of the mountain seemed formed of layers of dark, rugged stone, then grass and heaths succeeded, while the lower half of the mountain gleamed strangely white in the sunshine beneath the quivering leaves of the beautiful silver trees that girdled it. To the right of the mountain, and with the head rising almost to its altitude, are the two hills whose united outline bears so exact a resemblance to a lion couchant, that they have not unnaturally acquired the names of the Lion's Head and Rump. Smooth, verdant, and beautiful, they form an important feature in the landscape, and it is on the Lion's Rump that the telegraph is erected, to give notice of approaching vessels; the first ball announces a sail, the second indicates the direction whence it comes; and we may fancy how great is the excitement those balls occasion among the dwellers in that isolated colony as to what tidings may be coming from distant friends and relatives, and how prolonged their anxiety—for the telegraph is at work many hours before a sail can even be seen from Cape Town.

To the left a high conical hill called the Sugarloaf, flashes like an emerald in the sunlight. And there, nestling among the amphitheatre of hills, the white dwellings and green trees and gardens of Cape Town look smilingly out. Towards the west, or round the base of the Lion hill a succession of white villas, surrounded by beautiful gardens and darkly green vineyards, stretch out to Green Point, the southern extremity of Table Bay, where crowning a ridge of rocks stands a little lighthouse. In front of all roll the bright blue waters of the bay, where quietly at anchor our trusty vessel was now resting from her toils. And, according to the way of the world, those she had served so well, began to murmur at the narrow limits to which she had so long restricted them, and to be impatient to leave her for the land spread out so invitingly before them. In consequence one of the many shore boats sailing about in hopes of employment was summoned, and with infinite pleasure we watched the approach of the little cutter, her sharp bows cleaving the miniature waves as she came to bear us away to the shore.

The boat was floating alongside the ship, and her intending passengers were crowding eagerly to the gangway, when as sudden and almost as loud as the report of a cannon, a gust of wind blew over our heads, whistling menacingly through the cordage of the ship, and flapping deafeningly among her unstowed sails. Astonished at the sounds, we looked towards the land whence they came, but nothing was visible save a few specks of spotless vapour clinging here and there to the dark brow of the mountain. But those more experienced than ourselves read in those tiny cloudlets a timely warning to defer our landing, for it was the first indication of one of those frequent south-east gales that blow so furiously over that mountain plain—the first unfolding of the celebrated "devil's tablecloth" that ere many minutes we were to see spreading over the whole summit of the mountain, and curling itself in snowy wreaths far down its rugged sides; while beneath the same influence the placid waters of the bay were soon lashed into a wild tossing sea, which muttered and hissed beneath crests of surging foam as white as the cloud that shrouded the mountain.

A truly magnificent sight it was to watch those immense masses of spotless vapour, as, like crowding avalanches, they came rolling over the precipitous mountain, appearing to threaten with death and desolation the fair city below, while in vivid contrast against their intense whiteness was the brilliant blue of the cloudless southern sky. For hours the gale continued to rage around us as if the very spirit of the storm was abroad, beating furiously against our rigging, and shrieking wild threats of driving us from our anchors out into the wide ocean far to leeward, to beat back again as best we might.

At length the gale sank with the setting sun, leaving the evening calm and beautiful, and enabling us to accomplish our transit to the shore. At the Cape there is no twilight, so night fell at once, preventing us seeing aught of the South African city as we approached it; but through the clear Cape atmosphere the glorious constellations of the south shone down with wondrous brilliancy and size, and seemed reflected in the phosphoric gleam of the yet troubled sea. A whole bevy of coolies, with their glittering eyes and straight Malay features, awaited our landing, to two of whom we entrusted our carpet bags, and then walked on through a medley of boats and houses across the Grand Parade, until we finally found ourselves in one of the large hotels in the Keizergracht opposite, and the possessors of pleasant apartments overlooking the Parade, and, as we found in the morning, the bay also.

Only those who, like us, have been long at sea, can guess how pleasant was our first dinner on shore with its fresh fish, vegetables, and fruit, especially the last. In the sultry atmosphere of less than thirty-four degrees south of the equator, fruit is prized in a way unknown in our cooler climate; but it needed no extraneous circumstance to win admiration for the exquisite apricots and peaches, and the large blushing nectarines frosted with bloom; nor for the fresh green almonds and dark glowing figs, the delicious water melons glittering when cut like rosy ice; nor, above all, for the grapes, large dewy heaps of purple and golden fruit, with the delicious pine flavour that renders Cape grapes so celebrated.

Attempts have for some time past been making to gain for the Cape wines a share of public favour. Pontac, even as they sell it at the Cape, without lengthened keeping, is a very agreeable wine, and Cape sherry is not without merit, but Cape Madeira is decidedly very inferior; certainly it sells at a very low price, thirty to forty shillings being the usual sum for eighteen gallons. Of its red and white Constantia the Cape is exceedingly proud, but they are rich luscious wines, too sweet for my taste, and always remind me of the currant wine of our own farmhouses. The Cape brandy is also an extremely inferior product, and selling at a very low price is a great cause of the intoxication so prevalent among the coloured races. But it was with a more generous liquor than any of the preceding that we flavoured our fruit on the jubilee of our arrival; and if anything farther was needed to add to the interest of the occasion, it was given by the recollection of how different from the sultry atmosphere, the glowing fruits, and the fluttering leafiness that surrounded us, were the frost and snow which were enwrapping our native land; for it was the first month of the new year, and the midsummer Christmas of the south was but lately passed.

It needed but to glance around us to remember we were in a foreign land. There was nothing in the South African city to remind us of our own country, except the broad leaves of the oak trees with which many of its streets were shaded, and the scarlet uniforms of the soldiers who wandered beneath them. The Grand Parade was so near us, that thither we first bent our way; it is a considerable arena in the centre of the town, of course intended for the exercise of the troops, but also used for other purposes, for at one end is erected a handsome suite of commercial rooms, including an excellent library, reading room, &c. In the shade of the deep border of oaks which surrounds the Parade, is the fashionable promenade, and there the inhabitants are accustomed to wander, discussing the passing news and listening to the strains of the military bands which play there two or three evenings in the week.

On other evenings the public walks appear deserted, everyone seeming to prefer the at-homeness of sitting or walking on his own stoep, as the stone verandas in front of houses are called; for whether raised but a single step above the pavement or built to a considerable height, all those belonging to Dutch people were occupied by family parties, and it seemed strange to an Englishman accustomed to the strict seclusion which wraps, as in an impenetrable veil, the home life of his fair countrywomen, to see ladies—uncovered by bonnet or shawl—laughing and chatting as gaily as if in the retirement of their own homes, and appearing quite unconscious that they were subject to public observation.

Many were the fair faces that met my eye during my evening walk, and many the slender forms, for though the fair skin and flaxen tresses of the distant Netherlands still prevail among the maidens of unmixed Dutch descent, the quickness with which they shoot up to womanhood in their adopted country, has given to their forms the slenderness and fragility of reeds. On the Dutchmen themselves the climate does not appear to exercise the same influence, for they are generally tall and stout of person, and florid and jovial in aspect and manner. They are generally good "burghers," and excellent men of business, and he must indeed be Yorkshire bred and born who can overreach a Dutchman in a bargain. They are at the same time the best humoured and most manageable of husbands, allowing their wives to guide everything domestic, which they do with prudence and judgment; for no whit behind her Hollandish ancestress in thrift and industry is the Cape housewife.

Cape Town generally delights visitors by its aspect of extreme cleanliness, an appearance increased by the width of the principal streets, and by the large substantial flat roofed houses being always freshly coloured, either white, drab, or yellow, while the number of gardens relieve the dazzling glare, and the long avenues of trees cast a grateful shade on the pedestrian. But, for all that, Cape Town is intensely hot, some degrees hotter than the surrounding country. Facing the burning north, and lying in a nook among mountains, no breath of air visits it unless it blow a gale, and then the wind sends such clouds of sand whirling along the streets, getting into one's eyes, and striking like burning shot against one's face that one is able ever after to comprehend the miseries of the whirlwind of the desert. The Cape people close their doors and windows against its entrance, but in vain, for its finer particles penetrate everywhere.

In the rear of the town are the Government House and gardens, the latter open to the public as a promenade. The gardens are very extensive, and intersected with broad gravel walks and long shady avenues. I believe they contain many rare plants, but I saw them at an unfavourable season, the middle of summer, when vegetation is nearly withered up; winter there being, like our own spring, the season of leaves and flowers, and then the whole land is a wilderness of greenery and bloom. At the upper part of the gardens are the stone dens and cages of a menagerie, but when we saw them they were but scantily inhabited.

Among the floating population of the Cape are numbers of the East India Company's servants, both civil and military, come to recruit their shattered health in that delightful and salubrious climate. They declare that what most especially attracts their attention on landing is the rosy faces of the children, so different from the pale little blossoms of the burning east. But what most attracts the attention of strangers from England is the constant recurrence of brown or black faces. At first to their unaccustomed eyes all seem to be of the same race, with some variety of depth of colouring; but after a while a difference begins to show itself, and they gradually discover that they are surrounded by a number of distinct races, whose only resemblance consists in their dusky skins. The slender brown Africander, the descendant of slaves, with his straight features and flowing hair, differs greatly from the largely built jet black negro of Mozambique, or the burly Kruman of the West Coast. Occasionally a head raised above all others, and covered with little woolly knobs in lieu of hair, attracts attention to its gigantic Kafir owner, whose keen glittering eye brightens the night of his heavy countenance. Contrasting strongly with him are the light forms of the Hindoo servants of the eastern visitors, and the Chinese and Lascars so often seen in our own streets. A few members of other races are occasionally to be met in Cape Town, but the aboriginal Hottentot, I may say, never.

The Malay population alone are said to amount to upwards of five thousand. In consequence of a revolt in Malacca many fled to the Cape for safety, some of the Malay princes being among the fugitives. The spot where they had sought temporary shelter self-interest converted into a permanent home, for they soon found Cape Town afforded full scope for their industry, and for gaining the wealth which they grasp with true Israelitish covetousness. It is this love of gain which alone induces them to stoop their haughty natures so far as to enter service, where they are to be found in many capacities, for in addition to a Malay coachman—valued on account of the sobriety his religion enjoins—nearly every family of pretension employs a Malay cook, and probably one or two others as housemaids. The Malays are the principal fishermen, and sellers of fruit and cakes; they are the laundresses, also, and both men and women are to be seen in their open sheds busily employed in ironing. Many are said to have acquired considerable wealth: we remember an old man living in a mean hut and apparently making his living by selling cakes and tarts, who was known to be the possessor of £400 per annum.

Though so long resident at the Cape, the Malays have not amalgamated with those around them, but remain a distinct people, with dress, manners, and religion of their own. They profess the Mahomedan faith, in which they are said to be bigoted, and possess five or six mosques. All the bullocks in Cape Town fall by the hands of the Malay priests, who slay them with certain ceremonies; the reason of this being that the Malays will use no meat except what is killed by their own priests, while the other members of the community are indifferent on the matter.

A Malay will not under any circumstances consent to lay aside his national costume, which has neither elegance nor picturesqueness to recommend it; and on the box of the governor's carriage I have seen a Malay sport his drab trousers, and loose drab jacket, while over the red Madras handkerchief which bound his smooth black hair, was a conical cane hat, in shape resembling a pagoda. The women's dress is also ungraceful, for their long full shirts are tied, not round the waist, but close up under the arms, and over a bodice of another colour; however, their long hair of a brilliant black is never covered, but all drawn to the back of the head, and fastened round a silver ornament. But through all their disfigurement of attire the eye is struck by the extreme beauty of the Malay race. The lofty brow, the delicate nose, and the well formed mouth and teeth, are well nigh universal, as are the large brilliant eyes of the deepest black.

The hotel where we resided belonged to Dutch proprietors, good kindly sort of people, with whom we made great friends, and we were often amused by listening to the gentle languid tones in which our landlady lisped forth in her broken English the praises of her own colony, and all pertaining to it. Our landlord was equally amusing, though in a different style, for his English was correct in construction, though rough and broken in pronunciation, while the great object of his eulogy was his fatherland, and his inheriting an unmixed descent from which he could not sufficiently value himself.

One day we came home to find the usually calm household in a state of the utmost excitement. Mynheer, himself, was in a rage, and the vrow, his wife, in tears, while their stalwart son was walking to and fro in violent indignation. The cause was at once disclosed—Mynheer Adrian, the son, had split on his father's favourite rock and wished to marry a bride one of whose unfortunate ancestors another man had called his chattel.

"But that was his misfortune, not his fault," I remarked.

"Very likely," replied the old man, somewhat illogically, "but it is a great fault in his descendant. Carolina may be rich, and young, and beautiful, and what you like, but it does not alter the fact that her great grandfather was a slave, and her grandmother slave born. You can see our pure blood in our dazzling skins and our clear eyes, very different from an ugly puddle of Africanders and Mozambiques."

"But Carolina's hair is as fair, and her eyes as blue as ours," interrupted the son.

"Very true," replied the mother, "but, pah! her skin, see how muddy that is."

But there the good lady's prejudices blinded her, for I had often seen the Carolina in question visiting her daughters, and a sweeter or prettier girl it was impossible to see. In vain I tried to reason and then rally the usually good-natured old people out of their objections, they were resolute in believing that such a marriage would bring indelible disgrace upon their house.

On mentioning the foregoing subject to some of my friends, residents at the Cape, I was surprised to learn that my host and hostess's sentiments were precisely those of the mass of their countrymen, with whom the pride of an unblemished descent transcends all others. They also assured me, and I have since witnessed the same myself, that families have frequently been shut out from the society in which they have hitherto moved, in consequence of one of their members marrying one in whose veins flowed ever so small a portion of the despised slave blood; and the fact that (thanks to the British government) all have for many years been free alike, does not tend in the least to soften their violent and cruel prejudice.

But Mynheer, my host, as long as he was true to himself—which he appeared likely to be—had no cause for fear; for in that happy land for inexorable fathers elopements are unknown, and so are secret marriages. At the Cape, though a British colony, Dutch law prevails—and that says a man must either be married by banns, or else produce to the officiating clergyman the certificate of the matrimonial court, which inquires very closely into the matter of consent.

On many points the Dutch laws—which equally affect English residents—meddle much more closely in domestic affairs than our own, but the interference is generally dictated by a spirit of far seeing prudence, and a desire to protect the interests of those unable to protect their own, though sometimes they exhibit the keen worldly wisdom of a nation of traders. Under the first category may be ranked the law which forbids man or woman contracting a second marriage until they have settled half their property, minus one child's portion, on the children of the first marriage; but decidedly we must attribute to the second the enactment that the second husband of a widow shall discharge the debts of her first husband, and many are the peaceful households to which this law has brought distress, and ruin, and bitter hatred.

Perhaps one of the most painful instances of the evil which may result from some of the Cape laws we saw exemplified in the person of an English lady to whom we were introduced. She had married an English gentleman in England, with whom she emigrated to the Cape. Her husband's temper was very violent, which led to many painful scenes between them, and in the end his unkindness drove her from him. For a time she made her living as a governess, but subsequently learning she was entitled to property in England, she went home to claim it. Scarcely were the sails of the ship in which she went below the horizon, than her husband summoned her to appear before the supreme court to answer why she absented herself from his home without his consent. The appointed time was too short for the poor lady to be even aware of the proceedings against her (whether any one appeared to explain the case I know not, if they did their explanation was not deemed satisfactory) and in her absence a divorce was pronounced against her. A few months after she returned, disappointed of the property she went to seek, to find herself without a name or a home, and her husband the husband of another; for immediately on the divorce he had married a Dutch lady of respectable family, who had done no violence to her own feelings, nor suffered loss of caste among her own nation, by marrying one whom their own laws had declared free.

It appeared somewhat strange to us, that notwithstanding the number of daring young military and naval men to be met at the Cape, we never encountered one who had even attempted the ascent of the Table mountain, on which morning after morning we looked longingly, though the weak state of our health (the hope of benefiting which had partly induced us to undertake the trip), forbade the possibility of our scaling its rugged heights. But great as the labour must undoubtedly be, we do not think it is the fatigue deters adventurers, so much as the fear of being suddenly surrounded (as many unfortunates have been) by that mysterious cloud, and blown off the mountain by its accompanying gale, or walking blindly over the edge, as has been the fate of others—and in either case perishing miserably.

But though the ascent was denied us, we resolved to mount sufficiently high to enjoy the panoramic view of the surrounding country which the shoulder of the mountain affords. Wave after wave of grassy swells we mounted, each greener and larger than the last, then through a few rugged ravines, until at length we stood under the refreshing shade of the fluttering silver trees. Despite the scorching heat of summer, it was a beautiful and fertile scene, which the wide frame of surrounding hills shut in—far spreading vineyards, with their affluence of leaves softening the light of the pale meadows of ripening hay beside them, and teeming orchards glowing in the sunlight, and gardens filled with luxuriant fig trees and flashing laurels. Here and there were villages half hidden among oak plantations, and pleasant villas and quaint old many gabled Dutch houses, dotting the spaces between; and winding slowly along, like a silvery serpent, were the shallow waters of the Salt River.

Our stay in the Cape district being on this occasion limited, we resolved to see as much of it as the time permitted, so in a few days we took our departure for the village of Wynburg, that favourite locality of wealthy Anglo-Indians, whose shadowy gardens are fluttering with the white robes of Hindoo servants, and whose unpretending looking houses are said within to rival the splendours of the Arabian Nights. Our way lay over a well made road, shaded by noble trees, and bordered by gardens and vineyards, and rose and jasmine covered villas, and old gabled houses, each standing apart within its hedge of tamarisk, or of prickly pear—that most grotesque of shrubs—with its huge massive leaves fringed round with tufts of crimson blossoms.

From Wynburg we next proceeded to Simon's Town, some ten miles further from Cape Town. For the first three miles we rode on through a continuance of the same pleasant shady avenue which had brought us thus far; but then the scene suddenly changed to a dreary barren region of naked sand hills and wild sandy flats, thinly clothed in patches with tiny ice-plants, which glittered brightly in the sunshine. Mile after mile we toiled through the arid waste, well nigh scorched and blinded by the burning sunbeams and the fierce glare of the yellow sands, and right glad were we at length to issue from them on to the shores of the vast sea-lake, entitled False Bay. Another mile along the sands, and we opened on Simon's Bay, closely shut in within its girdle of hills, most conspicuous among which are the Red Hill, famous for its rare botanical treasures, and the lofty and imposing Simon's Berg, whose brow is commonly garlanded with lily white clouds, even though there may not be one in the sky, while every breath of wind from among the hills is perfumed by the fragrant heaths which grow so thickly among them.

Had we not known it before, the number of merry, frolicsome young midshipmen scampering among the sand hills, on every description of horse, and in every variety of drag, would have apprized us that we were approaching the naval station, and now, turning the angle of the landlocked bay, we came upon a stately twodecker, with her glossy sides pierced for fourscore guns, and her lofty spars tapering into the cloudless sky, with a tiny speck of crimson bunting fluttering at the mizen in token of a rear admiral's command. Grouped around her float the smaller ships of the squadron which happen to be in port; for the Cape is the head quarters of the pestilential West Coast station, where so many brave lives are annually expended in the endeavour to suppress the slave trade.

At the entrance of the town, in the midst of an extensive garden, stands the Admiralty House, with its vine-covered colonnade; beyond is one of the prettiest and trimmest of little naval yards; and round it and the whole bay, like a crescent, sweeps the principal street of the little town, stretching almost to the battery on the southern point, where a flag is always hoisted to give notice of approaching vessels. Above the town, perched on every little ledge of the surrounding hills, are innumerable white or yellow houses, half hidden among their bowery gardens.

The first impression of the traveller is that Simon's Town has nothing but its blue bay and bluer sky, and the outline of its hills, to recommend it, for despite its gardens, its general appearance is arid in the extreme; but when night falls, and the moon rises, the magical change we sometimes see in a dissolving view takes place in the landscape, and it becomes one of the most charming and fairylike scenes imaginable. A soft dreamy beauty seems to rest on sea and shore, on hill and white walled dwelling, as if all things were seen through a silver haze. This appearance is said to be occasioned by the glittering particles of the sand reflecting the brilliant rays of the moon, as they come flashing down through the transparent atmosphere.

It is not in this sequestered little nook of the British dominions that one would expect to find a relic of one of her greatest heroes. Yet there, at the time of our visit, occupying the ignoble post of sheer hulk, was the little vessel that in her palmy days was the Badger man-of-war, whose deck Nelson first trod as captain. In after days she was also the first command of the gallant Collingwood. Surely a better fate might have been found for even the decaying timbers of a vessel which calls to mind two such names.

On the opposite side of False Bay is a district entitled Hottentot's Holland. Towards the sea and bay it is bounded by a chain of mountains so high that during winter the snow lies thick upon their peaks. On a subsequent visit to Simon's Town, we ourselves saw it there flashing brightly in the African sunshine; and it is almost incredible how severely the chill breeze blowing over their frozen surface was felt by those who during winter usually enjoy a temperature similar to the most genial of our Mays.

The adage that "time and tide wait for no man," was verified in my case, for ere I had half satisfied my interest respecting Cape Town and its beautiful environs, imperative business and a ready coaster summoned me to the eastern province, and it was on a subsequent visit that I learned many items of information related in the foregoing pages.

REVIEWS OF NEW BOOKS.

Narrative of a Walking Tour in Brittany. By the Rev. J. M. JEPHSON, F.S.A., accompanied by Notes of a Photographic Expedition, by LOVELL REEVE, F.L.S. London: Lovell Reeve.

The travellers of modern date bid fair soon to leave no spot unvisited, for in all climes and lands we have adventurous spirits who wander forth for a holiday, and returning home, give us their impressions of what they have seen and heard. Fifty years hence it will be a difficult task for an individual to select a locality, however remote, that has not been explored, and as a sure consequence, in those times, we shall be as well acquainted with the traveller's route and sights, from the numbers of visitors who will have left the story of their pilgrimage behind, as if we had visited the scenes for ourselves. But it is not the remembrances of the majority of the wanderers that will live, for travellers of the modern school are not unfrequently prosy and commonplace, cooking up a dish from John Murray's handbooks, and extracting information from the gossiping corner of the nearest local newspaper. Hence the diary making gentry and their productions will be consigned to oblivion, while such a good-humoured and thoroughly appreciative book as the Narrative of a Walking Tour in Brittany, will long command respect, and afford instruction and amusement. If we retrace our steps some twenty or twenty-five years, Brittany was almost as unknown to the English tourist as the wilds of Australia, and very few of our countrymen dreamed that, within a few hours' distance from Southampton there was a race of people even more picturesque and primitive than our own Highlanders to be found across the water in la belle France. In the province of Brittany there are more of the remains of the mediæval French character than in any other part. In the country districts the revolution, the monarchy, and the empires, both of Napoleon I. and III., appear to have left little or no trace of events, and Mr. Jephson chose well when he selected this district for a summer's trip of enjoyment, and how capable he was of enjoying it the sequel will shew.

Our author gives some excellent reasons for choosing a holiday. He was, as a country clergyman living in the flat county of Essex, amongst marshes, fogs, and the proverbial caldness of that district, getting both out of health and spirits, and as he tells us, "little things and little people were assuming an alarming importance in his mind."

"The nature of my occupations did not supply an adequate counterpoise to these depressing influences. To listen to the monotonous whine and snuffle of the children in the national school as they read the sublime words of inspiration, or repeat that excellent moral poem of Dr. Watts about the "little busy bee;" to be all attention while an old woman recounts the history of each particular pain and ache which racks her limbs; to endeavour Sunday after Sunday, to adapt the principles of Christianity to the dull and unpractised understandings of a peasantry to whom any but the merest colloquial English is an unknown tongue; and to sit by and keep the peace at vestry meetings while rival farmers wrangle over rates and road making—these are not enlivening, though they are useful and salutary occupations.

"It happened that, last spring, I took up a volume of Montaigne's Essays, by way of driving my mind into another channel of thought. The first passage I alighted upon was the following:—'C'est pitié d'estre en lieu où tout ce que vous voyez vous embesogne et vous concerne; et me semble jouir plus gayement les plaisirs d'une maison estrangiere, et y apporter le gout plus libre et pur. Diogène respondit, selon moy, à celui qui luy demanda quelle sorte de vin il trouvoit le meilleur; 'L'estrangier,' dit-il. 'That is what I want,' I exclaimed.'

And he then determined to change his air and locality for a time to some place where he would have no home associations break in upon his holiday to remind him of anything English, except it came to him with a tinge of fourteenth century romance; and he likewise, in casting about for this desideratum, looked for a part where his superfluous cash would not melt so easily as in many other places equally within the same distance. So he chose a five weeks' walk in Brittany, and communicating his idea to Mr. Lovell Reeve, that gentleman suggested the desirability of illustrating the journey by photographs, and started, independently of Mr. Jephson, to cover pretty nearly the same ground, taking stereoscopic views of almost every object of interest on his way. Mr. Reeve succeeded in obtaining about two hundred of these views, ninety of which were issued simultaneously with the Narrative of a Walking Tour in Brittany, and comprise subjects from the picturesque Breton towns, from St. Malo round by Lannion, and thence from Quimper to Rennes. These views vividly and forcibly bring before the eye the quaint Breton architecture, its pagan dolmens and Christian calveries, churches, chateaux, and illustrations of life in Brittany, and they are every way worthy to rank with Mr. Jephson's descriptions, while Mr. Jephson's descriptions are equally worthy of Mr. Reeve's illustrations.

Accompanying our author, we wish, for their intrinsic beauty, we could present our readers with some of the illustrator's handy-work, but, as we cannot, we must take leave of Mr. Reeve, and follow our author, Mr. Jephson, who writes sensibly and forcibly on the advantages of a walking instead of a riding tour; but there is one inconvenience which continually peeps out in Mr. Jephson's work, and that is, the annoyance he was perpetually subjected to as a pedestrian, for in that character he was peculiarly under the surveillance of that paternal system of government which constantly calls forth Mr. Jephson's indignation and sarcasm. An English pedestrian is a perfectly unintelligible puzzle to its agents, and a constant source of provoking bilious attacks to its sensitive administrators; and to the Englishman who determines to rough it, the livery of a gendarme becomes, at least, as unpleasant a sight as a constable in our own country is to a professional mendicant. At our author's entrance into the first town in Brittany he was, to his surprise, and in spite of a passport regularly visé, and by him thought irreproachable, suddenly pounced upon and compelled to satisfy the thirst for knowledge of an inquisitive gentleman in a cocked hat, as he tells us in the following extract:—

"Having breakfasted at seven on a basin of café au lait, I buckled on my knapsack and set forward, intending to take another look at the principal parts of the town, which I had visited the evening before. But passing through the Grand Place, I was stopped by a cocked hatted gendarme, who demanded my passport. Now, it happened that when asked at St. Malo whither I was going, I said 'to Vannes,' because I intended Vannes to be the limit of my tour, after which I should return. The passport was, therefore, visé for Vannes. But now my gendarme took it into his head that having said that I was going to Vannes, it was the duty of the paternal democracy to see that I took the shortest possible road to Vannes. I was, therefore, marched through the streets, followed by a crowd of naughty little boys, to the police-office, where I was ushered into the presence of the commissaire de police, a grim functionary, whose countenance was suggestive of dungeons and thumb-screws. After eyeing me from head to foot, torro vultu, the awful official asked, in a voice which was intended to send my heart into the soles of my shoes, and force the latent conspiracy against the Emperor out of my finger's ends, 'Qui êtes-vous?' This was a staggering question. I could hardly suppose that he meant to ask my name, because he had it before him in the passport. I therefore concluded that he took me for some person of great political consequence, Mazzini or Lord Palmerston, perhaps, and anxious, in my modesty, to undeceive him, I replied, 'Mon Dieu, monsieur, je ne suis personne.'—'I am nobody.' As I uttered this reply, its resemblance to that which a predecessor in vagabondism had returned to an equally ferocious questioner struck me, and the resemblance of the redoubtable commissaire to the shaggy-browed Cyclops made me laugh. This still further excited his wrath, and he proceeded, with more awe inspiring severity than ever, to cross examine me as to the details of my birth, occupation, abode, object in coming to France, &c. When I told him that I was not come to see the Emperor, whom I was, in fact, rather anxious to avoid, and that my only object was to walk through Brittany for my amusement, he evidently discredited my story altogether. His final decision was that, having arrived at St. Briene, I might stay there, but that the paternal government would not permit me to leave that interesting town, not even to go to Vannes."

In consequence, our traveller had the mortification of being tramped about the town, from one police office to another, for three mortal hours, before he could allay the uneasiness of the perplexed gendarme, and on this and other occasions his treatment left a somewhat bitter tinge in Mr. Jephson's mind against the "paternal government." But with the country, peasantry, priests, fellow travellers, landladies of the various inns, he formed very pleasant impressions. He liked the farming, buckwheat pancakes, the legends, gaiety of the peasantry, the wild and wayward melodies they sang, and the popular and innocent amusements of the people. There are numerous little pen and ink pictures, which, for neatness of execution, deserve to go hand in hand with Mr. Reeves's illustrations; such a one we here present to our readers:—

"The village of Carnac is a small place, but the little inn, dignified by the name of the 'Hôtel du Commerce,' is clean, and the fare good. I felt rather tired and not very well, and seeing that the hostess was a nice motherly looking woman, I called her into my counsels as to what I should have for supper. She immediately suggested a soupe au lait, the very thing for a weary traveller who feels faint and yet cannot eat; and I found that, as the French say, 'l'appétit vient en mangeant.' I mention this as a hint which may be useful to travellers. But the widow Gildas—for such, as I afterwards learnt, was my hostess's name—thought that a little conversation might also be of use to me, and after setting down the dessert, began to let me into some of her personal history, partly, no doubt, in expectation that her confidence would produce a similar disclosure on my part. She was tall and well favoured, with a precise mouth, out of which issued a sweet voice, tuned to a key of gentle and pious resignation. The description of the Prioress in the Canterbury Tales might have been written for her. She 'of hire smiling was ful, simple, and coy; hire mouth was smal, and thereto softe and reed'; she was also 'ful, pleasant, and amiable of port, and peynel hire to counterfete chere of court, and ben estatliche of manere.' Throughout the house there reigned an air of piety. The chimney ornaments were little altars; beside the bed was a prie-dieu; and the pictures on the walls were saints, with extracts from pious chansons underneath. All this was explained when Madame Gildas told me, on my saying that I had just visited the Chartreuse, that her father had been, among the unfortunate Royalists shot on the Champ des Martyrs, and that her grandmother was one of the most zealous of those who, in the first Revolution, had harboured the persecuted clergy, and arranged the midnight meetings on the ocean, when the people, like the early Christians in the catacombs, worshipped God with death and torture staring them in the face

"I remarked to my hostess on the becomingness of her costume; upon which, looking down and heaving a gentle sigh, she informed me that she was in the first year of her widowhood, and that the dress which I admired was the deepest mourning she could wear. She then proceeded to tell me that the people of Plouharnel, though living so near, were quite different in character and habits from those of Carnac. The Plouharnettes were unsociable, disobliging, and rude; the inhabitants of Carnac, on the contrary, were fond of society, good-natured, and polite. The picture was drawn by one who could hardly be supposed disinterested; but it agreed with my experience. After giving me so much information, the widow Gildas thought that it was my turn to be communicative, and insinuated a wish to know what brought me to Carnac. I told her that I was walking through Brittany out of mere curiosity; upon which she made out the whole history in a succinct form, without further assistance from me. 'Ces messieurs,' meaning the photographers, who had preceded me by two days, 'ces messieurs font des photographes, et monsieur va à pied, n'est ce pas? Oui, oui! Et monsieur, sans doute, fera un petit ouvrage. Oui, oui!' Then, putting on her best smile, 'Et monsieur aura-t-il la bonté de faire mention de l'Hotel du Commerce?' I assured her I would; a promise which I thus fulfil."

We have all heard, read, or experienced the misery of travelling with unamiable companions, and Mr. Jephson treats us to a specimen of this class, and draws the picture so capitally that few will be found who cannot say, "I met one of the same at——." He tells us:—

"Opposite to me were a married couple and their boy. French people never have more than one boy or girl. I had observed the entrance of the party. The gentleman marched in front, with his eyebrows elevated, and his nose following his eyebrows; and having hung his hat upon a peg with a defiant look, he scanned the table with an air of disgust, as if he could not find any place good enough for him to sit down at. At length, having selected chairs to his mind for himself, his wife, and little boy, he sat down, helped himself and partners with apparent loathing, and in the intervals of eating, darted looks of hatred and suspicion at the rest of the company, particularly at any wight whose eyes might wander towards the region where sat his fair one. She meanwhile displayed her ring bedizened hands, which she evidently thought handsome, and seemed not at all displeased to attract attention. He occasionally addressed her and the boy in gruff and monosyllabic words. I was determined to try what would be the effect of bearding the lion in his den, and as an experiment asked him some trivial question; upon which his eyebrows nearly touched the roots of his hair, and he replied, after a moment's pause, and in a most magnificent tone, 'Monsieur, je ne sais pas!'"

In juxtaposition, when you meet a gentleman on his travels, and that man a Frenchman, nothing can be more agreeable, as the following sketch shows, and Mr. Jephson naturally describes his twinge of remorse, which every Englishman feels, for not entering into the spirit of fraternization with as much hearty good will as your foreigner does. The close of the following extract is to the purpose:—

"Throughout my tour I was generally fortunate in my companions of travel. If I could not laugh with them, I could laugh at them. On this occasion my fellow traveller was a most agreeable and intelligent Breton gentleman. I learned, partly from his conversation and partly from the host at Auray, that having begun life with a moderate competence, he had become a timber merchant, and was now one of the richest men in the province. He certainly deserved to succeed, for I never saw a man so anxious to please. Every one seemed to know him, and he took off his hat as respectfully to the peasant returning from work as to the gentlemen who passed us in their gigs. He was as polite to Monsieur Floriant, the conducteur, as if M. F. had been his equal. His fine intelligent face and flowing beard had prepossessed me in his favour, and his conversation confirmed my good opinion. He knew many Englishmen, and was about to send his two sons to school in England; I recommended Eton, but he reminded me that Bretons were Catholics, and that he must therefore look out for some Catholic school. This brought out from M. Floriant, the conducteur, a story of a couple of English schoolboys who had travelled with him two or three days before. They were asking him the French for different things on the road. Presently a flock of geese appeared, and they wanted to know their French name. M. Floriant told them that geese were called des Anglais; for, he said to me, you know they hiss and gabble like people talking English. The boys said nothing; but on seeing a pig by the roadside, they asked M. Floriant how that was called. He replied, 'un cochon.' 'Ah,' said one of the boys, 'in England we call those animals conducteurs.' To do M. Floriant justice, he enjoyed the retort quite as much as the boys, though it was made at his own expense.

The afternoon was lovely, and the country through which we passed rich beyond measure; but the recollection of that drive from Hennebont to Auray always fills me with remorse. My agreeable companion was a great connoisseur in fruit, and particularly curious in peaches. Somewhere near Landevant he had a house and gardens; and when the coach stopped to change horses, his servant came up with two remarkably fine peaches in a basket, the only ones which were yet ripe. One of these he gave to M. Floriant, the conducteur, and presented me with the other, which was by far the finest. I protested against leaving him without any, but he would hear of no excuse. At last I took it, but never recollected that there was a via media, as Dr. Hook says, between eating the whole and refusing the whole: for I might very well have divided it, and insisted on his taking half. Ever since I have been mortified beyond measure when I think how selfish I must have appeared. This is the sort of thing in which an Englishman fails. He is continually guilty of acts which make people set him down as selfish and brutal when in reality he is only awkward and reserved. But my Breton friend seemed to take it all as a matter of course that the conducteur and I should eat his peaches and leave him without any; and when we got down at the Hotel du Pavillon d'en Haut, at Auray, he left some friends to whom he was talking, to follow me into the hotel and shake me by the hand."

In taking leave of Mr. Jephson, and his Narrative of a Walking Tour in Brittany, we are constrained to add that the book has such an air of downright honest good humour, pleasant scenes, and graphic description, that we naturally warm into sympathy with one of so genial a disposition; and if the rather copious extracts we have given should sufficiently interest our readers to peruse the work itself, we are sure they will coincide with us in our estimate of its contents, and let us add, as a parting advice, that if it is possible to enhance the pleasure of a story well told, no one will be content without coupling with Mr. Jephson's work Mr. Lovell Reeves's photographs.

The War in Italy; with a Preliminary History of the Vicissitudes and Policy of Napoleon III. By E. H. NOLAN, Ph. D., &c. (Part I). London: John Wesley and Co., 54, Paternoster Row.

Our brother, Dr. Nolan, who has long been favourably known in the literary world by several works of importance, and especially of late by his valuable "History of the British Empire in India," has extended his labours in the field of history to a subject replete with interest, and which, he plainly shows us in the introductory chapter of the work before us, demands the serious consideration of every patriotic Englishman. It seems perhaps somewhat early to commence the relation of those hostilities which have so recently been terminated, or at least suspended for a time, by the treaty of Villa Franca, but the materials at the command of the chronicler of the present day are so ample, and to a certain extent so trustworthy, that the same lapse of time which was found necessary to sift out the actual facts of former great campaigns, seems not so imperatively required in the present instance. With regard to the other part of the subject—the previous career and probable policy of the remarkable individual whose will now constitutes the sole law of the great French nation—we can hardly imagine a theme more pregnant with instruction; and if handled in the same able manner as the matter of Bro. Nolan's former works, we may expect a treatise of no ordinary value. The past fifty years of Napoleon III. contain incidents and vicissitudes enough to stock half a dozen romances; and the success which has crowned his ambition hitherto may well cause us to think of possible contingences in the future.

The author's introductory chapter touches upon many important topics. He refers to the importance of a continental war to this country, and to the great excitement that the recent embroilment gave rise to throughout the whole of Europe. He points to the perils of the suspected alliance between France and Russia, which has had its effect already in alarming confederated Germany, and which if it prove true, is fraught with momentous consequences to England. The question as to the future of Italy (which the recent Parliamentary debates show to be, in all thinking men's minds, as unsatisfactory as ever,) will no doubt receive a just and discriminating examination from our historian, who points out some of the points most necessary for adjustment, and has some eloquent remarks upon the sympathy which ought to be—and is felt for that ill fated and beautiful country. Of the influence exercised by Louis Napoleon upon the freedom and progress of mankind, Bro. Nolan well observes:—

"Napoleon Buonaparte is undoubtedly the author and occasion of this war. When, as President of the French Republic, he attacked the new-born freedom of Rome, to re-establish the throne of the pontiff, he laid the train which his own hand per fas aut nefas now ignites. What shall be the future of this adventurous politician? Is he destined to shoot, like a fiery meteor, over at least this hemisphere, and then perish, his policy sinking into 'the blackness of darkness for ever?' Is he to be a new apostle of nationalities, at the same time propagating novel forms, both of freedom and despotism, as the comet, which, forming separate nuclei, ceases to be, yet propagates and multiplies itself, giving rise to new wonders?"

It is hardly fair to pass criticism upon a work of which so small a portion has been given to the public; but we have satisfaction in saying, that as far as it has advanced, it has greatly pleased us. The commencing sketch of the career and character of the first Napoleon is drawn with a firm and truthful hand, and his heartless ambition, with its wonderful results, are well depicted. It is the object of the author to show that the policy of Napoleon I. is necessarily the same which the Second, (or, as he chooses to call himself, the Third) Napoleon must follow; and believing that to be the case, he calls upon his countrymen to take timely warning. Some trifling blemishes we notice, probably owing to haste in preparation of the first numbers of the publication; without wishing to be hypercritical, we would remark for instance, that the title "Napoleon of Peace" was not assumed or invented by the present autocrat, but was conferred upon Louis Philippe by some of the adulators of the "Citizen King."

OUR ARCHITECTURAL CHAPTER.

As we anticipated would be the case, the designs of Mr. Scott for the new government offices have been rejected, the premier declaring that if constructed as proposed, they would not only be altogether unfitted for the purposes to which they were to be devoted, but unnecessarily expensive. As Mr. Scott however was appointed by the late government to carry out the works, he is to retain the appointment, having received instructions to prepare a new design, adapting himself more to the Italian than to the Gothic style, and to provide large, light, airy apartments for the transaction of business. Mr. Scott accepts the commission, and in the meantime the House of Commons has granted the money for having the foundations prepared, in order that as little time may be lost as possible. The designs are to be submitted to the House of Commons as early after the reassembling of parliament as possible. The Times recommends Mr. Scott to adhere to his own designs, or to decline the commission; but this is a sacrifice that he can hardly be expected to make.

Lord John Russell, on Monday, laid the foundation of a new training school at Stockwell, which is to be open to all denominations of Christians, without regard to sect. The new building will be designated the British and Foreign School Society's Training College for Mistresses. Provision has been made in the plans for the residence and instruction of one hundred young women, apartments for a female superintendent, and the necessary teaching staff, with practising schools for girls and infants. The contract for the completion of the work is £15,572; but this is exclusive of the land and a portion of the internal fittings and furniture, for which at least £2,000 must be added, making a total outlay of £17,572. Towards this it is understood that £6,000 will be granted by the Committee of Council on Education. The preliminary list of contributions amounts to nearly £4,000. The further sum of nearly £8,000 will therefore have to be raised by subscription.

In connexion with this provision for the training of one hundred female teachers, it is proposed to adapt the whole of the present building in the Borough Road for the reception of one hundred male students.

A new Guildhall, for which designs have been invited, is about to be constructed at Cambridge. The amount to be laid out in the first instance does not exceed £6,000, but the whole plan, for which the designs are to be sent in, it is estimated will involve an expenditure of £40,000; but the works can only be gradually proceeded with as certain leases fall in. The premiums offered are £200 for the best design, and £100 for the second. The committee of selection will be composed partly of members of the University and partly of inhabitants of the town, who pledge themselves also to seek the advice of professional architects not being competitors.

We learn from the Building News that a very successful example of iron architecture is being carried out by Messrs. Grissell and Co., from the designs of Mr. Robert Stephenson. The building—a kiosk, which is to be fitted up with the utmost luxury—may be described as a large cross, having its internal angles filled by quadrants of circles, and its central junction crowned by a large conjoined double dome or cupola, the lower one being forty feet in diameter, and its height to the summit (which is terminated by the crescent, emblematic of the Moslem faith) about eighty feet. There will also be a minor dome over each of the quadrantal portions of the plan to which we have adverted, which, in combination with the great central one will, as may well be conceived, give the terminating lines of the edifice a most picturesque effect as to outline "against the sky." The edifice itself, exclusive of an outer iron railing, will be comprehended within a square of one hundred and six feet six inches, and the boundary railing will extend to a square of one hundred and twenty feet. It will rest upon twenty-eight central columns, and thirty-two half-ones, the latter being external.

The strike, or more correctly speaking in the majority of cases, the "lock out" of the builders, still continues, though several attempts are being made to bring about an arrangement by arbitration, Mr. Marsh Nelson, Mr. Jackson, and other gentlemen well known both to the employers and the men having offered their services as mediators. One thing is admitted on all hands—that the declaration adopted by the masters for the operatives to sign was most ill advised, and must be withdrawn before any large body of men will re-enter the workshops. It is to be hoped that mutual concessions will soon bring the dispute to a close satisfactory to both parties.

MASONIC NOTES AND QUERIES.

ANCIENT VIEWS OF FREEMASONRY.—II.

[The first paper on this subject was given in a separate form, but on consideration we think the more appropriate place is amongst our "Masonic Notes."—Ed.]

Continuing in the order of time, I find the following entries in the Gentleman's Magazine.

"Wednesday, April 19, 1782.—At Merchant Taylors' Hall, in Threadneedle-street, was held the annual grand feast of Free and Accepted Masons, when the Lord Viscount Montague was chosen Grand Master, who appointed Thomas Batson, Esq., his Deputy; George Rooke, and James Smyth, Esqrs., his Grand Wardens, for the year ensuing. There were present a great number of persons of quality, about four hundred brethren."

"Epilogue for the Freemasons, spoken by Mrs. Younger, at the theatre in Lincoln's Inn Fields, April 27th:—

"Well, ladies, of the art of Masonry,
Altho' I neither am nor can be free,
Some of their signs, perhaps I may have seen;
And well I know what 'tis they sometimes mean,
And, therefore, I their advocate appear,
To tell you—what you will be glad to hear.
What monstrous, horrid lies, do some folks tell us!
Why Masons, ladies, are quite clever fellows;
They are lovers of our sex, as I can witness,
Nor ere act contrary to moral fitness.
If any of you doubt it—try the Masons,
They'll not deceive your largest expectations;
They're able workmen, and completely skill'd in
The deepest arts and mysteries of building;
They'll build up families, and as most fit is,
Not only will erect but people cities:
They'll fill as well as fabricate your houses,
And found a lasting race of strong built spouses.
What's more, you'll find whenever you befriend 'em,
They've faith and secrecy to recommend 'em.
If such their parts, such, ladies, their merit,
So great their skill and strength, their life and spirit,
What female heart can be so very hard
As to refuse them their deserved reward?
Once on a time, I've heard old stories say,
Two Mason gods to Troy town took their way.
Arrived and hired to work—to work they fell;
Hard was their task, but executed well:
With more than human art these heavenly powers
Raised such prodigious walls, such swinging towers,
As still defy'd all Greece's open force,
Nor fell but to let in their wooden horse.
Gratis they did it, whatso'er was done,
Refused their pay by king Laomedon;
They talk of Mason kings, but surely he was none.
Well was the Craft revenged for this disgrace;
In Dryden's Virgil I can show the place,
That tells us how this god-built tower was fir'd,
And in the Masons' quarrel Troy expir'd.
Ladies, this story is well worth your learning;
O, hideous! aren't you all afraid of burning?"

Let it this truth in every breast inspire,
That every workman 's worthy of his hire :
And sure such virtue in the present age is,
None will defraud the brethren of their wages.
Then treat the Craft, ye fair! with kind regard ;
And give them in your smiles their best reward ;
Give 'em—to boast where'er their art extends,
That they and beauty, from this hour, are friends."

"Tuesday, Sept. 5th, 1732.—At a Lodge of Freemasons, held at the Royal Vineyard, in St. James's Park, were admitted a clergyman of the Church of England, two dissenting ministers, and two officers of dragoons.

The next extract for the same year records a Sunday Lodge. "Sept. 17, Sunday.—At the Rose Tavern, Chcapside, was held a Lodge of Free and Accepted Masons, when Mr. Edmund Rose, of the said tavern, was admitted of the fraternity, by Mr. Daniel Delvalle, an eminent Jew snuff merchant, Master, in the presence of several brethren of distinction, both Jews and Christians, for whom was a handsome entertainment.

DR. MILLER OF DONCASTER, AND DR. HERSCHELL.

In the reply to your correspondent, "No Yorkshireman," last week, you refer to Dr. Miller as being the author of a work entitled The History and Antiquities of Doncaster and its Vicinity. It will perhaps be interesting to some of your readers to peruse the following extract from a note at page 162 of the said history; from which it will be seen that our brother, the organist and historian of Doncaster, was the means of bringing into notice one of the greatest geniuses of this country, viz., the astronomer, Dr. Herschell. The note is as follows:—

"It will ever be a gratifying reflection to me that I was the first person by whose means this extraordinary genius [Mr. Herschell, then residing at Doncaster] was drawn from a state of obscurity. About the year 1780, as I was dining with the officers of the Durham militia, at Pontefract, one of them informed me that they had a young German in their band, as a performer on the hautboy, who had only been a few months in this country, and yet spoke English almost as well as a native; that, exclusive of the hautboy, he was an excellent performer on the violin, and if I chose to repair to another room he should entertain me with a solo. I did so, and Mr. Herschell executed a solo of Giardini's in a manner that surprised me. Afterwards I took an opportunity to have a little private conversation with him, and requested to know if he had engaged himself to the Durham Militia for any long period? He answered 'No, only from month to month.' 'Leave them, then,' said I, 'and come and live with me. I am a single man, and think we shall be happy together; doubtless your merit will soon entitle you to a more eligible situation.' He consented to my request, and came to Doncaster. It is true, at that time my humble mansion consisted but of two rooms. However, poor as I was, my cottage contained a small library of well chosen books; and it must appear singular that a young German, who had been so short a time in England, should understand even the peculiarities of our language so well as to adopt Dean Swift for his favourite author. I took an early opportunity of introducing him at Mr. Copley's concert; and he presently began

'Untwisting all the chains that tie
The hidden soul of harmony.'

For never before had we heard the concertos of Corelli, Geminiani, and Avison, or the overtures of Handel, performed more chastely, or more according to the original intention of the composers, than by Mr. Herschell. I soon lost my companion—his fame was presently spread abroad—he had the offer of scholars, and was solicited to lead the public concerts both at Wakefield and Halifax."

The above account is followed by a further note, or rather a continuation of the same, in which is a humorous account of Herschell's competing for the place of organist at Halifax, and the remarks concerning him of old Retzler, the organ-builder. He seems to have obtained the situation, but told Dr. Miller that he should not stay long, for he had the offer of a superior situation at Bath, which offer he should accept. With respect to Dr. Miller I will only add, that in the chancel of the parish church at Doncaster, previous to the fire in 1853, which consumed the entire fabric, there was a tablet to the memory of Elizabeth, the wife of Edward Miller, Doctor in Music, and of her three daughters and a son, and on which was added, "Also Edward Miller, M.D., who died Sept. 13th, 1807, aged 72 years; nearly 52 years organist of this church; author of 'Improvement in Psalmody,' 'History of Doncaster,' &c., &c. After having served the world for many years, at last he strove to serve his God; and there is hope that by sincere repentance and a lively faith in the crucified Redeemer, he died in peace." This monument, with numerous others, was completely destroyed by the fire alluded to. Dr. Miller was succeeded as organist by Mr. Brailsford, and he, on his retirement, was succeeded by Mr. J. Rogers, who at present retains the office.—G. B, P.M., Doncaster.

Poetry.

THE ROPE WALK.

Is that building, long and low,
With its windows all a row,
Like the portholes of a bulk,
Human spiders spin and spin,
Backward down their thread so thin
Dropping each a hempen bulk.

At the end, an open door;
Squares of sunshine on the floor
Light the long and dusky lane;
And the whirling of a wheel,
Dull and drowsy, makes me feel
All its spokes are in my brain.

As the spinners to the end
Downward go and reascend,
Gleam the long threads in the sun
While within this brain of mine
Cobwebs brighter and more fine
By the busy wheel are spun.

Two fair maidens in a swing,
Like white doves upon the wing.
First before my vision pass;
Laughing, as their gentle hands
Closely clasp the twisted strands,
At their shadow on the grass.

Then a booth of mountebanks,
With its smell of tan and planks,
And a girl poised high in air
On a cord, in spangled dress,
With a faded loveliness,
And a weary look of care.

Then a homestead among farms,
And a woman with bare arms
Drawing water from a well;
As the bucket mounts apace,
With it mounts her own fair face,
As at some magician's spell.

Longfellow.

FROM THE SEA.

BY H. F. CHORLEY.

"My world of storm and wave," the Ocean said,
"Mightier than earth is, with its wit and wiles.
Let Man's best ship sail forth amid the smiles
Of shouting crowds, and joyous sun o'erhead:
I have my whirlpools—can with murder spread
Strange reefs of coral—hidden quicksand isles,
That grasp a navy in their thirsty toils,
Yet spare no wreath of foam to shroud its dead!
Did ye not vaunt that land to land should speak,
An old realm to a new, with lightning tongue?
Behold, I will rebuke your science weak,
From my most hidden councils deep and strong;
Nor can your haughty vengeance do me wrong
If, in my wayward scorn, your giant spell I break."

FRAGMENTS OF SONG.

LISTEN, brother, listen!
Hear'st thou not the sound
Of his footsteps on the ground,
Coming up the fir-tree walk?
Oh, listen, listen!

Say not 'tis the ivy-stalk,
Beating against the window-pane;
Or the dead leaves whirling round,
Eddying in a broken chain—
Listen, listen!

Again! oh listen, brother dear!
A voice of one in grief and pain
Seemeth to call on me in vain—
Calling on me, to hear—
Brother dear!

Is it the bitter wind
Complaining to its kind,
As it howls across the waste?
That is all—no need of haste
To ope the door—
No one is there!
Woe is me!
No one is there,
No one there!

CORRESPONDENCE.

[THE EDITOR does not hold himself responsible for any opinions entertained by Correspondents.]

FREEMASONRY IN BRAZIL.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE FREEMASONS' MAGAZINE AND MASONIC MIRROR.

SIR AND BROTHER,—Being a subscriber to your interesting Magazine, I came across an article published in No. 18, of May last, headed "Freemasonry in Brazil," extracted from the New York Mirror and Keystone, the republication of which I ascribe to your very praiseworthy desire of giving to the Masonic body of England some account of Masonry in every country of the world, without being overscrupulous as to the manner of writing, style, or composition; and I therefore hope that you will grant me a similar indulgence.

Having been initiated in Rio de Janeiro in 1833, I am perfectly acquainted with the history of the Order in this country; and as the article above referred to is incorrect in many particulars, I beg to furnish you with the following short account of Masonry in Brazil, which you may publish if considered of sufficient interest.

The first organized body of Masonic authority, the "Grande Oriente do Brazil," composed of the representatives of three Lodges, especially formed for the purpose by the division of one Lodge into three, to complete numbers, was established in Rio de Janeiro in the year 1821, and recognized by the Grand Orient of France.

The Emperor Dom Pedro I. was soon after initiated in one of these Lodges, and immediately proclaimed Grand Master; but finding that the Lodges of that period were nothing else but political clubs, he ordered them to be closed in the following year, 1822. After his abdication in 1831, Masonic meetings again took place, and a new authority, under the title of "Grande Oriente Brasileiro," was established.

Some of the old members of the "Grande Oriente do Brazil," shaken out of their lethargy by this occurrence, again met and proclaimed the reorganization of this Lodge in November of the same year.

We had thus two supreme authorities of the French rite, of seven degrees, in Brazil, which mutually disputed legality with, and made war upon, each other; with this difference, that the Grande Oriente do Brazil was generally considered conservative, and the Grande Oriente Brasileiro republican, as regards politics.

Commodore Jewett, referred to in the article published by you, established a Lodge or two, but they held their charters under the Grande Oriente do Brazil, of which body Jewett became a member.

Montezuma, Visconde de Jequitinhonha, having returned from Europe, whither he had gone as Brazilian ambassador, brought out the necessary powers for establishing a Supreme Council of the 33° of Antient and Accepted Masonry, granted to him by the Supreme Council of Belgium; and executed this commission in November, 1832.

The Supreme Council thus established was duly recognized by the Supreme Council of Belgium and France in 1833; and by that of New York, in December of the same year.

The Grand Orient "do Brazil," and "Brasileiro," true to the spirit of domination which prevails in all these bodies, where-soever established, immediately commenced persecutions against the Supreme Council, granted charters to Lodges, Chapters, and higher bodies of Antient and Accepted Masonry, and even established Supreme Councils of the 33° of their own, contrary to the Constitutions of the Scotch rite.

In 1835 disturbances broke out in the legitimate Supreme Council, promoted by a few ambitious and turbulent members; party spirit ran high among the inferior Masonic bodies holding charters under its authority, and a general dispersion resulted therefrom. Some of the Lodges having proclaimed the then Grand Master of the Grande Oriente do Brazil, their Grand Commander joined this body; others followed the revolutionary faction, which having formed another Supreme Council of their own, declared the original one dissolved, and its founder and Grand Commander dismissed; the remainder preserved their allegiance to the legitimate authority established in conformity with the constitution by Montezuma, Visconde de Jequitinhonha.

The revolutionary faction of the Antient and Accepted Rite united in 1842 with the Grande Oriente Brasileiro; published a manifesto that this body had entirely abandoned the French rite; proclaimed itself the only legitimate authority of the Scotch rite in Brazil; and by false representations succeeded in extorting a recognition from the Grand Orient of France. This accounts for the failure of Viscount Uruguay's attempts to procure a recognition of the Supreme Council of the Grande Oriente do Brazil, by the Grand Orient of France, alluded to in your republication.

This state of utter confusion amongst the higher Masonic authorities in Brazil continues, and could not but cause great dissatisfaction and a general desertion of the Lodges by the older conscientious Masons, who wished to keep aloof from politics and other antimasonic proceedings; many Lodges were consequently closed, and still remain so, and Masonry was threatened with entire extinction in this empire. Only lately it has somewhat revived on the part of the Grande Oriente do Brazil, but not, I fear, from any real zeal in favour of the true principles of the Order.

In Bahia three Lodges had been established under the authority of the legitimate Supreme Council of the Antient and Accepted Rite, by myself and other old Masons, in the years 1835 to 1838. These are the only Masonic bodies in Brazil, which, repudiating all revolutionary movements in Masonry, caused by ambitious and partly unprincipled individuals, and refraining from any political pursuits, as contrary to the spirit of the Order, have remained faithful to the authority which granted their charters, and still work under the Supreme Council founded and presided by the Visconde de Jequitinhonha; and thus constitute the only legal body of Scotch Masons in this country. Two of them now possess their own Masonic halls.

How far politics influenced the proceedings of both the Grande Oriente "do Brazil" and "Brasileiro" is proved by their original constitutions, since altered, which prohibited any but Brazilians, to become Masters in the chair, Wardens of Lodges, or members of Grand Lodge!

I am, Sir and Brother, your constant reader,

U. S., 33°.

Supr. Delegate of the Supreme Council
Bahia, 14th July, 1859. for the Province of Bahia.

THE MASONIC MIRROR.

MASONIC MEM.

THE brethren will be gratified to learn that our R.W. Bro. the Earl of Ripon, P.G.W., has been appointed and accepted the distinguished office of representative of the Grand Lodge of Canada to the Grand Lodge of England. We congratulate the brethren both of Canada and England on the appointment, feeling assured that no better guarantee could be had for the cordial working of the two Grand Lodges, than will be found in the well known business habits and talent of this young nobleman; whilst it will, we trust, secure to us the more constant attendance of the noble earl in Grand Lodge, of which we believe he is yet destined to become one of the brightest ornaments.

PROVINCIAL.

CUMBERLAND.

PROVINCIAL GRAND LODGE AT MARYPORT.

THE annual meeting and festival of the brethren of this province was held at Maryport, on Wednesday, the 27th ult., when, although they number but six Lodges, about one hundred and twenty of the brethren assembled to celebrate the occasion. The town being situated on the coast, was an inducement for many residents in the interior to arrive the evening before, who thus had an opportunity of visiting the docks, the harbour, building yard, and the noble pier, projecting a quarter of a mile into the sea.

The Prov. Grand Lodge was opened in due form at high twelve by the R.W. D. Prov. G.M., Bro. W. T. Greaves, who stated that twelve years had elapsed since a Prov. Grand Lodge had been held in Maryport, when only two members were on the list to represent the Lodge at Maryport; last year the number was but three; but on this occasion sixteen appeared to represent its increased strength, which was a good augury that it would shortly take rank with some of the stronger Lodges of the province.

The minutes of the previous Prov. Grand Lodge meeting were then read and confirmed, and the D. Prov. G.M. having expressed his regret that the late Prov. G. Sec. had left the province without having discharged the duties annexed to his office, proceeded to appoint the Prov. Grand Officers for the ensuing year as follows:—Bros. Robinson, No 424, Prov. S.G.W.; Capt. Spencer, No. 138, Prov. J.G.W.; Rev. B. Porteus, No. 424, and Rev. S. J. Butler, No. 424, Prov. G. Chaplains; M. Rimington, No. 424, re-elected Prov. G. Treas.; Lemon, sen., No. 409, Prov. G. Reg.; W. Kirkbride, No. 424, Prov. G. Sec.; Nicholson, No. 503, Prov. S.G.D.; Jackson, No. 138, Prov. J.G.D.; J. Deas, No. 133, Prov. G. Supt. of Works; Hodgkin, No. 138, Prov. G. Dir. of Cers.; Watson, No. 424, Assist. G. Dir. of Cers.; A. Routledge, No. 409, Prov. G.S.R.; Walker, No. 424, Prov. G. Org.; F. Hayward, No. 389, Prov. G. Pura.; Davis, No. 138, Prov. G. Tyler; Atkinson, No. 424, Smith, No. 138, Shaw, No. 503, Lemon, jun., No. 409, Gibson, No. 138, and Yeates, No. 138, Prov. G. Stewards.

A procession was then formed, and preceded by an excellent band from Whitehaven, the brethren proceeded to attend divine service in the parish church. Prayers were intoned by the Rev. Bro. Butler, vicar of Penrith, assisted by the accomplished organist and choir of St. James's church, Whitehaven. This part of the service was very effective, and most admirably performed. An eloquent and most impressive sermon was preached by the same rev. brother, from 1 Thess. iii., 12, 13, dilating upon the excellence of the principles of the society, and exhorting the brethren not to confine them to their intercourse with one another only, but to practise them generally with the world at large. The discourse was attentively listened to by the brethren and a large congregation from the town and neighbourhood.

The procession reformed and returned to the John-street school room, where, the Masonic business of the day being completed, the Prov. Grand Lodge was closed in antient and solemn form.

THE BANQUET.

In the afternoon the brethren reassembled at the Athenæum, and dined very comfortably. The usual loyal and patriotic toasts were given from the chair, followed by appropriate airs from the band, and "God save the Queen" as a trio, by brethren of the Penrith Lodge; then followed the customary Masonic toasts, which were duly honoured.

Bro. Robinson, Prov. S.G.W., having obtained permission, said—I rise to discharge a pleasing duty in proposing the next toast, which claims a bumper to do justice to the health of our worthy D. Prov. G.M., Bro. Greaves. I am no orator, brethren, and fortunately for me it needs none to obtain for the toast a cordial reception by those who are so well aware how much our Order, in this province is indebted to Bro. Greaves, for his indefatigable zeal in promoting the best interests of the society, for his courtesy and gentlemanlike demeanour in his intercourse with us on all occasions, and for the different position and feeling which now prevails amongst us as a body. (Cheers). Brethren, I will detain you no longer than to propose the health of Bro. Greaves, our D. Prov. G.M., with all the honours, and with the hope that he will long continue to hold his high office amongst us. (Loud applause).

Bro. Greaves on rising to return thanks said—This is the sixth annual festival, brethren, at which I have had the honour to preside, and I perceive that you greet me with the old familiar welcome. It is said that "practice makes perfect," but as there is no rule without an exception, so am I, as heretofore, as much at a loss adequately to express the thanks I feel for the honour you have so kindly paid me, and I must appeal again to your oft repeated indulgence in taking the "will for the deed;" but I should be vain indeed did I not regard the warm reception you have given to the toast as, in a large measure, due to the flattering manner in which it was introduced to you by our old Masonic favourite, Bro. Robinson. However this may be, I have now completed the fifth year in this office; and the Romans of old, our ancient rulers, called this measure of time a "lustrum," and a lustrum signified "an age," so that by this computation I have had the honour to rule Masonry in Cumberland for an age! and the time has arrived, I think, when I should retire from the helm? (No, no). Well, brethren, you seem to differ in opinion with me upon this question, but I trust this difference will never lessen our esteem and regard for one another. (Cheers). I cannot but regard this difference as extremely flattering to me. True it is, that when five years since, I took the helm of our Masonic "Craft"—for since we are upon the coast a little nautical phraseology may serve by way of illustration—breakers were ahead and all around us, we were in shall water, rocks and quicksands beset us, the crew were dissatisfied, and our officers were mutinous. But how is it now, brethren? Our "Craft" is in deep and smoother water, she is all "ataunto" with a more numerous and well affected crew and chosen officers, her sails bellying to the wind, and proceeding onwards with favouring gales to her appointed haven; and well content should I be now to salute a more efficient commander than myself, and install him at the helm to conduct her on her course. But let me cease from comparison and metaphor, and beg of you to accept my best and warmest thanks for the reception you have given to the last toast. (Loud cheers).

Bro. J. Deas, W.M. of No. 138, proposed the next toast, that of our reverend Bro. Butler, in a neat and appropriate speech, characterizing him as the chaplain and friend who never failed us on these occasions, and to whom our united thanks were due for the impressive manner in which he had conducted the service in the church to-day. (Cheers).

The Rev. Bro. Butler replied, that nothing gave him greater pleasure than being at his post in the discharge of his duty, and to render any service in his power, particularly in connexion with a society that combined such laudable objects in its working as this did, and associated, as this had done, its worship in our national church with the celebration of its annual festival (cheers). He much regretted the absence of his colleague, Bro. Porteus, and he felt sure that nothing short of his being away from home and other important matters prevented his being present and rendering his customary aid. (Hear, hear.) He was much gratified that his services to-day, such as they had been, were thus appreciated by the brethren, and begged them to accept his best thanks for this kind manifestation of their good will towards him. (Cheers.)

Bro. Greaves then gave the health of the Worshipful Masters and brethren of the several Lodges in the province, particularizing each according to the circumstances belonging to them, especially that of Whitehaven, which five years ago numbered only twenty members, but now mustered one hundred in addition to it, and having one amongst them (Bro. Fletcher) who was this year serving the office of a Steward of the Girls School, thus reflecting great credit upon this Lodge as well as upon himself. This Lodge was also particularly distinguished by having sixty of its members embodied as a rifle corps, armed and equipped at their own expense, and officered by members of their own body. These toasts were appropriately responded to by the Worshipful Master of each Lodge, relieved by some excellent singing by brethren of the Whitehaven and Penrith Lodges, and by seven o'clock the brethren departed by train to their respective homes, thus terminating a Masonic holiday long to be remembered, enhanced as it was by a brilliant summer's day, fanned by the breezes on the western coast.

DURHAM.

GATESHEAD.—Lodge of Industry (No. 56).—This Lodge was opened in due form at the Grey Horse Inn, Gateshead, on Monday, July 25th, by the W.M., Bro. C. I. Banister, all his officers being in their places, the Rev. Bro. S. Atkinson being the Chaplain. The minutes of last meeting having been confirmed, the W.M. examined Bros. Emerson, Wm. Green, and Barker, and it was the unanimous wish of the Lodge that they should have the second degree conferred upon them. The W.M. explained to them the tracing board, and Bro. Wm. Morrow, P.M., explained the working tools and charge. Bro. Buckham being desirous to take the third degree, was examined by the P.M., and complimented on his proficiency. He was raised to the sublime degree by the W.M., Bro. A. Clapham, P.M., explaining the working tools, and after the business of the Lodge was completed, it was closed in due form and with solemn prayer.

LANCASHIRE (WEST).

GARSTON.—Lodge of Harmony (No. 267).—This Lodge, held at the Wellington Hotel, Garston, met on Monday, August 1st. The Lodge was opened by the W.M., Bro. Chas. Aldrich, his officers being in their places. Bro. Leech being present, and wishing to take the second degree, was examined and passed to that degree by the W.M. Bro. Havers, P.M., Prov. G.D.C. of West Lancashire, explained the tracing board to the candidate, and delivered a very beautiful lecture to the brethren generally, which was acknowledged by Bro. Banister, P.M., for those present, in proposing a vote of thanks. The Lodge was closed in due form, and the brethren adjourned to refreshments, and spent a very happy evening.

ROBY.—Alliance Lodge (No. 965).—The regular meeting of this flourishing Lodge was held on Tuesday, August 2nd, at the Stanley Arms Hotel. The attendance of members and visitors was not so numerous as usual, owing no doubt to the excessive heat of the weather. The chair was occupied by the W.M., Bro. G. A. Wislowski Phillips, who opened the Lodge in the first degree, and there being no candidates in attendance for initiation, proceeded to examine Bro. Wm. C. Quiggin previous to being passed to the second degree. The Lodge was then opened in the second degree, and Bro. Quiggin was passed to the rank of a Fellow Craft by the W.M.; the ceremony was much enhanced by the presentation and explanation of the working tools in extenso by Bro. Pepper, P.M., No. 310. The Lodge was closed to the first degree, when a communication from the Grand Lodge respecting the irregular Lodges at Smyrna was read by the Secretary, and entered on the minutes; and after a short discussion respecting drawings and tenders to be sent in for the approval of the Lodge at the next meeting, for the purchase of chairs for the Senior and Junior Wardens, to be in accordance with the very handsome chair selected for the W.M. last year, the Lodge was closed with solemn prayer, after which the brethren retired to refreshment, which was well supplied by Bro. Trew.

NORFOLK.

PROVINCIAL GRAND LODGE AT NORTH WALSHAM.

THE annual meeting of the Provincial Grand Lodge of Norfolk was held on Friday, the 6th instant, at North Walsham, and was attended by about a hundred of the brethren of the province—a large number, considering that there is no railway communication with the town.

Upwards of sixty brethren assembled at half-past eleven in the National School Room, where the Grand Lodge was opened by the R.W. Prov. G.M., Bro. Benjamin Bond Cabbell; Bro. Baker, P. Prov. S.G.W., officiating as Senior Warden for Sir Henry Stacey (who did not arrive till the afternoon); all the other Officers of the Prov. Grand Lodge being present.

The minutes of the last Prov. G. Lodge, at Yarmouth, were read by Bro. W. Leedes Fox, Prov. G. Sec., and confirmed.

The Prov. Grand Lodge, on the recommendation of the Finance Board, voted a donation of £10 10s. to the Boys School, £10 to the Benevolent Institution for Aged Freemasons, and £10 to the Benevolent Institution for Freemasons' Widows.

The various officers of the Prov. Grand Lodge were re-appointed by the R.W. Prov. Grand Master, and Bro. Barwell was unanimously elected Prov. Grand Treasurer. The Prov. Grand Master stated that the next Prov. Grand Lodge would be held at Lynn, and in the following year (1861) at Norwich.

The Prov. Grand Lodge was then closed in antient and solemn form.

The brethren then adjourned for a short time, and having re-assembled at the school room, formed in procession in the usual order, and walked to the parish church, the members of each Lodge being ranged under their respective banners. The service in the church was also attended by many of the inhabitants of North Walsham. The Prov. G. Organist, Bro. Norman, of Ipswich, officiated at the organ. The lessons and prayers were read by the rector and the curate, and the sermon was preached by the Prov. G. Chaplain, the Rev. Bro. Samuel Titlow, from Matthew xvi., 20, "For what is a man profited if he shall gain the whole world and lose his own soul; or what shall a man give in exchange for his soul?" The Prov. G. Chaplain enlarged on the infinitely superior value of the spiritual and intellectual part of man to his material part, as proved not only by its higher intrinsic qualities and its immortal nature, but by the immense and inestimable sacrifice made for its redemption, and the awful misery implied in its loss—not merely the exclusion from all the happiness which the soul was capable of enjoying in heaven, but the absolute punishment it would have to endure—"the certain fearful looking for of judgment and fiery indignation." Might God, who was mighty in strength and wisdom, give us understanding in all things, and establish us in every good word and work! We read in the scriptures that God granted unto Solomon "wisdom and understanding," and that Solomon determined to build "a house unto the name of the Lord, and a house for his kingdom." Among other persons employed in the great work was a man of Tyre, "a widow's son of the tribe of Naphtali," who was "filled with wisdom, understanding, and cunning (skill) to work all works in brass," and that he came to King Solomon and wrought all his work. Might God strengthen them and make them willing to help others—to help, he might say, the clergyman and other friends of the poor in this parish—in works of faith and labours of love. "Honour and majesty are before God, strength and beauty in his sanctuary." If they ever hoped to gain everlasting life and to come before God's presence with thanksgiving, and worship him with the beauty of holiness, let them, with prayer and supplication, seek to become instrumental in the salvation of others. "Freely ye have received, freely give." An opportunity was now offered to them of benefiting the children of the poor. Their alms were asked in behalf of schools where children were instructed to love and fear the one God. In exhorting them to contribute liberally to so good a work as training up children in the way of light, he entreated them again to consider the value of immortal souls, and he hoped he might plead for these poor children in his Redeemer's name. Might they be instructed in those holy scriptures which were able to make them wise unto salvation through faith in Christ Jesus, and might the instruction of religious friends be always accompanied with prayer from the heart. Let teachers pray to Him who alone could instruct them before they entered upon the work of instructing others. In appealing to the brethren also in behalf of the District Visiting Society, the Very Worshipful Chaplain reminded them of the great principle of their Order, "relief," and observed that though they had that morning contributed a considerable sum to those charities which more especially belonged to them, and which looked up to them for help, their charity was not to be confined to any particular order of men, but should be universal as the world. The Saviour's charity was not confined, and the brethren of this great fraternity could never forget the occasions on which they were instructed to look upon every child of Adam as a brother of the dust.

The collection made after the reverend brother's earnest appeal amounted to £18 10s.

At four o'clock nearly one hundred brethren partook of an excellent dinner at the King's Arms, provided by Bro. Chapman. Several brethren were unable to obtain admission, and had to be accommodated in another room. The banquet was not restricted to Masons, though only a few strangers were present; and a good deal of dissatisfaction was expressed at the restraint thus imposed upon the brethren, and the necessity it entailed of omitting the impressive ceremonies of a Masonic banquet. From the general feeling which was evinced regarding what in a Masonic sense can scarcely be considered otherwise than an impropriety, there can be little doubt that on the next occasion the banquet will be in every respect thoroughly Masonic.

The chair was taken by the R.W. the Prov. Grand Master, the vice chair being filled by the Prov. S.G.W., Sir Henry Stracey, Bart., M.P., and Bro. H. C. Chamberlain, Prov. J.G.W. Among the company were Bros. the Rev. Samuel Titlow, Prov. G. Chaplain; Rev. F. W. Freeman, D. Prov. G.M. of Suffolk; Dr. Harcourt, D. Prov. G.M. of Surrey; W. W. Baring; the Rev. George Coleby, P. Prov. G. Chaplain; the Rev. W. French, P. Prov. G. Chaplain of Suffolk; R. S. Baker, P. Prov. S.G.W.; John Barwell, P.G. Treas.; W. Leedes Fox, Prov. G. Sec.; A. J. Collins, Prov. G. Reg.; W. Norman, Prov. G. Org.; J. Coleby, P.M.; J. Dawbarn, W.M., No. 258; — Cobb, W.M., No. 117; Henry J. Mason, P.M.; W. Wicks, P.M. and P. Prov. S.G.D.; J. Howes, P.M.; R. Gidney, P.M.; W. R. Redgrave, P.M. and Prov. G. Dir. of Cers.; J. Marshall,

P.M.; R. Kent, P.M.; J. Kennedy, P.M.; H. Wright, P.M.; G. Smith, P.M.; W. Smith, P.M.; C. Cummings, P.M.; &c. When the cloth was removed,

The R.W. Prov. G.M. rose to give the first toast. He said that in every society throughout the length and breadth of the land the first toast was a tribute no less of regard for her Majesty than of love and veneration for the constitution under which this country had flourished, and he was sure it was the cordial aspiration of every one present that that constitution might continue, amid the tumults of the hour, to flourish for ages yet to come—and for this plain and obvious reason, that this country was almost the only country in the world where every man, woman, and child, might say and do whatever he or she liked or pleased, without being amenable to the will or satisfaction of any other person, abiding only by his own judgment and the consequences of the conduct he chose to pursue. (Cheers). In whatever society, however, this toast might be given, he was confident that in no society was it ever drunk with greater satisfaction than in the society of Freemasons. (Cheers). Her Majesty was not a Freemason—(a laugh)—for she could not be one by the laws of the Craft, though in France they had female Freemasons (laughter), but her Majesty was the daughter of an illustrious prince who was himself a splendid personification of all those virtues which were the distinguishing ornaments of the Order. (Cheers). She had from her earliest childhood imbibed those principles, and he (the Prov. G.M.) was happy to say that she had carried them out in the administration of the affairs of this great country, and he had no hesitation in saying that the more the principles of their Order were intermixed with and carried out in the administration of the national affairs, so much the better would it be for the welfare of every individual in the country, and the greatness of our name in every part of the world. (Cheers). He would now give them, with hearty good feeling, "Her Majesty and the Craft."

The toast was drunk with enthusiasm, but, of course, without Masonic honours.

The Prov. Grand Master, in giving the next toast, observed that all members belonging to any fraternity or society must feel an interest in the character of those whom their suffrages had placed at the head of their community. They had now for a long period placed at the head of Freemasonry in this country a nobleman who, he might say, acceded to that high office with some degree of trembling and doubt, knowing well that his predecessors had brought to that office all the prestige, all the influence, and all the fortification of their high position as princes of royal blood. But from the first moment that Lord Zetland acceded to the distinguished office of Grand Master, he had won the full approbation and cordial friendship and warm feeling of every brother Mason in this country—(cheers)—because he had brought to the administration of the office a thorough determination to do his duty to the utmost of his ability. He (the Prov. G.M.) believed there was no man of a more humble and conscientious feeling than Lord Zetland—no man more disposed to underrate his own abilities—and though there had been some little party feeling, it had now happily all died away, from the satisfactory manner in which Lord Zetland had met all the allegations made, and the ample proof he had given that there was no man who had a greater desire to promote the welfare of the Order, or to carry out by his personal example those noble principles on which it rested. (Loud cheers.)

The Prov. Grand Master next gave, "The Deputy Grand Master of England, Lord Panmure." Of the distinguished nobleman who held the second rank in the Craft, he (the Prov. G.M.) could say from his own knowledge, that though he had only a short time held that office, he had during that period endeavoured in every way to promote Freemasonry, and more especially the cause of charity in connexion with the Order. He had taken the chair at the meetings of the Boys and Girls Schools, and his efforts had been eminently successful in administering to the means and the resources of the different Masonic societies. (Cheers).

Sir Henry Stracey, Prov. S.G.W., who was greeted with loud and protracted cheering, said he inferred from the kind reception which had been given to him, that they anticipated the toast which he was about to have the honour to propose; but before he discharged the agreeable duty he had undertaken, he wished to demand of their excellent Prov. Grand Secretary, whether those present were all Masons. (No.) Then he should simply say, that he had a toast to propose which required little or no recommendation at his hands. Their R.W. Prov. G.M. had said that the Grand Master of England had justified the choice that was made when he was elected to that high office. Was he (Sir Henry Stracey) wrong when he said that their excellent brother, Benjamin Bond Cabbell, had justified the choice that was made when he was appointed the Grand Master of the province of Norfolk? (Loud cheers). It was evident from the feeling manifested on this occasion that the selection was a just, a right, and a proper one. And he would say this, that the position filled by Bro. Benjamin Bond Cabbell was one which required many attributes not often possessed by the same individual. He need not remind them of the uniform urbanity and genial good humour of their Right Worshipful Prov. G.M., nor above all of his exercise of that crowning quality which distinguished Masonry—charity. (Loud cheers.) No man could stand higher as a Provincial Grand Master, as a brother, or as a man, than their excellent brother, Benjamin Bond Cabbell. (Cheers.) Few ever had, perhaps, such opportunities of studying the tenets of Masonry, for he understood that their worthy brother years ago officiated in the Grand Lodge of England for him who was afterwards the crowned head of England, and no one, therefore, could be better qualified for the high position to which he had since been appointed. (Cheers.) The toast was drunk with the greatest cordiality.

The Prov. Grand Master, who was enthusiastically cheered, said that arising to acknowledge the compliment which his excellent brother, Sir Henry Stracey, had so kindly, so indulgently, and so infinitely beyond his (Bro. Cabbell's) merits, introduced to them, he was sure they would do full justice to his feelings in believing him when he said that he received that compliment most gratefully. There did not exist within the limits of their Provincial Grand Lodge, nor within the limits of England, nor he would say of the whole universe, one who had a more humble estimate of his own abilities and powers than the humble individual who now stood before them. He thought, however, that he might take some little credit—not on his own account, but in common with every brother connected with the province—that during the short period he had had the honour of presiding over Masonry in Norfolk, the number of their Order had greatly increased and was continually increasing. (Cheers.) He took no credit exclusively to himself, but he hoped he might claim his humble share, in common with every other brother of the province, in the results of their united efforts to promote Masonry to the extent of their abilities. They looked upon it as a sacred cause—not only within the limits of their own fraternity, but as conducive, from the universality of the system, to the welfare also of every individual in the country who might not have the good fortune of belonging to their Order. (Hear, hear.) Something had lately been said about many large towns in this province being without Lodges, and he hoped he might be allowed this opportunity of making one single remark on that subject—namely, that although Lodges made Masons, there must be a previous step—there must be Masons to make Lodges. (Hear, hear.) To propose to establish Lodges in places where there were at present no Masons, seemed to him to be a proposal not exactly in accordance with the ordinary line of conduct which any wise man would consider proper for the accomplishment of the object he had in view. Was it meant that brethren should travel from a distant part of the country to these places to establish Lodges in them, and not only to establish them, but to work them and carry them on? He made these remarks in the most humble manner—in the most devoted prostration of his sentiments, to those who offered dictatorial opinions on the subject—(a laugh)—but in the humblest way he would suggest that it would be more agreeable to common sense, and more likely to attain the object in view, if those who made this complaint were to have proposed how Masons were to be made in those towns where no Lodges existed. He would attempt to supply this gap in the problem which had been so ostentatiously started. He would propose that the services of some brethren should be devoted to the making of Masons in those distant places, and then when the Masons were made, the means would have been provided for making the Lodges. (Hear, hear.) He hoped he would be excused for making these remarks, because he thought the plan he had suggested was the only way of accomplishing the object which was so generally desired. (Hear, hear.) He could assure them that there was no brother in the Order who felt a more ardent determination to do everything in his power, and to the fullest extent, according to his humble ability, for the promotion of the cause of Freemasonry—(cheers)—because he thought that in the promotion of that sacred cause he was carrying out all the great behests of a kind and all merciful Creator, and doing everything he could to promote the general welfare of mankind. (Applause.) He repeated, that the principles of their Order were carried out in every relation of life, the more they would not only effect the good of themselves, but promote that great cause of binding together the whole human family with the ties of mutual connexion and dependence, so that every one should depend upon the good actions and kind feelings, and benevolent disposition of those around him. (Cheers.) No principles, he was sure, were more calculated to promote universal peace and brotherhood than those of the Order of Freemasonry. (Cheers.) Some remarks had also been made as to holding Lodges at other periods of the year. He might be allowed to say, that if a Prov. Grand Lodge could be held on any occasion for the welfare of the Order and the preservation of the Craft, he should be most happy to fall in with the views and wishes of the brethren—(loud cheers)—and no matter in how remote a part of the kingdom he might be—for he was in all parts during the summer—whether in the Highlands of Scotland, or the centre of Ireland, he should attend at the shortest notice, and gladly carry out their wishes, whatever they might be—(renewed cheering)—for he was sure they had all but one wish and one anxiety—to promote the welfare of the Order. (Cheers.) He assured them that these meetings were among the very happiest moments of his life, and therefore if he could have them oftener, and by that means do any more good to Freemasonry, they had only to say the word, and he should be ready at their call. (Loud cheering.)

The Prov. Grand Master soon afterwards observed that they had been honoured that day by the presence of the Deputy Grand Masters of two other provinces—Bro. Dr. Harcourt, D. Prov. G.M. of Surrey, and Bro. Freeman, D. Prov. G.M. of Suffolk, whose healths he now proposed, assuring them that the brethren of Norfolk were always as glad to receive brethren from other provinces as they were sure of being well entertained in their turn when they visited other provinces.

Dr. Harcourt, D. Prov. G.M. of Surrey, said it had been his good fortune, during many years of Masonic intercourse with his brethren in different parts of England, to have to return thanks for the visitors. From his position, it devolved upon him to be somewhat of a critic of the mode in which the Lodges he visited were worked, but he confessed he was not at all prepared to see such excellent working as he had witnessed that morning in this Prov. Grand Lodge. He could not help remarking, also, on the regularity with which the procession was managed, and they certainly must have some energetic and efficient officers to marshal so numerous a body of brethren without the slightest hitch or disorder. There was one point, however, which he could not but feel was open to improvement, and that was the admission of non-Masons to the banquet. (General cries of "hear, hear.") He thought the banquet ought to be part of the Lodge. The presence of non-Masons certainly did curb the tongue, and prevented many allusions to Freemasonry that would be agreeable to the majority of the brethren. (Applause.) He hoped—and indeed he had little doubt—that at the next Prov. Grand Lodge their banquet would be as closely tyled as their Lodge. (Applause.)

The Rev. F. W. Freeman, D. Prov. G.M. of Suffolk, also replied, and expressed his concurrence with Bro. Dr. Harcourt as to the propriety of restricting the banquet to brethren.

The Prov. Grand Master said the next toast was the health of a rev. brother who was pre-eminently entitled to their thanks, who was at all times ready to lend a helping hand and to give the influence of his high position in society, in assisting every good and benevolent work. He (the Prov. G.M.) should not say a word about the eloquent discourse they had had from their worthy Chaplain that morning. They would agree with him that it was to the ministry of our holy religion that we were mainly indebted for that broad stream of charity which ran through the country, visiting every scene of woe—that charity which was the grand and distinguishing ornament of our country, and which was the spontaneous offering of a free people, given without government direction, or government security, or government sanction. (Applause.) England, he believed, was almost the only country in the world where such efforts were made by the people of their own free will. He now conveyed, on behalf of the brethren, their thanks to Bro. Titlow for his presence, and would assure him that there were no individuals in any community, however distinguished they might be in position, in wealth, or in power, who were more acceptable, and capable of rendering greater services, in the cause of charity than the ministers of our holy religion. (Applause.)

The Prov. Grand Chaplain most sincerely thanked them for their expression of kindness towards him. He considered himself but an humble individual to have been selected for the honour of filling such a high and important office, and he was glad to find that the brethren were satisfied with the mode in which he endeavoured to discharge its duties. He was gratified that the brethren should have shown a true Masonic feeling in this small town of North Walsham. They had come forward most liberally in behalf of local charitable objects. They had previously voted liberal sums towards Masonic charities, and Masonic charities ought never to be forgotten by them. They knew that Masons were the happy instruments of providing the comfortable means of living for aged brethren, and for the widows and children of poor Masons. Could it be said that that man had a proper love to God who could "see his brother in need, and shut up his bowels of compassion from him?" He might ask also—could it be said that they deserved to be called by the name of Masons if they could see the aged and helpless brethren of the Craft without rendering them succour in the hour of distress? They had, however, that day shown themselves deserving of the name of Masons, by helping the children and widows of their poor brethren, and they had moreover shown that their charity was not restricted to their own particular body, for they had contributed at the church a sum of £18 10s. for the poor of the town in which they were assembled. Their excellent Grand Master, they knew, was never backward in the cause of charity, and they thanked the Giver of all good gifts that He had pleased to put it in his power, and having put it in his power, had given him the will to dispense it as a good steward. Bro. Benjamin Bond Cabbell had added to the collection at the church a sum of thirty guineas—(loud cheers)—so that the meeting of the Freemasons in this town of North Walsham had resulted in a donation of £50 to the funds of the local schools and visiting society. (Cheers.) He (Bro. Titlow) was not surprised at their expression of approbation, for he knew that the desire of promoting good dwelt in their hearts, and that in their entrance into Masonry the duty of charity was strongly inculcated upon them, and that in their progress through its various degrees, duties were enjoined and admonitions enforced, which taught them not only how to live, but how to die. Now, supposing they had not met to-day at North Walsham, where would this £50 have come from? It was the spirit of Masonry, it was the duty which Masonry inculcated, and which had incited them to show that they were not only Masons in name but Masons in practice, which had produced this contribution. He need hardly say that he was himself strongly attached to Masonry; he believed it was a cord of association between man and man. The Mason ought to be a moral and an upright man, and the moral and upright man who was engaged in doing good to others, regarded with great affection his fellow man who was influenced in the like manner. (Cheers.) None but Masons could have altogether understood certain portions of the discourse that morning. Many years ago, not long after his initiation into Masonry, he was preaching at Ryde, and there was something in the discourse which awakened the attention of a brother in the congregation, whose wife remarked the change in his demeanour, and when he explained it by saying "The preacher is a brother," she was perplexed how her husband could have recognized him as a Mason while he was in the pulpit, not knowing that Masons could communicate with and recognize each other in the light or the dark, and that where they recognized each other there was at once a fraternal feeling excited on both sides. He felt that in order that this fraternal feeling might be indulged without restraint, it would be decidedly advantageous on these occasions for the brethren to unite more particularly as Masons (hear, hear), because they knew that in the presence of strangers they were obliged to exercise a caution which on such an occasion was not agreeable to the brethren. (Hear, hear). He was glad to know that Masonry was making such progress in the province, and he hoped it would continue to flourish as it had done. He was sure the poor, at least of this town, would say, "God be praised that the Masons visited North Walsham!" (Applause).

The Prov. Grand Master in proposing "The Officers of the Prov. Grand Lodge," observed, that the working of a Lodge was like the working of any piece of machinery—though some works were of great importance, and some of comparatively small importance, yet the working of the greater parts depended upon the efficiency of the most insignificant parts of the machine. Though they were all equal in the Lodge, and all stood on the same level, no one could dispute the advantage of having in their Order men of high social position who brought the influence of that rank to the promotion of the welfare of the Order. He considered, therefore, that they must all highly appreciate the accession of such a distinguished member of their Order as the Senior Warden of the Prov. Grand Lodge—Bro. Sir Henry Stracey—and more especially, as they were all sensible of the very kind and affectionate way in which that brother acted, there being no difference whatever in his deportment towards the highest and the humblest members of the Order. (Loud cheers).

Bro. Sir Henry Stracey, in reply, said, no man felt more sincerely than he did the advantages and blessings of Masonry, and since he joined the Order, he believed he had carried out its principles to the best of his ability. In thanking the brethren for the compliment paid to his brother officers, Sir Henry referred to the zeal and activity of their Prov. Grand Secretary, Bro. W. Leedes Fox, who, he remarked, deserved their special thanks for his indefatigable exertions.

The Prov. Grand Master having proposed the health of Bro. W. Leedes Fox, Prov. G. Sec., which was drunk with cordiality, Bro. W. Leedes Fox, in reply, said he felt it necessary to make some allusion to that portion of an article which appeared lately in the Freemasons' Magazine, which stated that since Bro. Cabbell's installation no progress had been made in Masonry in the province of Norfolk, but that it had rather retrograded. This conclusion was perhaps drawn from the fact that there had been no fresh accession of Lodges for many years in Norfolk. Now he (Bro. Fox) wished, as much as the Freemasons' Magazine, that more Lodges were established in the province, but it should not be forgotten that Lodges were only the means to attain an end, and that while a large number of Lodges might be conducive to the convenience of many brethren, the main question was, not how many Lodges there were in the province, but how many registered Masons. (Hear.) There might be twenty Lodges in a province, and yet from the number of subscribing members, those Lodges might not be equal to ten in an adjoining county. It was true that there were but eight Lodges in Norfolk, but from the present aggregate number of their members, they were equal to sixteen average Lodges. So far from Masonry being retrogressive or stationary in Norfolk, it had materially advanced since the accession to office of Bro. Cabbell, and it was now gradually progressing. Masonry was almost a dead letter in the province till the Prov. Grand Master's installation, but since that time the number of Masons in the county had trebled. (Hear, hear.) He (Bro. Fox) could easily understand that from misrepresentations and want of accurate information, the writer of the article in question might in his zeal for the Order reflect in somewhat strong terms on the province, but these should have been confined within charitable bounds, and attempts should not have been made by innuendo and otherwise to create in the minds of the Norfolk brethren a feeling of disrespect if not of hostility to their Prov. Grand Master. (Cheers). That worthy brother, by his benevolent actions and universal kindness, had merited the love and admiration of his brethren, and long might he be spared to rule the province! (Loud cheers).

The company then separated.

STAFFORDSHIRE.

STAFFORD.—Staffordshire Knot Lodge.—The brethren of the Lodge held their anniversary on Tuesday last, at Stafford, when they were joined by a large number of Past Officers from other Lodges in the Potteries and elsewhere. An excellent dinner was served up at the Shire Hall, Lieut. Col. Vernon, Prov. G.M. of Staffordshire, presiding.

SUSSEX.

BRIGHTON.—Royal York Lodge (No. 394).—The monthly meeting was held on Tuesday, the 2nd inst., at the Old Ship Hotel, Bro. A. Moppett, W.M., presiding. There was a good attendance, including several visiting brethren. A successful ballot was taken for Messrs. G. Whitto and W. Hudson, and they were forthwith initiated into the mysteries of the Craft in a most able manner by the W.M. Bro. Bull was then passed to the degree of Fellow Craft by the Worshipful Master. It is pleasing to add that this Lodge, under an efficient Master and good Officers, is enabled to perform its workings in a most praiseworthy style. Bro. Ade, P.M., as Secretary, is a great acquisition.

KNIGHTS TEMPLAR.

PROVINCIAL ENCAMPMENT.

NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE.—Royal Kent Encampment.—This Encampment was opened in the Masonic Hall, on Friday, July 22nd, by the E.C., Sir Knight Henry Hotham, assisted by his officers. The Rev. Sir Knight Atkinson being proposed by the E.C., and seconded by Sir Knight C. J. Banister, was duly elected a joining member. The Encampment was then closed in due form, and the Knights dined together under the presidency of their E.C.

COSTUME OF AMERICAN TEMPLARS.

At the triennial session of the General Grand Encampment at Hartford, United States, in 1856, the following regulations respecting costume were reported by a committee, but for want of time, action upon them was postponed until the coming session at Chicago:—

"The costume of a Knight Templar shall consist of a full suit of black, dress coat, and pantaloons, white cravat, black gloves, boots, and gilt spurs, and over all a white surcoat, on the left breast of which shall be embroidered a red cross; an undress military cap, and on the front a Templar cross; a cross-hilted sword, the scabbard of black suspended from a black velvet or leather baldric, a short dagger on the left side, a black velvet apron of a triangular form, having on the centre a patriarchal cross, and on the flap a skull and cross bones, all in silver. The edging of aprons and collars shall be of gold for Grand Bodies, and of silver for Subordinate Commanderies.

"Every Knight will also be permitted to wear on all occasions the Templar's badge, namely, a patriarchal cross, enamelled red and edged with gold, suspended from the breast by a red ribbon or gold chain. He shall be permitted to wear, on the index finger of his right hand a gold ring, ornamented with the Templar cross between the letters P. D. E.P., and inscribed on the inner side with the name of the wearer and the date of his initiation. And it is recommended that the Commander present to every Templar such a ring on creation.

"The great standard of the Order is the beauseant, which consists of alternate pales or vertical stripes of black and white, with the red Templar cross over all, which must be borne in all public processions.

"All Knights Templar, when signing Masonic documents, shall prefix to their signatures the sign of the cross; Grand Officers of Grand Commanderies shall prefix the patriarchal cross; and Grand and Past Grand Officers of the Grand Encampment shall prefix the double patriarchal cross, and when this can be conveniently done, the cross shall be made with red ink.

"The jewels of the Order shall be those now used, with this regulation: The jewels of a Commandery shall be of silver; those of a Grand Commandery of gold, suspended with a double delta or triangle; and those of the Grand Encampment, of gold, suspended with a circle."

SCOTLAND.

GRAND LODGE.

THE quarterly meeting of Grand Lodge was held on the 1st instant. Prior to the opening of Grand Lodge, Bro. Elisha D. Cooke, of Kentucky, had the honour of an interview with his Grace the Duke of Athol, M.W.G.M. of Scotland, and presented his Grace a letter of fraternal salutations from M. W. Rob Morris, G.M. of Kentucky, for himself and for the following Grand Masters:—John L. Lewis, of New York; Horace N. Stokes, of Ohio; J. Adams Allen, of Michigan; Solomon D. Baylis, of Indiana; John A. W. Buck, of Illinois; L. D. Toraoey, of Wisconsin; J. R. Hartsock, of Iowa; A. T. C. Pierson, of Minnesota; of which he had the honour to be bearer. The officers of Grand Lodge and distinguished visitors assembled in the Grand Secretary's room, and marched into the great hall, accompanied by the solemn peal of the organ. On arrival in front of the dais, the files opened to the right and left, when the Grand Master marched through, followed by his Deputy and visitors.

The dais was occupied by the Duke of Athol, M.W.G.M., on the throne, supported by Bros. J. White Melville, R.W.D.G.M.; and P. I. Ghuker, from the Grand Lodge of the Netherlands; E. S. Roussy, G. Chaplain; and Elisha D. Cooke, from the Grand Lodge of Kentucky.

Grand Lodge was opened in ample form and with solemn prayer. The attendance was very small in consequence of many brethren being in the country.

There was not much business of importance before the Grand Lodge, but an unusual number of presents, most of which Bro. Laurie, G. Sec. presented on behalf of the donors. Bro. P. I. Ghuker, from the Grand Lodge of the Netherlands, was then introduced, and presented on behalf of that Grand Lodge a very handsome silver medal, together with sou-printed documents. Bro. Elisha D. Cooke, from the Grand Lodge of Kentucky, was also introduced, who presented a copy of the History of Freemasonry in Kentucky, with the fraternal regards of Bro. Rob Morris, G.M. of Kentucky; also a package of printed documents from that Grand Lodge. On the motion of the Grand Master, a vote of thanks was recorded to those several Grand Lodges, and also to the brethren on his right and left for the very handsome manner in which they had presented those valuable contributions to the Grand Lodge library.

The Grand Secretary then announced the death of his Majesty Oscar, late King of Sweden, and an honorary member of the Grand Lodge of Scotland. The following is an extract from the letter conveying the news to the Grand Lodge:—"In the night succeeding his birthday (the 5th of July), he again suffered much from cough. His sufferings increased until the 8th, when he expired while lying on a sofa in his chamber, and surrounded by the royal family. This mournful scene was preserved by means of a photograph." The Grand Lodge ordered a letter to be written to Bro. Charles XV., the "present king," sympathising with him in the loss of his father, and congratulating him on his accession to the throne.

The Grand Secretary next announced the death of Bro. Robert Campbell, of Sydney, Prov. G.M. for New South Wales, stating that about one thousand persons attended his funeral, six hundred of whom were Masons, and presenting a petition from the brethren that some brother well skilled in Masonry might be appointed to fill his place. Some other little discussions on Lodge affairs then took place, and concluded the business of the evening. The Grand Lodge was closed a little after eleven, P.M.

CANADA.

GRAND LODGE.

At the Grand Lodge held at Kingston, Toronto, in the early part of last month, two brethren were put in nomination for the office of Grand Master, the M.W. Bro. Wm. Mercer Wilson, the immediate Prov. Grand Master, and the R.W. Bro. Thos. D. Harington, formerly Prov. Grand Master for Quebec. Bro. Wilson had expressed his intention of retiring from the distinguished position he has held since the formation of the Grand Lodge, but from the strong representations made to him that it might prove injurious to the Craft in Canada, were he to retire at present, he consented to again assume the duties if re-elected. On the votes being taken, Bro. Wilson was re-elected by a majority of more than a hundred. Bro. Harington was elected Deputy Grand Master. The Right Hon. and Right Worshipful Bro. the Earl of Ripon, P.G.W., was appointed representative of the Grand Lodge of Canada in the Grand Lodge of England.

The following are the other Grand Officers appointed:—Bros. F. W. Barron, S.W.; Stevenson, J.W.; T. B. Harris, Sec.; S. B. Hannan, Reg.; D. Groff, Treas.; Rev. Jos. Scott, Chaplain; S. B. Campbell, S.D.; J. W. Thomas, J.D.; W. G. Storm, Supt. of Works; L. L. Levey, Dir. of Cers.; T. R. Ridout, Assistant Dir. of Cers.; G. Masson, S.B.; S. D. Blondheim, Purs.; D. G. R. Fripp, Org.; A. M. Munro, Asst. Org.

The M.W. Grand Master was pleased to confirm the nomination of the following brethren as District Deputy Grand Masters for their respective districts:—Central District, R.W. Bro. G. F. Leserre; Toronto District, R.W. Bro. F. Richardson; London District, R.W. Bro. Thompson; Prince Edward District, R.W. Bro. C. Frank; Montreal

District, R.W. Bro. A. Morris; Eastern Townships District, R.W. Bro. L. H. Robinson; Ontario District, R.W. Bro. W. H. Weller; Wilson District, R.W. Bro. G. W. Whitehead; Hamilton District, R.W. Bro. Richard Bull. The rank of Prov. Grand Master was unanimously conferred on Bro. T. G. Ridout.

As no doubt Canadian certificates will shortly be seen in England, it cannot be otherwise than interesting that the various Lodges should be acquainted with the official seal of the Grand Lodge of Canada, the designing and execution of which was entrusted to Bro. Moring, of 44, High Holborn, and an engraving of which we now present. As will be seen, the form of the seal is vesica, the centre containing a figure of St. John, and the whole being edged with maple leaves.

It is beautifully executed, and reflects great credit on Bro. Moring, the impression coming up with great sharpness and relief.

COLONIAL.

MAURITIUS.

THE Masonic procession of the four Lodges of Port Louis took place on the 24th of June, and was conducted in the most satisfactory manner, and with the greatest éclat. St. James's Cathedral was crowded, and every one appeared to take great interest in the excellent sermon preached by Bro. the Rev. M. O'Dell. The service was further enhanced by the beautiful chanting in the choir, and the Lodges generally have to tender their heartfelt thanks to those ladies who so kindly lent their valuable aid on the occasion. The anthem, "Behold how good and how pleasant it is for brethren to dwell together in unity," appeared especially to impress the audience with its solemn harmony. The procession was highly imposing, and all the arrangements were admirably carried out. After service the brethren proceeded to the Lodge "Triple Esperance," from whence they dispersed. The crowd that was assembled to witness the procession was one of the largest ever seen in Port Louis; there were no constables visible, and the utmost order prevailed. After the procession, the brethren of the Military Lodge (deputations from the other Lodges being visitors) met for the installation of their officers, and to present to the Rev. Bro. O'Dell a handsome timepiece as a token of their regard. After the proceedings of the Lodge were concluded the brethren sat down to a substantial repast, during which many loyal toasts were given and responded to with the utmost cordiality. Amongst the visitors were Sir David Barclay, and another eminent Mason, Mr. Bosuson, recently arrived from Paris. Shortly after eleven o'clock the party broke up, and every one appeared much gratified with the proceedings from the commencement to the termination.

SOUTH AMERICA.

BUENOS AYRES.

EXCELSIOR LODGE (No. 900).—On the 19th of May last, at the sixty-second regular Lodge night, a more than usually large attendance of brethren was attracted by the circumstance of its being the last occasion of Bro. Samuel Hesse's attendance prior to his departure for England. In addition to the members of the Lodge there were several visitors present, and amongst the latter, Bros. Mariano Billingham and Santiago Albancier as a deputation to represent the native brethren working under the auspices of the local Grand Orient; and Bros. A. Villatte, S. Wiarda, and J. Wappers Melis as a deputation sent by the Lodge Amis des Naufragés, acting under warrant from the Grand Orient of France. The Lodge being duly opened in the first degree by the W.M., Bro. Frederick Hughes, assisted by Bros. C. P. Lunet as S.W., and G. Nuttall as J.W., the minutes of the last regular Lodge night were read and approved of. The Lodge was then raised, when Bro. Walter C. Comyns was raised to the sublime degree of M.M. by the Worshipful Master. The Lodge being lowered to the first degree, Bro. A. Dorr, by order of the Worshipful Master, read a letter from Bro. R. Fresco, asking for pecuniary assistance, when Bro. Rev. J. C. Ford, P.M. and Chaplain, proposed, and Bro. A. Dorr seconded, and it was unanimously carried, "That his letter should be handed to the Finance Committee to report upon." Bro. J. C. Ford then proposed, and Bro. L. B. Wilkie seconded, Chas. A. Wm. Jeppener, aged thirty years, native of Hanover, and Bro. W. C. Thompson, P.M., proposed, and Bro. A. Dorr seconded, George Fair, aged twenty-seven years, a British subject, as candidates for initiation. The Worshipful Master then communicated to Bro. Hesse, that as he was about to bring before the Lodge a question relating to his past services among the brethren, he would request his retirement for a few minutes while the same was being discussed. Bro. Hesse accordingly left the Lodge room, when the Worshipful Master addressed the brethren as follows:—"Brethren, I beg to lay claim to your indulgence if on the present occasion I depart from the course I had laid down for my observation at my installation, and submit to your consideration a motion from the chair of this Lodge; I do so, however, in the full conviction that it will merit your unanimous approbation and hearty concurrence. The minutes of our last meeting, which, in the earlier stage of this evening's proceedings, were read to you, announce the loss we are about to suffer in the departure for England (and that for good) of the worthy brother who first was called by the suffrages of his brethren to fill that seat in this Lodge which I have now the honour to occupy, and who proved himself therein so worthy of the confidence reposed in him, and so true to the obligations it involved. On a former occasion you testified your appreciation of the services he had rendered to the Craft in general, and to this Lodge in particular, by presenting to him a Past Master's jewel in gold. I now beg to move that the address I am about to read to you, written on parchment, be presented to Bro. Samuel Hesse in open Lodge, on this the last occasion of our meeting together in this room, as an humble memento of our affection and regard towards him. In submitting this resolution to your approval, I do so with the conviction upon my mind that your inclinations would prompt you to vote a more costly and magnificent testimonial of your appreciation of the services rendered to our ancient and honourable institution by Bro. Hesse; but on the other hand I feel assured that the brother we so highly regard and love, will best esteem this simple, though truthful, recognition of his worth in the assurance it conveys, that the widow and the orphan, the friendless and the distressed, the sick and the needy, will thus find our pockets more free to their call and more open to their claims. Brethren—I need not, I think, say more, but proceed to lay before you the address I have prepared for your acceptance." Bro. Ford then read the address, as follows:—

"Buenos Ayres, 19th May, A.D. 1859. A.L. 5859.

"To Bro. Samuel Hesse, P.M. and first W.M. of the Excelsior Lodge, No. 900.

"Worshipful Sir and Brother,—We, the Worshipful Master, Past Masters, Officers, and Brethren composing the Excelsior Lodge, No. 900, in this city, beg leave on the eve of your departure from among us, to offer you the expression of our sincere regret at the separation which will deprive us of that active co-operation and of those efficacious services which have proved so important to the welfare, so congenial to the progress, and so valuable to the support of that branch of our ancient and honourable institution first planted under your auspices in this remote region of the globe. The bright example which your past intercourse amongst us affords to the brethren in general, and to ourselves in particular, of Masonic excellence and equity, prompts our warmest gratitude and heartiest thankfulness. With feelings, therefore, of grateful veneration, and in the bonds of brotherly love, mingled with our liveliest regret at your departure, we beg you to accept the assurance of our prayers that the Divine Author of every good may long preserve you in health and in the full enjoyment of the social love and mutual affection of those nearest and dearest to you, which your safe return to your native land will, we trust, shortly afford to you. May it please the G.A.O.T.U. to water with the dew of his blessing those seeds of holiness and good which you have planted around you, that they may ripen into a rich harvest of personal blessing here, and be found laid up in the garner of heaven hereafter. With every sentiment that sincere love and warm esteem can prompt, we bid you affectionately, farewell; and subscribe ourselves, Worshipful Sir and dear Brother, your loving brethren."

Bro. J. C. Ford, P.M. and Chaplain, rose and addressed the brethren, expressing the great pleasure he had in seconding the motion put from the chair, when it was accordingly put, and carried unanimously. At the request of the brethren, a deputation from the Lodge room, composed of Bros. J. C. Ford, P.M.; Thompson, Billingham, Albancier, and A. Villatte, went out and conducted Bro. Hesse to the pedestal in the midst of the brethren all standing, when the Worshipful Master addressed him from the chair as follows:—"Bro. Hesse, it is my pleasing duty to inform you, that during your absence from the Lodge your brethren have voted an address to you, expressing their regard and affection towards you. It is with infinite pleasure that I obey their unanimous behest to present it to you, proud of the distinction it affords to me of rendering honour to whom honour is so justly due, and deeply gratified with the unmistakable demonstrations that it has called forth to prove how securely you have entwined around you the love, the sympathy, and the goodwill of your brethren of the Excelsior Lodge. As already expressed, we only render honour to whom honour is due; and recognize, though in a humble form, those services of our first Master which have so materially helped us forward within the good old landmarks of our ancient institution; and were it not for the shadow that intervenes to dim the pleasure those reminiscences afford, my satisfaction would indeed be complete. But we have also to bid you farewell—the course of human events calls you from among us, and the minutes of this evening's meeting will record, as far as we can see, your last occupation of that seat in this Lodge, so regularly filled, and so highly distinguished by your actions; but like the conqueror in a hard fought battle, you take your departure from amongst us with the laurels of a hero encircling your brow, and with the greater satisfaction, that yours has been no conflict of bloody strife and vindictive contest, but the more unostentatious, though equally difficult struggle, of good against evil, of principle against passion—of promoting and establishing true happiness around you, against the opposition offered thereto by the seductive temptations and noisy turnings of the world beyond our quiet precincts. And now that the place which once knew you so well amongst us here, will henceforth know you no more, I trust, dear brother, myself and brethren will justly value the bright example which your good deeds offer to our imitation, and ever heed the warning voice annexed to us in the legacy you therein bequeath, saying, "Go and do thou likewise;" and thus be led to labour and to strive for that perfection, in square conduct, level steps, and upright intentions, that with you we may hope finally to ascend to those immortal mansions from whence all goodness emanates. We thank you, dear brother, for your gift, and although it is with sorrowful hearts and with mournful feelings that we now pronounce to you the words, good bye—yet we hail the soothing consolation extended to us to mitigate their bitterness, in the knowledge that although absent in the body, you will yet be present with us in the spirit, and in the assurance which fraternal confidence inspires, that in your life and actions the sacred motto of brotherly love, relief and truth, borne on our Masonic banner, will ever continue unfurled, and in its onward course will ascend higher and higher in attractive beauty, displaying alike to the gaze of men and of brethren that Freemasonry, in its perfection, is only the consummation of truth, of justice, and of virtue, demonstrated in works of mercy, and of love, and in the practice of the golden rule which bids us to do unto others even as we would that they should do unto us. Go then, dear brother, and God be with you; and while you carry with you the prayers of your brethren, that his all seeing eye may ever benignantly watch over you, to bless, to comfort, and to guard you—let this humble, though sincere expression of their love also accompany you, as a slight memento of what they owe and feel towards you." The effect of these few words served to call forth a very visible manifestation of the affectionate regard of the brethren for the one they were about to lose, and their feelings and emotions had a powerful sympathy on Bro. Hesse, who amid the workings of surprise and agitation of mind at this unlooked for demonstration, remained for several minutes unable to speak; having partially controlled his feelings, he replied as follows:—"Worshipful sir and brethren, not being prepared for the honour now conferred on me, I am afraid that I shall be wanting in words to express my feelings. From my heart I sincerely thank you for the kind sentiment contained in this address; and assure you that I shall ever consider it as one of the most valuable tokens in my possession, for it convinces me that my conduct during the existence of the Excelsior Lodge has merited your approbation and esteem; but I must also say that it will cause me many moments of pain and regret, for whatever part of it my eye may rest upon, some name will present itself to recall to my recollection the loss of friends not easily replaced. Brethren, I am about to leave you, and it is very improbable that we shall ever meet again in this world; but let our actions throughout life be such as to inspire us with hope, that when we are summoned to the Grand Lodge above, we may again be happily united for ever and ever." Bro. I. C. Ruding proposed, and Bro. W. C. Thompson seconded, and it was unanimously carried, that the minutes of this evening's meeting should be sent to the Freemasons' Magazine for publication, as a further testimonial of the brethren's regard for Bro. Hesse. Bro. A. Dorr proposed, and Bro. I. C. Ruding seconded, and it was carried unanimously, that the W.M. should inform the brethren as soon as he was able to do so, of the time that Bro. Hesse would embark, on the 28th inst., that the wish of the brethren to accompany him to the mole might be thereby fully gratified. No further business offering itself, the Lodge was closed in due form at a few minutes before ten o'clock, when the brethren adjourned to the refreshment room. In the refreshment room the W.M. apologized to Bros. Billingham and Villatte for the involuntary omission he had committed in not acknowledging, before closing the Lodge, the kind and fraternal courtesy which prompted the brethren they represented, to send them as a deputation to unite with the Excelsior Lodge on the occasion of their bidding farewell to Bro. Hesse, which he could only attribute to the agitation that had so much affected him in the performance of the duties of the evening; but he would take an early opportunity of addressing to them an official communication upon the subject. Bro. Wiarda put into the hands of the W.M. the following address he had prepared for the occasion; requesting that it might be added to the minutes of the evening; as a further testimony to the esteem Bro. Hesse had so universally secured among the brethren generally in these distant parts:—"Worshipful Master and brethren of the Excelsior Lodge. On behalf of the committee appointed by the French Lodge, Les Amis des Naufragés, I am desired to express to you its unfeigned regret at being prevented from assisting in Lodge on this interesting and solemn occasion. Solely Masonic business of the utmost importance has caused the representation of the Amis des Naufragés to be delegated to a committee. As the brother whose farewell we receive this evening is too well known and appreciated amongst us to permit of his departure from Buenos Ayres without some expression, however feeble, of good feeling and brotherly love, this pleasing duty has devolved upon me. Bro. Samuel Hesse, you are about to leave us—I give to this word the fullest acceptance as extending to all the Masonic family. You, one of the leaders of the Craft, one of the chief pillars of the temple which you also contributed to erect and dedicate to the glory of the Grand Architect of the Universe—a temple whose present position does honour to the founders—to you no labour has been too great, no difficulty too discouraging during the execution of your great work; and I am here to convey the testimony of Les Amis des Naufragés that to your great Masonic qualities, prudence, and advice, allow me to say not only the Excelsior Lodge, but the entire Order in Buenos Ayres is deeply indebted. During your intercourse with Les Amis des Naufragés you have always carefully applied the square to all the corners of the edifice you proposed to raise; and by your level steps and upright actions have offered an example worthy of the imitation of all Masons. But the consciousness of the purity of heart and truth of purpose which has guided you, will constitute a pleasure far above what any estimation in which you might possibly be held could afford; therefore I will only add, Bro. Hesse, adieu! May the Great Architect of the Universe ever guide your footsteps, watch over and protect you, and may the brethren in your native land receive you with the same ardent feelings of regard which have dictated these few words. The good wishes of the French brethren attend you always."

AMERICAN MEMS.

CALIFORNIA.—The Craft in California are harmonious, and peace abounds throughout the jurisdiction. There are one hundred and twenty-two Lodges under the jurisdiction of the Grand Lodge, having a total membership of four thousand seven hundred and twenty-seven.

IOWA.—The Grand Chapter of Iowa will hold its annual communication in the city of Dubuque, on the 7th of September, so as to afford the Companions the opportunity of going directly from said meeting to attend the general grand bodies at Chicago, who commence their session on the 13th of September.

THE WEEK.

THE COURT.—Last Saturday the royal party at Osborne visited Cowes regatta in the Fairy; Prince Alfred's birthday was also celebrated by a dinner party. The Queen and all her children remain in good health. Visits have been interchanged between the Prince Consort and the Grand Duke Constantine of Russia, who is over here again, picking up what information he can as to our navy and arsenals. A plantation of Russian grand dukes and grand duchesses has taken root for some purpose at Torquay, where they have engaged residences for three years. Tounoun Pacha, the little heir apparent to the sovereignty of Egypt, has been taken to Osborne to pay his respects to the Queen, by Sir Moses Montefiore. Other visitors to Osborne mentioned are the Earls of Clarendon and Granville; the Princess Gauromma, and several German sereno highnesses. The inevitable Phipps is of course still in bed waiting—assisted by Colonel and Mrs. Biddulph and the Hon. Flora Macdonald.

FOREIGN NEWS.—Our foreign intelligence this week is scanty and unimportant. The Emperor of the French left Paris on Sunday for the camp at Chalons, and has since left Chalons for Plombières. Preparations are quietly proceeding for the Paris fêtes. A pleasing item in the news from France is that the French government appears to have abandoned its seizures of English newspapers. Paris correspondents are somewhat satirical upon the non-appearance of the expected tranquillizing article in the Moniteur. These pacific articles not having proved to be oil upon the troubled waters, it is hinted that the most peaceful course has been discovered to be silence. Count de Morny has, it is said, assured certain capitalists, on the emperor's authority, "that peace will be permanent." It is stated in commercial circles that the emperor has determined to reduce the import duties on raw materials. Whether true or not, the rates rose 30c. on the report. Various articles in the French press keep up some degree of excitement, particularly in the Constitutionnel by M. Granier de Cassagnac, directed against England and Belgium, who are in the repair of the fortifications of Antwerp a hostile demonstration against France. The Siccle has a strong article against the proposed Italian arrangements. The Nord exclaims against the disarmament of France (?) being met by the Naval Volunteers Reserve Bill. The state of Italy is described as very unsettled. Accounts from Bologna state that Prince Napoleon's corps is to be marched there, and, by degrees, to assume the position which the Austrians held. King Victor Emanuel was to make his entry into Milan on Saturday, when a decree would be issued dividing Lombardy into electoral districts, and that the Piedmontese and Lombard united parliament will immediately assemble after the elections. The press also will be released from its fetters. It is sincerely to be hoped that these good intentions will be carried out. There is a gradual increase of public tranquillity in Lombardy, and it is anticipated that the proceedings of the Zurich conference will be merely of a formal character. An official message from Florence informs us that the elections have been concluded with perfect order, and that the country is quiet, and the inhabitants full of confidence. A telegram from Berlin states that symptoms of congestion of blood to the head of the King of Prussia had caused serious apprehensions. Preparations are making for the congress at Zurich. The plenipotentiaries were to have arrived there on the 6th; the first sitting was to take place on Thursday. Some excitement has arisen among the Servian population from various acts of the Pacha of Belgrade, the principal being the construction of a rampart round that town. The Canada has arrived at Liverpool with advices from New York to the 28th ult. The political news is very unimportant. The news of the peace between France and Austria caused great sensation, and was the topic of the day, to the exclusion of nearly every other matter. Its financial effect was but slight. A Mobile merchant had shot his mistress in the streets of New York, out of jealousy.

INDIA.—With regard to the discontented European troops, the Bengal Harker says:—"It is not yet known how many men will avail themselves of the privilege of returning home, but we are disposed to think that the greater part will stick to their colours, and that the majority of the malcontents will remain with their regiments. A late order, for the present, excludes from the benefits offered to the Indian army in general the 5th European regiment stationed at Berhampore. A fortnight ago, about 300 men of this regiment proceeded to greater lengths than their brethren in the north-western provinces. Separating themselves from the rest of the regiment, they elected officers, appointing one Marshall as their colonel, and framed laws for their government. Marshall, it appears, is a man of ability, and maintained strict discipline. On the receipt of this news in Calcutta, a wing of her Majesty's 99th regiment and a company of the Royal Artillery were despatched by steamers to Berhampore. On the arrival of the troops twenty-four hours were allowed the men for consideration, and on the following day, with the exception of about forty men, they fell in on parade and submitted. The obstinate men have been imprisoned, and a court of inquiry will be held. The authorities have, we think, been too lenient in dealing with the Berhampore mutineers. The whole should have been sent down by steamer to Calcutta, and there tried by court martial.

GENERAL HOME NEWS.—The ministers have held two cabinet councils usual this week. The return of the Registrar General for last week exhibits a further reduction in the mortality of the metropolis, the deaths being 1,387, while in the two previous weeks they were 1,605, and 1,419. There was a corresponding decrease of deaths from diarrhoea. The births registered last week were 1,718. The trial of Dr. Smethurst for the murder of Isabella Banks at Richmond, is to be resumed on Monday next. It is thought that the trial will be presided over by the Lord Chief Justice of the Queen's Bench (Sir Alexander Cockburn). During the interval which has elapsed since the last trial the solicitors for the prisoner have been untiring in their exertions to get up medical evidence in opposition to that of Dr. Taylor, and they express themselves confident that they shall be able to demonstrate the fallacy of Dr. Taylor's theory, on which Smethurst was committed. At the Bodmin Assizes, on Saturday, Stephen Bamfield Lovell Bell, a surgeon, was tried for the murder of Captain Caddy. The crime was committed at Falmouth, on the 23rd of June, and arose out of some family quarrel. A verdict of manslaughter was returned, and the prisoner was sentenced to penal servitude for life. Joseph Warmington, a bootmaker, was examined on his own confession, at Guildhall, relative to having absconded with a cheque and bank notes to the value of seventy pounds, the property of his master, Mr. Lloyd, Newgate-street. The prisoner was committed for trial. A shocking tragedy has just taken place at Stoke Newington. A female expired there on Sunday morning, in consequence of an attempt on the part of the man with whom she lived as his wife to procure abortion. The wretched man immediately after terminated his own existence by cutting his throat. On Saturday, John Riley was executed at York, for the murder of his wife. It will be remembered that Riley, who resided at Hull, cut the throat of his wife, and afterwards attempted suicide, by hanging himself, but was rescued. At the Court of Bankruptcy, on Saturday, a petition presented against the Howbeach Coal Company, and praying for a winding-up order, was dismissed with costs. Another man, Henry Williams, or Hudson, has been apprehended on suspicion of being concerned in the late daring robbery and attempted murder in Shoe-lane. The prisoner underwent a preliminary examination before Sir R. Carden, at the Guildhall, when it was stated that a quantity of plated goods, supposed to be the proceeds of a robbery, was found at the house where Williams was taken. A person named Hebb, described as a commercial traveller, was charged at the Mansion House yesterday with forging a transfer of £500 Three per cent. Consols, and committed for trial. He was apprehended the same morning. A sad occurrence took place in the Channel, off the North Foreland, on Sunday morning. The steam packet Ondine and the collier brig Robert Garden, came into collision during a fog, when the collier was cut in two, sinking immediately, and carrying to the bottom with her four out of the nine persons on board. The neighbourhood of Leeds witnessed a cold blooded murder on Saturday evening. An old man, named Mr. Richard Broughton, on his way to town for the purpose of transacting some business, was attacked by two ruffians armed with bludgeons, and so beaten that he died next day. The murderers are not in custody, but a reward is offered for their apprehension. The builders' strike continues, but some of the shops that were closed on Saturday evening were unexpectedly thrown open, the "document" being withdrawn, and the men resumed their ordinary occupations. None of Messrs. Trollope's old men applied for work on Monday; and as upon the refilling of this establishment rests in a great measure the ultimate result of the contest, much interest attaches itself to this firm. The men express their determination never to "go in" unless under the nine hours system. They were paid their strike money on Monday, the skilled labourers receiving £1, and the unskilled 15s. each. Among recent scientific inventions we may notice a new revolver. Such of our readers who take an interest in the improvement of firearms, we would recommend to inspect the Deane-Harding revolver, just produced by Messrs. Deane and Son, of King William Street. It is a simplification of the Deane and Adams revolver, with this advantage, that it is so constructed that it can be readily taken to pieces for the purpose of cleaning, and as readily put together by the most inexperienced and rawest recruit—the whole of the functions of the revolver being performed by the cock and trigger. Notwithstanding the readiness with which it can be taken to pieces, yet its firmness and solidity when put together again is equal to that of any firearm ever produced. Another advantage is, that by the use of a new lever ramrod, attached to the revolver, it can be loaded with the utmost facility—the ramrod, which is at once simple and powerful, acting vertically on the bullet. To our military and naval brethren such a weapon must prove invaluable. The funds yesterday were slightly weaker, but at the close symptoms of recovery were manifested, and the last price for Consols was 95½ for money and the account. The demand for assistance at the Bank was very active, but this arises from the expectation that the directors may raise the rate of discount, though it is not generally anticipated. Foreign stocks and railway shares left off with a depressed appearance, and the markets were adversely affected by reactionary sales. No bullion operations occurred at the Bank, although there was still an inquiry for remittance abroad.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.—In the HOUSE OF LORDS on Monday, the Marquis of Normanby took occasion to enter into details upon the political complications connected with the affairs of Italy, and warned the Government not to meddle in a controversy in which, as he believed, from the antecedents of Lord Palmerston, the interference would be productive of more harm than good. Lord Wodehouse said the only communication was the transmission of the French despatch suggesting terms of peace to the Austrian Government, and upon these terms no opinion whatever was given. On Tuesday, Lord Stratford de Redcliffe complained of the suspension of the militia ballot, and called attention to the state of the defences of the country. During the last session that had taken place they had peace and war, and peace again, and he feared that they might have the same thing over again during the recess, for he had no faith that the pending negotiations would result in the establishment of peace on a permanent basis. Lord Kingsdown thought the defences of the country would never be in a proper condition unless they resorted to something like a conscription, for they could not otherwise man the requisite defences. The Earl of Ripon said that the Government had the whole question under consideration, and no effort would be spared to place the defences of the country in a satisfactory position; but he thought it would be very injudicious to resort to anything like compulsory service. On Wednesday, several bills were forwarded a stage, but no discussion of any importance arose upon them. The House of Commons sat for some time on Saturday, for the purpose of forwarding a stage several bills, to which there was but little opposition. On Monday, Lord Elcho moved that an humble address be presented to her Majesty, stating that in the opinion of this house it would be consistent neither with the honour nor the dignity of this country, which throughout the late negotiations has preserved a strict and impartial neutrality between the contending powers and used its earnest endeavours to prevent the outbreak of hostilities, to take part in any conference for the purpose of settling the details of a peace, the preliminaries of which had been arranged between the Emperor of the French and the Emperor of Austria. The noble lord said that the conduct of the late government during the war in Italy had been strictly neutral, and he was of opinion that that neutrality should be maintained. He could not agree to consider Austria as the aggressor in the late war, which terminated because the Emperor of France found himself beset by obstacles greater than he had calculated upon on the commencement of hostilities. He believed Austria did not take the step of invading Piedmont until she knew of the extent of the preparations of France, and that, in fact, war was a foregone conclusion. Under these circumstances he could not sympathise with France and Sardinia in a war which he believed to be unnecessary. He believed it was for the benefit of England that she should abstain from interfering in this conference, for he could conceive no possible advantage as likely to accrue from it, while it was full of peril to its future tranquility. Mr. Horsman seconded the motion. Mr. Kinglake moved the previous question. The Chancellor of the Exchequer said the government were prepared to meet the motion of the noble lord with a direct negative; but as the "previous question" had been moved, the government would not hesitate to support it. The fact was that the terms of the peace could be settled by the belligerents themselves; but if a conference should take place it would not be for the purpose of settling the details of a peace, but for the purpose of considering affairs which were not merely Italian, but European. The right hon. gentleman concluded by protesting against binding down the government to a particular course of action in the way attempted to be done by the motion of the noble lord. Mr. S. Herbert said he was sure the house would not agree to the motion. Now that the war was over, it ought not to be said that England refused her sympathies with the allies in their efforts to place matters on a satisfactory footing, and to secure the peace of Europe. Mr. Whiteside said there was no necessity for a congress to settle the affairs of Italy. Lord J. Russell said that circumstances might arise which would render diplomatic intervention necessary, and he could not consent to an ordinance compelling the government to abstain from a conference at which every European power would have a representative. Mr. Disraeli defended the policy of the late government, and recommended Lord Elcho to withdraw his resolution. Lord Palmerston denied that a case had been made out for interference with the discretion of government. The motion was withdrawn. The house did not rise till three in the morning. On Tuesday, on the consideration of the East India Loan Bill, some conversation took place as to the propriety of giving the guarantee of this country for the loan about to be raised for the service of India. In the course of the discussion, Mr. Ayrton animadverted upon the political economical principles which seemed to prevail on the Treasury bench. Sir C. Wood said the question of an imperial guarantee was one of vast importance—far too important to be discussed in the last few days of the session. On Wednesday, Mr. Bright moved for a select committee to inquire into the allegations contained in the petition of Hugh C. E. Childers, Esq., respecting the withdrawal of the Pontefract petition. Mr. Overend said he was glad that Mr. Bright had made this motion, as he had every wish for the fullest investigation, but at the same time he must deprecate the use of the word "defrauding," as applied to his conduct. The hon. and learned gentleman entered into a lengthened explanation in order to show that he had left London under the impression that the scrutiny into the late election for Pontefract was to be proceeded with. Mr. Disraeli thought the house would think that Mr. Overend had at all events vindicated his honour in the transaction. It might have been better if the matter had not been brought before parliament, but as it had been it was better that the inquiry should be proceeded with. Even supposing all that was alleged by Mr. Childers should turn out to be true, he could see no remedy, for the committee could do nothing beyond reporting its opinion, for it could not enable Mr. Childers to present another petition next session. After some further discussion the motion was agreed to. On the consideration of the European Troops (India) Bill, Sir De Lacy Evans repudiated the idea of employing foreigners, and contended that the disaffected troops in India had good ground for complaint that the promises held out to them by the First Minister of the Crown had not been carried out.

COMMERCIAL; AND PUBLIC COMPANIES.—Telegraphic advices have been received from Hong-Kong and Shanghai to the middle of June, the respective dates being the 22nd and 24th. The English accounts were to the 3rd of May. The rates of exchange had receded to 4s. 10½d., and 6s. 6d. It is stated that the export of tea was 60,000,000lbs., showing a decrease of 15,000,000lbs. Large settlements had taken place at Foo-chow at extreme rates. Silk showed an increase of 11,000 bales, the total being 80,000 bales. The market opened at 22s. to 24s. 6d. for No. 1 Tsatlee. In the recent advices from Hayti, it is stated that a law has been passed and confirmed by the Senate, abolishing the impost of fifth, and establishing an export duty of 1½ dollars on every 100lbs. of coffee, payable on the departure of the cargo. This law was brought into effect on the 10th July. The project of a legal process against the mercantile firm of Lloyd's, for their alleged implication with the Emperor Soulouque and his associate Delva, in the coffee and mahogany frauds, occupied attention.—The dividend of the Blackwall railway, for the half-year ending the 30th June last, will be at the rate of £2 15s. per cent. on the capital stock, which is equal to the dividend of 2s. 9d. per share paid at the corresponding period of last year. The North London dividend is at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum against the same payment in the corresponding period of 1858.

PROVIDENT INSTITUTIONS.—A new Assurance Company has lately been established, which contains the principles of life Assurance with that of a tontine, dependent, however, on the death of only one of the assurers. Thus, the Company, which is called the Public, form classes of a given number of persons, at a subscription of £1 1s. each; one-fifth is placed aside for expenses of management, and the other four-fifths invested in the names of trustees for the parties assured; one-third going to the family of the person first dying, and the remaining two-thirds to the person fortunate enough to hold the next number in the list, care being taken that no one party shall hold two consecutive numbers. Thus, supposing a class of five hundred members is formed, twenty per cent. is deducted for all expenses, and the remaining four hundred guineas invested; and on one of the members dying his family will receive about £140; and the next member an endowment of £280, with any interest accruing between the time when the class was first formed and the death of the assurer. By joining two or more of these classes, a man will at all times have his life assured for the benefit of his family, and may come in for something considerable during his life. The premium once paid, no second premium is required to keep the policy in force until the class is dissolved by the death of a member.—At the Annual Meeting of the Royal Assurance Company, a report was presented which cannot be otherwise than most gratifying to the proprietors and assurers, as showing that notwithstanding the extraordinary loss by the fire at Valparaiso (upwards of £20,000), the losses still continue less than the calculated average. The premiums in the fire department have increased since 1855 from £130,060 to £196,148 per annum, or more than 50 per cent., whilst in London the business has increased from £2,150 in 1848 to £37,681, it having increased by upwards of £16,000 during the past two years; the success being attributed by the directors mainly to the exertions of the London manager, Mr. Johnston. In the life department the new premiums amounted in the last year to £12,354, against £8,850 in 1856; the total sum now assured being £387,752. After paying the dividend and bonus of 7s. per share, £30,000 will be carried to the reserve fund, which will be thus increased to £140,850.

PUBLIC AMUSEMENTS.

HAYMARKET THEATRE.—The new farce, "Out of Sight, Out of Mind," by Mr. Charles Mathews, is as successful as it is possible for anything to be in the dog days when people are almost too languid either to applaud or condemn. The acting of the author in the part of Gatherwood the absent man, is one of the drollest impersonations it is possible to conceive. Poole's farce, "A Nabob for an Hour," has been revived for the purpose of introducing "a young lady" who has never before appeared on the stage, to a London public. The fair debutante is, we believe, so young that she has narrowly escaped being a "prodigy." She made a hit, and we have no doubt will become a public favourite.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

ROYAL FREEMASONS' SCHOOL FOR FEMALE CHILDREN.—We have been requested to correct a statement in our last week's paper, that "Emily Jane Nixon" is the "daughter of the late Bro. John Nixon." It should be "of the late Bro. Robert Nixon."

"ROBERT STUBBS."—The subject shall be inquired into.

NORTHUMBERLAND LODGE (No. 1003), NEWCASTLE, NEW BRUNSWICK.—The subscription of this Lodge has been received.

LONDON, SATURDAY, AUGUST 20, 1859.

MASONIC MISSIONS.

It is our mission at this period of the year to record the sayings and doings at the various Provincial Grand Lodges, and to make such notes upon them as they may seem to merit, with the view, as far as possible, to establish that uniformity of practice which ought to exist throughout the Order. We now, therefore, propose to ourselves briefly to review the proceedings at those Provincial Grand Lodges which have been held and reported since the commencement of our present series.

First on our list comes Surrey—and certainly the business of this province is so well conducted under the direction of the Right Worshipful Provincial Grand Master, Bro. Dobie, Past Grand Registrar, and his excellent and indefatigable Deputy, Bro. Dr. Harcourt—and the proceedings of the Prov. Grand Lodge are marked by such close attention to the laws of the Order, that it would be impossible to do otherwise than commend its working to the attention of the brethren of other provinces. One most gratifying fact was, that the Provincial Grand Lodge met in the town containing the youngest Lodge in the province and which had been only consecrated a few weeks prior to this meeting, and under the direction of the members of which every possible provision had been made for the comfort of the brethren. Perhaps the only noticeable point of the evening to which we need allude is to be found in the observations of the Right Worshipful Provincial Grand Master, on some remarks contained in the Magazine condemnatory of ladies having been allowed to take part in the musical ceremonies consequent on the formation of the new Lodge. Bro. Dobie clearly showed that they were not in the Lodge, and stated that he was as convinced as any brother of the importance of sacredly guarding the ceremonies from innovations and the outer world. In our remarks we never intended in the slightest degree to reflect on the R.W. Bro. Dobie, Bro. Wilson, or others taking part in the ceremony—making no doubt that the ladies were so placed as to be heard whilst they could not see; but we felt bound to enter our protest against the innovation whilst it was yet in its infancy, in order to prevent its extending; for had we merely reported that ladies added their voices to swell the harmony of the anthems and choruses, without comment—it might, perhaps, at some distant part of the kingdom or the globe, have been taken as sufficient authority for their being brought more closely into connection with our ceremonies, and the Freemasons Magazine and Bro. Dobie would have been alike astonished to find themselves quoted as authorities for an act which they could not too strongly repudiate. Again congratulating the Right Worshipful Provincial Grand Master on the prosperity of his province, we may just hint to the brethren that we should like to hear a little more of the proceedings in their various Lodges, and that if their appointments do not generally appear in our weekly list, it is because we have not received a return from a single Lodge in reply to our application for the dates, places, and hour of meeting.

We will now proceed to Kent, the Provincial Grand Lodge of which was held on the 18th ult.; and here we must be allowed to express our regret that the Right Worshipful Provincial Grand Master should have overruled the proclamation of the Director of Ceremonies, calling upon all brethren below the rank of Warden, to retire prior to the opening of the Prov. Grand Lodge, as a violation of the constitution of the Craft—and we say this with all deference to the learned brother—to whose dictum as regards the law of the land we should readily bow, though we cannot do so as respects the law of Freemasonry. A Provincial Grand Lodge consists only of Past Masters, actual Masters, and Wardens for the time being; and no others should be allowed to be present, either during the opening and closing, though the Provincial Grand Master may, if he see fit, admit other brethren to be present as visitors during the period of conferring honours and the transaction of other business, in which however they can take no part. Indeed, we believe it is rather desirable that they should be so admitted, in order to induce them to take such interest in the Provincial Grand Lodge as to attend from a distance; but they have no more right to be present during the opening and closing of the Prov. Grand Lodge, than have brethren below the chair during the ceremony of installation. Beyond the appointment of the Provincial Grand Officers but little business was transacted, that being reserved for a Provincial Grand Lodge of Emergency, the day for holding which we believe has not yet been fixed. Amongst the new appointments we notice that of Bro. Harvey Boys (who has long been well known in the province) as Deputy Provincial Grand Master. As regards the proceedings of the latter part of the day, it is not our province here to speak; but we must be allowed to suggest, that the Right Worshipful Provincial Grand Master having once granted his dispensation for the brethren to give a ball in Masonic clothing, should not have at the last moment withdrawn it merely because he was displeased at the shortcomings of one brother in carrying out the arrangements intrusted to him. It was unfair to the rest of the brethren, and caused great disappointment to their fair friends.

Passing onwards we come to Hampshire, where the Provincial Grand Lodge was held on the same day as that of Kent, and here we find that something like business was transacted. That excellent specimen of the old English gentleman and sailor, the Right Worshipful Bro. Sir Admiral Lucius Curtis, presiding, having held the office of Provincial Grand Master for a period of nineteen years with honour to himself and advantage to the Craft. The first business was the confirming the minutes of the previous regular Provincial Grand Lodge, and of a Lodge of Emergency held to consider the report of the committee on charities, the only question arising being, whether the number of thirty-one, as forming the committee, was not too large; but after some discussion, the number as originally agreed to was approved. After a short discussion on the oft mooted subject of the Provincial Lodges being represented by proxy in Grand Lodge, which was very properly allowed to drop, the most pleasing part of the business of the day was proceeded with—that of the presentation of a testimonial to Bro. J. Rankin Stebbing, in acknowledgment of the great services he has rendered to the Craft in the province of which he is so distinguished a member. It is our misfortune, occasionally, to disagree with Bro. Stebbing on questions of policy, but we have ever felt that a more independent, able, and well intentioned brother, does not exist in the Craft; and we therefore may be allowed to congratulate him upon his services being so handsomely acknowledged by the brethren amongst whom he is best known; and the testimonial must be the more valuable from the manner in which it was presented in presence of the Grand Lodge of the province.

Next in order appears to be Somersetshire—the distinctive feature of which was the consecration of a new Lodge in the ancient town of Glastonbury, by the Deputy Provincial Grand Master, Bro. Randolph, in the absence of the venerable Provincial Grand Master, Col. Tynte, in consequence of illness. The remainder of the business transacted does not appear to call for any comment.

We now come to the province of Norfolk, which a short time since occupied a portion of our attention—and our columns were freely opened to our correspondents to prove, if they could, that on some points we were in error. Our articles on Masonic Missions must necessarily, from want of sufficient data, be somewhat deficient in their details, and we may perhaps be occasionally led into false conclusions for the want of those data. As regards Norfolk, however, all the arguments brought forward at the late Provincial Grand Lodge to prove that we were in error are only, to our mind, so much corroborative evidence of the general correctness of our views. In the first place, we deny that our remarks were made in the "dictatorial" spirit attributed to us by the R.W. Prov. Grand Master—they were in fact merely suggestions intended to direct the attention of the brethren to the Masonic requirements of the province, with a view of stimulating them to greater exertions in improving its position. The Right Worshipful Provincial Grand Master, however, takes us somewhat closely to task, and because we suggested that certain large towns ought to be in possession of Lodges, informs us that "To propose to establish Lodges in places where there were at present no Masons, seemed to him to be a proposal not exactly in accordance with the ordinary line of conduct which any wise man would consider proper for the accomplishment of the object he had in view." Now we deny that we ever suggested that Lodges were to be established where there were no Masons; but we do hold, that were the Provincial Grand Master and his Deputy—ay, and his Grand Secretary—to exert themselves and look around them, they would easily find many Masons who are denied all communion with their brethren because of the distance at which they reside from any Lodge, and who would willingly exert themselves to raise new Lodges and extend the benefits of the Order if they received sufficient encouragement and assistance from those who are placed in authority over them. But our Right Worshipful Brother asks us, "Was it meant that brethren should travel from a distant part of the country to these places to establish Lodges in them, and not only to establish them, but to work them and carry them on?" To some extent it should be so, but only as we have just indicated; and how far that may be successfully done is shown by the results which have attended the exertions of Bro. Dr. Harcourt, in Surrey, and Bro. Gavin Pocock in Sussex. But Bro. Cabbell suggests a plan of his own—a kind of itinerant Lodge, in which we cannot agree—travelling brethren seeking for converts to the Order—the making of new Masons merely for the purpose of creating new Lodges. Here it is—"He would attempt to supply the gap in the problem which had been so ostentatiously started. He would propose that the services of some brethren should be devoted to the making of Masons in those distant places, and then, when the Masons were made, the means would have been provided for making the Lodges." To this we decidedly object. What we wish to see is the bringing back of brethren separated from the Craft by distance from Lodges into closer communion with their brethren, and the making of new members of our Order only through their example and influence as upright men, good citizens, and sincere friends. We could point out many towns in the kingdom in which there are worthy Masons who fancy they have not the power to create new Lodges within themselves, but would readily assist the Provincial Grand Officers in doing so. We make these remarks not in the spirit of dictation attributed to us, but because we sincerely believe that Bro. Cabbell uttered not one word more than he felt when he said, "He could assure the brethren that there was no brother in the Order who felt a more ardent determination to do everything in his power, and to the fullest extent, according to his humble ability, for the promotion of the cause of Freemasonry; because he thought that in the promotion of that sacred cause he was carrying out all the great behests of a kind and all merciful Creator, and doing everything he could to promote the general welfare of mankind."

But it was not the Right Worshipful Grand Master alone who felt bound to reply to the Freemasons' Magazine. Bro. Fox, the Provincial Grand Secretary, informing us "It was true that there were but eight Lodges in Norfolk, but from the present aggregate number of their members, they were equal to sixteen average Lodges. So far from Masonry being retrogressive or stationary in Norfolk, it had materially advanced since the accession to office of Bro. Cabbell, and it was now gradually progressing. Masonry was almost a dead letter in the province till the Provincial Grand Master's installation, but since that time the number of Masons in the county had trebled." We are glad to hear this from so excellent an authority, but then the question naturally arises, how long a period was suffered to elapse between the time of Bro. Cabbell's acceptance of the office of Provincial Grand Master and his installation? It is true there may have been local causes to prevent that installation at an earlier date, unknown to us, but that is no ground for accusing us of misrepresentation or of endeavouring to create by inuendo a feeling against the Provincial Grand Master, as Bro. Fox does in the following passage:—"He could easily understand that from misrepresentations and want of accurate information, the writer of the article in question might in his zeal for the Order reflect in somewhat strong terms on the province, but these should have been confined within charitable bounds, and attempts should not have been made by inuendo and otherwise to create in the minds of the Norfolk brethren a feeling of disrespect if not of hostility to their Provincial Grand Master." Now nothing could be further from the desire of any writer connected with the Freemasons' Magazine, as there are no brethren who know better the universal philanthropy of our Right Worshipful Brother, or who can more fully appreciate the value of his services and contributions in aid of our Masonic charities; and we willingly endorse the statement of Bro. Fox, that "the worthy brother by his benevolent actions and universal kindness had merited the love and approbation of the brethren." But is it because we fully appreciate the benevolent disposition of Bro. Cabbell—is it because the poor of every district which he may visit is sure to be remembered and benefited—as they were at North Walsham by the handsome gift of £30, added to the money gathered at the church (and we rejoice that the amount was given to the local charities, as it is not to those out of the Craft that we would appeal for support to our own institutions)—that we are to be tongue-tied, and not point out to our Right Worshipful Brother what we believe to be defects in his administration—defects which we feel tend to the injury of the Craft in his province? Now, in the report of the proceedings on the 5th inst., we are informed, (and the report was received from a brother whose character for accuracy as a member of the local press we know to justly rank very high), "the various officers of the Provincial Grand Lodge were reappointed by the Provincial Grand Master." Surely in the eight Lodges, equal to sixteen in other provinces, there were some brethren whose exertions and positions should have entitled them to some recognition—to some share of those honours which it is in the power of the Provincial Grand Master to bestow. Our Right Worshipful brother may rest assured that there is no course so likely to check the exertion and the just ambition of deserving brethren as to keep the same officers for too lengthened a period. In the Supreme Grand Lodge, at least five of the officers are changed every year; and the feeling has long been gaining ground that, excepting in such offices as those of the Grand Secretary and Grand Registrar, the more frequent the change, the better will it be for the interests of the Craft, and the greater will be the opportunity of the Grand Master to reward deserving brethren by giving them a share in the honours of the Craft which, though many may aspire to, few can of necessity obtain. In a province we hold there is no just ground for deviating from the practice of the Supreme Grand Lodge, unless indeed the members are so few that men of sufficient knowledge and standing cannot be obtained to fill the offices—a contingency which we are sure cannot arise in Norfolk. We have spoken thus freely because we feel we were challenged to it by the Right Worshipful Provincial Grand Master and the Provincial Grand

Secretary—and because having been so challenged, we should neither have been doing our duty to the Craft or to ourselves had we shrunk from entering the lists, and fully explaining our views upon the points mooted at the Provincial Grand Lodge and festival. There is another point upon which we would have said a word, had it not been so strongly deprecated by many of the speakers, and because we are aware it is one for which the Provincial Grand Master can be in no way held responsible—the admission of strangers to the banquet, as a restraint is thus put upon that free intercommunication between the brethren which ought to be the characteristic of a Masonic gathering.

In our last number, in addition to our report of the Provincial Grand Lodge of Norfolk, we also published the proceedings at the Provincial Grand Lodge of Cumberland, over which Bro. Greaves, the Deputy Provincial Grand Master, presided, the actual Grand Master, Sir James Graham, having, from the pressure of political duties and other causes, long ceased to take any active part in Freemasonry. We have heard but little of the province for some time past, and are therefore gratified to find that, under the rule of Bro. Greaves, it is gradually rising in importance and the brethren increasing not only in numbers but in intelligence. The Lodge at Maryport, where the Provincial Grand Lodge was held, was a few months since all but extinct, but is now rapidly increasing; and the Whitehaven Lodge, which five years ago possessed only twenty members, now numbers nearly one hundred and twenty, and Bro. Fletcher, one of its members, has served the office of Steward to the Girls' School. This is the more gratifying to us, because we had the honour of being present at the first Provincial Grand Lodge held by Bro. Greaves, towards the close of 1854—ere our pen had begun to show itself in the Masonic Mirror, then on the eve of starting—and we could not but witness with pain that there were dissensions in the province that boded no good for its prosperity. These, under the influence of Bro. Greaves' kindly rule have happily passed away, and he has the satisfaction of feeling that, though not a large, Cumberland is a happy and united province.

The Right Worshipful Bro. Colonel Vernon, the Provincial Grand Master for Staffordshire, has held his Provincial Grand Lodge and congratulated the brethren on the progress which the Order is making in his province, the number of brethren having nearly doubled in the last twelve months—now numbering something like six hundred—a result which we believe may, in a great degree, be attributed to the high estimation in which our gallant brother and his worthy deputy, Bro. Ward, are held throughout the province. Amongst other appointments we notice that of Bro. Major M'Knight as Provincial Grand Superintendent of Works. Can any of the brethren inform us what are the qualifications of the gallant Major for the office? Is he an officer of Engineers—or an architect with the rank of Major in a rifle or other local corps?

The Provincial Grand Lodge of the Eastern division of South Wales has been held, under the presidency of Bro. Charles Kemeys Kemeys-Tynte—the worthy scion of a worthy and truly Masonic house; but we do not notice anything in the proceedings to call for special remark, excepting that the Provincial Grand Master transacted the business of Provincial Grand Lodge in one apartment, and then with his Provincial Grand Officers joined those brethren of the province not yet members of the governing body in another room—they being assembled under the banner of the Neath Lodge. This is as it should be.

In Dorsetshire, (which has for the last two years been under the direction of the Grand Registrar in consequence of the death of Bro. Willett), a new era is opening in the Craft, Bro. Grundy having just been installed, at Bridport, as Provincial Grand Master, by Bro. Cosens, the Worshipful Master of the youngest Lodge in the province—the St. Mary's (1009). An excellent sermon was preached at Allington Church by the Rev. Bro. Henry Rawlinson, and the whole of the proceedings appear to have been marked by the utmost cordiality—the presage, we hope, of a happy and prosperous reign for the new Provincial Grand Master.

Having thus briefly observed on the Provincial Grand Lodges which have been recently held, we proceed to notice some errors into which it appears that we have unwittingly fallen in previous numbers. Thus Bro. Herbert, the Secretary of the St. Cuthberga Lodge, No. 905, and Past Master of No. 154, Hants, informs us that we were in error in stating in our number of June, that Bro. C. Rawe of No. 963, was the Provincial Grand Registrar—it should have been Bro. C. R. Rowe, of No. 905—he having been appointed whilst Worshipful Master of his own Lodge by the late Provincial Grand Master, Bro. Willett, in 1857, the year of his death. He further states that he is not aware that Wrexham has a Royal Arch Chapter, and that statement is an evident error of the writer. On other points Bro. Herbert (whose letter is only dated the 12th inst.) shall speak for himself:—

“I hope you will also allow me a word or two on behalf of the Lodge with respect to its place of meeting. We are stated to meet at a tavern, although you believe that Wimborne and other places named ‘have town halls in which the Lodge could meet.’ Your informant does not appear to have been aware that we have no choice. There are, indeed, in the town, two other rooms, but from the high rent demanded for each, and from other causes affecting one of them, both wholly inevitable, we are obliged to rent a room at the Crown Hotel, of which we keep the key, thus making it, in fact, a private room. Be assured, that we fully agree with you as to the ineligibility of a tavern, if a suitable room could be obtained elsewhere.

“Again, with respect to our name, which you designate as ‘fanciful and of no significance.’ All I shall say on this point is, that on looking through the list in the Freemasons' Pocket Book, I see very many names to which (not knowing the reasons for their selection) I conceive those terms might be applied with much more propriety; and that when our name was proposed by our first W.M., it was considered by the brethren as peculiarly appropriate and significant.”

“Finally, may I add a word on the working of the Lodge. It has been considered by visiting brethren as respectable and efficient, and has been honoured with the approbation of the D. Prov. G.M. We have music in our ceremonies, and every W.M. hitherto has been able to go through his own initiations, &c. The average attendance for a year and a half to Christmas last was twelve, and, notwithstanding all losses by deaths and removals, we still number twenty-five.”

A correspondent also corrects some errors into which we have fallen in our article on Warwickshire. Neither Foleshill or Coleshill have Lodges, the asterisk having been accidentally placed against them. A new Lodge has been or is about to be petitioned for, for Sutton Coldfield, under the auspices of the Rev. Bro. Bedford, rector of that place, Provincial Grand Chaplain, and P.M. of the Lodge of Light, Birmingham, having succeeded Bro. Blake in the early part of 1858. Bro. Dr. Hopkins continues a member of the St. Paul's, and, having paid his fees to the close of the present year, he was a few months since elected an honorary life member, he being now a resident of Jersey. Bro. Weiss was the Worshipful Master of the Howe Lodge in 1858, and was a munificent benefactor to the Lodge. Bro. Hall, erroneously stated to have been the Worshipful Master of this Lodge, was installed as Worshipful Master of the Lodge of Light in May last, as successor to the Rev. Bro. Bedford. The Royal Arch Chapter of Fortitude (No. 51), Birmingham, is still at work, but not with much efficiency; the Howe (No. 857), of which Comp. Dr. Hopkins is the First Principal, being the favourite, all the officers being well up in their duties, and the furniture and appointments most complete. There is no Chapter at Alcester. We are informed that the Athol Lodge (No. 88), Birmingham, about six months ago purchased a building for many years used as a synagogue, and have converted it into a Masonic hall.

* We shall be happy to receive another letter from Bro. Herbert giving us the reasons.

As we shall shortly proceed with our Masonic Missions, we shall be obliged by any information or statistics with which the brethren may favour us, in order to ensure the utmost possible accuracy.

MASONRY IN INDIA.

GREAT and important changes are taking place in our Indian empire, and at such a critical period of its history a brief review of the present condition of Masonry, with a few remarks on the practical inefficiency of existing Masonic institutions, may not be amiss.

The several presidencies constitute Masonic districts, though one of them (Bombay) has not yet been entrusted to a Provincial Grand Master. Lodges, however, working therein under Scotch warrants, enjoy provincial government. Bengal, comprising a vast extent of country, in which there are considerably more European stations than in either of the subordinate presidencies, whilst possessing a District Grand Lodge, has not established it in a central position so as to ensure a speedy communication with the numerous Lodges under its control, nor indeed as at present constituted would such an arrangement be feasible. Calcutta with its nine Lodges demands a separate government, and until additional provinces are formed, must imperatively remain the head quarters; but the remoteness of so many Lodge stations from the seat of authority renders highly expedient the creation of additional provinces. If correspondence were the only subject for consideration, no alteration in existing institutions would seem necessary; the almost unrivalled postal arrangements of India, which combine speed with economy, making such objection invalid. But the personal supervision of the Provincial Grand Master or his deputy, ought to be experienced by every Lodge in the district, and these brethren must be enthusiastic Masons as well as travellers, to favour the Peshawur or Lahore Lodges with even an occasional visit, that is to say, of course if residing (as such officers are wont to do) in the vicinity of Calcutta.

Bengal should be subdivided into at least three provinces, though more are really requisite; these ought to comprise, respectively, the northern, midland, and southern Lodge stations, and might be named the District Grand Lodges of the Punjab, of Meerut, and of Calcutta. In the event of such a project being seriously entertained, it would be a matter of but slight difficulty to arrange and determine the limits and extent of each jurisdiction. A further solidity and durability could be cemented by the selection of Deputy Provincial Grand Masters from brethren situated at a distance from the stations inhabited by the Provincial Grand Masters, a greater number of Lodges being thus brought under the direct notice of, and amenable to, high Masonic authority.

The presidency of Madras should possess another District Grand Lodge, whose jurisdiction ought to comprise the Lodges situate in its western and southern territory. The capital, Madras, has quite enough Lodges to form a separate province, there being no other station in India with so many. This presidency would enjoy a more complete Masonic government if it were formed into the provinces of Trichinopoly and Madras, having, as recommended to the Bengal side, Deputy Provincial Grand Masters at convenient stations. The Bombay presidency shews a great weakness in English Lodges; Masonry there being almost a monopoly of our Scotch brethren, to whose possession of a Provincial Grand Lodge whilst English Masons are without one, may be chiefly attributed the present decay. A District Grand Lodge under the constitution of England should at once be established, or in a few years English Lodges in Bombay will be amongst the things that have been.

state of affairs, and it is to be hoped that, ere long, provincial government will be granted to this presidency.

The Birman empire will soon demand a distinct government, but for the present should remain a dependency.

The importance of an adequate supply of Masonic provinces in this vast country cannot be over estimated; the necessity for local authority, to exercise a vigilant supervision and prevent the constant reference of trivial matters to head quarters in London, is as requisite in India as elsewhere; but many, very many disadvantages under which Indian Masons labour, their brethren in other colonies are wholly exempt from. In Hindostan the European population is not permanently resident, and persons take at the utmost but a life interest in the country. Military men and civilians in her Majesty's Indian service comprise by far the bulk of the white society. At each of the three principal stations, viz, Calcutta, Madras, and Bombay, there is of course a considerable sprinkling of professional men, such as surgeons, lawyers, &c., and also merchants and sailors, but even then they bear but a slight proportion to the government employés. There are few Europeans located in India, no matter to what profession or trade belonging, who expect to end their days in that country. In possession of a moderate competence, or of a hardly earned pension, the majority of Europeans gladly avail themselves of the facilities for overland transit to the civilized lands of the west afforded by the magnificent steamers of the Peninsular and Oriental Company. Few of our war worn veterans remain in India to repose upon their laurels, after a protracted residence has secured a comfortable and honourable retirement. Merchants and professional men have generally made ample fortunes and departed long before time has tinged their locks with grey. It thus follows that a lasting and time honoured connexion with the Lodge of one's initiation is a rare and almost unheard of occurrence; no staff of veteran Past Masters exists in any Lodge—brethren who have watched with mingled feelings of fear and hope its changing fortunes; the members of to-day will be unknown and forgotten twenty years hence. Brethren at the upper stations have yet more to complain of—Lodges up country being composed almost entirely of military officers or government officials, any disturbance or call for troops may deprive one of them at a swoop of half its members, and render a future meeting impossible. If, by some good chance, enough brethren are quartered together to apply legally for a warrant of constitution at a station unprovided with a Lodge, so much time is expended in obtaining the necessary authority, that on its arrival there are possibly not two of the applicants remaining together.

It is in the north west provinces, and in the Bombay presidency (more especially the latter, where direct communication with London is necessary upon every occasion), that the evils of procrastination are principally apparent; and there is great reason to believe that a few appointments therein of Provincial Grand Masters would much benefit the Craft.

When seven or more brethren are for a time occupants of the same station, and desirous of establishing a Lodge, a dispensation to commence working ought to be at once procurable, and the permission cheerfully accorded by the delegated authority. Upon such occasions there is generally a rush of candidates for initiation, and after the first meeting but little fear of a dissolution need be apprehended, at least for a time. It will often happen that members of Lodges (long constituted) are distinguished at intervals by alternate fits of enthusiasm and apathy for many consecutive months. Zeal and attention will animate every brother, whilst through an unfortunate selection of a Master, or other disastrous calamity, the Lodge may be plunged into temporary difficulties; members begin to look coldly upon one another, become slack in their attendance, irregular in the payment of dues, careless in their behaviour, and slovenly in their work—lose all pride in themselves as a body, and become divided into cliques, all of which herald an approaching dissolution. A timely warning of their possible fate, together with a short admonition from the Prov. Grand Master, would in most cases recall these erring brethren to a proper frame of mind, and dispose their hearts to profit by his advice; but without local supervision, in the event of such gloomy feeling prevailing, what must be the inevitable result? One Lodge the less on the roll of England.

A sudden outbreak, a simultaneous change of station, causing a partial dispersion of working brethren, would in many parts of India be fatal to the prospects of a Lodge; the Worshipful Master, Past Masters, and Wardens, might all be removed from the scene of their labours, and the remnant be of too recent initiation to act prudently at such a crisis. A Prov. Grand Master or Deputy could in the majority of cases readjust matters upon a firm and satisfactory basis, either by actual attendance or by the selection of an efficient brother to preside over the deserted flock; in fact it is scarcely possible for a contingency to arise, that will prevent a really good Prov. Grand Master from continuing every Lodge under his jurisdiction in active existence. It may be necessary to remark that Prov. Grand Masters should be selected as far as possible from amongst professional men or persons in permanent civil or military employ; for if such office be held by brethren liable to removal, Indian Masons would gain but little by the more plentiful establishment of Masonic provinces.

Thus far have we written on data with which we have been kindly furnished by correspondents in India; but there is also an English side to the picture, which, being within our knowledge, we should not be acting fairly were we to withhold it from the brethren. The subject of a re-distribution of districts and the addition of three Provincial Grand Masters for India, has for many months past occupied the attention of the authorities at home, and a scheme was prepared for dividing India into five districts (there are at present only two, Bengal and Madras) viz., Bombay, Madras, Bengal and Burmah, the North West Provinces, and the Punjab. This scheme, which we have heard met with the approval of the Most Worshipful Grand Master, was by his lordship's desire submitted to a considerable number of influential Masons in India, including the past and present Grand Masters and others, and with, we believe, one exception declared to be impracticable, and likely to prove injurious to Masonry in India; it being urged that it would be very difficult to find brethren to fill the office of Grand Master, stationary at one district, of sufficient standing to make Masonry respected; and that owing to the constant moving of the members of Lodges from place to place, it would very shortly render it impossible to hold a Grand Lodge at all. We believe that our foregoing observations have proved these statements to be to a considerable extent at least, fallacious; but, under the circumstances, we do not well see how the Grand Master could act in the face of these opinions excepting by abandoning the scheme. It now, however, remains for the brethren in India themselves to consider the matter. If they wish, as we are assured they do, for a re-distribution of the districts, and the appointment of a greater number of resident Provincial Grand Masters, they have only to memorialize the Grand Master upon the subject; and should the majority of the Lodges concur in opinion, we feel no doubt, from his lordship's repeated declarations in Grand Lodge, that he will readily fall in with their wishes, and appoint such brethren to rule over them as may appear best fitted to promote the interests of the Order, maintain its dignity, and receive the support of the Craft in the districts which they may have intrusted to their superintendence; and no persons will be better enabled to judge of this than the members of the Lodges whom they may be called upon to preside over, if they can mutually agree on one or two names to submit to the Most Worshipful Grand Master, care being taken that nothing like local jealousies shall be allowed to interfere with their choice.

MUSIC AND THE MASONIC RITUAL.

BY BRO. MATTHEW COOKE.*

[OWING to the change of form in The Freemasons' Magazine, many persons who did not subscribe to the last series would only become partially acquainted with the present subject, unless they felt sufficient interest in it to procure the previous numbers. The author has, therefore, prefixed a resumé of the two preceding papers on "Music and the Masonic Ritual, which have already appeared.

Fully recognizing the revival that has taken place in Masonry through the instrumentality of the papers in the Freemasons' Magazine, known as "Our Architectural Chapter," we put in a plea for a revival of the musical element in our body, founding our pretensions on the increased interest that has been manifested by the outer world, as well as in the Craft, in religious, artistic, and architectural subjects; and we further based our claim on the recognition of music as one of the seven liberal sciences recommended to the especial study of every Craftsman.

In the first paper (p. 537, Vol. vi.), we opened with some remarks on music, both as an art and science, and we combated the erroneous impression that few people are gifted with the voice to produce music, showing that every individual that has the powers of speech must, of necessity, be able to sing, although that gift should be of the most limited extent. We then passed on to remark that music was given us, among other perceptions of the beautiful, by the G.A.O.T.U. himself, for our especial delight and amusement; that the most noble use to which we could devote it was to hymn his praise as the Giver of all good gifts; and that licentious ideas could not arise from music itself, but only when used to heighten the expressions of loose and profane words; finishing with a curious extract on the value and uses of a good voice.

In the second paper (p. 688, Vol. vi.), we entered upon the inquiry of the wonderful effects of our art recorded in the writings of the ancient pagans, and its medicinal virtues. We also gave general definitions of melody, harmony, and rhythm; and, returning to our starting point, discoursed of the kinds of music adopted by the ancients in their mysteries, and the instruments in use among them. We traced the Pythagorean system of sounds to its formation; the rites of the Druids, so far as they were illustrated by music, and some general remarks upon the Phallic or song-dance of the ancients; concluding this portion of the subject by the various references to Holy Writ in which music and the dance are commemorated.]

In the previous papers, above referred to, it will have been particularly noticed by such of our readers who have perused them, that we have avoided the subject of the music of the Egyptians, while alluding to the rites of initiation of the principal mysteries of antiquity. This we have done advisedly, because the Egyptian and Hebrew music are so closely allied, that we can hardly consider the former without trenching on the latter. However, we hope in the present paper to dispose of the Egyptian music before entering upon the great inquiry of the art, as recognized in the Jewish and Christian churches. And as we know of no better authority than Sir Gardner Wilkinson† on all that appertains to Egyptian antiquities, we shall make considerable use of his labours to elucidate our meaning, and transfer from the work referred to such portions as we find suitable to the subject matter in hand. With these remarks we continue our investigation, and find that in Egypt it was not thought unbecoming the gravity and dignity of a priest to admit musicians into his house, or to take pleasure in witnessing the dance; and, seated with their wives and family, in the midst of their friends, the highest functionaries of the sacerdotal order enjoyed the lively scene. In the same manner, at a Greek entertainment, diversions of all kinds were introduced; and Xenophon and Plato inform us that Socrates, the wisest of men, amused his friends with music, jugglers, mimics, buf-foons, and whatever could be desired for exciting cheerfulness and mirth.

Though it is impossible for us now to form any notion of the style of Egyptian music, yet we can make some near approach to its character, and we may be allowed to conjecture that it was studied on scientific principles; for, from the great attention paid to it by Pythagoras, many of whose years were spent in learning "the wisdom of the Egyptians," there is every reason to believe that music was looked upon as an important science, and diligently studied by the priesthood. According to Diodorus, it was not customary to make music part of their education, being deemed useless and even injurious, as tending to render the minds of men effeminate: but this remark can only apply to the custom of studying it as an amusement, which might lead to luxurious and dissolute habits; and Plato, who was well acquainted with the usages of the Egyptians, distinctly says that they considered music of the greatest consequence, from its beneficial effects upon the mind of youth. This is confirmed by Strabo who asserts that the children of the Egyptians were taught letters, the songs appointed by law, and a certain kind of music, established by government to the exclusion of every other; and Diodorus himself, not only allows the invention of music to have been ascribed by the Egyptians to divine origin, but shows that the poets and musicians of Greece visited Egypt for the purpose of improvement.

The authority of Plato, who had spent thirteen years in the country and had paid particular attention to the institutions of the Egyptians, is of the greatest weight on this question; and the whole passage connected with it is of so much interest that Sir Gardner Wilkinson quotes it as follows:—

"Athen. Guest. The plan we have been laying down for the education of youth was known long ago to the Egyptians; that nothing but beautiful forms and fine music should be permitted to enter into the assemblies of young people. Having settled what those forms and what the music should be, they exhibited them in their temples; nor was it allowable for painters, or other imitative artists, to innovate, or invent any forms different from what were established; nor lawful, either in painting, statuary, or any branches of music, to make any alteration. Upon examination, therefore, you will find that the pictures and statues made ten thousand years ago are in no particular better or worse than what they now make.

"Clin. What you say is wonderful!

"Athen. Yes; it is in the true spirit of legislation and policy. Other things, practised among that people, may, perhaps, be of a trifling nature; but what they ordained about music is right, and it deserves consideration, that they were able to make laws of this kind, firmly establishing such melody as was fitted to rectify the perverseness of nature. This must have been the work of the Deity, or of some divine man; as, in fact, they say in Egypt, that the music which has been so long preserved was composed by Isis, and the poetry likewise; so that, as I said, if any one is able to apprehend the rectitude of them, he ought to have the courage to reduce them to law and order. For the search of pleasure and pain, which is always directed to the use of new music, perhaps possesses no great power of corrupting the consecrated choir by an accusation of its antiquity. It appears, therefore, that the choir of the Egyptians was by no means capable of being corrupted, but that the contrary was entirely the case."

That they paid very great attention to the study of music, and had arrived at a very accurate knowledge of the art, is evident, when we consider the nature of the instruments they used, and the perfect acquaintance they must have had with the principles of harmony; for Athenæus† expressly tells us that both the Greeks and barbarians were taught by refugees from Egypt, and that the Alexandrians were the most scientific and skilful players on pipes and other instruments.

In the infancy of music, as Dr. Burney has justly remarked, "no other instruments were known than those of percussion, and it was, therefore, little more than metrical." Then followed the pipe, made of reeds, which grew in the rivers and lakes, and as improvement followed improvement, by the time the Egyptians were a great nation, music became a noble and valued science. They also appear to have perfectly understood how to produce a scale from a smaller number of strings, by shortening them on a neck, in a similar manner to our modern violin. From this we argue that they must have attentively studied the nature of musical sounds, and extended to this the same minute and serious investigation as to the other sciences. Though Diodorus thinks that the Egyptians did not consider music a necessary part of an accomplished education, yet he attributes* the invention of it to the same deity who gave them laws and letters, who regulated the affairs of religion, and who taught them astronomy, and all useful and ornamental arts. This fabulous account of its origin evidently shows music to have been sanctioned and even cultivated by the priests themselves, who invariably pretended to have derived from the gods the knowledge of the sciences they encouraged, of which their body was the sole repository and source; and serves to prove the great respect paid to music by the Egyptian priests, who thought it not unworthy of a deity to be its patron and inventor.

In noticing the harps of a tomb at Thebes,† Bruce‡ makes the following remark:—

"They overturn all the accounts hitherto given of the earliest state of music and musical instruments in the east; and are, altogether, in their form, ornaments, and compass, an incontestable proof, stronger than a thousand Greek quotations, that geometry, drawing, mechanics and music were at the greatest perfection when this instrument was made, and that the period from which we date the invention of these arts, was only the beginning of the era of their restoration."

We may mention that the instruments chiefly in use among the Egyptians were the single and double pipe, harps, from three to fourteen strings, guitars, tambourines, and various instruments of percussion. These were also frequently used to accompany bands of singers, and these bands frequently consisted of more than twenty persons, who were often all blind, two of whom responded at the end of the verses by clapping the hands in the rhythm of the preceding music.

If it was not customary for the higher classes of Egyptians to learn music for the purpose of playing in society, and if few amateur performers could be found among persons of rank, still some general knowledge of the art must have been acquired by a people so alive to its charms; and the attention paid to it by the priests regulated the taste, and prevented the introduction of a vitiated style, so that music was studied by the priesthood with other views than that of affording pleasure and entertainment, the same science being borrowed by Pythagoras from Egypt.

The Egyptians may not have had the means of handing down their compositions with the same fidelity as modern nations, yet this objection does not apply to the study of the science itself; their object being rather to touch the feeling than delight the ear. It is impossible for us to determine whether the Egyptian priests, in later times, devised any method of preserving their melodies, or trusted entirely to oral tradition, as this secret would have been concealed by them with the same jealous care as the mysteries themselves.

Without entering upon the questio vexata where Pythagoras obtained his doctrine of the theory of sounds, the fact of his having studied all the learning of the Egyptians, and his being the sole teacher of that system among the Greeks, goes far to prove that it did not originate in Greece, and that his opinions were founded on Egyptian data. For what that philosopher asserted respecting sound emitted by a long and short string of the same quality and thickness, "that the shorter made the quicker vibrations, and uttered the acuter sound," had been already shown by the Egyptians; and we may fairly conclude that he derived his knowledge of this subject from the same source* as that of the solar system, which remained unknown in Europe from his time to the days of Copernicus, and with which Pythagoras, of all the Greeks, was alone acquainted.

At the religious ceremonies and processions of the Egyptians, when music was introduced, there is reason to believe the attendance of ordinary musicians was not admitted, but that performers attached to the priestly order, and organized for this special purpose, were alone employed, who were considered to belong exclusively to the service of the temple, in the same manner as each military band of their army to its respective corps.

Among the instruments of Egyptian sacred music may be reckoned the harp, lyre, flute, double pipe, tambourine, cymbals, and even the guitar; but neither the trumpet, drum, nor mace, were excluded from the religious processions in which the military were engaged. They do not, however, appear to have been admitted, like the former, among those whose introduction into the courts of the temple was sanctioned on ordinary occasions; and perhaps the peculiar title of "the holy instrument" ought to be confined to the sistrum.

The harp, lyre, and tambourine, were often admitted during the religious services of the temple; and in a procession in honour of Athor, represented on the frieze at Dendera, two goddesses are observed to play the harp and tambourine. The priests, bearing the sacred emblems, frequently advanced to the sound of the flute,† and entered the temple to celebrate their most important festivals; and with the exception of those of Osiris at Abydos, the sacred rites of an Egyptian deity did not forbid the introduction of the harp, the flute, or the voices of singers.

At the feast of Diana, or Pasht, at Bubastis, music was permitted as on other similar occasions, and Herodotus ‡ mentions the flute and the crotola, which were played by the votaries of the goddess, on their way down the Nile to the town where her far-famed temple stood. In the processions during the festival of Bacchus, the same author says, the flute player goes first, and is followed by the choristers, who chant the praises of the deity; and we find the flute represented in the sculptures in the hands of a sacred musician, attached to the service of Amun, who is in attendance while the ceremonies are performed in honour of the god. And that cymbals were appropriated to the same purpose, we have sufficient reason for inferring, from this having been found buried with an individual whose coffin bears an inscription, purporting that she was the minstrel of Amun, the presiding deity of Thebes.

That the harp was a favourite instrument in religious ceremonies, is evident from the assertion of Strabo, from the frequent mention of minstrels of Amun, and other gods, in the hieroglyphic legends placed over those who play that instrument, and from the two harpers in the presence of the god Aa.

With most nations it has been considered right to introduce music into the service of religion; and if the Egyptian priesthood made it so principal a part of their earnest inquiries, and inculcated the necessity of applying to its study, not as an amusement, or in consequence of any feeling excited by the reminiscences accompanying a national air, but from a sincere admiration of the science, and of its effects upon the human mind, we can readily believe that it was sanctioned, and even deemed indispensable, in many of their religious rites. Hence the sacred musicians were of the order of priests, and appointed to this service, like the Levites among the Jews: and the Egyptian sacred bands were probably divided, and superintended, in the same manner among that people.

Herodotus states, indeed, that women were not allowed in Egypt to become priestesses of any god or goddess, the office being exclusively reserved for men;* but though it is true that the higher functions of the priesthood belonged to the latter, as far as regarded the slaying of victims, presenting offerings, and other duties connected with the sacrifices, yet it is equally certain that women were also employed in the service of the temple, and, according to the historian himself, were so fully instructed in matters appertaining to religion, that two, who had been carried away and sold into Libya and Greece, were enabled to institute oracles in those countries. Although these two accounts by the same hand are contradictory of each other, it is probable that Herodotus merely refers to the higher offices of the priesthood, without intending to exclude them altogether from those sacred employments.

However difficult to decide as to the name, or the precise rank or office they bore, the sculptures leave no room to doubt they were admitted to a very important post, which neither the wives and daughters of priests, nor even of kings, were ashamed to accept. In the most solemn processions they advanced towards the altar with the priests, bearing the sacred sistrum.

By some, the sistrum was supposed to have been intended to frighten away Typhon, or the evil spirit; and Plutarch, who mentioned this,† adds, that "on the convex surface is a cat with a human visage; on the lower part, under the moving chords, the face of Isis, and on the opposite side that of Nephthys." The chords (more properly bars) to which he alludes, were generally three, rarely four, and each was passed through three or four rings of metal, whereby the "rattling noise made with the moveable bars" was greatly increased.

Songs and the clapping of hands were both considered as connected with sacred music, and they are frequently alluded to by ancient authors. The worshippers at the festival of Bubastis are said by Herodotus to have celebrated the deity in this manner, with the music of flutes and cymbals; and the Jews followed the same custom, as is evidenced in the first verse of Psalm xlvii., where the invitation is, "O clap your hands together, all ye people: O sing unto God with the voice of melody," a custom which is still retained by the Moslem inhabitants of modern Egypt. That they also had a sacred dance in their temples, in honour of the gods, is evident from the representations of numerous sacred processions, where individuals are depicted as performing certain gestures and dances as they approach the precincts of their holiest places.

Such is a sketch of the musical knowledge of the Egyptians; and although we have been more diffuse than was at first intended, yet, from the close resemblance between the rites, customs, and arts of the Egyptians and Israelites, until the giving of the law from Mount Sinai to the latter nation, it was necessary to our purpose previous to approaching the subject as applied to God's own chosen people. And we also desired to get rid of all other systems of pagan belief before entering upon the great record of holy writ, so as to be enabled to follow our theme in its ritual application, both under the Jewish and Christian dispensations; and if we now appear to retrograde for a time, our readers will, after having been acquainted with all that is to be said on the science in

BY THE M.W. BRO. ROB MORRIS, GRAND MASTER OF KENTUCKY.

IN one of the popular books of floral illustrations, the beech tree (fagus sylvaticus) stands as the emblem of wedded love, and a tale is introduced to show the propriety of the selection. It tells of a wife who had been married twenty years, who wrote a message to her husband, warm from an affectionate heart, and inscribed it upon a large beech tree that stood by his favourite walk. The denouement is affecting. The smooth bark of the beech renders it a very tempting tablet to all that class of beings who yearn to perpetuate their names, if they cannot any thing else, by engraving them on natural bridges, pyramids, starved rocks, albums, and everywhere else. Sober travellers are struck with evidences of this propensity in passing along public roads that lead through clumps of beeches. Frequently you may see every trunk covered for six feet up with initials, full names, and figures. In the grove where I sit writing this article I have amused myself by counting how often a certain person, "D. C. Perry" by name, has inscribed it; and it is a fact almost incredible, yet true, that I find it upon seventy-four trees. The task must have occupied his leisure hours for months; but his purpose is effected; for although the oldest inhabitant cannot tell who "D. C. Perry" was, every tree has a voice to speak his name for centuries to come. Such is human fame.

It is a singular fact that I have never discovered any evidences of this propensity among all the Indian tribes who lately inhabited this country. There is not a mark upon any of the ancient beeches but what may be traced to the hand of a white man. These Indians, degenerate descendants or subduers of a people that built the mounds, and run the walls, and dug the trenches of circumvallation, have died and made no sign. This is the more remarkable, as the warriors repose, day after day, perfectly idle and listless, while their squaws perform all the labour except that of hunting and fighting. Now the uninstructed reader may possibly suggest that the marks made by these dwellers of the forest are overgrown by the bark, and might still be found under it, but such cannot be. Marks made upon the bark always remain outside of a tree. All surveyors have abundant occasions to know this, and when practicable, they never permit their markers to go through the bark. In cases where it is removed it will afterwards grow through the scar, if not too large, and conceal it; but even then it is easy to discover the place, and now if the new growth of bark be removed the surveyor's marks will be found duplicated in relievo upon the portion removed, and in sunken letters upon the tree. Another interesting fact here; if a mark be made upon a tree at a certain height from the ground, it will continue exactly at that height so long as the tree lives. Upon a tree before me are the marks of six boys made twenty-three years ago, and they stand at the height indicated by the accompanying figures. Alas! the six blooming youths, who jostled and jested with one another while it was done, are all scattered and slain until but one survives—the eldest—a consumptive, hopeless man, coughing his last hours away in misery!

Much ingenuity is often displayed in these beech-tree hieroglyphics. Here we are startled by an immense serpent, carved as if winding up the trunk, and so naturally done that you cut a club, in the true spirit of Eve's descendants, to kill it. The large spider styled the tarantula is here copied with accuracy by hunters too illiterate to sign their own names. Let us take a stroll through this beech grove and make notes. Here, upon this monster with a double trunk, is a full set of Masonic emblems, the compass and square, the gauge and gavel, the plumb and level, even to the full paraphernalia of mysticism. Not to be outdone by this, some fervid mind that has been aroused into action by riding the goat in tyled recesses, has drawn here the insignia of Odd Fellowship and arks, bows and arrows, crooks, &c., form a strange contrast with the solitude of the place.

Schoolboys have been here, for here is a monstrous figure having in one hand an ominous resemblance to a cane, and in the other a book, while from its hideous mouth emerges a scroll with this pedagogical motto, "Talk karé boys." Under it is a name that helps to solve the mystery, "Mister blake." It is clear that the youthful artist laboured to perpetuate some of the peculiarities of the said Blake, for he has most comically bandied his legs, and stuck a pipe stem in his pocket. Doubtless "Mister blake" will be remembered long after the little fellows who smarted under his castigations shall have grown to manhood and forgotten the whole injury, or only remembered it to wonder that the blows of his teacher fell so sparsely on his unworthiness. Schoolgirls have been here: these buds and flowers, this well drawn bouquet, these little fragile hearts, pierced yet united by that delicate shaft of love, and this motto, pensez à moi—no dull masculine hand had wit or patience to execute these. All the ovals on the tombs of the Pharaohs excite no tender or sentimental thought like that group embroidered by dots from the scissors points of some fair hand. The remainder of the group bears the usual variety of initials in every possible combination, and whatever emblematic devices the mind has conceived.

All objects that pervade air, or earth, or water, have their types here; also, inkstands, watches, books, hats, shoes, guns, bows, mathematical problems, numerals, quills, spectacles, saddlebags, chairs, pitchers, maps, and all things else. And now as we turn homeward—at the very verge of this cluster by the brook, now so full, but usually a mere ravine—let us notice this pair of beeches only a yard apart, so nearly of a size as doubtless to have grown from the same year's nuts, and joined together at the top by that fruitful grapevine. These twin beeches have a history sufficiently pathetic to make melancholy a summer hour and bedew a fair cheek in tears. Will you hear it?

No rude hieroglyphic is here; no initials have scarred its white surface, but close by the ground, so closely as to be almost hidden by the clean, green moss, there is a broken sentence, at first view quite inexplicable. It is thus inscribed:—

"Weary waiting—
—sad belating;
These lines mating,
—unabating."

Do not let us turn away as if in contempt at the jargon, for upon the twin tree opposite we shall find the corresponding words, although the storms of ten seasons have laboured to obliterate it. They read thus:—

"—do not tarry,
Hither, hither,
—I will marry:
Thine in fondness"

Only ten years have passed since a pair of lovers sat between these twin beeches face to face, and plighted their vows. Their acquaintance was no affair of yesterday; for Oliver Saunders and Ellen Littleton had been reared from early childhood by the same kind hands, and it was in the unrestrained intercourse of childhood that they had learned to consider each as destined for the other. Both were orphans, both dependent upon charity, both shy and unsocial to all the world, save one another. Thus they grew up together until Oliver arrived at years of manhood, and determined to take his place among the sons of men. What his plans were he disclosed to no one, not even to the affectionate friend who had reared him, or the confiding girl whose "smiles had cheered his daily labours and studies for so many years." In reply to their anxious looks, however, he said that his mind was fixed upon trying his fortune in a distant part of the Union; and then the two, who of all the world alone felt any interest in his movements, expressed their acquiescence with his views, and lent their best aid to facilitate his departure. No formal declaration of love had ever passed between the orphans, but fond eyes had long ago told the tale, and it needed no other language. But now that every preparation was made for his departure, upon the very last day of his stay, as the sun was sinking below the tree tops, the youthful pair sat between the beeches, which are now shedding their tenth suit of leaves since that hour. The thrilling words as yet unspoken—those words that linger on the ear long after all other music of life is forgotten—were now uttered and answered in love's own response.

The Omniscient above heard the vow which bound them together and for ever in holy troth, and the registry was made in heaven. Then said Oliver—"I go, dearest, to win of this world's goods a competency for our support, and for the declining years of a beloved aunt. If God spare my life I will return upon this day twelvemonth. Here at this hour let us again meet as now. Should fortune crown my efforts, I will then claim you in marriage; if not, I will depart for further trial; but punctually upon each anniversary I will return, no other person recognizing me, and join you at this trysting place.

"I have read in the Greek poets, that when friends parted in ancient days, expecting to meet again, they consecrated a tresera sacred to memory, divided it into two parts, and each carefully concealed a fragment, wearing it next to the heart.

"Here is a medal on which I have sketched some rude lines, and thus, dear Ellen, I break it. When this portion which I have reserved for myself, is presented you by the hands of a stranger, mourn for me as dead, and believe that your lover has gone down to death, blessing you to the last." And then each knelt down and wrote upon the trees the fragmentary lines which we have already seen.

Daylight bore him from their anxious eyes. Time blunted the keen impression of their grief, and the affairs of that quiet household resumed their accustomed course. The neighbours soon forgot that such a person as Oliver had ever existed, and the most inveterate gossip ceased, ere long, to inquire concerning him. Occasionally they received a letter, brief, but affectionate, and always enclosing a remittance for his aunt, and a more lengthy epistle for Ellen. So passed away the first year, and as the anniversary drew nigh, a paleness began to be evident upon Ellen's cheek. No letter had come for several weeks, and she feared some hidden evil. A sleepless night preceded the day, and punctually at the hour she directed her feet, trembling and unsteady, to the appointed spot. Did her eyes deceive her as she crossed the little bridge and turned from the path? Was it her lover rising from between the twin trees and advancing to meet her? It was—she could not be mistaken—it was Oliver—but how changed! his eyes were all bloodshot, his cheeks bloated, his nerves quivering—Oliver had bowed to the idolatry of the bowl and become a drunkard! Staggering back at the sight, Ellen would have fallen to the ground had he not sustained her. He led her forward to her own seat, placed himself opposite, and hiding his face in his hands, burst into tears. Then, after a long silence, for all voice was denied her, he told his tale of sadness, the same that is found on every page of human history. He had gone out with a heart strong in self confidence, yet ignorant of the world's ways. He had put his trust in men, and men had again and again deceived him. Then he had despaired, and instead of returning to find sympathy in the faithful hearts left behind, he consigned himself to forgetfulness, and sought it in dissipation, in drink, in gaming—in worse than that. Ellen listened for hours to his melancholy story, and then the lovers parted, she to her maiden pillow, he to the world, yet both bearing the pledge to meet again on the anniversary.

The twelvemonth rolled slowly by, for his letters were few and contained no cheer. Her aged companion sickened and died, the little property was claimed by nearer relatives, and Ellen left the neighbourhood to take charge of a small country school. Her step was no longer buoyant, nor her voice the voice of early days. But where was he, to whom Ellen's misfortunes were to be attributed? Alas! where was he not? Amidst all things evil, breaking jail after jail to engage in further enormities, at times the victim of the drunkard's madness—once an inmate of the asylum for the insane—never in any scenes of good—Oliver was hurrying down the hill of life with fearful rapidity. Yet the second meeting came round and he was there, there to renew his first vows, to promise amendment, to press to his purple lips the tessera which had never left his breast, to call on God to witness his honesty of purpose. And the third meeting was full of hope to both; for there was a spring in his step and a light in his eye that spoke of reformation commenced, and the good angels whispered comfort to their hearts as they arose at midnight to say farewell. Once more now, dear reader, listen to his words—"Bride of my heart, all this I owe to you. Your love was the only fixed point in the shifting scenes of my evil career, and but for that I had long since found a hopeless grave; and now the promise of the future is yours. I have become changed, I am now experienced in the things of life, and shall be able in another year to accomplish the object with which I first set out. Prepare yourself then, dear Ellen, to become my wife when next we meet; God's hand will lead us out and bring us in, in safety. Farewell." And so they parted again, Ellen to her school, by this time a school of character and profit, Oliver to fill a responsible office offered him by a kind friend who had witnessed his capacity and trusted in his promises of amendment. Another year passed, not on tedious pinions, and except that Oliver did not write so frequently as her loving heart demanded, there was not a cloud in her vision. Fondly and stealthily she prepared her wedding dress, gave notice to her attached patrons that her school would terminate at a certain period to be resumed no more, and as the fourth anniversary came round, you would have thought, to look upon her, that there was no happier heart in the creation of God. Cruel fate to confiding love! Oliver was there, but intoxicated; and his swollen features and emaciated appearance indicated a total relapse into dissipation.

Oh, that she had died at the first glance! Oh, that she had no more sat opposite to him between those fair trees, or consented to hear his words! They parted; there was no more light in the sun for Ellen. She drooped visibly day by day; a broken heart, a thing rarely seen, yet in her case all too real, inclined her soul to God, and in faith she waited her summons to depart. She received no message from him whom she could not loathe, and daily prayed to forgive. As the well remembered hour again came round, she became impressed with an irresistible longing to visit the twin beeches once more. It could do her no harm. Surely he would not be there; he would not presume to desecrate that holy spot again. Fortifying herself with these thoughts she took the path to the glade, crossed the little bridge, and turned her eyes towards the trysting place. She had guessed rightly; the place was solitary—but lo! suspended by a ribbon over his own seat there hung the tessera—the broken medal—the pledge of love; and with it there was a letter, which once again brought peace to her troubled heart. "When once more you visit our trysting place, dear Ellen, I shall have gone before you to the world of shadows; but not in a hopeless departure. For near this close of life I have found One who was always waiting to be gracious, and his staff supports me now even in the valley of the shadow of death. Farewell, dearest, but come to me soon. I have seen you more than once through the past year, although unseen by you, and I know that our parting is not for long. The christian brother who supports my dying head has learned all our sad history, and has promised to perform this last kind act, which will notify you of my fate. I feel that you have forgiven me, for God has accepted my repentance, and his acts may well be sealed by one so pure as you. Farewell, beloved—we meet again."

Now there is a grave near the Spring Creek church, and its stone is inscribed with the name of Ellen Littleton, with this passage below—"Though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death I will fear no evil."

WINTER SCENES.

BY S. H. BRADBURY.

THE leaves have fallen from the trees,
The alder trembles at the door;
And like the surge of angry seas,
The mad storm moans across the moor!
The frosts are pencilling the panes
With many a quaint and rare device;
About the leafless village lanes
Are seen unbroken spots of ice.

The rime upon the hedgerow seems
More purely white than ermine robe,
The solemn sun but weakly beams—
Hangs in the sky like blood-red globe.
The poor birds flit from spray to spray,
A dense mist hangs upon the wold,
And in the day-light waxes grey,
Like smoke from heavy ordnance rolled!

Deep silence reigns in every vale,
No streamlet tinkles as it flows,
Save when struck by the northern gale,
That harps in thunder as it blows!
The ivy round the cottage door
Looks perished in the dim cold light;
And round our homes the mad winds roar,
And strike with all their groaning might!

The holly's muffled with the snow,
Thro' which the rubied berries peep
Like drops of coral, while below
The river's bound in icy sleep!
We list the north, with thunder-tone,
Rock giant trees from root to crown,
While massive clouds look sad and lone,
And with a sullen grandeur frown!

The snow-flakes fall in reeling showers,
In many wild and grotesque forms;
And soon the hills appear like towers—
The bulwarks of the rolling storms!
And day, storm-vanquished, coldly dies,
Then night in savage glory reigns;
With snow-bound earth and unstar'd skies
Amid the howl of hurricanes.

OUR ARCHITECTURAL CHAPTER.

WOOLWICH is soon to be numbered amongst the towns which have the advantage of a Masonic hall, some brethren connected with the Florence Nightingale Lodge having arranged for the rental of a building in a very eligible situation, and which has hitherto been used as a chapel. We are assured that very little alteration will be required to adapt it to the purposes for which it is intended, and for which it will be shortly opened. At present, we believe the only Masonic bodies that have arranged to meet in it are the Florence Nightingale Lodge; the Florence Nightingale Lodge of Mark Masters (S.C.); the Kemeys Tynte Encampment of Knights Templar; and the Invicta Rose Croix Chapter.

The "strike" and "lock-out" which still continues must, if not shortly brought to a termination, have a serious effect upon the profession of the architect, many works which were in contemplation having been laid aside to await the contest, some of them perhaps never to be revived. The architectural event of the week may be considered the laying the foundation stone of Mr. Spurgeon's new tabernacle on the site formerly occupied by the Fishmongers' Almshouses, opposite the Elephant and Castle, at the corner of the St. George's and Kennington roads. The building is to be Corinthian in its character, and will be built under the direction of Mr. Pocock, whose design has met with general approbation. The interior of the tabernacle will be one hundred and forty-five feet long by eighty-one feet wide, and from the floor to the ceiling will measure sixty-two feet. The total area will, therefore, be 11,745 square feet, and the cubic measurement of the apartment 728,190 cubic feet. Allowing two square feet to each individual, the floor of the building would afford standing room to upwards of 5,800 persons; the architect's calculation, however is, that the body of the chapel and the two galleries which are to run round it will afford full accommodation, free of crushing, to 6,500 people. As in all buildings in which large crowds are to assemble it is desirable that the means of egress should be ample, the tabernacle is to have nine doors, each six feet wide, communicating with the galleries by eight staircases, four to each gallery, so that the building may, even on the most crowded occasions, be emptied in something like ten minutes' time, should occasion require it. The most noticeable feature of the day was the handing in by Mr. Inskip a cheque for £3,000 from an invalid gentleman at Bristol, who offers a further sum of £2,000 in the event of twenty gentlemen subscribing £100 each, or forty £50 each within the next three months, towards the funds required for the completion of the building.

A new building of considerable pretensions is now in the course of erection in Seething-lane, from the designs of Mr. Ed. I'Anson. The building which is being erected for the Corn Exchange Chambers Association, has a frontage of eighty-eight feet, a depth of sixty-five feet, and its height from the curb level to the eaves of the roof is sixty-eight feet. The front, to the sills of the first floor windows, a height of twenty-six feet, is constructed entirely of Portland stone; and above the walls are faced with red bricks from Rochester. The whole of the dressings round the windows, string courses, and upper cornice, are to be of Portland stone. The prevailing style of the building is that of the French Renaissance. The ground floor portion of the façade is composed of a series of six semicircular headed windows, and a corresponding doorway, which latter will be a highly elaborate production, to be of ornamental ironwork. The windows are seventeen feet six inches high in the clear, and eight feet wide, having circles and spandrels at their heads. One of the principal features of the interior will be a large and handsome subscription room, fifty-five feet by forty feet, and seventeen feet eight inches high, adjoining to which there will be a refreshment room forty-three feet long by seventeen feet wide. The larger portion of the basement is planned for bonded vaults, and another part of it contains a large kitchen thirty-five feet by twenty-nine feet, scullery, beer cellars, and other conveniences. The building, when completed, will comprehend six stories of the following heights in the clear, viz., the basement, ten feet; ground floor, seventeen feet eight inches; the first floor, twelve feet; the second floor, eleven feet; the third floor, nine feet six inches; and the attic, eight feet six inches. The interior of the building is to be fitted up in a very superior manner, the whole of the joinery being intended to be executed either in wainscot or mahogany, with the former of which the walls of most of the rooms will be lined from floor to ceiling. The builder's contract is stated to amount to nearly £30,000.

A new workhouse at Norwich, which has been eighteen months in hand, has just been completed with the exception of the fittings, which it is calculated will occupy another month. The building, which has cost about £21,000, is one of the most perfect of its kind, and with the grounds attached occupies an area of nearly ten acres, or 47,674 square yards. The building proper, exclusive of any enclosed yards, but including workshops, covers 64,000 square feet. The style adopted in the edifice is that known as the Old English, with the usual amount of Gothic element in the composition. Externally the walls are faced with red bricks having white brick dressings. Internally the walls are brick and lime whitened, with the exception of those of the officers' rooms, which are plastered. The length of the front elevation of the building is four hundred feet, and that of the entrance front is two hundred and fifty-one feet. The front of the infirmary portion, measures one hundred and twenty feet, and that of the lunatic wards, one hundred and five feet. The depth of the main building, including the chapel, is two hundred and thirty feet. The front portion is thirty feet, the infirmary one hundred and ten feet, and the lunatic wards, including a corridor one hundred and seventy three feet in length, connecting them with the principal building, is two hundred and sixty-eight feet. The height of the elevations to the eaves gutters is thirty-four feet. In height, the structure is arranged in three stories, the two lower ones being eleven feet each, and the upper one fourteen feet from the floor to the collar beam of the roof. The edifice which has been erected from the designs of Medlar and Maberly is calculated to hold one thousand inmates, and it is in contemplation to erect schools for the accommodation of three hundred children.

A tender has been accepted from Messrs. Piper and Son, for the erection of the new vestry hall of St. Luke, Chelsea, for £5,630, and £630 additional, for the use of Portland instead of Bathstone. The tenders ranged from £10,945 1s. 5d., nearly £3,000 above the second tender, to £5,630, that accepted, and which was £8 13s. 4d. below that of the previous tender. We cannot but regard these odd shillings and pence in tenders of such large amounts as from £5,000 to £10,000, as affectations of accuracy, unworthy any firm of eminence.

Several Archæological Societies have been holding meetings of late, at which various papers of interest have been read, some of which are referred to under another head.

THE SWAN LODGE.

This Lodge was constituted in the year 1724, by Martin Folkes, Esq., Deputy Grand Master to His Grace the Duke of Richmond; and afterwards had the honour of a visit from the Right Hon. the Lord Coleraine, whilst he was Grand Master, who declared his approbation and signified his desire of becoming a member thereof, as may be seen now at large in the first sederunt book.

Several remarkable distinctions have been paid to this Lodge by many honourable and right worshipful brethren who have visited it very frequently. Many, also, have been initiated in the solemn mysteries and ancient science of Masonry; but as an extraordinary instance of the great regard shown to this Lodge, the Right Hon. the Lord Lovel, Earl of Leicester, when he was Grand Master, summoned the Master and brethren to hold a Lodge at Houghton Hall. There were present, the Grand Master, his royal highness the Duke of Lorraine, and many other noble brethren; and when all was put into due form, the Grand Master presented his grace the Duke of Newcastle, the right hon. the Earl of Essex, Major General Churchill, and his own chaplain, who were unanimously accepted of and made Masons by the Right Worshipful Thomas Johnson, then Master of this Lodge. These particulars are extracted from the Freemasons' Magazine, Vol. 7, published by G. Cawthorn, Strand, 1796.—D. HART, Prov. G.M., Trinidad.

HALYWARK FOLK.

The Rev. John Ashe, in his Masonic Manual, mentions "a set of men called 'halywark folk,' to whom were assigned certain lands, which they held by the service of repairing, defending, or building churches and sepulchres. * * * These men were stonecutters and builders, and might also be of our profession. The county of Durham entertained a particular set of these halywark folk, who were guards of the patrimony and holy sepulchre of S. Cuthbert." Is any more known of these people? And from what work is the above likely to have been taken?—APPRENTICE.

ANTIQUITIES OF YORK.

Seeing you admit extracts from standard works, as being conformable to your plan of "Masonic Notes and Queries," I thought the accompanying extract might interest your readers in general, and our York brethren in particular, and as the work from which it is taken, Hargrove's "History of York," 2 vols. 8vo. York, 1818, is both valuable and very scarce, its reproduction in your pages may be none the less esteemed. The seal alluded to I have traced for you, and I presume sufficiently intelligibly, that your draughtsman will find no difficulty in copying it if you think it worth while to engrave it. In vol. ii. of the work alluded to, pp. 475 et seq., our historian in describing the various wards of the city, arrives at Bootham-ward, and in the place referred to states as follows:—

"The Masonic Coffee-house.—This tavern was originally the Roman Catholic chapel; but being disused as such after the erection of the new building, it was purchased by the members of the York Union Lodge of Freemasons, in February, 1806, in sixteen shares of £25 each, and subject to a mortgage of 200 guineas; the alterations and repairs at that time having incurred an additional expense of £200."

"This leads us to a brief notice of the history of the several Lodges of Freemasons that have existed in York. In searching the archives of Masonry, we find the first Lodge was instituted in this city at a very early period; indeed, even prior to any other recorded in England. It was termed the most Antient Grand Lodge of all England; and was instituted at York, by King Edwin, 926, as appears by the following curious extract from the ancient records of the fraternity:—"When the antient mystérie of Masonrie had been depressed in England, by reason of great wars, through diverse nations, then Athelston, our worthye king, did bring the land to rest and peace. And though the ancient records of the brotherhood were manye of them destroyed or lost, yet did the Craft a great protector find in the royal Edwin, who being taught Masonrie, and taking upon him the charges of a Maister, was full of practice, and for the love he bare it caused a charter to be issued, with a commission to hould every yeare an assembly where he would, within the realme of England, and to correct within themselves statutes and trespasses done within the Craftes. And he held an assembly at York, and made Masons, and gave them their charges, and taught them the manners of Masons, and commanded that rule to be holden ever after; and gave them the charter and commission to meet annually in communicaytion there; and made ordinances that it should be ruled from kings to kings."

"And when this assembly was gathered together, they made a cry that all Masons, both old and younge, that had any writinge or understanding of the charges that were before in this land, or in any other land, that they should bring them forth; and when they were secured and examined, there was found some in French, some in Greek, some in English, and some in other languages; and he commanded a booke thereof to be made, and to give his charge; and from that time to this Masons have kept and observed that form, &c."

"The Grand Lodge of all England, thus instituted at York, acknowledged no superior, paid homage to none, existed in its own right, and granted constitutions, certificates, &c. The Grand Lodge of England, held at the Queen's Head Tavern, Holborn, in London, had its constitution granted by this Lodge in 1799, being only for that part of England which lies south of Trent. This Lodge also granted constitutions to the Lodges held at Ripon, Knaresborough, Hovingham, Rotherham, &c. The seal of this Lodge, affixed to its constitutions and certificates, was as here represented.

There is a tradition, that in the vault or crypt under the choir of the cathedral, king Edwin held his infant Lodge; and some Masonic brethren conceive there are certain appearances in the columns which support it, that justify the rumour. Be this as it may, not many years ago several brethren of that ancient body held a Lodge in the third degree, in the same place,* in honour of Edwin, the great patron and founder of the Masonic Order in York.

This Lodge, which had flourished during more than forty years in the eighteenth century, was, from causes which are not at present known, discontinued for a length of time; but, on the 17th of March, 1761, it was renewed by six surviving members, viz., Bro. Francis Drake, F.R.S., author of Eboracum, Grand Master; Bro. George Reynoldson, D.G.M.; Bros. G. Coates and Thomas Mason, G.Ws.; Bros. Christopher Coulton and Martin Croft.

* In the Anacalypsis by the late Godfrey Higgins, vol. i., book x., chap. viii., sec. 1, p. 768, speaking of the Culdees at York, as Masons, he says:—"In consequence of this I went to York and applied to the only survivor of the Lodge, who shewed me, from the documents which he possessed, that the Druidical Lodge, or Chapter of Royal Arch Masons, or Templar Encampment, all of which it calls itself, was held for the last time in the crypt, on Sunday, May 27th, 1778. At that time the Chapter was evidently on the decline, and it is since dead."

A little further on in the same page, before alluded to, Higgins states:—"The documents from which I have extracted the above information respecting the York Masons, were given me by — Blanchard, Esq., and transferred by me to the person who now possesses them, and with whom they ought most properly to be placed, His Royal Highness the Duke of Sussex. It appears, from the documents above named, that Queen Elizabeth became jealous of the York Masons, and sent an armed force to York to put them down." The above extracts are important: by them we are enabled to trace the records alluded to in the possession of the late Duke of Sussex. But where are they now, and in whose custody are such precious documents placed? They ought to be fac-similed, and the originals deposited in some established place of security. Our correspondent, "History," will also find in this note an answer to that part of his question which touches on Queen Elizabeth's interference.

Reverse.

Among the parchments belonging to the Lodge is a very ancient MS. on the subject of Masonry, which was found at the demolition of Pontefract Castle in the year 1649, and was presented to the Lodge in the year 1788, by Mr. Drake, the distinguished antiquary just mentioned.

"In 1770, at the feast of St. John, Sir Thomas Gascoigne, Bart., being then Grand Master elect, a procession of more than one hundred and twenty brethren went from the Grand Lodge room in the York Tavern, to St. John's church, Micklegate. And as a further proof of the importance of this Lodge, we find it recorded that on the 24th of June, 1783, the Grand Master, with all the officers, attended in the great room of the Mansion-house, where a Lodge in the third degree was opened, and Bro. Wm. Siddall, Esq., at that time the Right Hon. the Lord Mayor, and Grand Master elect, was installed, according to ancient usage and custom, the Most Worshipful Grand Master Mason of all England; and was thus saluted, homaged, and acknowledged."

"About the year 1787 the meetings of this Lodge were discontinued, and the only member now remaining is Mr. Blanchard, proprietor of the York Chronicle, to whom the writer is indebted for information on the subject. He was a member many years, and being Grand Secretary, all the books and papers which belonged to the Lodge are still in his possession."

"Such was the original Masonic Lodge in York, from which several less important ones have, at different times, emanated. There have also been established in York, the Apollo Lodge, the Rockingham Lodge, the Provincial Grand Lodge, and the Union Lodge. Of these, the Apollo Lodge has been removed from York; the Rockingham Lodge held its meetings at the George Inn, Coney-street, but it no longer exists as a body, though the room in which the members assembled is still called the Rockingham; the Provincial Grand Lodge yet holds its annual meetings in the room in Little Blake-street; and the Union Lodge, the one whose members purchased the Lodge room already mentioned, and now the most important one in York, consisting of more than one hundred brethren, holds its annual meetings at the Masonic Coffee-house, assembles at the Golden Lion in Thursday Market, alias Sampson's-square, on the first and third Mondays in each month, and holds Lodges of Instruction every Wednesday at the same place."

"On all occasions of extraordinary public joy or calamity in the city, the Masonic brethren are prominent in their processions, &c., which so far constitutes them a public body as to claim some notice in the annals of the city in which they reside.—M.C.

THE KILWINNING LODGE AND ST. JOHN'S LODGE OF GLASGOW.

In your Magazine, as in most other Masonic publications, it is stated (vol. vi., p. 335-6) that "some travelling Masons went to Scotland and established themselves at Kilwinning in the year 1140, where they erected a stately abbey, and here was the germ of Scottish Freemasonry, which has regularly descended through the Grand Lodge to this time." And again, "The Scotch Masons claim their origin as a body from the time of building the Abbey of Kilwinning, about 1150." I also read in your Magazine (vol. vi., p. 86), that the St. John's Lodge of Glasgow, the most ancient one in the city, holds a charter from Malcolm III., King of Scotland, dated 1075, wherein it is stated that "none in my dominions shall erect a Lodge until they make application to the St. John's Lodge of Glasgow." In 1181, also, it is affirmed, this Lodge received a charter of confirmation in its favour.

Perhaps some of your correspondents can reply to my question,—Which of these two Lodges should be placed first in authenticity. If the St. John's Lodge is to be believed on the faith of its charter, how came the Kilwinning Lodge to be established so close to it—of course without any authority from Glasgow, or else, in later years, it would not have so quietly assumed the first place? Or is the charter of Malcolm III. to be considered a forgery? which so many of the mediæval documents are found to be.—ONE PERPLEXED.

MASONIC ANTIQUITIES.

Among the "Correspondence" of (vol. vi., p. 791) the Freemasons' Magazine, "R. E. X." refers to an ancient MS. in his possession, which states that Masonic institutions were proscribed by the British parliament in 1425. This of course relates to the celebrated statute, 3 Hen. VI., which has formed the groundwork of so much controversy.

As to another proscription in 1561, temp. Q. Eliz., I have been unable to find any reference to the proceeding in any book, save the usual Masonic histories. I throw out a hint—Would a search at the State Paper Office elucidate the point?

I should also be glad to know of an authority for the statement that "in 1327 all the peers of parliament were brethren of our ancient Order!"—HISTORY.—[See a preceding note.]

NOTES ON LITERATURE, SCIENCE, AND ART.

HAD the lamented Bayle St. John lived, his next work would have been a biography of Rabelais, which, we believe, will be completed and edited by his younger brother, Mr. Horace St. John. We hear that the labours of the author have been with a view to show that the world-famed humourist has been misrepresented to English readers by his translators, especially by the witty and learned Urquhart.

A letter from Paris says:—"Guizot has just arrived from Val Richer, in order to finish the third volume of his memoirs; and it is so near the 24th, the day fixed for the great Orleanist meeting, that it is not astonishing to learn that Thiers should have just come back to his hotel likewise, in order to finish his volume, too."

In connexion with the inauguration of the Chambers's Institution at Peebles, a dinner took place on Tuesday night, in the new hall of the Institute, at which Mr. William Chambers presented the deed of gift to the Provost, Magistrates, and Town Council of the borough. In the speech of the evening he said:—"I never was, and never will pretend to say that I am the originator of cheap literature. All I presume to claim is, that about 1832, there was an extraordinary aptitude for the purchase and reading of cheap literature. Most of it was very poor, and not of a quality which ought to have been addressed to intelligent readers. I endeavoured to turn the tide of popular taste, and get for it that material for which there was a craving; and in that attempt I was successful. Chambers's Journal, which was originated in the month of February, 1832, about six weeks in advance of the Penny Magazine, was received with a degree of acceptance which astonished me and my friends. Assisted by my brother, I entered on the career. With his graphic and elegant papers, that publication became soon more successful than I had ever any reason to expect. It went on, and goes on now, with a degree of popularity which has astonished and surprised all who are connected with it. Having gained the public ear in 1832, it has not lost it in 1859."

The adjudicators of the prizes for the best essays "On the Causes of the Decline in the Society of Friends" have been prevented from arriving at an earlier decision by unforeseen hindrances, and by the large number and extent of the essays submitted to them, and by their exceeding desire to deal justly. It has, after careful consideration, been determined that an essay, bearing a motto from the epistle of the York Quarterly Meeting of the year 1855, should receive the first prize; and one, bearing the motto verbum, vita, lux, the second prize. The author of the first essay is Mr. J. S. Rountree, of York; of the second, Mr. Thomas Hancock, of Nottingham.

A reproduction of the "Biblia Pauperum," from the copy in the British Museum Library, is announced by Mr. J. Russell Smith. It will consist of forty engravings, printed in one volume, uniform with Mr. L. Leigh Sotheby's "Principia Typographica."

Mr. Hotten, the bookseller, has recently published a "Dictionary of Slang," and so rapidly has it gone off that he is about to bring out a second edition. With respect to a statement that he had received offers of assistance from Lord Strangford, Mr. Monckton Milnes, and others, he writes to the Critic: "I am reluctantly compelled to give a partial contradiction. I am, it is true, preparing a second edition of my work, but I have not the honour of an acquaintance with the gentlemen you mention as interested in the reissue, and I have certainly never received offers of assistance from them."

The Exhibition of the Royal Academy has produced this year £8400. Last year, owing to the attractions of Mr. Frith's "Derby Day," the receipts ran to several hundred pounds more. Fourteen hundred works of Art combined to draw this sum from the pockets of the shilling public, of which one hundred and fifty works were supplied by the Academicians. These Academicians (says the Athenæum) take the whole of the proceeds, and the rest of the artists have the comfort of making the show. It is the old story in the comedy: the churchwardens eat the venison, and treat the congregation to a ring of bells.

The Archæological Institute, whose meetings we have had small occasion lately to report, simply because there has been no tangible business done at them, has just concluded its annual festivities—this year at Carlisle. The customary papers were read though many of these were not of the customary importance. Excursions were made to Corby Castle and Brougham Hall.

At the meeting of the Kent Archæological Society at Rochester there was exhibited a larger number of purely local antiquities than is usually brought together on such occasions. Those illustrative of the Roman and Saxon epochs were particularly remarkable. Some forty or fifty examples of various types of the Roman fictile vessels, found upon the site of the ancient potteries on the banks of the Medway, were exhibited by the Rev. T. Woodruff. The chief objects found in the Roman villa at Hartlip were arranged by Mr. Pretty, and collections of Roman remains from Ightham, Plaxtol, and the neighbourhood, were contributed by Major Luard and Mr. Biggs. A selection from the contents of an extensive Roman cemetery at Strood was exhibited by Mr. Humphrey Wickham. There were exhibitions of Saxon remains, which were of interest; such were the earthen vessels from Harrietsham, and the silver enamelled hair pin and ornaments from Chatham. The antiquities were exhibited in the deanery, where on Wednesday evening a large company assembled. Mr. Roche Smith for upwards of two hours gave an extempore explanation of the Roman and Saxon antiquities with reference to the aims and objects of true archæology. The papers were all of local interest, and were read by the Rev. E. Trollope, the Rev. T. Hugo, Major Luard, Mr. Corner, and the Rev. L. B. Larking. The annual general meeting of the Sussex Archæological Society was held last week at Bosham and Chichester. After visiting Bosham Church, where a paper was read by the vicar, the Rev. H. Mitchell, on the relics of the church, the Roman villa, the archæologists returned to Chichester and visited the cathedral, inspecting the close, cloisters, vicar's hall, bishop's chapel, palace, market cross, and other antiquities of the place; after which they dined in a marquee erected in the beautiful grounds of the bishop's palace. The Dean of Chichester presided, and the Bishop of Oxford made an eloquent and humorous speech upon the occasion.

We have before us some specimens of photographic reproductions of maps, executed by Mr. George Downs. These show yet another application of this most wonderful and beautiful art. The sheets reproduce for us an Austrian official survey of Lombardy, enlarged or diminished to any size at the will of the operator; yet with a perfect fidelity of lines, names, surfaces, mountain shades, and the like. We have never seen a more beautiful map.

The National Botanical Gardens at Kew, containing the great palm-house, the old and new museums, the tropical aquarium, &c., and the royal palace pleasure grounds, flower gardens, and new arboretum, having been greatly improved and adorned, are now open every week-day from one o'clock till dusk; on Sundays, from two o'clock till six. Free admission to the whole. In the old tropical aquarium, or hothouse No. 6, there is a fine specimen of the lace or lattice-leaf plant of Madagascar. It is said that it has been copied by the artificial florists of London for ornamental purposes.

REVIEWS OF NEW BOOKS.

The Jews in the East. By the Rev. P. BEATON, M.A., Chaplain to the Forces. [From the German of Dr. Frankl]. London: Hurst and Blackett (successors to Colburn), Great Marlborough Street.

AS FREEMASONS we admit into brotherhood and fellowship individuals of every nationality, people, and tribe, without reference to their religious faith; and as long as they acknowledge the existence and power of a Supreme Being we do not inquire into their mode of worship, for we tolerate all religions and sects, and the question of each being right or wrong is no business of ours—if they believe in God we are content. But yet the Jews are to us, Masonically speaking, a people of the greatest interest and importance, as every brother must know for himself, and every companion bear witness to. They were the chosen people of God, and yet await the time when he, in his infinite wisdom, shall again assemble them and make them his chosen, according to his promise, when they shall be again collected into a nation, and no longer be a dispersed and distinct race, mixing with the whole human family, yet never absorbed by it, but remaining a separate people in faith, language, manners, laws, and even personal appearance.

The title of The Jews in the East is partly a misnomer. The first volume has little or nothing to do with them, and the name of the Rev. P. Beaton published in large type, with that of Dr. Frankl bracketed in small type, is an entire reversal of the order of things, Mr. Beaton taking the post of honour, while he is the mere translator, and Dr. Frankl, who is the real author, modestly bringing up the rear. The work itself is one of the numerous classes of tours in the East, so plentiful nowadays. True it is that

Dr. Frankl went on a special mission to Jerusalem, and wherever he stopped appears to have made himself thoroughly acquainted with the actual condition of the Jews in those places; he has certainly told us more about them than any previous traveller has done of late years.

As we before intimated, the first volume tells us but little of The Jews in the East, but deals chiefly in classical allusions, and as Dr. Frankl, who appears to be a German Jew, as well as a physician, a poet, and an editor of a not unknown edition of Hippocrates, it is scarcely to be wondered at. He opens with a description of a visit to Athens and the preliminary voyage down the Adriatic, and the account he gives us is full of his terrors, emotions, and sensations, which were caused by a navigation of the Ionian sea about the time of the vernal equinox, and are, no doubt, faithful pictures of the horrors of a sea voyage to a German landsman and poet to boot.

We pass over the various places he saw with admiration and excitement, as they will readily suggest themselves to the memory of the classical geographer, and incidentally mention that he seems not to have recognized the scene of a poem of his own on the battle of Lepanto, although he more than once complacently alludes to that performance. But with his experience of the first roll of the vessel in a gale of wind, and its magical effect on the breakfast table, he tells us how horribly seasick he was, and what fearful despair and fright his situation engendered. Yet under these perils mind for a time overcame matter, and he struggled to behold the majesty of the great deep in its fury, the poetical overcoming the landsman's feelings. Still it was but for a short time that his heroism lasted, for he crawled to the scuttle of his cabin and opened it to look upon the waves, "like stout gigantic women, wearing powerful crowns of silvery foam, and dancing wild dances to the mad music which thundered down from the clouds;" and like most other "stout gigantic women," in their "wild dances," they did not like being watched so closely, and so unceremoniously dashed through the scuttle, drenched him and his bed, and he became so utterly helpless and hopeless, that not even an attempt of the "friendly doctor" to "divert his attention" to the classic shores around could rouse him from his abject state of misery.

Safely landed at Athens, he expresses himself amply compensated for having "crossed the stormy ocean," for there he seems to have been perfectly bewildered with enthusiasm. Even the chipping of the stones by the Athenian stonemasons recalled to his recollection and made him think of the passages he had read concerning "the clink of Amphion's lyre which built the walls of Thebes." Here he falls in with an Athenian sculptor, M. Pittakis, "a thin, little, elderly man, with fiery eyes, rather poorly dressed in the French style, working in a small room in Hermes-street, among hundreds of fragments of marble, and thus pathetically describes the end of his visit:—

"I asked M. Pittakis for a small piece of marble to carry home with me as a sign that I had been in the Holy Land, to which he said I was a pilgrim. He looked on the ground and handed me a small piece which had formed part of a gutter, and bore at least some traces of the chisel. After I had received it with thanks, he took it back again, and looking at it with a sorrowful air, said:—

"Go; thou hast witnessed the lapse of thousands of years. It may be that the hand of Pericles touched thee, that his eye gazed upon thee; thou hast survived the destruction of bygone ages, and now thou art about to go forth to the land of the barbarians. Do not take this impression amiss, sir; you know that every country but Greece was considered barbarous."

"When I saw how painful it was for him to part with it, I did not wish to take the stone, but he said—'I have mastered my feelings—take it, take it.'"

Passing over the author's various disquisitions respecting the modern Greek poets and professors, the affability of the king, and the horsemanship of the queen of Greece, the Sultan's new palace at Constantinople, Omer Pacha, and the Emir Beschir, we come to the real subject matter of the work, The Jews in the East.

The condition of this once favoured people is, according to Dr. Frankl, one of the most melancholy and sad spectacles that can meet the eye. He describes them, not as a lofty high souled race, bearing their misfortunes with dignity, but as the lowest, ignorant, and most abject people of the east. They exist in self governed communities, adhering to the old theocracy, organized and ruled by the rabbinical class whom he calls a priesthood; but surely this must be a mistake, seeing that the daily sacrifice cannot be restored till Shiloh come. These Rabbis have the power of taxation, both for political, social, and charitable purposes, as well as criminal jurisdiction, including the administration of punishment by imprisonment; and, if we read Dr. Frankl aright, this also includes capital punishment, but this, we presume, must be an error, for have not the Jews themselves, at various times, repudiated the power of condemning criminals?

They also profess, and really make noble efforts, to relieve the poor, but all their attempts are neutralized by a bad and vicious system of administration. Our traveller expresses his complete horror at the condition of the Jewish hospital at Smyrna, and tells us that when the Sultan granted them a site at Constantinople, on which to erect an hospital, they commenced the building, but have left it unfinished to this hour. Their schools, he tells us, are of the very worst description; education is looked upon with a distrustful eye, and any interference on its behalf by the western brethren is jealously resented as coming from a source suspiciously liberal. Early marriages seem to be the curse of the Jewish race in the east, inducing premature decay, and the dependence of a family on parents who are themselves little else but children. This is sought to be palliated on the ground of preventing worse consequences, but it weakens the community so much that in some places they seem to be gradually dying out under its effects. To the surprise and indignation of the western and more civilized Jew, polygamy, to the extent of a second wife, is not uncommon where the first wife has no children, or the children are all females. They are also a very superstitious race, and Dr. Frankl is a minute recorder and indefatigable collector of strange stories of their belief in the supernatural. The most prominent notion of this kind is the belief that women are regarded by spirits and demons with love and jealousy. The Ilatti Humayoum is more feared and disliked, than looked upon as a hopeful indication in their favour. The military service which they are called upon to render to the sultan is hateful in the extreme, as they believe it to be a secret attempt to undermine their religion. So far has this feeling extended, that in the Hebrew slums of Constantinople Dr. Frankl heard it made the subject of a song, and tells us:—

"I asked the man if he knew any new songs.

"You have come to a king in the realm of song."

"We laughed at this haughty Spanish answer, and ordered him to sing. He sang a song, just out, the production of some unknown poet, the subject of which is the Jews of the place, showing how they have violated all that is old and highly prized, have cast aside their piety and their reverence for the Supreme Being, and been rendered apostate and godless by the Tansimat and Hat Humayoum."

This feeling also coincides with a subject that, at the time, wrought the most dismal dismay among them when the chalebi was prohibited, of which he says:—

"The chalebi is the old traditional head-dress of the Jewish women; its ugliness is only equalled by the difficulty of describing it. Imagine a ball of linen rags, about the size of an ostrich's egg, tightly compressed, and placed on the crown of the head of the woman who is about to be adorned with the chalebi. Then a female attendant holds this ball in its place, while another winds a shawl over it in curious folds. Thus the chalebi rises aloft like a tower, and carefully conceals the hair of the wearer; it not only detracts from the personal appearance of those who wear it, but also exposes them to the derision of the Mohammedans, by showing that they are Jewesses.

"Redschid Pasha signified, when the Chacham of Nischan paid him his official visit, that it would be agreeable to him if the women reformed their style of dress, and laid aside the chalebi. On this the Chacham Baschi ordered the chalebi to be prohibited in the synagogues. The old women shed tears, and lamented as if they were about to lose a favourite child, and persisted in wearing the chalebi. Then the Chacham Baschi gave forth an anathema against it, and the souls of the old women were overwhelmed with a feeling of profound sorrow, as they saw in this innovation the presage of the ruin and decay of the sacred Jewish religion, in the same way as the old Polish Jews, when the young men laid aside the long black caftan, and impiously cropped their long unshorn locks.

"But there is a tale of mystery connected with the chalebi.

"Soon after the anathema had been hurled at the heads of the aged women, one night, a female, concealed by a grey veil, made her appearance at a place of embarkation on the Bosphorus, and stepped into a caique. When the boatman asked her where he should row, her answer was, 'Row on.' Having arrived at a landing-place, she ceased rowing, and asked her if she would land. 'Row on,' was her only answer, and this occurred several times. It struck the boatman that his boat passed through the water as lightly as if there had been no one in it. At length they arrived at the landing-place at Chasköi, where most of the Jews reside. The woman with the grey veil stepped from the caique to the land, and said to the boatman—

"Know that I am the cholera, and that I have come to punish the Jews, because their women have laid aside the chalebi."

"There followed a fearful outbreak of cholera at Chasköi."

On Dr. Frankl's journey to Jerusalem, whither he has been commissioned to go by a benevolent Austrian lady in order to open a school there for the benefit of the Jewish children, he experienced a proof how a poetical and touching custom had degenerated into a burlesque; and he gives the following account of his approach to the holy city:—

"I was now some hundred yards in advance of the caravan, and quite close to the walls of the city. Suddenly a man, whom I had not previously observed, rushed upon me, and seized the collar of my great coat with his left hand, while he brandished a long glittering knife in his right. My reverie, from which I was suddenly roused by this unexpected attack, gave place to a feeling of indescribable terror, and I was almost mechanically drawing my pistols from the holster, when the man quickly loosened his hold, lowered his arms, and, with pale lips, exclaimed—

"Schema Israel! what are you going to do?"

"All this happened in less than a minute, and recognizing one of the same creed, I, who may have been just as pale with terror myself, could not help bursting into a laugh. He explained to me that every Jewish pilgrim, before he enters the city, must tear his dress from sorrow at its destruction, in the same way as on the occasion of the death of a relative. So I allowed Mr. Mosche Kural, who derives a small income from this office, 'a krie cut'—i.e., I allowed him to make a rent in my dress, while I repeated after him the usual formula—'Zion is turned into a desert, in lies in ruins.'"

At Jerusalem he found the degradation, degeneration, immorality, and superstition of his race at the lowest possible depth; and however accustomed we may be to the denunciations of the Christians of the Latin and Greek churches located there, among themselves, or to the slanders of the Anglo-Prussian Bishop Gobat, with all the abuse the latter has heaped on those who differ from him—yet in comparison to Dr. Frankl's indignant description of the ways and doings of the Jews at Jerusalem, the former are comparatively mild and inoffensive. The Jews have a favourite practice, particularly those of Germany and Poland, and they leave the lands of their birth when advancing in years, in order to lay their bones in the tomb of their forefathers at Jerusalem; and as many of them reach the holy city not overburdened with wealth, they are supported by alms collected for that purpose in almost every city of Europe. Three consequences follow this continual immigration and collection. The first is an immense amount of speculation and fraud amongst the rabbis and other persons through whose hands the money passes. Another is the idleness, falsehood, sycophancy and selfishness of professed mendicants, which inflames the ferocious party quarrels among the various sects of eastern and western origin, who fight their battles in the holy city, each to secure the greatest amount of assistance derived from the pious offerings of their people abroad. And lastly, these immigrants bring their families with them, who lapse into the evil habits of the country, contract premature marriages, lose all habits of industry, and add to the number of the enfeebled and depraved race who prey on the benevolence, and frustrate all the munificent plans for their welfare, formed by such noble-minded Jews as Sir Moses Montefiore, who came with barrels of dollars to distribute among his people, but all whose schemes for permanently improving them have wellnigh come to nought, and who was ultimately excommunicated by them for offending their superstition by visiting the Mosque of Omar.

Dr. Frankl, though a Jew, does not consider himself bound to accept the ideas, or hide the faults of his race. Even while conforming to their customs, he expresses no respect for some of them. He openly proclaims the unworthiness, fraud and rascality of most of their rabbis. He enumerates, with bitter precision, the varieties of their parties. He descants at large on the greediness, the unfitness for anything useful or good, of the poorer population; and though he does not tell us that his own benevolent errand was unsuccessful, he dwells on what he had to endure from the malice and calumnies of unscrupulous opponents, and scarcely leaves much reason to hope that his schemes would prove more lasting than those of his noble and openhearted predecessors, Sir Moses Montefiore and Mr. Cohen.

A darker and more miserable picture could hardly be drawn of a race lost to every feeling of self-respect and good, sinking deeper and deeper each generation into sensuality and corruption of mind and body, eaten up with the grossest superstitions, and grossly, ruthlessly, and systematically oppressed and plundered by rulers professing to govern, and even to feed them, in the name of God!

He quotes the indignant expression of a Polish merchant who went to Jerusalem expecting to find it the seat of sanctity, but found nothing there save immorality, hypocrisy, and utter helplessness. The Pole said:—"He that will enjoy aulom haze (the pleasures of this world), must live in Moldavia; he that wishes to renounce them and to obtain aulom habo, (the pleasures of the other world), must live in Russia, but let him that wishes to have neither aulom haze, nor aulom habo live at Jerusalem." And it is "in Jerusalem alone," adds Dr. Frankl, "where every word of the Bible is regarded as sacred, the command of the Bible, 'In the sweat of thy brow shalt thou eat bread,' is practically ignored." Our author also tells us,

"It is deeply to be regretted that many Jewish workmen, who come to Jerusalem with the honest intention of making their own bread, soon abandon their different trades, which no doubt are more exhausting in a hot climate, and live on alms. For example, about sixteen years ago a tailor, dressed in the European fashion, made his way from Amsterdam to Jerusalem: the last production of his needle was a Polish suit, made a short time before his arrival. He at once renounced his trade, and, following in the footsteps of his tailoring countryman, the Prophet John of Leyden, he became a president, and of course wealthy. A tailor from Bavaria, who had previously tried to make his fortune in America, and at length succeeded by a marriage at Jerusalem, had to give up his trade, because his aristocratic spouse at Jerusalem told him roundly, 'I do not sit'—i. e., I will not live 'with a tailor,' and they now both live very comfortably on alms."

Dr. Frankl, who collects all the quaint stories he can, tells us the following one, illustrative of this city of beggars:—

"The following still more amusing event, as it tends to illustrate the character of the people, may here be introduced:—Sir Moses Montefiore brought with him in wooden barrels dollars in specie, and resolved, with his usual kindness of disposition, to give with his own hand a dollar to every poor person. It took many hours before his task was done and the miserable exhibition of poverty concluded. It so happened that the noble distributor, forgetful of himself, gave away the sum which he required to pay his travelling expenses home. He was obliged to borrow money. A man was soon found, who expressed his readiness to oblige him—for a consideration—and supplied him with the necessary sum, the amount of which was considerable, in specie. And yet this man the previous day seemed to be the neediest of the needy, and had received a silver dollar from the hand of the benefactor of Palestine."

The ignorance of the presidents, chachams, rabbis, and other spiritual heads of the community is very gross, and Dr. Frankl writes in severe terms of them generally. He says:—

"When any knowledge of the Talmud is found to exist among the Ashkenasim at Jerusalem—the Perushim enjoy the highest reputation in this branch—it has never been acquired in the Holy City, but been brought by the immigrants from their native land. They never study the Bible, and derive all their knowledge of it from the Talmud, to which they have recourse without any previous knowledge of grammar. But all study here is a mere mechanical exercise of memory, and in the land of Talmud and Amoraim there is not a single person engaged in learned researches. I happened to mention to a rabbi, who enjoys a high reputation for learning, that I was about to visit Mount Gerizim and Ebal, and expected to reach them in the course of two days. 'What! are they not a thousand miles from this?' asked the rabbi, in astonishment."

Dr. Frankl also charges them with appropriating to themselves the lion's share of the princely contributions of the European Jews for their people at Jerusalem, and he further adds that—

"The poverty of some is so great that it cannot fail to excite surprise and compassion, while the wives of the presidents, who came there at first quite as poor, are dressed in silk, and decked with gold and precious stones. The daughter of one of them, on the day of her marriage, wore a dress which cost 1,000 piastres; and the marriage feast, to which all the more distinguished members of society at Jerusalem were invited, cost 1,500 piastres."

"When that active philanthropist, Mr. Albert Cohen, paid his second visit to Jerusalem, the wives of the rabbis were expressly forbidden to wear their jewels during his stay. We have often heard the poor, when speaking of their contributions, and the way in which they are applied by the rulers, use the characteristic expression, 'They devour them!' We would not go quite so far as this, or assert that the highly honoured presidents are guilty of embezzlement. We would take a charitable view of the subject, and say that they have an overweening idea of their own rank and importance, which is all quite natural and pardonable. But then rank must be supported, and they perhaps deduct a little too much for themselves in the shape of 'Kadima.'"

So also he tells us the office of travelling collector is highly prized, and—

"With what feelings of veneration is a Sheliach, a begging delegate from Palestine, greeted when he enters our houses to collect money for our poor co-religionists at Jerusalem? Does not the dust of the sacred soil still adhere to his dress? His eye has lingered and wept over the ruins of the temple, and tearing himself from the bosom of his family, he has gone forth and exposed himself to the dangers of the stormy ocean and of a long journey by land. He tells us of those who are languishing in poverty and starving with hunger in Jerusalem, who are weeping and praying for us."

But how should we greet him if we knew that this collecting of alms is simply a trade, and that the delegate himself will pocket the greater part of the money which is contributed in perfectly good faith for the relief of those who are languishing and starving at Jerusalem?

"The office of delegate is sold in the holy city to the highest bidder; usually to some respectable chacham or rabbi, to enable him to amass a fortune. It is quite true that he is bound to pay a certain sum to the community. The highest bidder continues to enjoy his right; he is not bound to enter on his journey immediately; he may put it off for months, or even for years, provided always that he pays the interest of the sum, which increases according to a fixed scale. This interest often amounts to a considerable sum, and there are cases where it has been paid for five or eight years. On his return the delegate receives the third part of the proceeds of his journey, but he does not receive the sum originally deposited; it is, therefore, quite natural and pardonable that he should repay this sum to himself, and hand over only the balance to the community, which pays him the third part of the balance also."

Dr. Frankl prides himself on his enlarged ideas, and makes free with the superstition of his eastern brethren. Among the various attempts made to obstruct his school was one which recalls a kindred species of superstition much nearer home. He tells us he had taken a house and arranged it with no little difficulty and trouble. Crowds of miserable people brought their children asking for their admission, and invoking all kinds of eastern blessings, such as "Receive my child into this institution, and thou shalt eat with the pious of the fish Leviathan;" at last all matters likely to give offence having been carefully looked after, "The small synagogue of the school had to be removed from the first to the second floor, because it is forbidden to walk over the ark where the thora or law is kept." This accomplished, the day fixed for opening, when at the last moment a cry was raised that there was a crucifix in the school:—

"The restless, idle zealots contrived to give me considerable annoyance to the last. The night before the ceremony of inauguration I was woken up and informed that the report had been spread by the Russian Jews that there was a crucifix in the institution. I imagined that a crucifix might have been wantonly thrown into it, or painted on the walls. I hastened to the house, but I could discover nothing, till my attention was directed to the fact that the Grand Cross of the Emperor's own Order was painted on his breast. I contrived with some difficulty to scrape off the points of the cross with a knife; in the same way I managed to remove the carving of a silver lamb, part of the arms of Simon von Lännel, which were introduced beneath his picture, as a graven image is not allowed in a synagogue."

In taking leave of Dr. Frankl, we must say, though he is a western Jew, and his accounts are both quaint and grotesque, there is nothing ill natured in them. He deplures, as we do, the degradation of the eastern portion of the house of Israel, but we believe, and for the sake of our Hebrew brethren, we hope, that as the eastern Jews sink into insignificance, the western Jews will rise higher and higher towards the goal. To our Hebrew brethren and companions we cordially recommend the perusal of a work which treats so much of the customs and peculiarities of The Jews in the East; and to all who feel, as strongly as we do, such an interest in everything that concerns the immediately once favoured, and again to be the favoured, people of God, we say—read this work, which contains such a mass of information, pleasantly told, as no other series of books on The Jews in the East have told us before.

THE MASONIC MIRROR.

MASONIC MEMS.

THE R.W. Prov. G.M., of Wiltshire, Lord Methuen, has convened a Prov. Grand Lodge to be held in the New Hall, Chippenham, on Tuesday, the 23rd August.

The Prov. Grand Lodge for Worcestershire is to be held at Kidderminster, early in September. The brethren are to proceed in procession to church, where full cathedral service is to be performed.

METROPOLITAN.

BRADON LODGE (No. 902).—A meeting of this Lodge was held at the Star and Garter, Kew, on Wednesday, the 17th, when Bro. Collins was duly installed as W.M. Amongst the officers appointed were Bros. Avery, S.W.; Sweeny, J.W.; Jno. Scott, P.M., Treas.; J. W. Adams, P.M., Sec.; and Daly, Tyler. A handsome supper closed the proceedings of the day.

INSTRUCTION.

CRYSTAL PALACE LODGE (No. 1,044).—The fifteen sections will be worked at this Lodge of Instruction, held at the City Arms, West-square, on Monday, September 5th. Bro. Farmer, W.M. No. 25, has consented to officiate as W.M., and will give the introductory address to each lecture. The Lodge will meet at seven o'clock precisely.

PROVINCIAL.

DEVONSHIRE.

STONEHOUSE.—Lodge of Sincerity (No. 224).—At the regular meeting of the Lodge, on the 8th inst., Bro. Rodd, W.M., in the chair; Lord Graves, S.W.; Dr. Dowse, P.M., J.W., pro tem.; Spence Bate, Secretary; Rae, J.D.; Walker, I.G.; Hunt, P.M.; Brizzi, G. L. Triscott, Dix, and Jackman being present, as well as the following visiting brothers:—Tate, No. 460, and Saunders, No. 351, the Lodge having been duly opened, and the minutes of the last regular meeting confirmed, it was passed to the second degree, when Bros. Risk and Dix were examined as to the progress they had made in the hidden mysteries of nature and science peculiar to the degree of Fellowcraft; and having shown that they had made such progress as entitled them, were entrusted with the test of merit that would enable them to obtain admission in a Lodge of a superior degree. The Lodge was then raised to the third degree, when Bros. Risk and Dix were admitted in due form and raised to the sublime degree of Master Masons. The Lodge was then closed to the second and first degrees, when the Secretary read by command of the W.M. the second of the ancient charges:—"Of the civil magistrate, supreme and subordinate." The W.M. ordered that a letter of sympathy and condolence be sent to the widow of our recently deceased Bro. V. Narracott. The Lodge finally closed in harmony at a quarter before ten o'clock.

DORSETSHIRE.

PROVINCIAL GRAND LODGE AT BRIDPORT.

On Thursday, the 11th inst., the Right Worshipful Bro. Joseph Gundry, Prov. Grand Master of Dorset, held his first Grand Lodge since his appointment to this distinguished office, for the purpose of re-organizing the various Grand Offices of the province, which had been some time in abeyance, owing to the decease of the late Prov. Grand Master, Bro. H. R. Willett, and latterly had only been under the charge of Bro. Roxburgh, the Grand Registrar of England.

The brethren of the province were received in the Town Hall of Bridport, occupied as the temporary Lodge room of the Lodge of St. Mary's, Bridport, No. 1,009, Bro. Frederick Cosens, W.M., where they assembled at high twelve.

The Prov. Grand Lodge having been opened in antient form, a Board of Installed Masters was first held, at which the Prov. Grand Master was duly installed. The Prov. Grand Lodge was then opened for the admission of the brethren of the several Lodges, who inscribed their names on entering to the number of upwards of one hundred.

The R.W. the Prov. Grand Master then addressed the brethren in acknowledgment of the high honour that had been conferred upon him in placing him in so exalted a position in the province; and pledged himself to do everything in his power for the promotion of Masonry and of those sublime and sacred objects which it has in view, calculating on the support of the brethren of the Order.

The Prov. Grand Pursuivant marshalled the brethren under their respective banners, and preceded by a band playing the Masonic anthem, the brethren walked to Allington Church to attend divine service. The day was peculiarly favourable, and the effect was acknowledged to be highly imposing. Arrived at Allington Church, the brethren took open order, lining the churchyard path, as the officers of the Grand Lodge passed through the midst of them, and entered the body of the church.

Bro. the Rev. J. B. Ferris, of Corscombe, read and conducted the services for the day; the sermon being preached by Bro. the Rev. Henry Rawlinson, Chaplain, No. 1,009. Kent's anthem, (from the 1st Chron. xxix., 10, 11, 12, 13) for four and two voices and chorus, was admirably given. Bro. Case presided at the organ, and the choral services were executed under his direction.

The sermon, by Bro. the Rev. Henry Rawlinson, curate of Symonds-bury, who wore a collar and badge of the Order, was listened to with the deepest attention. The text was taken from Acts vii., 47, 48—"But Solomon built him an house. Howbeit the Most High dwelleth not in temples made with hands." The reverend brother went on to show that a brotherhood like theirs believing as they did in the volume of the sacred law, and from whose hallowed pages they derived their sacred symbols and allegories, first assembled, with much propriety, in the house of God before taking any important step. As there were also exoteric persons present, strangers to their antient and enlightened Order, he sought to disabuse them of the impression that its institutions were principally of a social and convivial cast, by urging first the deep debt of gratitude which Christendom owed to this antient and honourable fraternity, and secondly, demonstrating the high standard that they, their successors in the Craft, endeavoured by God's grace to reach. The first part of his discourse he adapted to his text by a reference to the progress of temple-building, from the altars of the first ages, to the idolatrous tabernacles and shrines of antiquity, till the greatest of human that direction culminated in the temple of Solomon, completed in seven years and a-half, its ornaments so applicable to their Craft, and so figurative of its excellence, by a body of Freemasons under Hiram, King of Tyre. He then went on trace from this time downwards the history of the Craft. The desire for splendid monasteries and magnificent cathedrals procured from the Roman pontiffs the most important privileges. From the Continent the association passed into Scotland, where they built the abbey of Kilwinning, and erected their first Lodge, and from Scotland the Order was introduced into England, the earliest Lodge being at York. There was scarcely a cathedral, abbey, or public building of note, that was not erected by the associated body of Freemasons. He instanced the Temple church in the reign of Henry II.; on the accession of Richard II., William of Wykeham, G.M., founded at his own expense New College, Oxford, and Winchester College; in the reign of Henry IV., the Guildhall of London; in that of Henry VI., Magdalen College, Oxford, Eton College and King's College, Cambridge, Bishop Wanefleet, G.M.; in that of Henry VII. (who was G.M.), the east end of Westminster Abbey (Henry VIII's chapel); under Cardinal Wolsey, G.M., Hampton Court, Whitehall, and Christ Church, Oxford; under his successor Cromwell, St. James's Palace, Christ's Hospital, and Greenwich Palace; finally, Sir Christopher Wren, G.M., erected that masterpiece of architectural skill, St. Paul's Cathedral. Passing on to the second head of discourse, he showed beautifully the end that Masons—no longer pursuing the operative, but devoted exclusively to the pursuit of the speculative branch of their Craft—sought to obtain, dealing extensively in the symbolism of the Order, and freely expounding its meanings. With a stirring exhortation to the brethren to walk in the paths of religion and virtue, to which the symbols of their Order pledged and bound them, the reverend gentleman wound up a most animated discourse.

The brethren then returned to the Town Hall in the same order of procession.

The Prov. Grand Lodge being re-constituted, after the transaction of a variety of business, including approbation of the Grand Treasurer's accounts, which that functionary stated showed the funds of the province to be in a more flourishing condition than ever before had been the case during his term of office, the Prov. Grand Master made the following nomination of Grand Officers, who were all called up to the dais and invested by Bro. the Rev. Thomas Pearce, No. 543, D. Prov. G.M., viz.:—Bros. Thos. Coombs, W.M. No. 605, Prov. S.G.W.; Phippard, W.M. No. 542, Prov. J.G.W.; the Rev. J. St. John, Prov. G. Chaplain; Hannen, No. 694, Prov. G. Treas.; F. Cosens, W.M. No. 1009, Prov. G. Reg.; J. Maunders, W.M. No. 199, Prov. G. Sec.; W. Parr, W.M. No. 160, Prov. S.G.D.; R. N. Howard, J.W. No. 199, Prov. J.G.D.; J. Sopitt, No. 542, Prov. G. Supt. of Works; Godden, No. 963, Prov. G. Dir. of Cers.; T. Rawlinson, No. 905, Prov. Asst. G. Dir. of Cers.; W. Manley, S.W. No. 1009, Prov. G.S.B.; Robinson, No. 605, Prov. G. Org.; Bosworth, No. 199, Prov. G. Pura.; Prov. Grand Stewards—Bros. E. Colborn, No. 640; W. Godwin, No. 694; J. P. Gundry, No. 1009; R. Phillips, No. 640; Lovelace, No. 605, Prov. G. Tyler. The venerable and respected Prov. G. Tyler, Bro. Fairie, having—from infirmity and advanced years—been obliged to tender his resignation; as an acknowledgment of his long and faithful services, a gratuity of £5 was granted him.

The thanks of the Prov. Grand Lodge were voted to the Vicar of Allington for the use of his church; to the Rev. J. B. Ferris for officiating; to the Mayor for his grant of the use of the Town Hall; to Mr. Case and the choir for their services, and most especially to the Rev. Henry Rawlinson for the truly Masonic sermon he had preached.

The Prov. Grand Lodge was then, after the transaction of the remaining business, closed with all due formality.

THE BANQUET

took place at four o'clock, at the Bull Hotel, where Bro. Knight provided an excellent dinner.

The usual toasts were given by the R. W. Prov. Grand Master (who presided), commencing with "the Queen and the Craft," which was briefly but loyally prefaced.

In proposing the Bishop and Clergy of the diocese, the Prov. Grand Master observed that as the principles of the Craft were founded upon religion, the toast was always most appropriate, and he had no difficulty in recommending it to their attention since the Bishop was himself a Mason.

Bro. the Rev. T. B. Ferris, rector of Corscombe, in returning thanks, observed that the field of duty open to a Mason was indeed a wide one, and he would do well to imitate the diligence and the wisdom manifested by those who worked in the different professions, discharging those important duties which were so beneficial to the world. He believed that the R. W. Prov. Grand Master would not be alarmed if he recommended to him, and to the brethren, an imitation of the lawyer's handicraft. Certainly they would do well and would act consistently if they understood the doctrines and the duties of distributive justice. Next, he certainly recommended them to imitate the parson. At any rate, if they were true to their Masonic duties, let them preach peace wherever they go, and, whenever called upon, let them stand up like men and give a reason for the hope which they profess to have. Then, again, let them not pass over the doctors. (A laugh.) Society is in a very disordered state, and their duty was to choose the remedies which soothe and allay, instead of irritate and increase, the sorrows of mankind. Next, let them imitate our noble soldiers—let them go forward, never regarding being called peacemongers and enthusiasts, but honestly in their hearts Preferring a blessing to a bayonet, and a volume from Dr. Oliver to a shell from Sir W. Armstrong—steadfastly resolving, wherever they were, to try and conciliate the severity of private and individual opinion, and, as far as possible, to annihilate all party strife.

The D. Prov. Grand Master Pearce proposed the health of the Prov. Grand Master, upon whom he passed a very high but well deserved compliment.

The R. W. Prov. Grand Master, in returning thanks, said that while he felt that many brethren were far more able to fill his high office than himself, yet, having the welfare of the Craft at heart, and there having been a strongly expressed wish that he should fill the office, he had been induced to accede to that wish, and they might rely upon his best efforts to promote the good of Masonry generally, and of the province of Dorset in particular. He hoped that as long as he held the office he should be supported by the sympathies of the brotherhood as evidently as they had been manifested that day. He proposed the health of the D. Prov. Grand Master.

The Rev. Bro. Pearce, D. Prov. G.M., observed that he believed that he was one of the youngest D. Prov. Grand Masters in England, and, therefore, he the more highly regarded the honour.

The Prov. Grand Master afterwards gave "the Visiting Brethren," for which Bro. G. P. R. Pulman returned thanks.

ESSEX.

CHIGWELL.—Chigwell Lodge (No. 663).—This Lodge held a meeting on Saturday, the 13th inst., when Bros. Lomas and Winter were passed to the second degree, and Bros. Glasscoxon and Jager were raised to the sublime degree of Master Masons. Bro. Paas was then elected W.M. for the ensuing year, and it was unanimously agreed that a P.Ms. jewel be presented to Bro. Richard Geo. Motion, the present W.M., on his retiring from the chair. The visitors were Bros. Ransford, Muggerridge, Nelthorpe, Tomkins, Osborne, E. W. Davis, W. and W. C. Harvey.

HAMPSHIRE.

SOUTHAMPTON.—Royal Gloster Lodge (No. 152).—The regular meeting of the Lodge was held on Thursday, the 11th inst., the W.M., Bro. F. Perkins presiding, supported by his officers and several P.Ms. Bro. Leete was raised to the degree of M.M. by the W.M. in his usual impressive manner, after which Bros. A. Weston and Preece were passed to the second degree. Bro. G.M. Passenger, S.W., congratulated the W.M. on his appointment as Prov. S.G.W., after so many years of good and useful service to the Craft, and expressed his conviction that he would discharge the duties of that high and important office with credit to himself and justice to the province. Bro. Passenger concluded a long and eloquent speech in the following words:—Worshipful Sir, you work your Lodge like a Mason, and preside over it like a gentleman. We are gratified at the same time to find that the onerous duties of your office have not diminished the comforts and pleasures of domestic life; and shall ever be pleased to remember that during the time you have filled that chair you have taken unto yourself as a wife the daughter of a distinguished brother Mason; a lady who possesses all those virtues and accomplishments which are calculated to render an Englishman's home happy; and have added to your household gods another son. We wish your son may become as good men and as worthy Masons as their father; and that you may live to a good ripe old age, to see and enjoy it, and that the chair of S.W. of this province may never be filled by one less desirous and capable than yourself of promoting the best interests of Masonry in general, and this province in particular. By your leave, Worshipful Sir, I will propose the following resolution:—"The officers and members of this Lodge desire to congratulate their W.M. upon his appointment as S.W. of the province of Hampshire, wishing him a happy and successful year of office, and that the G.A.O.T.U. may grant him health, long life, and prosperity to enjoy the high rank to which his services will entitle him." Bro. Douglas, P.M., seconded the resolution. He believed the W.M. would still do, as he always had done, his utmost to promote everything which would benefit the Craft. He perfectly agreed with all those kind expressions of the S.W. towards the W.M., and he was quite sure that every brother who knew him was delighted at his appointment. Bro. Abraham, P.M., then put the resolution, and it was carried unanimously. The W.M. in returning thanks alluded to the lateness of the hour, and on that account would not detain the brethren by any remarks, excepting to state that he was deeply sensible of their kindness towards him, and the allusions which had been made to those who were near and dear to him. Masonry had been to him the exciting cause for any good he had done, and although it brought with it its own reward, it was highly gratifying to his feelings to find these proofs of appreciation recurring so often. He would always endeavour to merit their esteem, and he hoped the same fraternal feeling might exist in every Lodge between the W.M. and the brethren, which marked in so decided a manner the career of the Royal Gloster. The Lodge was then closed in harmony at ten o'clock. A large number of brethren sat down to the usual banquet, and a very pleasant evening was spent.

LANCASHIRE (EAST).

BURY.—Lodge of Relief (No. 50).—On Thursday, the 11th inst., the monthly meeting of the above Lodge was held at the Hare and Hounds Inn, when Bro. John Redfern, Dir. of Cers., officiated as W.M.; Bro.

Parkes as S.W.; and Bro. Fishwick, P.M., as J.W. A ballot having been taken for Mr. James Grimshaw, of Prestwick, and found to be unanimous in his favour, he was initiated into the degree of E.A., after which, two other candidates were proposed to be balloted for at the next meeting. The brethren then adjourned to refreshment, and spent a comfortable evening together.

SOMERSETSHIRE.

HIGHBRIDGE.—Rural Philanthropic Lodge (No. 367).—The monthly meeting was held on Friday, the 12th inst., Bro. Henry Bridges, P. M., presiding in the absence of the W.M., Bro. W. Harwood. The ballot was taken for Mr. Henry Leaker, and was forthwith initiated into the mysteries of the Craft. Bro. Down, the architect, reported that the new Lodge room was completed by the builder, and he had possession of the key, and that it was quite ready for decoration. It was then agreed that the committee should get the room finished with as little delay as possible. A letter was read from the W. M., stating he should not be able to attend the next regular Lodge, to be held on the 9th of Sept., and it was unanimously agreed that the next Lodge meeting should be held on the 16th of Sept. Bro. Henry Bridges then stated that the next festival for the Royal Masonic Benevolent Institution for Aged Freemasons and their Widows, would be held in January next, and he trusted that from so numerous a Lodge as No. 367, numbering seventy-six members, they would be able to find a brother to serve as Steward. The Lodge was closed, and the brethren adjourned to refreshment; the proceedings of the evening terminated in an agreeable manner at an early hour.

STAFFORDSHIRE.

PROVINCIAL GRAND LODGE AT STAFFORD.

On Tuesday, the 9th instant, the brethren of this province met in Prov. Grand Lodge, at the Shire Hall, Stafford; upwards of one hundred brethren were present.

The Prov. Grand Lodge was opened in antient and solemn form at high twelve, by the R.W. Prov. Grand Master, Bro. Lt.-Col. Vernon, assisted by his Deputy and the Provincial Grand Officers.

The gratifying announcement was made that during the past twelve months the Freemasons of Staffordshire had nearly doubled their number, and now counted about six hundred. The official appointments for the year were made as under:—Bros. Ward, D. Prov. G.M.; Hon. G. Vernon, Prov. S.G.W.; F. A. Edwards, Prov. J.G.W.; Rev. J. Downes, Prov. G. Chaplain; Rev. Dr. Armstrong, Prov. G. Asst. Chaplain; William Lloyd, Prov. G. Treas.; D. Peacock, Prov. G. Reg.; F. Dee, Prov. G. Sec.; J. Butterworth, Prov. S.G.D.; C. H. King, Prov. J.G.D.; Major McKnight, Prov. G. Supt. of Works; S. Hill, Prov. G. Dir. of Cers.; W. B. Hayley, Prov. G. Asst. Dir. of Cers.; J. Ford, Prov. G. Sword Bearer; E. Shargool, Prov. G. Org.; J. Lowndes, Prov. G. Pura.; Carlo Bragazzi, Prov. G. Standard Bearer; H. Bagley, Prov. G. Tyler; and Bros. J. Duke, Samuel Hughes, W. Homer, H. Gillard, J. Collis, and R. Lowe, Prov. G. Stewards.

The Provincial Grand Lodge has sanctioned such an appropriation of its funds as will ensure for the Benevolent Institution, and for the Boys and Girls School, the sum of £50 each, being an amount which will entitle the Provincial Grand Master to act as a vice-president and one of the committee of management of each institution. This has been done by capitalizing £150, and ensuring the life of the Provincial Grand Master for £157 10s., the annual premium of which amounts only to £6 4s., the payment of which will secure the capital, and render it available for a like purpose in case of the death of the assured. This is setting a noble example to other provinces which many of them will not be slow to follow, and thus materially add to the financial resources of the charities.

The business of the day having been completed, the R.W. Prov. G.M. proceeded to close the Lodge in due and solemn form.

The brethren then walked in procession to St. Mary's Church, where prayers were read by the Rev. Bro. Lowe, Prov. G. Steward, and an excellent sermon preached by the Prov. G. Chaplain the Rev. Bro. Downes, from the text "This commandment have we—that he who loveth God love his brethren also."—1 John iv. 21. The discourse was intended as an exposition of the principles of the Royal Order of Masonry, which the reverend brother declared had nothing belonging to it inconsistent with the strictest rule of our holy religion, whether it respected our duty to God or man; yes, so far was it from anything of this, that any part of it, if duly followed, had a direct tendency to enforce and encourage the performance of every one of its most holy precepts, nor did he know a more prominent or distinguishing feature it possessed than that set forth in the text, "Love to God and love to the brethren."

After the sermon a collection was made, amounting to £11 16s. 4d., during which the offertory passages were read by the Rev. Bro. Dew, assistant chaplain at the county gaol. It was ordered that the collection should be applied as follows:—Five guineas to the Staffordshire Infirmary, and the remainder to the Rector of St. Mary's, Stafford, in aid of his new schools.

The brethren afterwards dined at the Shire Hall, which was hung for the occasion with banners and emblems; the latter were very tastefully and artistically executed, and consisted of Masonic devices. From the three galleries, which were filled with ladies, were suspended banners belonging to different Lodges in the province. The banner of the Prov.

Grand Lodge was hung from the front gallery, facing the chairman's seat. This was surmounted by a banner, and above it was the motto, "Brotherly Love, Relief, and Truth," with the words "Faith, Hope, Charity;" and beneath, "Sit Lux et Lux fuit." In front of the other galleries were the inscriptions—"Temperance, Fortitude, Prudence, Justice;" and "We meet on the level, we part on the square." Above the chair occupied by the Prov. Grand Master was the illuminated device of a "Staffordshire Knot," white upon black ground, with a V.R. and crown.

After dinner the Prov. Grand Master proposed "The Queen—God bless her:" he alluded to her Majesty's eminent virtues as displayed by her in the government of this great and prosperous country, and to the fact that the Queen was the daughter of, and the niece of, illustrious brothers who had once ruled over the Craft.

The D. Prov. Grand Master in proposing "The Prince Consort and the rest of the Royal Family," expressed a hope that they might, ere long, have the honour of receiving the Prince of Wales as a member of the Craft.

The Prov. Grand Master, in proposing "The health of the M.W. Grand Master, the Earl of Zetland," said that, notwithstanding they had heard remarks from time to time during the last two or three years implying a want of confidence in their M.W. Grand Master, he thought the fact of the re-election of the Earl of Zetland to that office for the sixteenth time was sufficient proof that he enjoyed the confidence of his brethren. (Cheers.) The voice of faction and detraction might have been heard—but a man was to be judged of by the esteem and regard in which he was held by those who knew him best. It was not a faction, a party, or a newspaper that could write down a deserving and good man; and, therefore, he repeated that they had reposed confidence in their M.W. Grand Master as was shown by the fact that he had recently, for the sixteenth time, been placed at the head of the Order. His character, which had been tried severely during the last two or three years, shone more brightly than before. He had proved himself an anxious and zealous ruler: perhaps he had his faults, but no human being was without them—and the manner in which he had ever ruled over the Craft—the zeal, the quiet, gentleman like good feeling which he had shown in every way—entitled him to their esteem and respect. (The toast was drunk with enthusiasm.)

Bro. H. C. Vernon, Prov. Grand Master of Worcestershire, proposed "The Most Worshipful Grand Masters of Scotland and Ireland—the Dukes of Athol and Leinster," who were at all times most happy to unite with the Grand Master of England in furthering the interests and stability of their great Masonic institution.

Bro. Colonel Hogg, as an Irish Mason, expressed his acknowledgments for the enthusiastic manner in which the health of "Ireland's only Duke" had that evening been received. An additional reason why the Masons of Staffordshire should drink his grace's health was that he was married to a daughter of the Duke of Sutherland, and felt an interest in what transpired in this county. He (the gallant colonel) could assure those brethren present who had visited the sister isle that if ever they did so they would receive from the Masons there such a hospitable reception as would prove the truth of the proverb that an Irishman's heart and purse invariably went together. He was proud to add that Masonry in his country was advancing rapidly. They did not go for numbers but for men, and that was the system carried out with success in all parts of the world where Masonry was known. (Cheers.)

Bro. Dudley Parsons, whose name was associated with the toast, also returned thanks as an Irishman.

Bro. Dr. Burton said that some delicate allusions had been made to what had transpired relative to the conduct of the M.W. Grand Master, who had been so materially strengthened in his official usefulness by the confidence of the Craft at large, and although he (Dr. Burton) was not personally acquainted with their Deputy Grand Master, Lord Panmure, he had the best reasons for asserting that that nobleman had proved himself a straightforward man in office, and under all circumstances an able and zealous supporter of the Grand Master. He proposed "The Right Worshipful Deputy Grand Master and the Officers of Grand Lodge." (Cheers.)

The R.W. Bro. H. Vernon replied to the toast. No one could be more anxious for the extension of Masonry, no one could be more attentive in the performance of his duties, and no one had the principles and practice of Masonry more at heart than Lord Panmure. With regard to the officers of Grand Lodge, whom himself and brother represented on that occasion, he could only say that at all times they would be happy in conveying the opinions of Grand Lodge to the brethren of their respective provinces. If they wanted them to do anything it was their fault if they did not ask, and, if asked, they would do their utmost to give satisfaction. (Applause.)

The V.W.D. Prov. G.M., Bro. Ward, said that it was his privilege to propose the next toast, and he always approached it with much diffidence, because he felt that it should be entrusted to able hands. It was, however, a toast which did not require any eloquence, inasmuch as the subject of it lived in the hearts and esteem of the Masons there assembled. He begged, therefore, to propose "The R.W. Prov. G.M., Lieut.-Colonel Vernon." He knew that there was no need of eloquence in making such a proposition. They were all perfectly aware of the consummate skill and talent which their Prov. G.M. possessed; of the kind, gentlemanlike, and courteous way in which he ever conducted himself towards his brethren. They might ask of him to "be to our virtues very kind," although they could not, with equal confidence, say "be to our faults a little blind." When their Prov. G.M. saw a fault he was not afraid to speak his mind, which was like medicine, very disagreeable to swallow, but it nevertheless did those who took it good. The R.W. Prov. G.M. had already told them in Lodge of the flourishing state of Masonry in this province. He (the speaker) could safely endorse that statement. Since he had known Masonry, a period of upwards of half a century, he had never known it in so flourishing a condition in that province as it was now. Not only were new Lodges being opened, but fresh zeal and energy were infused into those in existence, which argued well for their future career. They owed a deep debt to their Prov. G.M. for the state in which the province then was; and when they looked at the manner in which he made his talents useful in other parts of the kingdom, the Craft generally owed him a deep debt of gratitude. (Loud cheers.)

The Prov. Grand Master replied, his brethren would believe him when he said he was not at all insensible to the value of the warm applause with which his health had been received. He trusted that he had an honest pride in the feeling that he was esteemed by his brethren, and that he had the good will and the good wishes of those who were connected with his brethren. (Cheers.) In alluding to the kind and flattering terms in which his health had been proposed, he thought that his deputy must have been misled by an amiable weakness to speak of him, not as he was, but as a Provincial Grand Master ought really to be. (No, no.) He thanked them for that disclaimer; but he knew the kindly feelings of their warm hearts induced them to think and speak of him in a manner which he did not deserve; and he felt deeply gratified by their kindness on that occasion. The testimony which they had given him on many occasions of the regard and esteem in which he was held among the brethren made him proud of the position which he sustained among them—a position involving trouble and labour, but attended with little or no difficulty. If his course had been an easy one, it was because he had their good will. In speaking of himself they had kindly attributed to talent on his part what was only patient steadiness and fixedness of purpose. They knew that the interests of the province, and of Freemasonry generally, were the dearest objects of his care. With firm and steady views in that direction a little talent would go a great way. If there was any method of kindness in his intercourse with the brethren, it was prompted by the kindness with which he was invariably received among them. He was proud of the co-operation and assistance which he received from all brethren in the province, and especially from his officers; and here he might remark that if his office occasioned him any difficulty it arose from the anxiety of knowing that there were forty or fifty men annually deserving of the purple, and only eight or ten offices at his disposal. His brethren at large would, he knew, give him credit for effecting as much as he could; and thanking them for their renewed confidence, he trusted that every day and year of his life would be an endeavour to deserve it. He had great pleasure in proposing "The V.W. D. Prov. Grand Master, Bro. Ward," and feelingly alluded to the zeal and efficiency of his most valuable services. In a province of the extent of Staffordshire, where Lodges were scattered widely, north and south, it would be impossible for any single individual to attend to them all, even if he had the time to devote to such a purpose. He had the effective and zealous assistance of the D. Prov. Grand Master, especially in the superintendence of the northern districts of the province. From him he received abundant information; so that if he (the Prov. Grand Master) was not able to visit the north so frequently as the south, he was by no means ignorant of what was going on there; and that information was not only backed by the weight of the opinions of one who had been fifty years a Mason, but whose conduct had been that of steady progress through life, and whose excellent conduct had made him an upright man and a Mason. He could not sufficiently thank Bro. Ward for his valuable assistance, especially when he (the Prov. Grand Master) was away from the province, when he knew that his services were freely given, and were more effective than his own would be under any circumstances. He placed every confidence in Bro. Ward, in whom, too, every Mason had confidence. That brother had arrived at a goodly time of life, and they hoped that God would still bless and preserve his honoured hairs, so that he might remain among them for many many years. (Cheers.)

The V.W.D. Prov. Grand Master, who was loudly cheered, said that the gratifying reception he had met with was almost too much for a man of his age. In thanking them for the kind manner in which his health had been drunk, he could assure them that it was his greatest ambition and pleasure to stand well with them all, and to earn the esteem and approbation of his brethren. After an experience of half a century he was not likely to be led away, like a young man, by any fancied enthusiasm for Masonry. He had outlived anything of that kind; he had had experience enough of it, for mere enthusiasm too long ago had worn itself away; and the longer he lived the more he had become attached to Masonry and his many brother Masons. He could boast of being the senior Mason in that room and of the province; he was the eldest of four living generations, his son being a grandfather, and had learnt deeply to value the principles and practice of Masonry; and he trusted that his long course had been such as to justify their approbation and esteem.

Bro. Trubshaw, in proposing "The Prov. Grand Wardens and other Officers of the Prov. Grand Lodge," after remarking that independently of Masonry flourishing from the purity of its principles, it was sure to prosper in that province so long as the name of Vernon, was associated with it; and as there were many present who were newly initiated into its mysteries as well as many who had not had that advantage, he (the speaker) took the opportunity of telling them that amidst the revolutions of states and empires, of human laws and customs, Masonry had remained without any material change in its outward forms. Its pillars had remained unshaken through the rage of every varied storm. Its stability thus showing the soundness of its principles and their conformity to right reason and the best dictates of the human heart, and he hoped that one and all present would join with him in the prayer that the Almighty Architect of the universe might preserve the edifice pure and entire to the latest posterity, as it was the asylum of feeble man against the shafts of adversity, against the perils of strife, and, what was more to be dreaded, against the conflict of his own passions. It inculcated this great maxim as, a means of social happiness—that however separated by seas or distance, distinguished by national character, or divided into sects, the whole community of mankind ought to regard each other as members of the same family, for we are all children of the same eternal Father. (Cheers).

This toast having been duly responded to, there followed the toasts of "The Visiting Brethren," "The Ladies" (to which the Rev. Bro. Lowe replied), "The Prov. Grand Stewards," whose arrangements were highly and deservedly extolled. "The Masonic Charities," "The health of the Chaplain," "The Vocalists" (replied to by Bro. Pearsall), &c.

Among other distinguished visitors present on the occasion were Bros. H. C. Vernon, Prov. G.M. of Worcestershire; Masfield, P. Prov. S.G.W., Worcestershire; J. Ross, P. Prov. S.G.D., Warwickshire; J. Machin, P. Prov. S.G.W., Warwickshire; C. J. Vigne, P. Prov. S.G.W., Somersetshire; H. K. Harvey, P. Prov. S.G.W., Staffordshire; C. Trubshaw, P. Prov. S.G.W., Staffordshire; Col. Hogg, P. Prov. S.G.W. Staffordshire; J. Hallam, P. Prov. S.G.W., Staffordshire; Dr. Burton, P. Prov. S.G.W., Staffordshire; C. T. Davenport, P. Prov. S.G.W., Staffordshire, &c., &c.

WALES, SOUTH.

PROVINCIAL GRAND LODGE AT NEATH.

The annual Provincial Grand Lodge was held at the Masonic Hall, Neath, on Friday, the 5th inst., under the presidency of the R.W. Prov. G.M. Colonel C. K. Kemys-Tynte, supported by Bros. Dr. Bird, D. Prov. G.M.; M. Moggridge, Prov. S.G.W.; J. W. Russell, P. Prov. G.W.; R. F. Langley, Prov. G. Reg.; N. B. Allen, Prov. G. Treas.; Geo. Allen, Prov. G. Sec.; R. Jones, Prov. J.G.D.; F. D. Michael, Prov. G. Dir. of Cers.; Wm. Cox, Prov. G. Org., and other provincial officers and brethren.

The Prov. Grand Lodge having been opened in solemn form, the minutes of the proceedings of the last Provincial Grand Meeting, at Brecon, were read by the Prov. G. Sec., and duly confirmed; after which the Prov. G. Treasurer's accounts were received, audited, and passed.

The R.W. Prov. Grand Master then called the attention of the brethren to a letter from the Grand Secretary on the subject of the Masonic Schools, in which the R.W. brother appeared to take a strong interest; he urged the claims of these institutions forcibly and earnestly, and recommended the establishment of provincial committees for the purpose of assisting and extending the advantages of these excellent charities. From the appeal made by the R.W. Prov. G.M., we doubt not that at the earliest opportunity the several W. Ms. in the district will bring the subject before their respective Lodges, and will endeavour to co-operate in this good work.

The usual votes for charitable purposes were then agreed to, viz., the annual subscriptions to the Masonic Schools for Boys and Girls; to the Swansea Deaf and Dumb Asylum, &c.; also a donation to the Neath Schools. After which the R.W. Prov. Grand Master appointed his officers for the ensuing year, in the following order:—Bros. Alexander Essett, Prov. S.G.W.; R. S. Langley, Prov. J.G.W.; Theo. Mansel Talbot, Prov. G. Reg.; Geo. Allen, Prov. G. Sec.; Robt. Jones, Prov. S. G. Dir.; Edward J. Morris, Prov. G.J.D.; P. H. Rowland, Prov. G. Supt. of Works; F. D. Michael, Prov. G. Dir. of Cers.; Jas. Gawn, Prov. G. Org.; Blunt and Donaldson, Prov. G. Stewards.

Bro. N. B. Allen was unanimously re-elected Prov. G. Treas.

The R.W. Prov. Grand Master, accompanied by his officers and the members of the Prov. Grand Lodge, then visited the Neath Lodge, which was held in the new and extensive school-rooms adjoining the Masonic Hall, kindly lent for the occasion, and where the members of the various Lodges of the district were assembled in goodly numbers. The R.W. Prov. Grand Master was warmly greeted, the brethren, under the direction of Bro. F. D. Michael, Prov. G. Dir. of Cers., giving the customary salutes of welcome in good Masonic style. The R.W. Prov. Grand Master having acknowledged the compliment in a very feeling and eloquent address, the brethren formed in procession and proceeded to the parish church, to attend divine service. The sermon was preached by the rector, the Rev. John Griffiths, who selected for his text, Micah vi., 8. "He hath shewed thee, O man, what is good, and that doth the Lord require of thee, but to do justly and to love mercy, and to walk humbly with thy God," and delivered a most impressive and eloquent discourse, which was most attentively listened to. The musical service was well performed by an efficient choir. Bro. Dr. Wastfield, Prov. G. Org. for the western division, presided at the organ.

At the conclusion of the service, the brethren returned to the Lodge-rooms in the same order, (preceded by the excellent band of Mr. Hallam, of the Forest Tin Works, who had kindly placed their services at the disposal of the brethren for the day), passing through the principal streets, which presented a very lively appearance, the windows and balconies being filled with ladies and interested spectators.

The usual collection for charity was then made, and the amount liberally contributed was, at the suggestion of the R.W. Prov. Grand Master, placed at the disposal of the rector for the poor of the town. After which the R.W. Prov. Grand Master and his officers returned to the Provincial Grand Lodge, which was closed in antient and solemn form.

The brethren re-assembled at the Castle Hotel, at four o'clock, when about ninety sat down to partake of the excellent fare provided for them by Bro. Hancock; and during the dinner the band played several choice selections, contributing much to their gratification.

After the removal of the cloth, the R.W. Prov. Grand Master gave the customary loyal and Masonic toasts. The health of the R.W. Prov. Grand Master was proposed in graceful terms by the D. Prov. Grand Master, Dr. Bird, and drunk with full Masonic honours and the greatest enthusiasm. After responding to the toast, the R.W. brother vacated the chair, which was taken by Bro. M. Moggridge, the P. Prov. S.G.W., and W.M. of the Swansea Lodge.

Bros. Dr. Wastfield and Geo. Allen successively presided at the piano-forte, and the pleasure of the evening was much enhanced by the excellent singing of these brethren, and also of Bros. Gawn, Jno. Jones, H. W. Williams, Angel K. Smith, and others.

The greatest praise is due to Bro. P. H. Rowland, W.M. of the Neath Lodge, for the excellent manner in which everything was arranged for the convenience of the brethren, which gave complete satisfaction. The brethren separated at an early hour, having passed a most agreeable day.

The next Provincial Grand Lodge will be held at Aberdare.

MARK MASONRY

PROVINCIAL.

BIRKENHEAD.—Joppa Lodge (No. 5, S.C).—The Brethren of this Lodge held their usual meeting at the Park Hotel, July 27th, 1859, Bro. J. P. Platt, R.W.M., in the chair; there was a good attendance of the officers. The following brethren were advanced to the degree of Mark Masters:—Bros. J. B. Hughes, No. 864; Jas. D. Casson, No. 864; S. G. Broomhead, No. 245; T. J. Markham, No. 282; W. G. Pinchin, No. 310.

THE WEEK.

THE COURT.—On Friday afternoon Her Majesty and the Prince Consort embarked on board the Victoria and Albert at Osborne on a cruise of several days. The Queen was also accompanied by several of the royal children. They visited the islands of Guernsey, Jersey and Alderney, and were everywhere received with enthusiasm, arriving safely at Osborne on Monday morning. There have been no visitors at Osborne House this week. Tuesday was the Duchess of Kent's birthday, and was celebrated in a very quiet way. Prince Alfred has returned from his visit to his brother in Edinburgh.

FOREIGN NEWS.—The great Paris event of the week has been the celebration of the fêtes on Sunday and Monday. On the former day the entry of the troops into Paris took place. The emperor and his suite proceeded along the Boulevards from the Bastille to the Place Vendôme amidst the acclamations of the crowd, which was immense. The defiling of the troops terminated at half-past two, p.m. The empress and the prince imperial were stationed at the Place Vendôme. Before the defile was over a tremendous shower fell, and rain continued during the evening, diminishing the effect of the illuminations, which otherwise were of a very brilliant description. The reception of the troops, which was most enthusiastic along the boulevards, was very cold in the faubourg. At the banquet given to the principal chiefs of the army of Italy, at the Tuileries, the emperor expressed regret to see separating so soon the elements of a force so well organized and redoubtable. "A part of our soldiers," said his majesty, "are going to return to their hearths. You also are going to resume the occupations of peace. Nevertheless, do not forget what we have done together. If France has done so much for a friendly people, what would she not do for her own independence?" The short speech contained no political allusion. Two facts of importance are, the formation of a large camp at Lille, under the command of Marshal Niel, and the announcement in the Moniteur of a full amnesty to all individuals who have been condemned for political crimes, or who have been the objects of measures of general safety. The details of this important measure will be looked for with great interest. —On Monday, at Milan, a solemn fête was celebrated in honour of Napoleon. In the morning a Te Deum was performed in the cathedral, in the presence of the king, Marshal Vaillant and other officers, the magistrates, and the national guard in grand gala dress. After dinner a spectacle took place in the arena, the expenses of which were defrayed by the municipality, and the receipts destined for the wounded. The king, Prince Carignan, Marshal Vaillant, and about 40,000 people were present. The name of Napoleon was received everywhere with acclamations. Count Arese has arrived at Turin. An amnesty for small offences has been published.—From Florence we learn by telegraph that the proposition of Signor Ginori, as to the incompatibility of the dynasty of Lorraine to govern Tuscany has been agreed to unanimously, and a proposition carried by the assembly that it is the firm will of Tuscany to form part of the kingdom of Italy under King Victor Emmanuel. The mayor of Parma has addressed a letter to the Patrie, giving a positive contradiction to the report of a revolutionary movement having broken out in that city. The real wishes of the duchy of Parma with regard to the annexation to Piedmont were to be ascertained on the 14th, by a plebiscite, or declaration of the people, on the matter. General Garibaldi has accepted the chief command of the forces of Central Italy.—All the accounts from Vienna state that there is a great desire for reform in Austria.—The Chamber of Deputies at Munich have rejected the motion for the formation of a central German power.—The last accounts from Berlin represent the state of the King of Prussia as very serious.—New York news is of very slight importance. President Buchanan has positively declined to become a candidate for re-election. The affairs of Mexico remain in a most unsettled state. General Degollada was sparing for a new campaign. The advices from California are to the 11th July. Great excitement existed in Nevada and El Dorado counties in consequence of the new and extensive gold discoveries in Walker's River. A terrible railway accident had occurred in Albany, a train being precipitated in a creek, by which fifteen persons lost their lives.

COLONIAL.—The Parana has arrived at Southampton with the West India mail. The Paramatta was still ashore when the mail left St. Thomas's on the 1st inst. Business is reported as rather dull in the islands, but the sugar crops were looking well. Health of the islands generally favourable.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.—On Saturday, in the HOUSE OF LORDS, after several petitions had been presented, and the Royal consent given by commission to various public and private bills, the Queen's speech was read by the Lord Chancellor. The commission of prorogation was then read, bringing the session to a close.—In the HOUSE OF COMMONS, on the motion of Mr. Bland, new writs were ordered for Liskeard, in the room of Mr. Grey, now one of the commissioners of Her Majesty's Customs; for Hertford, in the room of Mr. Cowper, who has accepted the office of Vice President of the Board of Trade; and for Berwick-on-Tweed, in the room of Mr. Earle, who has accepted the Chiltern Hundreds. Mr. Westhead then drew attention to the report of the committee on the Pontefract compromise, and moved that the report of the committee be read. He said that as Mr. Childers could not be replaced in his former position, Mr. Overend, as a man of honour, should resign the seat. Mr. Selwyn thought that such a course was uncalled for and unjust, and suggested that the order for the discharge of the Pontefract election petition be itself discharged. Mr. Selwyn afterwards withdrew his motion, and the proposition of Mr. Overend was then adopted, that Mr. Childers should be replaced in his former position. Mr. Gregson asked the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs when he expected the treaty with China would be ratified. Lord J. Russell could not say exactly when the treaty would be ratified, but he believed there would be no unnecessary delay. The government would require the Chinese to fully carry out the condition of the treaty, and would invite an ambassador from that court. Lord Elcho moved an address for copies of reports relative to the instruction of volunteers in the government musketry school at Hythe. After some observations from S. Herbert, as to the wish of the government to forward these volunteer corps, Lord Palmerston said that ninety such corps had already been formed, and other such corps were in course of formation. The government was most anxious to encourage them, but were still more anxious to encourage volunteer artillery corps along the coasts of the kingdom. The motion was agreed to. The speaker soon after proceeded to the House of Lords to hear the royal commission read for the prorogation of the present session. On his return he read her Majesty's most gracious speech at the table, and the members separated.

GENERAL HOME NEWS.—Two Cabinet Councils were held this week at the official residence of Lord Palmerston.—At the election of a new member for Devonport, in the place of Mr. Wilson, the candidates were Mr. Ferrand, Conservative, and Mr. Buller, Whig. The latter was returned by a majority of 75.—The Registrar General's returns exhibit a further, though slight, decrease in the number of deaths for the past week; but the public health, the Registrar adds, is far from being in a satisfactory condition. The total number of deaths was 1,296; those from diarrhoea numbering 296. The number of births was 1,762.—A melancholy catastrophe is reported in the loss of the British ship Blenheim, in the Bay of Bengal. Her commander (Capt. Headley), the second officer, and eleven of the crew went down with the ill-fated vessel.—On Saturday morning a ship lying in the Wear, at Sunderland, was reduced almost to a wreck by an explosion of gas. The vessel was loaded with coal ready for sea, and the cargo had evidently generated a large quantity of hydrogen gas, which became ignited by a light inadvertently brought into the cabin. A number of persons were also seriously injured by the accident.—Mr. Wakley has resumed the adjourned inquest on the body of Elizabeth Freshfield, at Ball's Pond, whose death occurred through an attempt to procure abortion. It will be recollected that a person named Clement John Carnell, who passed as her husband, committed suicide immediately after the death of the unfortunate woman. Very little additional evidence could be obtained, and, after a short deliberation, the jury returned a verdict of Murder against Carnell.—The trial of Dr. Thomas Smethurst, for the murder of Isabella Banks, at Richmond, was resumed on Monday morning, before Lord Chief Baron Pollock. It will be recollected that the prisoner is charged with the murder of a lady named Isabella Banks, by administering to her constantly either of arsenic or antimony, or some other irritant poison. He was a married man; but he had gone through the ceremony of marriage with the deceased shortly before her death, and he had induced her to make a will in his favour, under which he would have come into possession of about £1,800. Mr. Sergeant Ballantine opened the case for the prosecution, Dr. Julius being the first witness examined. Besides his, some other medical testimony was taken. Dr. Taylor was examined at considerable length as to the result of his analysis, and gave it as his opinion that death had been produced by the administration of irritant poisons. Mr. Serjeant Parry then made a long and able address on behalf of the prisoner, and proceeded to call Dr. Richardson, who gave evidence for the defence. This witness, whose cross examination was still proceeding when the court rose, stated the result of certain experiments he had made with poisons on dogs. The impression seemed to be, however, that from the mode of carrying out those experiments they had not much bearing on the present case. The trial lasted all the week, and was not concluded at the time of our going to press.—The funds yesterday were rather weaker, and prices closed about one-eighth per cent. lower, the final quotation of Consols being 95½ to ¾.

PROVIDENT AND CHARITABLE INSTITUTIONS.—In a country like England, exhibiting such profusion of charity—where science, the arts, and commerce, the church, and the naval and military professions can each point to its Asylum, where the orphan is clothed and educated, and the aged, whose only sins are poverty and misfortune, is enabled to end his days in comfort, agriculture—employing the largest invested capital, representing as she does the most important interest of the country—stands unrepresented in this glorious list, unable to show any refuge for the unfortunate British farmer, or any asylum where his orphan can find a home, or his widow a resting place. This lamentable fact has not escaped the notice of some philanthropic gentlemen, conspicuous among whom is Mr. Alderman Mechi, who has brought to bear upon the project of a new Royal Agricultural Benevolent College the same energy which has so successfully characterised his life in the pursuits of commerce and agriculture. It is his desire to see established a great institution worthy of the wealth and patriotism of British farmers, and affording a secure refuge to their decayed brethren and the widows and orphans of those who have been less fortunate in life than themselves. The project was first agitated in June only of the present year; but such a hearty response has been made to the worthy alderman's appeal, that already more than three hundred leading members of the agricultural interest have given in their adhesion, including such names as the Dukes of Rutland and Richmond, Earl Howe, Lord Wharnclyffe, Lord Combermere, Lord Ashley, M.P., Lord Burghley, M.P., the Lord Mayor, Lord Leonfield, and Lord Henry Thynne, M.P. We need hardly point out that some of these names are well known and respected in the Order; and, considering what a large number of English Freemasons are connected with agricultural pursuits, we are sure that we shall not in vain recommend the rising institution to the favourable notice of the brethren.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

"THE GRAND LODGE OF THE PHILADELPHES."—We are compelled to defer the communication of M. Duquesnes until next week.

ROYAL GLOSTER LODGE.—The report of the meeting of this Lodge, on the 11th inst., only reached us on the eve of going to press. We are, therefore, only able to give a very much condensed account of the interesting proceedings.

BRO. ROBERT STUBBS.—The question has been considered in Committee of Grand Chapter, and we have no doubt will be officially noticed. The transaction took place so far back that we do not see any use in further alluding to it. The truth is, it is a great mistake to allow the same brother to be Prov. Grand Master under both the English and Scottish constitutions. Much of what took place in Canada was attributable to that cause—though, doubtless, the brother acted conscientiously, though, as we think, mistakenly in his proceedings.

"A."—In the Book of Constitutions, p. 18, is the following rule:—"Brethren of eminence and ability, who have rendered service to the Craft, may, by a vote of the Grand Lodge, duly confirmed, be constituted members of the Grand Lodge, with such rank and distinction as may be thought proper." There is no power, however, so far as we can see, to make honorary Prov. Grand Officers; nor is it likely that any attempt will be made to confer honorary rank on any brother under extraordinary circumstances, such as a prince of the blood becoming a member of the order; the Grand Lodge having negatived a proposition of the Grand Master to confer honorary rank on a Past Asst. G. Dir. of Cers., who had served the Craft for nearly twenty years.

LONDON, SATURDAY, AUGUST 27, 1859.

FALLACIOUS VIEWS OF THE CRAFT.

OUR article under the above title had scarcely made its appearance in the Freemasons' Magazine, before a singular corroboration of our statement as to the curious misconceptions of the Order which exist among the uninitiated, appeared in the columns of our powerful contemporary the Times. A certain Mr. James McCaldin feels himself much aggrieved because Mr. Whiteside, in the full torrent of his parliamentary eloquence (on the question of setting aside certain jurors in the county of Antrim), stated the said McCaldin to be an atheist and a violent political agitator. McCaldin thereupon writes to the Times denying the charges in an indignant strain and demanding that his denial should be inserted in the columns of that journal.

Now we can sympathise with the wounded feelings of Mr. McCaldin, and we consider also that the steps which he has taken to vindicate his fair reputation, are proper and manly. But the proofs which he has adduced in support of his counter-statement to Mr. Whiteside involve two such curious non sequiturs that we quote them for the benefit of such of our readers as may have overlooked this epistle in their daily Times reading.

"As to my being an 'atheist,' (says our injured friend) I am well-known in Belfast as a Presbyterian, not altogether without zeal for my religion. I have from childhood been a systematic attendant on public worship, and since I arrived at a suitable age I have been a regular communicant. So much for the 'atheism' with which Mr. Whiteside has branded my character in the House of Commons. As to my being 'a violent party man,' during a life of twenty-five years in active business I never was a member of any political association, never having been an Orangeman, a Freemason, or a member of the Odd Fellows, or any other society."

We should much like to know what idea this worthy Irishman has formed of Freemasonry. Judging from the somewhat incoherent document which we have quoted, it is as far from being a favourable one as it is from being correct. He assures us that he is not an atheist, which we are delighted to hear; he also further gratifies us by the information that he is not a "violent party man"; and in support of these assertions he declares himself to be totally unconnected with the Masonic body, which he lumps together with such societies as the Odd Fellows and Orangemen—thereby implying that he is neither a political agitator nor an atheist because he is unconnected with Freemasonry and those two societies.

We trust that among Mr. McCaldin's acquaintance in Belfast, there may be found some brother of the Craft who will charitably point out to him those passages in our ancient charges which are suited to his benighted condition; from which he may learn that a genuine Craftsman can neither be "a stupid atheist" nor involve himself in plots and conspiracies against the government of the country where he dwells. It would be as well also to explain the vulgar error of classing the Order in the same category with such modern and totally dissimilar societies as those named above; and to inform Mr. James McCaldin that his being a Freemason would be considered by most educated and well-informed men, as a far greater security for his being a worthy member of society, than even his being a "zealous Presbyterian" or a strict attendant upon the ministry of the Rev. John Mac-naughten. Of one thing he may rest assured, that a man who knows the world so well as Mr. Whiteside will not be likely to class him as a violent party leader—since his total inability to lead his fellows in any way, either for good or bad, is by no means faintly shadowed forth in that ignorance of the phases of life which are passing around him—which would be fatal to any one wishing either to lead the minds or enlist the sympathies of his fellow-citizens.

A SCOTTISH ARCHIMEDES.

ABOUT the year 1768 there lived, but can hardly be said to have flourished, in the world of literature, a self taught genius, named Martin Murdoch. Of the early career of this author we know but little; his own account of his origin was that he was the son of a Scottish clergyman, whose cure of souls was situated in the remotest part of the Highlands. The elder Murdoch taught his son the principles of mathematics, and left him at his death a little flock on a small farm; but science alone flourished with Martin. Misfortunes and accidents, and the unsuitableness of his occupation to the bent of his mind, compelled him in a short time to break up and dispose of his stock and farm. Finding himself in great distress, and without any prospect of ameliorating his condition where he was, he determined upon going to London to try if he could get a living there by teaching arithmetic and mathematics. London, however, he was not destined ever to reach; at Cleator, in Westmorland, fortune threw him in the way of a benevolent clergyman, who was possessed not only of considerable wealth but also of a keen appreciation of merit, and a sincere love of science. Yielding to the friendly solicitations of this good priest, Murdoch appears to have here terminated his travels, and to have remained under the protection of his benevolent patron, pursuing those studies which are the subject of the following observations.

It is well known that the picturesque county of Westmorland abounds in lakes and impetuous streams, which in the winter are occasionally so swollen as to overflow their banks; the Eden, the Dove, and Winandermere, are all beautiful, but sometimes very perilous; being remarkably deep and clear, they deceive the eye of those who attempt to ford them without a guide. It was one of these treacherous streams which at last proved fatal to this endowed Scotchman. Mathematicians, it is said, often dwell in the seventh heaven; and forgetting earth, poor Murdoch became a victim to the other element. In a fit of abstraction, he neglected, in crossing a river in the winter, to exercise due caution, and was drowned in the flower of his intellect at the age of thirty-six.

It is deeply to be deplored that one so accomplished should have met unrewarded an untimely death, as he was a public benefit to society. At the period he adorned, mathematics was the chief subject of the day; it was then that he refuted Dr. Berkley's (Bishop of Cloyne) philosophy, and he pointed out with great truth the difference between a fluxion and a differential. He clearly showed that Sir Isaac Newton was the author of this method of calculation, which the learned Leibnitz claimed, having published, in 1684, at Leipsic, his Elements of the Differential Calculus. Leibnitz received two letters from Newton, in 1677, upon this subject; however, it is of little consequence, as both great authorities arrived at the same conclusions. This treatise excited Dr. Keith to reply, and he made it appear very plainly from Sir Isaac's letters, published by P. Wallis, that Newton was the inventor of the algorithm, or practical rules of fluxions, and that Leibnitz did no more than publish the same with an alteration of the name and manner of notation. The German philosopher quarrelled with Dr. Keith, and appealed to the Royal Society against him, that they would be pleased to restrain the doctor's vain babblings and unjust calumniations, and report their judgment, as he thought they ought to do, in his favour. But this was not in the power of the Society, if they did justice, for it appeared quite clear to the committee of the members appointed to examine the original letters and other papers relating to the matter, which were left by Mr. Oldenburgh and Mr. J. Collins, that Sir Isaac Newton was the inventor of fluxions; and they accordingly published their opinion to that effect, which determined the affair.

Murdoch's simplicity was his great charm, for he had the power of making the youngest persons understand his theory, provided they climbed the ladder of knowledge with him step by step. In this slight sketch a few of his rules are given; for this glorious branch of science is of immense importance to calculators, and many useful systems have been lost and afterwards revived.

Murdoch was well acquainted with Sir Isaac Newton's philosophy, as well as that of Leibnitz; he considered the former to be certainly the inventor of fluxions; he maintained that a differential has been, and still is, by many called a fluxion, and a fluxion a differential—yet it is an abuse of terms; a fluxion has no relation to a differential, nor a differential to a fluxion. The principles upon which the methods are founded, show them to be very different, notwithstanding the way of investigation in each be the same, and that both centre in the same conclusion. Nor can the differential method perform what the fluxionary method can. The excellency of the fluxionary method is far above the differential.

Mr. Murdoch explained his theory thus:—Magnitudes, as made up of an infinite number of very small constituent parts put together, are the root of the differential calculus. But by the fluxionary method, we are taught to consider magnitudes as generated by motion. A described line in this way is not generated by an opposition of points, or differentials, but by the motion or flux of a point; and the velocity of a generating point in the first moment of its formation, or generation, is called a fluxion. In forming magnitudes after the differential way, we conceive them as made up of an infinite number of small constituent parts, so disposed as to produce a magnitude of a given form; that these parts are to each other as the magnitudes of which they are differentials; and that one infinitely small part or differential must be infinitely great, with respect to another differential, or infinitely small part; but by fluxion, or the law of flowing, we determine the proportion of magnitudes, one to another, from the celerities of the motion by which they are generated.

This most certainly is the purest abstracted way of reasoning. Our considering the different degrees of magnitude, as arising from an increasing series of mutations of velocity, is much more simple and less perplexed than the other way; and the operations founded on fluxions must be more clear, accurate, and convincing, than those that are founded on the differential calculus.

There is a great difference in operations—when quantities are rejected because they really vanish; and when they are rejected, because they are infinitely small: the latter method, which is the differential, must leave the mind in ambiguity and confusion, and cannot in many cases come up to the truth.

It is a very great error, then, to call differentials fluxions; and quite wrong to begin with the differential method in order to learn the law, or manner of flowing. Mr. Martin Murdoch's system of teaching was this:—He first taught arithmetic, trigonometry, geometry, algebra; the two latter branches, first in all their parts and improvements, the methods of series, doctrine of proportions, nature of logarithms, mechanics, and laws of motion; from thence he proceeded to the pure doctrine of fluxions, and at last looked into the differential calculus; and he declared it would be lost labour for any person to attempt them who was unacquainted with these procognita.

When he turned to fluxions, the first thing he did was to instruct the pupil in the arithmetic of exponents, the nature of powers, and the manner of their generation; he next went to the doctrine of infinite series, and then to the manner of generating mathematical quantities. This generation of quantities was the first step into fluxions, and he so simply explained the nature of them in this operation, that the scholar was able to form a just idea of a first fluxion, though thought by many to be incomprehensible. He proceeded from thence to the notation and algorithm of first fluxions; to the finding second, third, &c., fluxions; the finding fluxions of exponential quantities, and the fluents from given fluxions; to their uses in drawing tangents to curves; in finding the areas of spaces, the values of surfaces, and the contents of solids, their percussion and oscillation, and centre of gravity.

By following his plan, this clever master made the pupil by his explanations happily understand and work with ease; and made him find no more difficulty in conceiving an adequate notion of a nascent or evanescent quantity, than in forming a true idea of a mathematical point. He gave two years for his pupils to acquire an aptitude to understand the fundamental principles and operations at all relative to fluxions; and they could then investigate, and not only give the solution of the most general and useful problems in the mathematics, but likewise solve several problems that occur in the phenomena of nature.

The following are some of his difficult questions, which, by his tuition, were answered immediately:—

First question.—He requested in the first place to be informed how the time of a body's descending through an arch of a cycloid was found: and if ten hundred weight avoirdupoise, hanging on a bar of steel perfectly elastic and supported at both ends will just break the bar, what must be the weight of a globe, falling perpendicular 185 feet on the middle of the bar, to have the same effect?

Second question.—How long, and how far, ought a given globe to descend by its comparative weight in a medium of a given density, but without resistance, to acquire the greatest velocity it is capable of in descending with the same weight, and in the same medium, with resistance: and, how are we to find the value of a solid formed by the rotation of this curvilinear space, A, C, D. The general equation expressing the nature of the curves:—

$$\text{Being } \frac{\frac{m}{n}}{y z \frac{a - x x x}{a^2}}$$

Again, how is the centre of gravity to be found of the space enclosed by an hyperbola and its asymptote: and, how are we to find the centre of oscillation of a sphere revolving about the line P, A, M, a tangent, to the generating circle F, A, H, in the point A as an axis?

There were some learned men of his time would not allow that a velocity which continues for no time at all can possibly describe any space at all: its effect, they say, is absolutely nothing, and instead of satisfying reason with truth and precision, the human faculties are quite confounded, lost, and bewildered in fluxions. A velocity, or fluxion, is at best he does not know what—whether something or nothing: and how can the mind lay hold on, or form any accurate abstract idea of, such a subtle fleeting thing.

Mr. Murdoch answered—Disputants may perplex with deep speculations and confound with mysterious disquisitions, but the method of fluxions has no dependence on such things. The operation is not what any single abstract velocity can generate, or describe, or assert, but what a continual and successively variable velocity can produce in the whole; and certainly a variable cause may produce a variable effect, as well as a permanent cause a permanent and constant effect; the difference can only be—that the continual variation of the effect must be proportioned to the continual variation of the cause. The method of fluxion therefore is true whether he can or cannot conceive the nature and manner of several things relating to them, though he had no idea of perpetually arising increments and magnitudes in nascent or evanescent states.

The knowledge of such things is not essential to fluxions.

all they propose is, to determine the velocity or flowing, wherewith a generated quantity increases, and to sum up all that has been generated or described by the continually variable fluxion. On these two bases fluxions stand.

Here follow two of Mr. Murdoch's instances :—

1st.—A heavy body descends perpendicularly, 16·12 feet in a second, and at the end of this time has acquired a velocity of 32·0 feet in a second, which is accurately known ; at any given distance then the body fell, take the point A in the right line, and the velocity of the falling body in the point may be truly computed ; but the velocity in any point above A, at ever so small a distance, will be less than in A, and the velocity at any point below A, at the least possible distance, will be greater than in A.

It is therefore plain, that in the point A the body has a certain determined velocity which belongs to no other point in the whole line. Now this velocity is the fluxion of that right line in the point A, and with it the body would proceed, if gravity acted no longer on the body's arrival at A.

2nd.—Take a glass tube open at both ends, whose concavity is of different diameters in different places, and immerse it in a stream till the water fills the tube and flows through it ; then in different parts of the tube the velocity of the water will be as the squares of the diameters, and of consequence different.

Suppose then in any marked place a plane to pass through the tube perpendicular to the axis, or to the motion of the water, and of consequence the water will pass through this section with a certain determined velocity. But if another section be drawn ever so near the former, the water, by reason of the different diameters, will flow through this with a velocity different from what it did at the former ; and therefore to one section of the tube, or single point only, the determinate velocity belongs.

It is the fluxion of the space which the fluid describes at that section, and with that uniform velocity the fluid would continue to move, if the diameter was the same to the end of the tube.

3rd.—If a hollow cylinder be filled with water, to flow freely out through a hole at the bottom, the velocity of the effluent will be as the height of the water ; and since the surface of the incumbent fluid descends without stop, the velocity of the stream will decrease, till the effluent be all out. There can then be no two moments of time succeeding each other ever so nearly, wherein the velocity of the water is the same ; and of consequence the velocity at any given point belongs only to that particular indivisible moment of time. Now this is accurately the fluxion of the fluid then flowing ; and if, at that instant, more water was poured into the cylinder to make the surface keep its place, the effluent would retain its velocity, and still be the fluxion of the fluid. Such are the operations of nature, and they visibly confirm the nature of fluxion.

It is from hence quite clear that the fluxion of a generated quantity cannot retain any one determined value, for the least space of time whatever, but the moment it arrives at that value, the same moment it loses it again. The fluxion of such quantity can only pass gradually and successively through the indefinite degrees, contained between the two extreme values, which are the limits thereof during the generation of the fluent, in case the fluxion be variable. But then, though a determinate degree of fluxion does not continue at all, yet at every determinate indivisible moment of time, every fluent has some determinate degree of fluxion whose abstract value is determinate in itself ; though the fluxion has no determined value for the least space of time whatever. To find its value then, that is, the ratio one fluxion has to another, is a problem strictly geometrical, notwithstanding anti-mathematicians have declared the contrary.

Mr. Murdoch's was a most ingenious and new method of determining expeditiously the tangents of curved lines, which a mathematical reader often finds a very prolix calculus in the common way ; and as the determination of the tangents of curves is of the greatest use, because such determinations exhibit the gradations of curvilinear spaces, an easy method in doing the thing, is a promotion of geometry in the best manner.

The rule is this :—Suppose B D E the curve, B C the abscissa = x , C D the ordinate = y , A B the tangent line = t , and the nature of the curve be such that the greatest power of y ordinate be on one side of the equation ; then $y^3 = -x^3$, $xx y + x y y - a^3 + a a y - a a + a x x - a y y$; but if the greatest power of y be wanting, the terms must be put = O^1 .

Then make a fraction and a numerator ; the numerator, by taking all the terms wherein the known quantity is, with all their signs, and if the known quantity be of one dimension, to prefix unity ; and if two, 2 ; if of three, 3 ; and you will have $-3a^3 + 2aay - 2axx, axx - ayy$.

The fraction, by assuming the terms wherein the abscissa x occurs, and retaining the signs, and if the quantity x be of one dimension, to prefix unity, as above, &c., and then it will be $3x^2 - 2xxy + xyy - aa + 2axx$; then diminish each of these by x , and the denominator will be $3xx - 2xy + yy - aa + 2ax$.

This fraction is equal to A B, and therefore—

$$t \text{ is } = \frac{-3a^3 + 2aay - 2axx + axx - ayy}{3xx - 2xy \times yy - aa + 2ax}.$$

In this easy way may the tangents of all geometrical curves be exhibited ; and I add, by the same method, if the scholar be skilful, may the tangents of infinite mechanical curves be determined.

VOICES FROM RUINS.

Most people are probably aware of the existence throughout Ireland of a number of ancient buildings, which are from their form ordinarily called "round towers," although the learned have named them variously "baal or beel towers," "fire towers," "watch towers," "tower of penitence"—all which names are referable respectively to the theories that have been promulgated respecting the origin of these singular structures. These towers are at present about ninety in number, some of them advancing rapidly towards decay, but others likely to endure for many centuries to come. We may here mention one or two peculiarities common to them all. The first is that they stand beside some ancient church, or on the site of some ancient burial ground, of which tradition merely speaks. The second is, that they are all perfectly round, tapering upwards from the base, and surmounted by a hollow overlapping cone. They are all built after the manner known by the technical phrase "sprawled rubble"—that is to say, of round stones, between the interstices of which are smaller stones, hammered in to the cement or mortar. Conjecture has lost itself in endeavouring to assign a date and purpose to these strange exemplars of a defunct architecture. There is, however, a period from which investigation may go back. Giraldus Cambrensis, who lived in the twelfth century, an accurate observer and careful inquirer, speaks of them as ancient in his time, and dating beyond any then existing historical record. Nor have there being wanting antiquarians who traced their origin to an epoch long anterior to the Christian era, and with apparently good reason, connecting them with the religious and mystic rites, peoples and sects, whose histories have been totally lost, and whose names alone remain as the sole evidences of their existence.

A description of one of these venerable buildings will serve to give a pretty accurate notion of the main features which distinguish them all. The one best known, perhaps, because the most frequently visited by the tourist, is situated in a place called Glendalough, or "Glen of the Two Lakes," a wild mountain gorge, better known however to the peasantry of Ireland by the more familiar name of the "Seven Churches."

Proceeding south from the Irish metropolis, through the most picturesque scenery of the county Wicklow, the Dargle Glenally (the Devil's Glen), you commence a gradual ascent, leaving behind the pine and dwarf oak and mountain ash which nod upon the summits of the distant mountains, and through long terraces of which you had just passed. The roads become rocky, and the face of the surrounding country black and desolate, dotted however with here and there a group of lean sheep or a family of goats tethered together, a mud hut or two, and the spire of an isolated church, of which the advowson is a sinecure, and whose pastor and master chiefly resides at some fashionable watering place. In wet weather nothing can be conceived more dreary than the prospect of this waste of highland; while in fine weather the lark sings merrily overhead, the plover skims along with his melancholy "peewee" and belligerent sparrows chase each other through the withered and neglected hedgerows. There is no change in the scene for at least half a dozen weary miles. At length, wheeling round the spur of a projecting rock, a crescent of black mountain, its rugged outline defined with marvellous distinctness against the blue sky of the horizon—the traveller enters upon a somewhat uncertain descent, passing through a pretty village of white cottages and young limes, through which a small river brawls in its rather impetuous course.

Your notice is immediately arrested by a gaunt looking man who salutes you with every demonstration of outward respect. Your first impression is that this individual is perhaps a pensioner of Greenwich Hospital, for he wears a cocked hat and a blue surtout reaching to the heels, with brass buttons. This impression is however soon dissipated when you observe the unsailorlike movements of your acquaintance, and that he wears red plush small clothes, with an enormous patch of leather on the seat of honour to preserve the texture of the valuable fabric. This singular being is the genius loci. He at once takes possession of you. He insists that you are one of his subjects, and that he only has a right to your countenance and your money. Looking from him, however, for one moment, two lakes stretch out westward of dusky brownish colour, over which thousands of many coloured and unusually large dragon flies disport themselves. The sun's rays seldom reach the surface of either lake, and silence seems to reign in the place. Of this spot Moore, in his charming melodies, sings—

"Glendalough, whose gloomy shore
Skylark never warbles o'er;
Where the rock hangs high and steep,
Young St. Kevin stole to sleep."

Your guide conducts you to the borders of the lesser lake, where stands the round tower, the centre of a group of ruins itself, as though it were the monument of a glory younger and less lasting than its own. Its discrowned summit appeals touchingly to the passer by. It is about ninety-five feet in height, about forty-five feet in diameter at the base, and about thirty-five feet towards the top. It is flanked by an immense churchyard, in which may be found almost every manner and style of sepulchral monument, from the huge stone carved crosses that commemorate the deeds of eminent ecclesiastics, down to the commemorative wreath of white blossoms which poverty hath twined and deposited above the last home of humble innocence. The grey ruins of several churches crumble silently at short distances; some of them knit together by bands of deep green ivy, and sustained from destruction by the parasite which has sapped their strength. On every side are piles of stone which once formed part of an ancient city; for such we are told was Glendalough, and students from Italy and even from Egypt and the far off Ind used to resort to its famous university.

Where are the architects who were then also the priests of the sacred temple, and went in procession, clothed in the symbolic vestiture of the Craft—adorned with the square, the triangle, and other symbols, types at once of matter and spirit—and affixed upon the architrave the emblematic pentalph, that mystic sign of the double immortality which is obtained by good works? In that tall tower, according to some scholars, the priests used to kindle the sacred fire which should be a sign unto all the dwellers on the hills to kneel and worship; and if you step near you will see the windows through which the holy flame is supposed to have shone forth. Else why should be found beside these venerable monuments the stone "pillar of witness," the "Crombac," the fire house, and other relics of pagan worship?

But coming to later time, when Christianity in the blaze of young enthusiasm extinguished the flame and cast down the idols of the heathen, we are told that here, in those hollow cylinders, lived the first anchorites, holy men, who fashioned with their own hands these stern looking prison houses, wherein they remained for the whole period of their lives, and some of them were buried here, and their bones have been collected and placed with respect in votive chapels, built to commemorate their piety. According to other antiquarians, the bell which summoned the mountaineer to the worship of the Virgin, succeeded the element with which the pagan typified the all pervading essence of the Deity. As the muezzin from the minarets of the east summonses to morning, midday, and evening prayer, so used the monk from the round tower by aid of a tinkling bell, to call upon the neighbouring peasantry to repeat the angelus, as is done in Rome at this day, and in most other Catholic countries, where the clergy have power to enforce the practice.

There have been vessels found in these stone casement, which are only used for the service of the altar, and hence many have affected to think that they were used as depositories for such articles in times of trouble, when the brigand and the trooper in turn laid unholy clutch on every house, whether sacred or not, that lay within their reach. But whether the round tower was used for any or all of these purposes, one thing is certain, that the craftsmen who were their builders had a purpose in view which has never been apparent to other than themselves. Their sites are now in the midst of solitude, and funereal garlands grow up at their base. In one instance, as in Clon Macnoise, the round tower overlooks the vast tide of the river Shannon; and if it were indeed a fire temple, it could have been discerned from an immense distance. Repose deep and perpetual is the main expression of this spot in particular. Here has the pilgrim often come to cast off sin from his soul as the dust from his feet. Here often has the writer loitered—

"The sounding cataract

Haunted me like a passion: the tall rock,
The mountain, and the deep gloom of the wood,
The still sad music of humanity,
Nor harsh, nor grating, though of ample power,
To chasten and subdue. I too, have felt
The presence that disturbs me with the joy
Of elevated thought—a sense sublime
Of something far more deeply interfused,

Whose dwelling is the light of setting sun ;
A motion of the spirit that impels
All thinking things, all subjects, and all thought,
That rolls through all things."

There is a lamp in every ruin, before whose pale ray is read the story of the eloquent though voiceless past. The passing waves of humanity have left its glory unextinguished, the tumults of a thousand years and generations have faintly touched the castle rampart, but the cloistered repose of the ancient minster acquired the shadows of the passions which disturbed the outward world; and its tenants cultivated the arts and sciences unmolested, went to their account, and were succeeded by brethren who prosecuted their studies and died in their turn. In the ruin we see the outline of beauty in form which the inroads of corrupt tastes and fashions have been unable to obliterate. Who gazes upon the massive blocks of stone within which emperors worshipped and empires congregated around? To us who have derived our glory and our fame from the temples dedicated to the cultivation of religion and morality, the sight of a ruin should furnish food for contemplation. The conqueror has lit his watchfires at its base, the unfortunate have found mercy and oblivion in its embrace, and plenty and peace have flourished beneath its tall shadow. The ruin is a standing witness against humanity, as it is the glory of man's genius. It stands in solemn contrast to the modern mockeries that rise up around it. Profanation is subdued in its presence. The limits of earth and water have retired before its mysterious warnings. The brave man whose life has been devoted to the practice of good and the cultivation of virtue, finds in the evening of his time the consolation which keeps alight the fire of life; and when he falls his name remains to his children, urging to duty, charity, and hope. So with the ruin. There is a sermon to the pride of man upon every disintegrated fragment which the caprice of the storm scatters abroad. The ruin must in the course of things pass away, but the devout in future ages will pause as they pass, and whisper to their children "Here it stood."

RANDOM THOUGHTS.

"And a certain man pulled a bow at a venture."

WHAT is Masonry? This is a question that may be answered by some few members (and some few only) in each Lodge, with schoolboy correctness, who may yet, notwithstanding, be utterly unable to explain the several points which form that answer. And even members of many years' standing may be asked this question without being able to give you the simple answer, which they must repeatedly hear while attending the ceremonies of the second degree. Hundreds, nay thousands, who receive the light (?) of Masonry, think their task accomplished when they have but imperfectly mastered those signs, tokens, &c., which are the safeguard of the Order, and thus so far accustomed themselves to Lodge routine, as to be able to bear, without much discomfort, Lodge business and ceremonies. But few there are who can point out to us in what the allegory consists, where is the symbolism, or what peculiarity there is in the morality that is set forth. They are not taught by Past Masters when preparing for the several degrees, or by the after proceedings of most of our Lodges, the necessity of knowing these points, and therefore it is that knowledge is so universally neglected. They hear ceremonies pushed through with undue haste, and the most important portion promised "if time will permit"—which it very seldom does—and thus our lectures are seldom heard, and but seldom are the explanations of our beautiful tracing board given.

But Masonry was intended for high and useful purposes. The magic initials "P.M." (as at present conferred) are not the only things worth striving for—there are the first principles of Masonry which require fully mastering, ere those letters can have their full meaning, and their right signification. A P.M. should be a teacher of his brethren, and that teaching not confined to the mere care of seeing that the officers only correctly perform the ceremonies, but that the meaning of every portion of those ceremonies is well understood by the brethren at large. This is a duty of the Past Master of the Lodge, and his aim should be to see that his children are well trained in the mysteries of our glorious old Craft. In some Lodges (but, alas! not in many), it is a rule that the Worshipful Master should lecture his brethren on Masonic subjects; and it is a rule that might be advantageously adopted by many Lodges that now exult in the term "Crack." Crack many of them may be, as far as the mere working is concerned. Correct they may be, with, perhaps, parrot-like correctness; but unless the different portions of the ceremonies are analyzed and explained at various times, but few can know the real meaning and import of those workings.

We are not peculiar in having a language that the uninitiated world cannot understand. Other times and other people have thought it necessary to clothe in allegory or symbolism their peculiar discoveries in science, their philosophy, and even their religion. As far back as the reign of the high and mighty kings who built those stupendous erections, the pyramids—which promise to last as long as time and this world exist together—symbolism had full sway. Their philosophy, politics, and religion, were all concealed by hieroglyphics; while even their principles of government were deemed to be so invaluable as to be expressed only by signs and symbols, and these signs and symbols were revealed to their Magi alone, who were bound over to an inviolable secrecy. From the Egyptians we may trace the origin of those societies in which everything associated with their workings was likewise veiled in allegory; and as time rolled on so we believe did these societies improve in their moral aspect, until Masonry, their top stone as it were, sprung out from them—a beautiful system, shining forth in a halo of glory, in which those divine truths may be learned which will lead its true and genuine members to a participation in the glory and happiness of the eternal heavens. Unlike the system of Pythagoras and others who followed him, Masonry is founded upon a rock, and must endure so long as that rock remains upon which its superstructure is based. It stands upon holy ground—it is supported by wisdom, strength, and beauty. Wisdom is in all its paths, and conducts its members in all their deliberations; strength is given to them to pursue their righteous course under difficulties and dangers; while the beauty of the divine laws are exemplified in their workings, and shine forth pre-eminently in every line of her invaluable lectures, and in all the precepts of the glorious old Craft. It is a system that has been railed against, persecuted, and anathematized; but it has come out of the fire purified even as silver is purified by the hands of the refiner.

There is a rich field here for learned dissertations, and we have men in the Craft who ought to take up these subjects, (though not after the Oliverian style) because God has blessed them with the intellect necessary for this task, and the influence required to enable them to be teachers of their brethren. There is one of our illustrations or symbols only that I shall now glance at, and that is the shape of a Mason's Lodge—which our "authority" tells us is that of an oblong; in length, from east to west; in breadth, from north to south; and yet so simple as is this symbol, and so oft repeated, I never met with one who has given an explanation of it. They repeat the stereotyped words and content themselves with that; but this taking things as a matter of course is foreign to the true spirit of Masonry. We are forbidden from discussing, in Lodge, matters pertaining to politics or religion, but not matters relating to Masonic knowledge. On the contrary we are exhorted to "dedicate ourselves, &c."—and further, to study "such of the liberal arts and sciences as be within the easy compass of our attainment." And as if this were not enough, we are charged to make a "daily advancement in Masonic knowledge."

And how can this be done, save by discussing points of interest in our workings and lectures, and making the principles upon which we work, well and generally known to our members. I have many times thought upon this matter, and "random" though they may be, yet the shots may still hit the mark. The first reference to allegory we meet with is a very simple one, relating to the form and shape of the Lodge, and yet never have I heard it stated why a Masons' Lodge is oblong. The shape thus given it, shows that our ancient brethren did not work carelessly or superficially. The shape was intended to convey universality—but how? What peculiarity is there in it to convey such an impression—to make such a conclusion probable? They say that its length is east and west, and its breadth north and south. Now this, I think, gives us a clue to the reason of the peculiar form adopted to convey this idea, for astronomers would at once say it refers to the earth, the very great diversity of the animate and inanimate objects of the creation displayed on this planet being further referred to in our admirable lectures. Thus we can readily understand the claim that this form of a Masons' Lodge has to universality, and also the truth of the assertion that it is oblong. The earth is represented as being spherical or round, but it is not in fact a perfect sphere, for from its rapid revolution on its axis (which is from pole to pole) there is a swelling out at the equator, matter having a natural tendency to fly off. This, however, is restrained by the force of gravitation, but notwithstanding this power, there is a sensible difference in the diameter, the equatorial exceeding the polar diameter by many miles. Thus, then, if a sphere of the exact contour of the globe were put into a box, that box must be oblong, in order to receive the greater length of the equatorial diameter; and thus is the truth of the peculiar shape of a Masons' Lodge made manifest and clear, proving also that science and its pursuits were no strangers to our ancient brethren.

Perhaps some other brethren may like to follow up this idea, and put to paper some of those effervescing random thoughts which are at times so valuable.

MASONRY IN FRANCE.

[The following is an extract from a communication from the R.W. Bro. DE MARCONNAY, Master of the Lodge "La Clemente Amitié," in reply to a request for information in regard to the Supreme Council of the 33°, under whose authority the Lodge Le Progrès de l'Océanie, at Honolulu, was established, &c.—ED.]

"UNFORTUNATELY (I say unfortunately, for I consider it a calamity, because in Masonic, as in other governments, conflicting authorities always cause confusion) two legal Masonic bodies do exist in France—the Grand Orient, the most ancient and regular, of which Prince Lucien Murat is Grand Master, having under its jurisdiction two hundred and fifty Lodges—and the Supreme Council of the 33°, organized in 1804, of which the Duc de Cazes (ex minister of state) is Grand Commander, having under its jurisdiction eighty working Lodges.

"In 1804, the Count De Grasse introduced into France the thirty-three degrees of the Ancient and Accepted (Scottish) Rite, which degrees he received from the Supreme Council of Charleston, in South Carolina. This rite originated in France in 1760, under the title of the Rite of Perfection. It consisted of twenty-five degrees, and a Mason named Morin was authorized to establish (propagate) it in America. Its reconstruction (in its present form) has been attributed to Frederick II. of Prussia, which is an error, as the Scottish Rite of thirty-three degrees is unknown in Prussia. It was introduced into France by the Count De Grasse at the end of the great revolution which resulted in the empire—a time when the people were glad to find even in Masonry, the most equalizing of institutions, a sort of aristocracy and distinctiveness. Thus the new Order succeeded, and the Grand Orient, fearing its rivalry, in October, 1804, concluded a treaty with it, by which both bodies became united. This treaty was violated by the Supreme Council in less than a year; but as Napoleon would not suffer any war to exist in France, save the one he was waging against the whole of Europe, another treaty (a secret one) was entered into by the two bodies, whereby the jurisdiction of the Grand Orient was limited to the three symbolic degrees and the degree of Rose Croix, while the Supreme Council retained its authority over the higher ones.

"Upon the fall of Napoleon, many of the most influential members of the Supreme Council were exiled in consequence of their political opinions. The Grand Orient, which in its desire to avoid (prevent) schism, had not only united with that body, but, after the disruption of the union, had for the sake of peace, circumscribed its own authority, embraced this opportunity to annul the treaty before made, and resumed its authority over the Rite of Perfection, of which the Ancient and Accepted (Scottish) Rite was but an arbitrary modification; and the authority thus resumed was acknowledged by almost all the Lodges conferring those degrees in France.

"In 1824, all political animosities and passions being appeased, the members of the Supreme Council reorganized that body, and claimed for it its former powers. Thereupon commenced disputes, projected treaties, &c., between the two bodies, until at last, tired of quarrels from which no good resulted, a peace was made, by which both bodies were acknowledged as legal; and though it is indisputably true that the Grand Orient is the only legitimate power by which Lodges in both rites can be constituted in the French dominions, the Supreme Council claims and exercises the authority of constituting Lodges in the Scottish Rite. By virtue of such authority was the Lodge Le Progrès de l'Océanie established in Honolulu in 1842, under the auspices of Bro. Le Tellier.

"From the report in some proceedings of 1856, it appears that the Lodge Le Progrès de l'Océanie, in consequence of not receiving any communication from the body by which it was constituted, or from a desire to connect itself with a more influential and extensive power, petitioned the Grand Orient of France to endorse its old charter, or grant a new one; but received for answer, that while that body would be gratified to add another Lodge to its jurisdiction, as the charter under which the Lodge was held was not derived from the Grand Orient—the supreme Masonic power in France—but from another body, the request could not be complied with until the wishes of the petitioners were more definitely expressed. In my opinion (and such I think must be the opinion of every Mason, who has any knowledge of Masonic jurisprudence), the Lodge Le Progrès de l'Océanie, is not a regular Lodge; for its legal existence depends upon uninterrupted correspondence with its parent body, the punctual payment of its dues, and the regular and correct return of its members, &c. When it fails to perform these duties for any length of time it becomes dormant, its work is not legal, nor are its acts entitled to any consideration.

"I think I have thus answered the first four questions propounded in your letter to the Grand Orient, but will repeat briefly as follows:—

"1st. The act of the Supreme Council establishing the Lodge Le Progrès de l'Océanie, was legal.

"2nd. The Supreme Council still exists in France.

"3rd. It constitutes Lodges in France and in the colonies, and can resuscitate dormant ones; and "4th. Notwithstanding the existence of, and the power claimed by, the Supreme Council—which body exhibits a kind of rivalry with the Grand Orient, and has entered into competition with it by establishing Lodges of the Ancient and Accepted (Scottish) Rite—the latter is the only legal authority by which Lodges can be established in France, and in its colonies. It is the oldest body, has the greatest number of adherents, and confers all the Masonic titles acknowledged in France.

"In answer to your fifth question: The Masonic laws of this jurisdiction require the subordinate Lodges to correspond regularly with the body which constituted them, by sending every month thereto a list of their members, and by paying certain dues; and any Lodge which fails to comply with these requirements for one year, is within three months thereafter declared extinct, or dormant. Lodges in the colonies are allowed six months' grace. When a Lodge ceases to work, notice of that fact must be sent to the body by which it was established, together with its charter, jewels, &c. Such Lodges cannot be resuscitated without permission.

"In answer to your sixth question: The Grand Orient has not at any time granted a charter to the Lodge Le Progrès de l'Océanie; and in reply to your seventh and last: If such a charter had been granted by the Grand Orient, that fact would have appeared together with the name, number, and locality of the Lodge, in the printed calendar annually published by its order."

THE OBJECT OF FREEMASONRY.

THERE is one important consideration in regard to the object of Freemasonry which is overlooked by most Masonic writers, and that is, the positive duty of all Freemasons to practice the teachings of the Institution, so as to improve their moral natures, that they may become better and better, and continually advance to a higher plane of action. It must be evident to every reflecting mind that the most elaborate writers upon the subject of Freemasonry, instead of having a unity of design with the above object in view, in imitation of the example of the various sects of religionists, promulgate theories and dogmas, which they expect their readers to subscribe to—and thus establish opinions, which after all are mere opinions, and which result in diverting the Masonic mind from the true object and intent of Freemasonry. If the question were asked what has Freemasonry done in elevating the moral status of its members, what answer could they give? It would not be satisfactory to refer the inquirers to the law, to the lessons inscribed upon the Masonic trestle board, or the beautiful theories and treatises written on the subject of Freemasonry. The response would be, that the Book of the Law contains the moral code of all creeds, and from tens of thousands of places at least one day out of every seven, those who have made the Book their particular study, explain and expound the meaning of the information contained in its pages, according to the theories of the particular church they are authorized to represent, and yet the result of all these efforts is to produce an antagonism, a variance between man and his fellow. Such has been the experience for ages past, and a like condition of disagreements and differences exists in the Masonic institution, not as to the duty of living up to the teachings of Freemasonry, but in the controversies arising in regard to the "letter of the law," the other, the most important consideration, is overlooked. We have controversies in regard to almost every imaginable subject by which hostile feelings are engendered, and the main object, indeed the sole object for which Freemasonry was instituted, viz., the progressive development of our better nature, is sacrificed to the discussion of mere theoretical opinions. This has resulted from the writings, professedly Masonic, of such men as Oliver, Hutchinson, and others whom we could name. The consequence is, that the standard of Masonry is lowered, and it has not developed in practice in conformity to its teachings. There is not that living inspiration in the every-day actions of Freemasons to influence the world around them to progress to a higher plane, to advance from good to better, and thus to improve the condition of society, such as the teachings of Freemasonry contemplate. The practice of the virtues is what Freemasonry demands, and not mere sentimental theorizing or speculating upon its teachings. We have had enough of this; let us resolve to do, to reduce to practice the teachings of Freemasonry, to aim to be better ourselves, and to love our fellow men, and then we will truly manifest to the world around us, the object of Freemasonry.—American Mirror and Keystone.

OLD ROCHESTER BRIDGE.

FROM time to time your contemporary, the Times, has chronicled the gradual destruction of this once famous bridge. The last time I was at Rochester—the summer of 1858—hardly one stone was left on another, but there yet remained the vast foundation piles, which, at low water, the sappers and miners were busily employed in uprooting. Those of your readers who, like Mr. Pickwick, have admired the picturesque scenery of the Medway from the fine old bridge, will forgive my calling their attention to a few facts relating to its history. It was built, at the close of the fourteenth century, by Sir Robert Knowles and Sir John de Cobham, the former bridge, which was of wood, having been rendered unsafe by Simon de Montfort when he besieged the castle, which was held by Earl Warren for the king. Lambarde, in his Perambulation of Kent, says, "The olde work of timber buildinge was fyled by Symon, the Earl of Leicester, in the reigne of Hen. 3, and not full twentie yeares after, it was borne away by the ice, in the reigne of K. Edward, his sonne." Cobham appears to have been the most liberal in his donations towards keeping the bridge in repair. At the east end there was a "lyttel chapel edified," where were sung daily three masses, to enable travellers to worship as they passed through the episcopal city, a special collect being said at each service for the souls of Sir John and some others specified in the charter. At a later period, Archbishop Warham and Bishop Fisher were benefactors to the bridge. Warham bestowed on it a set of iron copings, which Mr. Lower conjectures were wrought at the iron works on the archiepiscopal manor at Mayfield. Fisher took great interest in the improvements which were in progress in 1531. He used, "for his recreation and diversion," to go and look at the workmen who were employed in the repairs. The first and third piers were to be maintained by the bishop and his tenants. Lambarde gives the agreement in Latin:—"Episcopus Roff: debet facere primam peram de ponte Roffensi, et debet invenire tres sullivas, et debet plantare tres Virgatas super pontem. —Episcopus Roff: debet facere terciam peram, et debet tres sullivas et plantare duas Virgatas et dimid." Strange to say, the name of the architect is not known. Until Westminster bridge was built, Rochester bridge ranked as second in the kingdom. In 1793, it was widened and beautified, under the direction of Mr. Alexander. Being at length considered insufficient for the requirements, both of the town and the river, the noble old bridge has given place to a noble and handsome erection, which, however, will never possess the associations of its predecessor. I may mention that Queen Victoria passed over the old bridge on her way to visit her wounded soldiers, at Fort Pitt hospital, thus fitly closing the long series of historical recollections with which its ancient arches teemed.*—J. MASONIC NOTES AND QUERIES.

NETHERLANDISH MASONIC SONGS.

Worshipful Sir and Brother,—You will excuse my Dutchman's English. In your Magazine for May, 1859, at page 926, is asked for a Netherlandish translation of your Entered Apprentice's Song. I cannot precisely supply a translation, but in my own Lodge the banquet is usually closed after the following song:—

"BAND VAN BROEDERSCHAP.

"Air:—Frères et Compagnons.

"Legt, broeders 't werktuig neêr,
Wilt uwen arbeid staken;
Un werk strekt u tot eer!
Laat ons de rust nu smaakon,
Die de Orde elk Metslaar schenkt,
Ew'nan het hart een wellust doet ervaaren,
Die nimmer 't reinat genoeg krenkt,
Of naberon kan baaren.
"Dit gloedend druiven sap,
Doon broederband geschonken,
Zij onzer broederschap
Welmeenend toegedronken.
Eenmaal toek, zeker, zal
De Metslaarij heel de aarde alom verlichten,
En elk, door ons volmaakt getal,
Ons edel werk verrichten!"

The spelling of some of the Dutch words is not modern.

[Literally translated].

"BAND OF BROTHERHOOD.

"Lay, brethren, the working tool down,
Your labour cease;
Your work is honourable!
Let us now taste the repose
Which the Order to every Mason gives,
And which to the heart a pleasure brings,
Which never the purest harms,
Or repentance can bring forth.

"This glowing grape juice
By brother's hand poured forth,
Be our brotherhood
Sincerely drunk to.
For certainly will
Masonry the whole earth everywhere enlighten.
Let us each, by our perfect number,
Our noble work perform!"

These two stanzas are selected from a work called Gezangboek voor Vrijmetselaren (Songbook for Freemasons), Amsterdam, 1806, still our most common song book. It contains a number of both Dutch and French songs. Some Dutch Lodges have peculiar song books. We used to rise at the beginning of the last strophe. Sometimes the brethren will join in singing the Frères et Compagnons.

I cannot ascertain that quite the same verses and custom prevail throughout the Netherlands; and this summertime I shall not get information thereupon.

* According to Dr. Thorpe, the first bridge (of wood) over the Medway was built by Edgar the Peaceable, who levied an annual tax on "divers tracts of land for its repair." A Saxon MS., still extant, marks with exactness such portions of the work as were to be executed by the respective landowners. It was 430 feet long, and had nine piers with eight arches.—Vide Beattie's Castles and Abbeys of England.

MASONRY IN HOLLAND.

If I have correctly observed, the general form of Dutch Masonry was rather English till the middle of the last century, afterwards rather French. Our Masonry, however, never partook of that wild and political tendency which the French Craft was, I think, unreasonably accused of by ecclesiastical writers.

At page 879 of your same volume, the information about our high degrees is not in all parts correct.

Holland is only two provinces of the Netherlands.

The Groot Oosten (Grand Orient) of the Netherlands directs only the blue degrees.

Dutch high degrees, indeed seven, were entirely identical with the Rite français moderne, working under the Grand Orient de France. The Hoofl Kapittel (head Chapter) assembles annually at the Hague the day before or after the Groot Oosten, a week after Pentecost. Some years ago there was passed a resolution, which I prefer to speak of to brethren only who possess those degrees.

Every Dutch Chapter bears the name of the Lodge to which it was connected.

At the Cape of Good Hope we have still Lodges, but no longer Chapters, I think.

Our Grand Master stands at the head of those degrees, but doth not often meet with them. He appoints his substitute for presiding and affairs.

Besides, our Grand Master, Prince Frederik of the Netherlands, somewhat previous to 1820, introduced the Dutch degrees of Elected and Upper Elected Masters, Uitverkoren en Opper Uitverkoren Meesters, which are called divisions of Master degree. To some Lodges belong chambers of those degrees. The chamber of administration assembles at the Hague the day before or after the Groot Oosten. Often the Grand Master himself presides. Those degrees are not introduced abroad, nor have they been substituted for the high degrees. I imagine those Master divisions are partly philosophical, and in some particulars universally theological. Perhaps the making up of them was somewhat connected with the discovery of the Cologne charter of 1535, of which the authenticity is questioned, especially abroad.

Some years ago at Amsterdam, a congregation, Post nubila lux, dissatisfied with Dutch Freemasonry, and not obtaining from the Groot Oosten the arbitrary innovations it desired, established itself as a Lodge, but without any constitution either at home or from abroad. I think the establishers were not entitled to communicate what they conditionally had received.—Your true and hail-wishing Brother, T. W. VAN MARLE, Presiding Master of the Lodge Le Préjugé vaincu at Deventer; Representative of the Grand Eclectic Lodge at Frankfort O.M. to the Grand Orient of the Netherlands.

Orient of Deventer, Netherlands, August 17th, 1859.

HIGH DEGREES.

Some ambition for being more than a Master Mason cannot be annihilated. High degrees, I think, can be very useful if they procure an experienced aristocracy who take their peculiarities as forms and means for recognizing and assembling, for studying and promoting true Masonry, for critically segregating the genuine symbols and proprieties from what fancy and history may have intruded. The amendment of all profane systems for the benefit of society and future times, must be preceded by every brother's reasonably interpreting the royal art; and this interpretation must be preceded by a right comprehension of the matter.

I think the parallelism is the very analogy and inexhaustible allegory between both lines, the operative and the speculative.—T. W. VAN MARLE.

BROACHED THURNAL.

What is "broached thurnal?" Should it be in mediæval Latin, tornella brocata—a little tower, covered with a spire, whose rain-drop, as in primitive gothic, falls directly to the ground? Was it a little ornamental tower, for some purpose in the interior of churches? But how could a brother thereupon learn to work, or thereupon try the justness of his tools? Is it metamorphosed by the French into a pointed cube?—T. W. VAN MARLE.

A MASONIC ORATORIO.

Several editions of the Ahiman Rezon give, at the end, a (not quite correct) copy of the elegant oratorio Solomon's Temple, performed in Dublin prior to 1769, to which the music was composed by Mr. Richard Broadway, organist of St. Patrick's cathedral. Thereupon occurs a mention in your September part, 1858, page 578. This music must be curious and interesting. Is it still existing? Where and how is it to be found and to be had, were it only in unison?—T. W. VAN MARLE.

When an English Lodge goes to church, is it a similar case with a French jury's going to mass? There, Protestants and Jews are not allowed to partake of that preparation. Is, in England, that custom only practised by Lodges whose members all belong to that church? And how, when those members, or part of them, are inscribed to that church, but privately differ from it in opinion? Is the service on such occasion public and ordinary? Is the preaching clergyman ever a Freemason? Is the service only opened to the Lodge and its visitors? Do the brethren ever attend in full Masonic costume?—T. W. VAN MARLE.—[When it is thought proper that an English Lodge or Provincial Grand Lodge should go to church, brethren of all religious denominations are in the habit of attending, without regard to difference in belief, and we have often seen brethren of the Hebrew persuasion present. The service is public, though certainly not ordinary; except in the sense that the ordinary liturgy of the church is employed. The clergyman who preaches is almost always a brother of the Order, and usually selects a Masonic topic for illustration. The public are invariably admitted to these services, and the brethren wear the insignia of the Craft.]

THE USE OF TRADITIONS.

Is venturing on risking metaphysical fictions excusable, as being unavoidable in a transition from pretended civilization to the real light of Masonry?—T. W. VAN MARLE.

ORIGIN OF TRAVELLING MASONS.

In Germany, and may be in Denmark, the fellows of a handicraft (Handwerksburschen) still use to travel (wander) for getting employment and for learning under several Masters in several places. Was a similar custom prevailing in England and Scotland when the custom of initiating arose?—T. W. VAN MARLE.

STEPHEN JONES.

In reply to the queries in your last number, I am able to inform your correspondent that this worthy brother was what Goldsmith terms "a bookseller's hack;" at any rate such was his vocation for the last ten years of his life, during which period I was personally acquainted with him. He was the intimate friend of Bro. Preston, and one of his executors, being also a P.M. of Preston's Lodge (Antiquity, then No. 1). Preston's mantle descended on him, and I think it may be affirmed has never been worn since. Bro. Jones was the compiler of the well known school dictionary, entitled, Sheridan's English Dictionary Abridged. He also compiled a biographical and a geographical dictionary, besides other useful works. I avail myself of this opportunity to mention that there exists a copy of the "Prestonian Lecture," complete, the whole of the three degrees, in cipher, which was given to a worthy brother by the late Bro. Lawrence Thompson, who for many years held the appointment of Prestonian lecturer, which was I believe previously and first held by Bro. Jones. Having seen the MS., and being acquainted with his penmanship, I venture to assert that it is in Jones's handwriting. Being the manager of the publishing department of the house that chiefly employed him in reading proofs, I had many opportunities of seeing him during his last years; and, as well as I can remember, I took him—he being too ill to leave the house—a few pounds for reading the proofs of an edition of Jones's Sheridan, a few days before his death, either the day, or close upon it, that the Duke of Sussex laid the first stone of the Caledonian Asylum, in 1827. Bro. Jones wrote for the European Magazine, edited and published by Bro. James Asperne, and I think he contributed to the Encyclopædia Londinensis. He produced a small volume entitled Masonic Miscellanies in Poetry and Prose; comprising two hundred Masonic songs, odes, anthems, &c., and several essays by himself and others. This volume is dedicated to his friend, Bro. William Preston, to whom he acknowledges he is indebted for any insight he may have acquired into the true nature and design of Masonry. The last edition of this work is 1811. After Preston's decease, he was the editor of the Illustrations of Masonry. At the time of my being acquainted with Bro. Jones, I knew nothing of Masonry, but on the occasion of my last visit, I expressed my regret at the miserable appearance of his lodging, in an obscure street in Pentonville, and his evident want of comfort. He said he had no one to do anything for him; the room was the extreme of wretchedness, there was a single worn out chair, a small deal table, and a dirty floor without carpet or covering of any kind. At no period of my life was I ever more struck by the contrast man finds, "when pain and anguish wring the brow," in the presence and absence of "the ministering angel," woman. Bro. Jones had neither wife, sister or child about him.

ST. ALBAN'S LODGE, BIRMINGHAM.

"H. H." writes—"In your recent article on the Craft in Warwickshire, mention is made of the St. Alban's Lodge. It might be worth while to inquire what has become of that Lodge. I have a copy of the quarto edition of Anderson's Constitutions, revised, &c., by Northouck, and published in 1784. It has been handsomely bound, and has an inscription on the outside, in gilt letters, "Compliment to St. Alban's Lodge, Birmingham, of Dr. S. Freeman, P.G.S., London, 1786."

REFERENCE TO AN EARLY TRACT WANTED.

Where can I be favoured with a perusal of an early tract, mentioned in one of Dr. Oliver's books, as published in 1676, and entitled A Short Analysis of the Unchanged Rites and Ceremonies of Freemasonry?"—W. P.

ANTIQUITIES OF YORK.

In the account given under this head of the Masonic Coffee-house in York, it is stated that Mr. Blanchard had certain papers in his possession. In reference to this statement we may observe, that Godfrey Higgins's Anacalypsis, (vol. i., bk. x., chap. viii., sec. 1, p. 768), the following passage occurs:—"The documents from which I extracted the above information respecting the York Masons were given to me by —Blanchard, Esq., and transferred by me to the person who now possesses them, and with whom they ought most properly to be placed—his royal highness the Duke of Sussex."—[Query: In whose custody are they now?]

In the same article, mention is made of a Lodge being held in the crypt of York Minster. The meeting referred to is mentioned by Higgins as having taken place on "the 27th of May, 1778, and was the last meeting in the crypt of the Druidical Lodge, or Chapter of Royal Arch Masons, or Templar Encampment.—SENEC.

WAS THE DUKE OF WELLINGTON A FREEMASON?

Among the numerous appointments, titles, and orders of the great Duke of Wellington, can you tell me if he at any time belonged to our fraternity?—INQUIRER.—[In the Freemasons' Calendar, printed under the sanction of the Grand Lodge of Dublin, for the years 1848 to 1856, there appears in each volume a portion headed "Traditional and Recorded Information respecting the Order of Freemasons;" but this was omitted in the publication for 1857, and whether it has been so since we cannot say, not having the books to refer to. In all the years above mentioned, from 1848 to 1856, the following statement is made:—"1790. The Duke of Kent initiated; and, December 7th, the Duke of Wellington initiated in No. 494, at Trim, of which Lodge his grace's father the Earl of Mornington and his brother the Marquis Wellesley had been Masters." A well informed brother, whom we hold in great respect, has stated to us that he remembers a characteristic letter from the Duke appearing in some newspaper or periodical, in which his grace denied all knowledge of the Craft, or having at any time been made a Mason. Feeling anxious to oblige "Inquirer," we have put his query to all whom we supposed likely to throw any light on the subject of its authenticity, but without avail; nor can we trace No. 494 among the Irish Lodges, or even find that there was a Lodge existing at any time at Trim. Perhaps some of our Irish brethren may be able to set this matter right, by proving to us the correctness or incorrectness of the authority quoted.—ED.]

INTRODUCTION OF MASONRY INTO ENGLAND AND IRELAND.

Both in and out of the Craft the "Remarkable Occurrences in Masonry," which is yearly perpetuated in our Calendar and Pocket Book, has met with much ridicule, on account of the gratuitous assumption of some of the statements put forth being, if not positively untrue, at least impossible of proof. But while the English Masons have modestly attributed to St. Alban, the protomartyr of Britain, the honour of having "formed the first Grand Lodge, A.D. 287," it appears we are far more modern than our brethren of the sister kingdom. In perusing their portion of "The Traditional and Recorded History of the Irish Constitutions, selected from Ancient Authors, and from the Archives of the Grand Lodge," printed year by year in the Dublin Freemasons' Calendar, the first paragraph states, "A.M. 2736. The Phœnicians are supposed to have settled A.C. 1264, in Ireland, and Masonry to have been introduced by Heber and Heremon, sons of Milesius, succeeded by Eochaid, styled the Ollamh Fodhla, or Learned Doctor, who (A.C. 769) constituted triennial meetings at Tarah in Meath. But the constant warfare and aggressions of the Danes destroyed the ancient records and discouraged all sciences, though the eastern round towers and minarets which still exist testify the labours of the era, corroborated by the opinions of Strabo, of Diodorus Siculus, and by the Sanconiaton, referred to by Sir William Betham, in his second volume of Etruria Celtica, assimilating the Masonic rites with the mysteries of Samothrace, and with the Gobhan Saor, or free smith of Ireland. A.D. 306, St. Albans obtained the first royal charter for "Assemblies or Huttes of Masons to be holden in England. (Preston's Illustrations.) A.D. 872, Alfred the Great promoted the Order, and the art much prospered. According to Bede, Alfred was initiated at the College in Mayo; and the letter of Eric, a celebrated philosopher of Auxerre, to Charles the Bald, about the middle of the ninth century, designated the Irish philosophers 'Servants of the wise Solomon.'" How are the discrepancies of the dates between the English and Irish Calendars to be reconciled?—G.B.—[We are totally unable to reconcile these statements with the generally received history of the times in question. The looseness of the Irish Calendar's account may be tested by the following:—It is there asserted that Preston is the authority for the date A.D. 306; now Preston says, in speaking of St. Alban (not St. Albans), "He was converted to the Christian faith, and, in the tenth and last persecution of the Christians, was beheaded, A.D. 303. So also, Alban Butler's Lives of the Saints, where the 26th of June is dedicated to his commemoration; and the Rev. Dr. Giles's edition of Bede's Works. In the passage about Alfred's initiation at the College in Mayo, is another gross blunder. Bede could not have written about Alfred, as he (Bede) died 104 years before Alfred was born! Bede was born A.D. 673, and died 735. Alfred the Great was born A.D. 849, and died 901! Well may our correspondent allude to the ridicule brought on our Order through the historically false dates assigned to various events and persons, who we believe to have been totally unconnected with our Craft. It is time such delusions were swept away.]

ETYMOLOGY OF THE WORD "MASON."

Your contemporary, the Athenæum, in one of the April numbers of the present year (p. 578), writes thus while reviewing a work:—"We remember a case in which the true etymology has been forgotten, and the subject, noble in itself, has suffered decrease of dignity by this obliviousness. We allude to the alleged British derivation of the word 'Freemason.' It is said that one of the many titles of the Druids was May's Ons, or Men of May—the May-pole having been a standard or symbol of Druidism—Freemasonry, as derived from Druidism, has therefore forgotten its etymology; indeed has forgotten its origin itself, and vulgarized May's Ons into Masons, by which the prosaic fact and the poetical sentiment equally suffer." The above, I dare say, is thought very clever and original, but it appears to me very far fetched, and unworthy of the least confidence. Can you inform me where the reviewer found such an authority, or is it truly an original idea?—INVESTIGATOR.—["Investigator" need hardly be told that the Masons do not derive their foundation from the Druids, nor has Masonry forgotten itself. The writer in the Athenæum appears to have been reading Cleland's two essays, The Way to Things by Words, and The Real Secret of the Freemasons, 8vo., London, 1766—a work which advocates a Celtic derivation for most words, and among others will be found the term "Mason" with the above etymology, and reasons in support of its correctness. See a very much more intelligible and probable derivation in the Freemasons' Magazine (vol. vi. p. 335].

A NOTE DECLINED.

Our correspondent "Civis," who sends us a note for insertion, seems to have misunderstood our explanation in a late number. We deal only with historical, antiquarian, literary, and biographical matters. Personalities are not included; particularly when they would lead to wounding the feelings of a brother. For this reason, the note forwarded by "Civis," cannot be inserted.—ED.

EXTINCTION OF A LEARNED BODY.—A meeting had been fixed to take place at Vannes this summer, of the learned in the national lore of all the remaining branches of the Celtic family in Great Britain, Ireland, and France, under the auspices of the Archaeological Association of Brittany, of which the Vicomte de Villemarqué was the distinguished president. Various schemes of hospitality, research, and consultation were founded on this arrangement, and it was anticipated that the congress might have thrown some additional light on ethnology, history, and language. "But all these amenities have been annihilated by a blow. The Minister of the Interior has been led to perceive the inconsistency of such proceedings with a certain law against associations in general, which law was made in 1852, shortly after the coup d'état. The peaceful Bretons, who loved archæology, and meddled not in politics, found one morning in their family newspapers a brief arrêt, declaring, in magisterial language, that the association was dissolved." This society, which was founded sixteen years ago, under the patronage of Louis Philippe, contained two sections, one of agriculture, and the other of archæology, and during its existence several valuable works have been contributed by its members.

Poetry.

TO A LARK

SINGING CLOSE TO A RAILWAY STATION.

BRAVE HEARTED bird ! who, with undaunted wing,
Despite the toiling engine's deafening sound,
From this bare spot on which no dew doth lie,
Up heavenward so joyously dost spring ;
Time was, when, resting on the furrow'd ground,
Thy nestlings watch'd thee vanish in the sky,
And, poised in air, thy hymn of rapture sing ;
Yet e'en in this drear waste thou still hast found
Sweet solace in the charm of minstrelsy,
The gift of song within thy breast concealed.
Oh, for thy spirit, bird ! hopeful and strong,
Born of the life in poet's heart reveal'd,
Which lifts the soul above all care and wrong !

THE EVENING PRIMROSE.

WHEN day's last throes are drawing nigh
And passing breezes gently sigh ;
When chilly eve in dew pearls dight,
Awaits the solemn tread of night ;
And flowers, that e'er the sun had shed
His lustrous halo round each head,
In new-born beauty met the air,
Now jaded charms alone do wear ;
Then doth the primrose clad in gold,
So coy her modest bloom unfold,
Content to watch the evening star,
And hear the lark's last notes afar ;
She casts around her sweet perfume,
The breath of praise we must assume,
Since it is written in God's words,
" Let everything praise Thee, O Lord ! "

IONE.

GRACE DARLING.

BY BRO. GEORGE MARKHAM TWEDDELL.

THY say that thou diedst young, fair heroine !
Few were the years thou number'dst upon earth ;
But though not thirty summer's flowers were thine,
Thy name, whilst earth remains, will brightly shine,
With the unclouded sheen of holy worth.
Say not a well spent life is ever short ;
Say not an ill spent life is ever long ;
For thousands will unto thy tomb resort,
And poets hymn thee in immortal song.
Yea, future ages will thy praise proclaim,
And tell how modest, brave, and kind wert thou,
Children be taught to lap thy honour'd name,
(Now consecrate to everlasting fame,)
And bloodless laurels e'er bedeck thy brow.

SHE IS NOT LISTENING NOW.

I HELD a parley with my tears,
My tears that fell like rain ;
I cannot sing in these dull years
The old exulting strain.
What though this sad declining life
Riches and fame endow,
Too late the peace, too long the strife—
She is not listening now.

To thee, my travel wearied soul
Would ever fly for rest,
And all its dear bought stores unroll
Thou brightest and thou best !
Treasure above all wealth or lore,
As I shall e'er avow,
Thou hast gone hence for evermore,
Thou art not listening now !

True that for thee I would have died,
Or lived all fear above—
And rudest shocks of life defied,
With an o'er-mastering love—
In vain this wild and frantic grief,
In vain each fervent vow ;
Slow time, wan age, bring small relief,
She is not listening now !

Ah, bound on earth in dearest links,
With the soul's brightest chain,—
A whisper comes, " Thy spirit sinks,
Yet shall it climb again
To richest peace—to union sure,"
My blest one answerest thou ?
O world, thy worst I may endure,
For she is listening now !

TOBACCO.

A PROPER MEDITATION FOR ALL SMOKERS OF TOBACCO.

THIS Indian weed, now withered quite,
Is green at noon, cut down at night,
Shows thy decay—
All flesh is hay—
Thus think, and smoke tobacco.
This pipe, so lily white and weak,
Doth well thy mortal state bespeak ;
We are e'en such,
Gone with a touch—
Thus think, and smoke tobacco.
And when the smoke ascends on high,
Then thou beholds the vanity
Of worldly stuff,
Gone with a puff—
Thus think, and smoke tobacco.
And when the pipe grows foul within,
Think of thy soul defiled by sin ;
For then the fire
It doth require—
Thus think, and smoke tobacco.
And when the ash is cast away,
Then to thyself well mayest thou say,
That unto dust
Return we must—
Thus think, and smoke tobacco.

THE GRAND LODGE OF THE PHILADELPHES.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE FREEMASONS' MAGAZINE AND MASONIC MIRROR.

SIR AND BROTHER,—The kind reception given to our first letter induces us to address you a second. We are anxious to express our thanks for your impartiality. After having published an attack against us, you opened the columns of your paper to our answer. That was fair; and indeed we expected nothing less from the serious and honest publication which is the echo of the great Masonic body in England. Nevertheless, we are not, in all respects, satisfied with your answer. In the note which followed your letter, you merely maintained the incriminations contained in your first article. Now, our letter had, in our opinion, proved beyond a doubt that the Order of Memphis is a Masonic society, regularly established in England before the coup d'état, and we are confident of having annihilated the accusations brought against us. Furthermore, moved by a spirit of candid honesty, we had offered to prove the truthfulness of our assertions by unquestionable documents. To this, what was your answer? Without attempting to discuss our letter or giving any proof in support of your opinion, you merely affirmed a second time that ours is a secret and illegal society, and you forbade all English Masons to have any connexion with us, under the pain of excommunication. We beg to be allowed to make a few observations upon these points. In the first place, how can you apply the qualification of secret to a society which offers to prove by undeniable documents as well as by its conduct, that it is a Masonic one; which opens the doors of its temples to all Masons, whatever be the rite or the country they belong to; which never loses an opportunity of inviting them to its meetings? Really we do not know, whether in England the dictionary and the grammar authorize to apply the qualification of secret to such a society, but we firmly believe that denomination to be contrary to the rules of sound logic. As for the word "illegal," applied to our society, we humbly acknowledge our inability to discuss the point with you. Being ignorant of the English law, we do not know what penalty we are liable to for our offence (crime, may be). Perhaps we know of England nothing but the surface? Perhaps there is in the arsenal of your legislation some mouldy old act which holds the sword of the law threatening over our heads? Indeed it is with difficulty that we can bring our minds to such a supposition in a country where the rights of every man seem to be respected; where the government seems to allow citizens to form commercial, philanthropic, political, and religious societies, without interfering with them. Yet, we cannot believe that you accuse our society of being illegal for the mere purpose of frightening us, or to dissuade any person desirous of joining us from so doing. No; we truly believe that it has been your intention to give us a brotherly warning, and we are disposed to accept the benefit of it. If we have infringed the English law, it is for want of knowing it. Well then, achieve your work. You have kindly warned us, do more; tell us the means of freeing ourselves from the illegal position in which we stand. We have used in this letter the word excommunication, to characterize the penalty with which you threaten the English brothers that may visit our Lodges. This really smells strongly of the Inquisition, and indeed you go beyond the holy society; for, you denounce us as heretics without having taken the trouble of inquiring into our doctrines, and you issue an interdiction against all Masons that may be visiting us in order to judge of our merits by themselves. You must acknowledge that this is contrary to the spirit of Masonry. England has left far behind her the days of Henry the VIII., and those of the bloody Mary. The spirit of tolerance and free examination exists in all her institutions, and we cannot believe that amongst the great bodies of this country, Masonry alone has refused to follow the steps of progress.

We remain, Sir and Brother, yours fraternally,

By order of the Respectable Grand Lodge,

BR. DESQUESNES,

The General Secretary.

London, July 30th, 1859.

[In inserting the above letter, we do so with a view of taking leave of the subject, as we have no wish to bring into notoriety the so-called Grand Lodge of Philadelphes or Order of Memphis. We deny that it has ever been legally established in England, or that any persons connected with it can be recognized as Masons in any part of the world where the supreme bodies are in communion with England. With regard to the application of the word "secret" to this society, we hold all societies to be so who take an obligation from their members to keep anything secret from the rest of the world—and this we presume the Philadelphes do. As regards "illegality," we recently gave those clauses of the Acts of Parliament which exempt Freemasons' Lodges from the penalties attached to belonging to secret societies; but that exemption could not be held in any court of law to refer to any body of men meeting together and calling themselves Freemasons, but only to those established in connexion with the Grand Lodges of England, Ireland, or Scotland. It is a principle of Masonic law that there can be but one supreme head in any country; and however our members may connect themselves with the Mark degree, Ancient and Accepted Rite, Knights Templar, &c., so far as Craft Masonry is concerned all acknowledge the undivided jurisdiction of the Grand Lodge; and no persons can be admitted to the more advanced degrees who have not been regularly made Masons in a Craft Lodge. We admit that other societies are so far secret as to require obligations from their members, such as the Odd Fellows, Foresters, and others, but they have been established for purely benevolent objects, and each Lodge is, or ought to be, registered under the Friendly Societies' Acts, and their by-laws approved by Mr. Tidd Pratt; without which precaution they have no security for their funds, nor legal remedy against a fraudulent officer. Our correspondent asks how the members of the Grand Lodge of Philadelphes are to become legal. We reply, by dissolving their present society, and seeking admission into Masonry through the portals of an English Lodge, when, if they are found worthy, and wish to do so, they may, after having taken the necessary steps in the Order, apply for a warrant to open a Lodge for themselves. And here we may inform them, if they are not aware of it, there is already one French Lodge; La Tolérance, holding under the constitution of the Grand Lodge of England—the Grand Lodge now numbering on its roll, after allowing for the withdrawal of the Canadian, something like one thousand Lodges. As regards the penalty with which we have threatened English brethren if they visit this Lodge of Philadelphes, we have done no more than remind them of the tenour of their obligation; and we repeat, that such a visit would subject them to severe censure, if not absolute exclusion from the Order. Moreover, beyond his various obligations, every candidate for the Master's chair (and there are comparatively few Masons who do not at some time or another aspire to that dignity), must solemnly declare previously to installation, "to respect genuine and true brethren, and to discountenance impostors and all dissenters from the original plan of Freemasonry;" "to pay homage to the Grand Master for the time being, and to his officers when duly installed, and strictly to conform to every edict of the Grand Lodge;" and that "no new Lodge can be formed without permission of the Grand Master or his Deputy, and that no countenance ought to be given to any irregular Lodge, or to any person initiated therein"—and how any Mason in the face of such a declaration (which is as patent to every member in the Lodge, and equally binding upon him as upon the Master), can visit or in any way sanction the meetings of the Philadelphes, we are at a loss to imagine. If they do so, it is only, we repeat it, at the risk of exclusion from the Order. We do not know what may be the regular fees of the Philadelphes—if they have any regular scale—but we do know that parties professing to belong to them are touting about publichouses and offering to initiate persons into Masonry for sums varying from £1 down to 10s., and perhaps lower. In conclusion, we warn all true and genuine brethren to be cautious how they have any communication with members of this illegal body; and Masons throughout the world, that they have no legal status as Masons, and that their certificates can only be recognized by any of the various Masonic bodies either in Europe or America in connexion with England, as so much waste paper, neither entitling their holders to acknowledgment, or relief should they require it.—ED.]

CALENDAR FOR 1860.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE FREEMASONS' MAGAZINE AND MASONIC MIRROR.

DEAR SIR,—Who prepares "The Calendar"? To whom should applications be addressed leading to its improvement? Those to whom this reference is of use know its defects, and would be glad to find that the attention of its conductors had been seriously directed towards its completion.

In 1858, your correspondents, "One Who," &c., (vide No. 42, p. 744), Bro. E. S. Cossens, and "R. L." (vide No. 46, p. 934), suggested some very pertinent improvements; and you, approving such suggestions, remarked "there would not be time (25th October, 1858), to obtain the information for the forthcoming Calendar," &c.

Doubtless the Calendar conductors read such correspondence, and by consequence could not now plead want of time, short notice, or any other excuse, for not adopting all the suggestions, which you know could be obtained by them on a proper application to the Grand Secretary's Office, with the sanction of the Most Worshipful Grand Master. His Lordship is too orthodox to object to any proposition which bears evidence of benefit to the Craft; and if the suggestions made by your former correspondents were adopted, I am confident the Calendar, so improved, would meet with an extended sale, and be thankfully acknowledged.

It would then be useful and required by every officer in the different Lodges in Great Britain and Ireland, the Colonies, and other possessions far and far away.

Yours truly,

R. E. X.

THE CALENDAR.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE FREEMASONS' MAGAZINE AND MASONIC MIRROR.

DEAR SIR AND BROTHER,—It certainly appears to me very remarkable that the publishers or compilers of the Freemasons' Calendar and Pocket Book should from year to year profess to give to the public "A Complete List of all the Regular Lodges and Royal Arch Chapters, with their places and times of meeting, corrected from the books of the United Grand Lodge, &c.," when in point of fact many Lodges and Chapters so published have not had an existence for a number of years; this is calculated to lead many astray, and Grand Lodge should at once commence an expurgation of the dormant bodies. The dormant Lodges coming under my immediate notice are Nos. 569, Cumberland, Harmony, Amherst, Nova Scotia (not working for fifteen years or more); No. 932, Queen's Lodge, Queen's County, New Brunswick (never opened); No. 570, Albion Chapter, St. John, New Brunswick (never opened); besides these Lodges, I notice, in a communication in the Freemasons Magazine, that Lodge No. 64, Howard of Brotherly Love, Arundel, having a Chapter attached, has not made a return for twenty-one years or over. I have no doubt, if brethren from the several counties in England would send a list of their non-working Lodges to you for publication, such a formidable array would be exhibited as would cause the heads of the institution to order the warrants of such as are in arrears, either to be returned, or payment of back dues made. This would cause such a shaking among the dry bones, that out of nearly eleven hundred Lodges under England, so many would be struck off the roll as to astonish the readers of the Calendar.

Hoping this communication may have the effect of arousing the apathy of the Grand Lodge officials,

I remain, yours fraternally,

ROBERT STUBBS,

P. Prov. G. Sec., and W.M., No. 301, Irish Register.

THE STORY OF CHICHESTER CROSS.

ONCE upon a time—that is to say, three centuries and a half ago—there lived in this quaint, quiet, old town of ours, this dear old Chichester, a certain bishop whose name was Edward Story. And the people loved him, not because he was their bishop, but because he was such a kind hearted, good, old man. Good cause had they to love him; for he was their staunch friend. "Friends of the people" are plentiful as gooseberries nowadays (particularly at election times); but they were "few and far between" indeed in these old times of which we speak—in the year of grace 1500. As the bishop passed along the street children stopped in their play and knelt to receive his ready blessing; the merchants laid aside their dealings, paused in their chafferings for higher prices, out of respect to their ecclesiastical father, and uncovered as he passed along; all harsh words or angry looks faded away; in fact, the bishop seemed to be surrounded by an atmosphere of calm and happy religion, which influenced all who came into his presence.

He had passed the prime of life when he first came to the town, full twenty years before; he had laboured all that time in doing good to all around him—in proving that true religion lives in our deeds far more than in our words; they had seen his hair grow whiter year by year, till now 'twas as the driven snow; and they had seen those manly shoulders bending more and more with age and infirmity. All knew he could not last much longer; but a gloom spread over the whole town when the news passed from mouth to mouth that the good bishop had given orders for his tomb to be prepared, and with heavy hearts they soon heard the sculptor's chisel chipping away the marble to form a plain but solid monument. That table tomb still exists; but how few among us think of the mouldering remains beneath—of the mere handful of dust which now represents all that was mortal of him who was one of the best Christians the town ever knew.

But the old man did not die yet. He had done much already for the good of the townspeople. The founding of the grammar school in West-street was one of these good works; but there was one other which he wished to see completed—one upon which he had pondered, and which had filled his large heart for years. Often had it sorely grieved him to see the poor peasantry come wearily trudging into the town from the village of Boshenham with fish, or with vegetables from those hamlets among the forest covered hills, and obliged to offer their wares in the open streets, exposed to the glaring sun in summer, to the drenching rains of autumn, or shivering amid the ice and snow of winter. He determined to build them a market house; some say he drew the design with his own hand, and I believe it, for bishops were often their own architects in those days. He bought a piece of ground of the corporation for £10—a much larger sum then than now. Ruskin tells us, and we all know it to be true, that men worked with their whole heart in those times; whatever they found to do, they did thoroughly. A barn would have served the purposes intended; but they could not do things in that style. If they had a building to erect, they made such a one as future ages might look upon with pride and pleasure—they made it a "thing of beauty," which should be "a joy for ever;" and in spite of the bad taste of the Goths of the last century, who added that lantern at the top, and put that hideous, iron fencing round it, the cross is still one of the greatest ornaments of the city. Here the poor people could sell their goods exempt from tolls, and protected from the weather. One of our city chroniclers tells us also, that the bishop left an estate worth £25 at Amberley, to keep the cross in repair. He further tells us that the corporation sold this estate a few years afterwards, in order to buy one nearer home. Can any one tell us, where the estate is which they bought, or ought to have bought? Some one fond of searching among dusty old records might do good service to the town by ascertaining what amount of truth there is in this statement.

So much then for the previous history of our city cross. Its present state we all know. And now I have a hint to throw out as to its future use—a hint which there are many good men and true who are ready to act upon at once. Its only use at present is to record the flight of time, and even this simple duty it very imperfectly performs; for one has to find the mean between the four dials before he can satisfy himself as to "What's o'clock." What I would beg to propose is, that it should be converted into a drinking fountain. Let there be a seat where the wayfarer could rest himself, protected from the rain or from the fierce rays of the summer sun, and let there be a constant supply of filtered water. All who have seen how greatly those drinking fountains are appreciated by the working classes of the metropolis, and the large towns of the north, will, I am sure, gladly come forward to support such a plan. Let us not be left behind in this age of progress, but unite at once in doing so good a deed. A comparatively small amount will make this the most perfect thing of the kind in the kingdom. Its position too, is just adapted to such a purpose. Let us not refuse the healthful and refreshing draught to the tired and thirsty wayfarer, but come forward at once and convert this beautiful structure into a drinking fountain, and so, in the spirit of its good founder, finish "The Story of Chichester Cross."—Builder.

ARCHÆOLOGY.

CAMBRIAN ARCHÆOLOGICAL ASSOCIATION.

THE society has just held its thirteenth annual meeting in the town of Cardigan, under the presidency of the Lord Bishop of St. Davids. The members assembled on Monday week, and were actively engaged in visiting the antiquarian remains of a highly interesting district every day throughout the past week. Each evening they assembled in the town hall to read memoirs and discuss various archæological points connected with them and the excursions. There was a large attendance of members, and the principal gentry and clergy of the neighbourhood took an active part in the proceedings. On three of the excursion days the members were most hospitably received at mansions situated on their line of route; and everything was done by a local committee, presided over by the Lord Lieutenant of Cardiganshire, to make their visit highly agreeable. On the first day the country north of Cardigan was explored, and several British camps were visited; on the second day the society explored the south-west side, visiting Nevern with its finely sculptured cross of the ninth century; Newport, with its ancient castle of the Lords' Marches, its cromlech, its church, &c., the magnificent cromlech of Pentre Ifan, placed on the skirts of Presseleu range, some ancient mansions, and the bridge where Archbishop Baldwin preached the crusade, accompanied by Giraldus Cambrensis. On the third excursion day the eastern end of the Presseleu mountain range was thoroughly examined, and a large party remained on this remarkably beautiful mountain till a late hour, visiting the camps, graves, circles, and ancient British roads for which it is well known to antiquarians. Before getting to the mountain, however, the party had digressed to Cilgerran Castle, where G. T. Clark, Esq., delivered a valuable lecture in the presence of the association on that ancient building of the thirteenth century, and on Norman castles in Wales generally. The fourth day's excursion included the Priory of St. Dogmael's, Cardigan Priory Church, Cenarth Falls, and the Castle of Newcastle-Emlyn. The weather was fine throughout, and the excursions were very numerously attended. Some of the most remarkable objects of antiquity visited were several early inscribed stones bearing "oghams" on their edges: one of them in particular, at St. Dogmael's Priory, is of great interest, the Latin inscription and the "ogham" inscription being the exact rendering one of the other, and commemorating "Sagranmyn, son of Cynedda," a British prince known to have lived in the sixth century. Few parts of Wales are so rich as in early inscriptions.

the country round Cardigan. The papers read at the evening meetings were numerous and of considerable interest, touching upon many topics connected with local antiquities and Cambrian archaeology in general. The bishop presided with great ability, taking a very energetic part in the discussions and delivering several speeches (especially the opening address) of unusual learning and spirit. A temporary museum was, as usual, formed for the occasion. It contained large collections of coins, seals, rubbings, pedigrees, early printed books, and many important MSS., including the most important records of the Barony of Kemaes, from the muniment room of its possessor, Mr. T. D. Lloyd, of Bronwydd. The week's proceedings terminated with a ball, and the next annual meeting in 1860 was fixed to be held at Bangor.

THE ROMAN VILLA AT CARISBROOKE.

THE Hants Advertiser supplies us with a report of the adjourned meeting held at the Guildhall, Newport, Isle of Wight, for the purpose of receiving an answer from the Vicar of Carisbrooke to the resolution passed at the last meeting. A letter from the Rev. E. James, M.A., Vicar of Carisbrooke, was accordingly read, in which that gentleman declined to grant a lease to those gentlemen who proposed to erect a suitable building over the villa, so as to render it accessible to the public at all times; at the same time, the vicar expressed his intention of covering in the figured pavements at the bath and leaving the tessellated pavement alone open on terms of subsequent consideration. The chairman remarked that, in relation to the Roman villa, there appeared to be but one general wish, and that was that the whole of it should be uncovered. They had only begun a work, and did not know where it would end, or what it would lead to. The extent of the villa was not as yet known; they did not know what other beauties would be exposed to view; they did not know what treasure might remain hidden by the ancient Roman who formerly inhabited the villa, or what pots of coins might be concealed. Pots of coins had been found in other places; one containing six hundred was found at Shanklin. Roman coins and other treasure had sometimes been discovered of great value. Until the whole of the villa was exposed it would not satisfy any one who had an antiquarian mind. It was the feeling of the committee that the whole should be uncovered. He did not think that the vicar knew of the strong feeling which existed relative to the ruins, a feeling extending throughout the whole country, from the peasant to the crown. He thought that the committee should wait upon the vicar, and then perhaps he would relent, and uncover the whole of the villa. As much as twelve pounds in a day had been already taken to view it in its present condition, and what an extra source of attraction it would be if the whole were exposed to view. It would be a vast ornament to the locality, and also a great inducement to visitors, and hence a source of general benefit. He trusted that in the end the vicar would consent to expose the whole to public view. Dr. Wilkins stated the result of communications, to a degree of a private nature, he had received, and also particulars of an interview he had had with Col. the Hon. Sir Charles Phipps, and which were of a highly interesting and gratifying nature, and from which, as the chairman expressed it, the same sentiments with regard to the villa were entertained, alike from the peasant to the crown. Eventually, all persons present agreeing upon the desirability of having all the ruins uncovered (at the same time recognizing the difficulties of the position in which the vicar was placed), resolutions were passed to the effect that nothing less than the complete excavation of the villa in its entirety would be satisfactory to the public; and that it is desirable that the villa should be constantly accessible to visitors under certain regulations of payment. Finally it was agreed that a deputation should wait upon the vicar to put him in possession of the important communication from an influential quarter referred to by Dr. Wilkins; which deputation has since waited upon the Rev. E. James, but with what result is not yet known.

MIDLAND COUNTIES ARCHÆOLOGICAL SOCIETY.

THIS association has lately made an excursion from Birmingham to the site of the old Roman city, Uriconium. After inspecting the place and the progress of the excavation, the excursionists assembled beneath the Old Wall, to hear an account of the progress made from Mr. Wright; after which they visited Wroxeter and its ancient church, and then returned to Shrewsbury. This society we are given to understand is rapidly rising in importance, and that ere long it will be in a position to rival any similar association throughout the kingdom.

Literature.

NOTES ON LITERATURE, SCIENCE, AND ART.

A PETERSBURG correspondent of a contemporary, after alluding to various measures of reform which have been adopted by the Russian government, remarks upon the impulse which has been given to journalism by the liberal measures which have been adopted since the accession of Alexander II. He says:—"At this moment there are fifty or sixty daily, weekly, and monthly papers published at St. Petersburg, three-quarters of which are written in Russian, and by far the greater portion started since the war. The most reliable information and the most free discussion are to be found in the Russian rather than in the French or German papers. The government seems anxious that the internal condition of the empire should be fully discussed at home, without permitting the rest of Europe to take part in the debate. Russian local papers are also to be found throughout the entire empire; indeed, there is hardly a government without one. In the St. Petersburg papers we find pretty fair reports of the proceedings in the English parliament, translations of articles from the Times, accounts of the late war in Italy, comments on home and foreign affairs, &c."

Mrs. Beecher Stowe, the author of "Uncle Tom's Cabin," is now in England, engaged upon her new tale, a portion of which has already appeared under the title of "The Minister's Wooing." This title will be retained for the complete work, which may be expected about the first of October, and the serial publication will be continued as heretofore until completed.

The London correspondent of the Manchester Guardian states that nine thousand copies of the Laureate's "Idylls of the King" have been already sold. The same gentleman points to the fact that Mr. Tennyson received £100 for his poem in the third number of Once a Week, as an instance of the patronage now lavished upon poetry. Is it not rather a striking proof of the extent to which publishers will go in paying for advertisement? It was not so much the merit of the poetry that caused the £100 to be paid, as the value of the name for the placard and the advertising column.

A weekly paper, entitled the Aldershot Military Gazette, is now published at the camp.

The Copyright Library of the United States has undergone a recent and very great improvement. For the last sixty or seventy years there has been slowly accumulating, in the north-west corner of the old state department building in Washington, a library of copyrighted books, pamphlets, maps, charts, engravings, and music. By the last mail we learn that the entire library, and the records of the copyrights, have been removed to the new department of the interior, and have been placed by the secretary under the charge of the Commissioner of Patents. The library has not hitherto been well cared for; and it is known that many of the better sort of works are missing, though the certificates of copyrights show that they had been received. The number of volumes transferred is about 17,000, not including about 2,000 pamphlets, and a large collection of maps, charts, engravings, and music. In the law establishing the Smithsonian Institution, there was a clause requiring authors or publishers to send three copies of each work to Washington; one to the State Department, one to the Congress Library, and the third to the Smithsonian Institution. The officials of the last-named two libraries soon became disgusted with the "trash" they received, or the work it entailed, and set about getting rid of both. It is now decided by the higher powers that that clause of the Smithsonian law is not binding, and that copyrights are safe if only one copy of each work be sent to the right place, and be properly recorded. Moreover, the trade and authors are notified that they need not pester the officials any more in those two other libraries by sending them their productions.

Messrs. J. W. Parker and Son have in the press a History of the Hungarian War, by Otto Wenkster, who has had many opportunities of forming a just estimate of the war, and of the actors in it.

Several new books from our leading authors, especially in fiction, are announced in Boston, U.S., for which we hear, on reference to the authors, there is no authority, and they hear of the promised books for the first time: but for this we should hail with pleasure the announcement in the papers by this mail of "a new novel by Mrs. Gaskell."

Mr. Thackeray's new monthly is now spoken of as a certainty, to commence with the new year—we believe the engagement provides for a new tale from the editor, and that a very attractive list of contents may be expected. Mr. Hughes, the author of that pleasant book,

"Tom Brown's School Days," is also quoted as the editor of a new monthly, to be published by Messrs. Macmillan and Co.

We ought not (says the Athenæum) to allow the death of Sir George Staunton to pass without a word of record in a literary journal. Sir George had many claims on public notice, hereditary, political, and diplomatic; but we must not forget that he was one of our very few Chinese scholars. He translated the China code. Among other fruits of his residence in China were occasional contributions, on that country, made to the columns of the Athenæum. A very interesting memoir of Morrison, the great Chinese scholar, was from his pen.

The results of the middle-class examinations held by the University of Oxford, have been published; but these only specify the lists of the successful candidates, the places at which they were examined, and their classifications. It is a curious comment upon the merits of the debate as to making religious examinations compulsory, that in some of the classes not one half of the candidates have that asterisk prefixed to their names which signifies that they have satisfied the examiners in the rudiments of faith and religion.

A proposal, made by the Town Council of Southampton, to expend £10,000 of the Hartley bequest in erecting a public reading-room and museum, has met the approval of the Vice-Chancellor. We hope to see the necessary works immediately commenced.

The Duke of Devonshire has just issued, under the superintendence of Mr. John Payne Collier, a fac-simile of the 1604 edition of Shakespeare's "Hamlet." This is the edition published while Shakespeare was alive, which professes to be, not incorrectly, "newly imprinted and enlarged to almost as much againe as it was according to the true and perfect copie."

Edouard Fournier's book, "Le Vieux Neuf," is having great success in Paris. It is well and skilfully done. He proves that there is no invention in the world—nothing new under the sun; that we only "invent" what has been a long time in use under another form, and what our ancestors had already stolen from theirs. He says, moreover, that the English are remarkable for never inventing anything—they are totally devoid of the power of invention—that every contrivance to which they lay claim has been cribbed at one time or another from the French, who, with a few exceptions, have invented everything. Here it is evident the author belies his own assertion, and proves that there really is something new under the sun, for if this be not "a pure invention," what is?

A contemporary says:—"The original book of the four Evangelists, upon which all our kings, from Henry I. to Edward VI., took the coronation oath, is now in the library of a maiden lady, in Eaton-square. It is in manuscript, and written on vellum, the form and beauty of the letters nearly approaching to Roman capitals. It appears to have been written and prepared for the coronation of the first-named monarch. The original binding, which is still in a perfect state, consists of two oaken boards, nearly an inch thick, fastened together with stout thongs of leather, and the corners defended by large bosses of brass. On the right side (as the book is opened) of the outer cover is a crucifix of brass, double gilt, which was kissed by the kings upon their inauguration; and the whole is fastened together by a strong clasp of brass, fixed to a broad piece of leather, nailed on with two large brass pins. Surely this national curiosity ought to be deposited in the British Museum."

The editor of the Literary Gazette denies that it is about to be merged in The Critic.

Dr. Cumming has now in Mr. Bentley's press a volume bearing the significant title of "The Great Tribulation coming upon Earth." Surely one would have thought that by this time the Doctor ought to be convinced that the gift of prophecy is not in him.

Victor Emmanuel has appointed the illustrious poet, Alessandro Manzoni, to the presidency of the Institute of Milan. To this office there will be a salary attached of about £500 a-year.

THE MASONIC MIRROR.

MASONIC MEMS.

THE Prov. Grand Lodge of Sussex is to be held at Hastings, on Friday, the 2nd of September. We find on the agenda paper the following notice of motion:—"The Lodge is to be held in the new Music Hall, and not at either of the hotels. The brethren will afterwards dine at the Swan Hotel.

It affords us much pleasure to hear that the Howard Lodge of Brotherly Love, Arundel, No. 64, has been resuscitated, as we suggested in our "Masonic Missions" it should be. We congratulate those energetic brethren in Sussex who have accomplished this good work.

BRO. LORD METHUEN, the R.W. Prov. G.M. for Wiltshire, has consented to preside at the next anniversary festival of the Girls' School, in May next.

METROPOLITAN.

THE GRAND LODGE.

THE report of the Board of General Purposes, to be brought before the next Grand Lodge, states that Bro. Howard, of No. 878, has been suspended from his Masonic functions, for neglecting to attend to the summons of the Board. The Board recommends the grant of £275 for the decoration of the Great Hall; and £70 for putting into "efficient repair" the organs of the Great Hall and Temple. The following Lodges having complied with the laws by making the necessary returns and payments, have been removed from the list of Lodges for erasure:—

Howard Lodge of Brotherly Love, No. 64, Arundel.

Derbyshire, No. 143, Longnor, Staffordshire.

St. David's, No. 474, Milford.

Combermere, No. 880, Liscard, Cheshire.

Peveril of the Peak, No. 940, New Mills, near Glossop.

The balance in the hands of the Grand Treasurer on account of the Fund of Benevolence, is £689 10s. 9d.; and on account of the General Purposes Fund, £958 2s. 4d.; and on account of moneys received not yet appropriated by the parties remitting, £723 19s. 3d.; making a total of £2,366 12s. 4d.

There were no notices of motion.

BOARD OF BENEVOLENCE.

At the Board of Benevolence on Wednesday last, £90 10s. were voted amongst seven petitioners; and in one case £30 recommended to Grand Lodge.

ROYAL FREEMASONS GIRLS SCHOOL.

A quarterly court was held on Thursday last, Bro. John Udall in the chair, when the minutes of the various committees were confirmed; the only point of interest being an announcement that Bros. Lyall and Symonds, who had been appointed a committee for the purpose, had selected a library for the use of the teachers and pupils, which was approved by the general committee, and a vote of thanks given to Bros. Symonds and Lyall for their exertions.

After some conversation the balloting list for the next election was approved, there being nine candidates, of whom six are to be elected. Of these candidates six come from the country and three from London.

At the next general meeting, in October, a resolution will be brought forward for increasing the number of children in the school from seventy to eighty; but the alteration cannot take effect until the following general meeting in April, 1860.

A vote of thanks to Bro. Udall closed the proceedings.

HAMPSHIRE.

SOUTHAMPTON.—Lodge of Peace and Harmony (No. 462).—This Lodge met at Freemasons' Hall, on Wednesday, August 17th, when a candidate was initiated into the Craft by Bro. A. Fletcher, W.M. Bro. Webb, P.M., delivered the charge very impressively; Bros. Mason and Baker were passed to the degree of Fellow Craft. Bro. G. W. Clarke, (Sec.), reported that the W.M., Wardens, and several other members of the Lodge attended the Prov. Grand Lodge, held on the 19th ult., on which occasion the W.M. had carried out the wishes of the brethren in the presentation of Bro. Stebbing's portrait, which now adorned the hall. A brother from the Poet Byron Lodge (U.S.) was examined and admitted. A letter from the Grand Secretary, relating to the irregularities at Smyrna was read; and after some cases for benevolence had been dealt with, the Lodge was closed in harmony. After the dinner the usual toasts were given; the W.M. took occasion to congratulate the brethren upon their Secretary, Bro. G. W. Clarke, having been appointed to be Prov. Grand Secretary. Bro. H. Clarke, J.W., returned thanks for the special mark of kind feeling which the W.M. had shown towards the officers of the Lodge on that and former occasions, and assured him that he might rely upon their fullest assistance at all times.

WILTSHIRE.

PROVINCIAL GRAND LODGE.

THE Prov. Grand Lodge of Wiltshire was held in the new Music Hall, Chippenham, on Tuesday last, August 23rd, under the presidency of the Right Hon. Lord Methuen, R.W. Prov. G.M., who was supported by Bro. D. Gooch, Prov. G.S.B., and D. Prov. G.M.; Bro. Weaver, Prov. S.G.W.; S. Dunning, Prov. J.G.W.; Furman, Prov. G. Reg.; W. F. Gooch, Prov. G. Sec.; F. Webber, Prov. S.G.D.; C. W. Hind, Prov. J.G.D.; C. F. Marshall, Prov. G. Supt. of Works; W. Biggs, Prov. G. Dir. of Cers.; J. Allan, Asst. Prov. G. Dir. of Cers.; Sylvester, Prov. G.S.B.; Bradford, Prov. G. Pura.; Roberts, P. Prov. G.W.; the Hon. Jas. H. L. Dutton, Prov. G.M., Gloucestershire; Milsom, Prov. J.G.W., Somersetshire; Dr. Tunstall, P. Prov. G.W., Somersetshire; Oliver, P. Prov. G.W., Somersetshire; Henry Bridge, P. Prov. G.W., Surrey, and a number of other Past Grand Officers of this and other provinces.

The Lodge having been duly opened by the D. Prov. Grand Master, the R.W. Bro. Lord Methuen, Prov. G.M., was announced and received with the usual honours.

The minutes of the last Prov. Grand Lodge having been read and confirmed.

The R.W. Prov. Grand Master rose and said that it gave him great pleasure to be enabled to congratulate them, not only on the prosperity of the Craft in general, but upon the province of Wiltshire in particular. He was not, however, from circumstances over which he had had no control, so well versed in their affairs as he should wish to be, and he would therefore call upon their excellent Prov. G. Secretary to read the report of the charity committee appointed at the last meeting.

Bro. W. F. Gooch then read a report, which stated that a meeting of the Charities Committee was held at Chippenham, on the 25th of January, when it was resolved—

1. That the committee for the permanent management of the Charity Fund shall consist of the R.W. Prov. Grand Master, the R.W.D. Prov. Grand Master, the Prov. Grand Wardens, together with the Worshipful Master and immediate Past Master of each Lodge.

2. That the committee shall meet on a Wednesday in the month of July in each year, at Chippenham, for the purpose of auditing the accounts, distributing the money, and preparing the report to be submitted to the Provincial Grand Lodge.

3. That the Prov. Grand Secretary be requested to act as Secretary to the committee, and that he shall give seven days' notice of the meeting.

4. That the following scale of payment towards the Charity Fund be made by each Lodge and Chapter:—

For each member, two shillings per annum.

The W. Master, on his being installed into a chair in the province, ten shillings and sixpence per annum.

The Senior Warden, on his being installed into a chair in the province, five shillings per annum.

The Junior Warden, on his being installed into a chair in the province, five shillings per annum.

Each chair in the Chapter, five shillings per annum.

Each other Officer, two shillings and sixpence per annum.

Each candidate on his initiation, five shillings.

The above payments to be made at the end of each year to the Provincial Grand Treasurer at the same time as the dues to the Provincial Grand Lodge are paid. The Treasurer to open a separate account for the Charity Fund.

5. That for the year 1858, the dues for members only be paid from the first of January, 1859.

The Provincial Grand Lodge voted at their last meeting £20 per annum towards this fund.

6. That it be a rule for the guidance of the committee, that they shall arrange the gifts to the charities, so that the various Lodges in the province may be made life governors thereof, and that the Lodges be taken in the order of their amount of subscription.

7. That a copy of these resolutions be sent to each of the Lodges and Chapters in the province, with a request that they will embody them in their respective by-laws.

In reply to these resolutions, three of the Lodges out of the seven existing in the province had made returns, which, with the £20 voted from the Provincial Grand Lodge funds, placed £32 12s. 6d. at their disposal. The three Lodges which had made a return were—No. 453, Swindon; No. 420, Chippenham; and No. 915, Trowbridge. As it had been agreed that the fund should be distributed in proportion to the subscriptions of the Lodges, it had been arranged by the Committee that No. 453 should be made a life governor of the Boys and Girls' School; and No. 420 of the Royal Benevolent Institution.

The D. Prov. Grand Master had great pleasure in moving that the minutes and recommendations of the Charities Committee be adopted. He was aware that some parties were of opinion that that committee had no power to act until the minutes of the last Prov. Grand Lodge had been confirmed. These minutes had been confirmed to-day, and they had now only to carry the resolution he proposed, to set at rest all objections and give such an authority to their future proceedings as must ensure the prosperity of the fund. There was one alteration, however, which he wished to make in the report. It proposed that the committee should meet in July, for the purpose of determining the award of the year. He felt that to be a most awkward time, and would submit that the minutes and report be adopted, substituting "one hour before the Prov. Grand Lodge" for "a day in July."

Bro. Wheeler, acting Prov. S.G.W., seconded the motion.

Bro. Oliver, P. Prov. G.W., Somersetshire, suggested that as the Lodge of Rectitude was already a life governor of the Royal Benevolent Institution, it would be better to give that Lodge a governorship of one of the schools, instead of another governorship of the same institution.

The report was then adopted, leaving the exact distribution, as we understood, to the committee.

The report of the Clothing Committee was next brought up, and dress aprons for the various Prov. Grand Officers ordered to be purchased at an expense of £25, out of the available funds in hand of £81.

The various Lodges of the province being called, and it appearing that all were represented excepting No. 856, Elias de Derham, Salisbury—that lodge was under the by-laws ordered to be fined 40s.

The R.W. Prov. Grand Master said that they had now to perform a most pleasing duty, that of the election of Grand Treasurer; and though perhaps it should scarcely come from him, he felt they were under such deep obligations to their worthy Bro. Sheppard, that he felt the greatest pleasure in moving his re-election.

The D. Prov. Grand Master felt it an honour to be allowed to second the resolution, having long experienced the value of the services of their distinguished brother.

The motion having been carried nem. con.,

Bro. Sheppard returned thanks. He had the honour of holding the office for upwards of thirty years, and so long as he enjoyed the confidence of the brethren, he would always discharge his duties to the utmost of his ability.

The R.W. Prov. Grand Master then proceeded to appoint and invest his officers for the ensuing year as follows:—Bros. D. Gooch, D. Prov. G.M.; Major Goddard, Prov. S.G.W.; Collings, (Past Master, No. 7.), Prov. J.G.W.; Sheppard, Prov. G. Treas.; W. F. Gooch, Prov. G. Sec.; Biggs, Prov. G. Reg.; Commons, Prov. S.G.D.; Stancombe, Prov. J.G.D.; Marshall, Prov. G. Supt. of Works; Bradford, Prov. G. Dir. of Cers.; Trig, Prov. G.S.B.; Spencer, Prov. G. Pura.; and Bros. Chandler, J.E.S. Bradford, T. Chandler, Tyler, and Burrows, Prov. G. Stewards.

Bro. G. H. Brown had abstained from doing so prior to the appointment of the Grand Officers, not wishing in any way to interfere with the prerogative of the Prov. Grand Master—but as the appointments were now made, he wished to call attention to a provision in the Book of Constitutions to which he believed too little attention had hitherto been paid. At page 49 it was said that Prov. Grand Officers "must all be resident within the province, and subscribing members to some Lodge therein, but the M.W. Grand Master may grant a dispensation for non-residence. A fee of two guineas for Grand Wardens, and one guinea for any subordinate officer shall be paid to the general fund of charity for such dispensation." Now, under this law it was clear that no brother could be appointed to Prov. Grand office without he resided in the province, unless he had a dispensation from the M.W. Grand Master. He did not wish to interfere with anything that had been done, but considering that bygones should be bygones, that they should more steadily adhere to the law in future.

The D. Prov. Grand Master was of opinion that the law just read was overruled by that which stated that the Prov. Grand Master was by his patent "invested with a rank and power in his particular district, similar to those possessed by the Grand Master;" and in appointing the brethren the Prov. Grand Master might be thereby supposed to have given them the necessary dispensation to hold their respective offices.

A brother thought the complaint came with an ill grace from a brother who had taken rank in a neighbouring province, of which he was a non-resident.

The R.W. Prov. Grand Master had no doubt that by his appointment he had given the necessary dispensation to hold office, it being the duty of the Secretary or Treasurer to see that they received the proper fees; and he could not think that the fact of a brother who supported their Lodges, living two or three miles beyond the borders of the province, should deprive him of those honours to which he was otherwise justly entitled.

Bro. Brown having explained that he had no other object in view but to call attention to the law.

Bro. Collings, Prov. J.G.W., said but for the observations of the R.W. Prov. Grand Master, he should not have felt comfortable in continuing to hold the distinguished office to which he had been appointed, if any doubt were thrown upon his qualification. He should, however, consider it very hard to be disqualified from holding Prov. Grand Office because he lived a few miles out of the province; he belonging to no other Prov. Grand Lodge but that at Chippenham. (Hear, hear).

The question then dropped, with the understanding that those brethren who had been appointed to office not resident in the province, should pay the extra fees; and the Grand Lodge was closed in due form.

Shortly after four o'clock the brethren reassembled at the Angel Hotel, where a most excellent dinner had been provided; the R.W. Prov. G.M. Lord Methuen presiding.

On the cloth being removed, the toasts of "The Queen;" "The M.W.G.M. the Right Hon. the Earl of Zetland;" and "The D.G.M., Lord Panmure, and the rest of the Grand Officers," were given in rapid succession.

The D. Prov. Grand Master said he rose to propose to them a toast, which he was sure would be received with the greatest enthusiasm—"The health of their R.W. Prov. Grand Master." (Applause.) He knew how deeply they regretted that owing to his public duties he had not been with them for the last two or three occasions, and how rejoiced they were to again have the benefit of his presence. There was no brother more highly respected, and he was sure they would all cordially join in drinking to his good health, hoping he might long preside over them.

The R.W. Prov. Grand Master had feared that his lengthened absence from amongst them might have made them feel that he took but little interest in the Craft;—(No, no)—but the kindness of his reception that day had assured him that the brethren still entertained the kindest feelings with regard to him. (Cheers.) It was true that he had been away from them, whilst in the discharge of his duties to his country, for two or three years, but he could assure them that he was not absent from their Masonic meetings either willingly or wilfully. He was aware that his place had been well filled by his excellent Deputy, without whose assistance he hardly knew how he should have got through the duties of the day. However, he was once again amongst them, and thanking them for their kindness, he could assure them that nothing would give him greater pleasure than to do all in his power to promote the prosperity of the Craft and the fame of Wiltshire. (Cheers.) He felt that a great compliment was always paid to them by the presence of visitors, especially from neighbouring Provincial Grand Masters. He thought if the chiefs of the Order in the various provinces oftener met together it would do much to promote the prosperity of the Craft, and increase that good feeling which should always exist amongst them. He begged to propose "The health of Bro. the Hon. James Dutton, Prov. G.M. for Gloucestershire," coupled with that of the W.M. of the Cotswold Lodge, by whom he was accompanied.

Bro. the Hon. James Dutton said he had to return his heartfelt thanks for the manner in which his health had been proposed, and the great pleasure he had derived from this visit. He was sure that he was not alone in feeling great gratification at the events of the day as he saw around him many brethren from Bath, Bristol, and other surrounding districts; and he could assure them that he should be much honoured if he had again the opportunity of accepting their hospitality at a future Grand Lodge, of which he should readily avail himself. (Applause.)

The R.W. Prov. Grand Master said that he owed so much to his worthy Deputy for the manner in which he had presided over the province in his absence—and he believed the brethren owed so much to him—that it was difficult sufficiently to thank him for his valuable services, and the manner in which he had conducted their affairs. He felt perfectly confident that they would cordially join him in drinking his good health, with many thanks to him for the manner in which he had discharged the duties of his office.

The D. Prov. Grand Master could assure them that no words of his could sufficiently express the feeling with which he rose to acknowledge the toast so kindly proposed by the Prov. Grand Master and responded to by them. He could assure them that no one could have exerted himself more or felt greater anxiety for the success of Freemasonry in the province, and he was happy to say that not only had their Lodge increased in number, but their members had increased in influence and respectability. Of the large number of new members who had come amongst them of late years he had personally initiated very many, and amongst them there was not one whom he regretted having introduced into the Order; and he believed that throughout the province they had reason to be proud of the brethren with whom they were connected. (Cheers.)

The R.W. Prov. Grand Master then gave "The health of their neighbours," coupled with the names of Bro. Colonel Tynte, Prov. G.M. for Somersetshire, one of the oldest and best of Masons, and Bro. Dr. Tunstall.

Bro. Milson, Prov. J.G.W. for Somersetshire, returned thanks on behalf of Col. Tynte and the other brethren of Somersetshire, assuring the R.W. Prov. Grand Master it gave him and others the greatest pleasure to have the opportunity of being present that day.

Bro. Dr. Tunstall also acknowledged the compliment. He had been highly gratified at witnessing the good feeling which had prevailed throughout the day so characteristic of their Craft, and he wished the utmost prosperity to their province.

The R.W. Prov. Grand Master had now to ask them to drink to the health of their most excellent Prov. Grand Treasurer. He need not tell them how well he looked after their funds, but he considered it most wonderful to see him in such excellent health, and indeed he believed that ever since he had had the pleasure of that worthy brother's acquaintance he had been getting younger and younger every year.

Bro. Sheppard having had the honour to hold the office of Prov. Grand Treasurer for a period of thirty two years, felt deeply the mark of confidence they had honoured him with in re-electing him that day. He was gratified in finding that their province was so prosperous that after paying thirty guineas to the charities he should have £61 in hand, and it would be always his pride to discharge the duties of his office to the best of his ability, and endeavour to promote the interests of the Craft.

The Prov. Grand Master said they must not forget that they were on a visit to Lodge No. 420, and that they owed to the brethren their best thanks for the handsome manner in which they had been received. The Worshipful Master of that Lodge, to whom he had had the pleasure of giving Grand office, was one of those who resided a little out of the province; and though of course he, as Prov. Grand Master, could not infringe the law nor do anything which might bring down upon him the censure of his superior officer, yet, as they were speaking in confidence (laughter) he might say that he thought instead of fining brethren for living a little distance out of the province they ought to thank them for taking office, and in common justice pay them for coming amongst them. (Laughter.)

Bro. Commons, Prov. S.G.D., as Master of the Lodge of Rectitude, had the honour to return thanks for the last toast. He was highly gratified, as must be every Mason, at seeing their noble Prov. Grand Master again amongst them. He was also pleased to find that as regarded their charity fund, the Lodge of Rectitude was second on the list in the amount of the returns, and they might depend upon it that next year they would strive to make it the first. He could assure the Grand Master that their Lodge would always be found in the foremost rank in his support, and if necessary they would follow his fortunes as a soldier if again called abroad to serve his queen and his country (Applause).

The Prov. Grand Master said he should now ask them to drink to the health of one who was not a Mason, but one whose name would always be received with the utmost kindness and cordiality in Wiltshire. They had living amongst them one of the links of a long line of statesmen—the last of his race—the Marquis of Lansdowne, and it would ill become them to forget him at any of their gatherings; he gave the health of the noble marquis. (Cheers.)

The Prov. Grand Master said that he would now give them a toast, which in fact might be looked upon as part of that just responded to. It was the health of a brother whom he had known from his earliest childhood, and who had ever held the character of an upright and honest man, Bro. Spencer. (Applause.)

Bro. Spencer, steward to the Marquis of Lansdowne, stated that he was totally unable to express his feelings at so unexpected a compliment. The R.W. Grand Master had most kindly proposed the health of a noble marquis, whom it had been his (Bro. Spencer's) good fortune to serve for upwards of twenty-five years, and whom he could truly say set a bright example as an English nobleman of all those qualities which could distinguish and elevate man. In thanking them for the manner in which they had drunk his own health, he felt he could not do so on behalf of the noble marquis in the manner he could wish, but he was sure that the noble lord would feel highly gratified when he told him—as he should take an early opportunity of doing—how cordially his name had been that day received by so respectable a body of Wiltshire gentlemen. He was highly gratified at seeing their noble Prov. Grand Master in the chair that day, it being the first opportunity he had had of meeting him in Masonry, and at hearing him express his intention henceforth to live amongst them, and devote himself to the interests of Wiltshire, of which he was so bright an ornament. (Cheers.)

The Prov. Grand Master then gave the health of the Prov. Grand Officers. He had the pleasure of knowing Major Goddard for some years, and he now informed him that though he had no doubt that all the officers would well perform their duties, should there be any breach of discipline he should hold him responsible for it. (Laughter.)

Bro. Major Goddard, Prov. S.G.W., on behalf of the Prov. Grand Officers and himself, returned thanks for the high honour conferred upon them that day, hoping and trusting that by this time next year they would receive the approbation of the R.W. Grand Master, for the manner in which they had discharged their duties. (Cheers.)

The R.W. Prov. Grand Master would ask them to drink but one more toast—the health of those members of Grand Lodge who had done them the honour to visit them that day, from London. Bro. Crew, who was well known to them as the Secretary of that most excellent charity, the Girls School, and Bro. Warren—being sure they were always happy to meet these brethren.

Bro. Crew had no pretensions to speak on behalf of the Grand Lodge of which he was only a humble member, but he the no less appreciated the compliment which had just been paid to himself and Bro. Warren by the R.W. Prov. Grand Master. He must allow him to express his gratification at seeing the efforts made to increase the funds of the noble charitable institutions connected with their Order, and if he advocated more fervently the cause of the Girls School than he did that of the Boys, or the Royal Benevolent Institution, it was not because he underrated the value of those institutions, but because, owing to his official connection with the Girls School, he was naturally led to take a greater interest in its prosperity. Already had 700 children passed through that school with great credit to themselves, and so as to reflect honour on the institution and the Craft; and it gave him great pleasure to announce that the R.W. Prov. Grand Master had kindly consented to take the chair at their next anniversary festival, when he should have the honour of presenting to his lordship seventy, and perhaps eighty, young girls so cared for that any brother present might be proud to acknowledge them as his own daughters; and who could say that there was no brother present whose children might not some day become the inmates of that school, where he was sure they would receive such an education as would fit them for any position in society?

Bro. H. G. Warren being loudly called upon also briefly thanked the R.W. Prov. Grand Master and the brethren for the compliment paid him, and the company separated at an early hour—many of them returning to their respective homes by train.

WORCESTERSHIRE.

DUDLEY.—Vernon Lodge (No. 819).—The election of W.M., Treasurer, and Tyler, for this Lodge, took place on Wednesday, the 17th inst., at the Old Town Hall. Lodge was opened at seven o'clock precisely by Bro. G. H. Deeley, P.M. (P. Prov. G. Supt. of Works), in the absence of the W.M., Bro. E. Hollier. On the motion of Bro. W. Wigginton, J.W. (Prov. G.S.B.), Bro. Z. B. Smith, S.W., was unanimously elected as W.M.; Bro. George Burn Lowe was unanimously re-elected as Treas.; and Bro. J. Jeffs as Tyler. The letter from the Lodge La Césaire (Jersey), asking for aid towards their new temple, having been taken into consideration, Bro. Wigginton proposed that the sum of £3. 8s. be forwarded to the W.M. of that Lodge, with hearty wishes for their success. On the suggestion of the Lodge, however, the sum was altered to one guinea, and the resolution unanimously passed. Bro. Fitzgerald (visitor) P.M., No. 523 (Kidderminster), and Prov. G. Org., announced to the brethren that the Prov. Grand Lodge for Worcestershire was arranged to be holden in the Music Hall at Kidderminster, on the 20th of September, at twelve o'clock noon; that a procession would take place to the fine old parish church, when full cathedral service would be performed; and that the banquet would be held in the Music Hall. He hoped the Dudley brethren would muster strongly upon the occasion. The J.W. suggested that notice of the Prov. Grand Meeting should be inserted in the next Lodge circular, that all the members of No. 819 might be apprised of the same. The installation for No. 819 unfortunately takes place on the 21st, the day after that fixed for the Prov. Grand Lodge.

ROYAL ARCH.

PROVINCIAL CHAPTER.

DUDLEY.—Royal Standard Chapter (No. 730).—The installation of Comp. Wm. Howells as M.E.Z., took place on Tuesday, the 16th inst., at the Dudley Arms Hotel, Dudley. Strange to say, none of the other Companions selected for office were present, being absent at the seaside, &c. consequently none were invested. Bro. Howells excels in the Royal Arch workings, as he always has done in the Craft degrees, and deserves the support of all his Companions.

SCOTLAND.

LAYING THE FOUNDATION STONE OF THE CORN EXCHANGE AT PEEBLES.

[Communicated by Bro. Elisha D. Cooke.]

THE Duke of Athole and the Grand Lodge left Edinburgh last Friday afternoon, at 12.30, arriving at Peebles about two o'clock. A slight rain accompanied us all the way from Edinburgh to this place, creating some fears that the pleasures of the day would be in some degree marred, but fortunately the showers ceased immediately after the train stopped at the station. We should have had a large crowd in the train, but the greater number of the Masons from Edinburgh availed themselves of an earlier train in the morning, arriving at Peebles in time to form in procession with the brethren there, and were in waiting to receive the Grand Lodge at the station.

The brethren were formed in line on the platform, and received the M.W.G.M. and the Grand Lodge with three hearty cheers. The number of spectators, exclusive of the Masons, assembled at the terminus, was very great; indeed, a stranger would have thought they comprised the whole population of this district of the country. The procession was arranged according to the following official programme, which was strictly carried out:—

The members of the Peebles Lodge assembled at the house of the R.W.M. at one o'clock to escort him to the Lodge, which was then opened; the brethren afterwards proceeded to the quadrangle of the Chambers Institution, leaving the Lodge at two o'clock, when the deputation was received and the procession formed.

The R.W.M. and Wardens of Peebles Lodge, and Masters and Wardens of the Lodges in the province marched to the Tontine Hotel at half-past one o'clock in order to accompany the Provincial Grand Master, provost, and magistrates to the railway station to receive his grace the Duke of Athole and the Grand Lodge.

The procession then moved off at half-past two o'clock, and on reaching the Town Hall halted to admit the magistrates and council and other gentlemen.

Grand Lodge was opened in the Tontine Hotel, and on the procession reaching the front of that building it opened to admit the Grand Lodge in rear of the Lodges.

Order of procession:—Grand Marshal; music; Burgh Officers, with halberds; Provost, Magistrates, and Town Council; Bro. Lessel, carrying plans of the Corn Exchange, supported by gentlemen of the town and neighbourhood, including members of the Farmers' Club; Lodges present and their brethren.

The procession proceeded along the High-street, Old Town, Elcho-street, Railway-bridge, Northgate, to the site of the stone at the Town Hall.

On reaching such spots as the leading Marshal pointed out, the brethren halted and opened to admit the M.W.G.M. and the Masters and Wardens of all the Lodges present in usual order.

After the foundation had been laid with Masonic honours, the procession returned in inverted order to Tontine Hotel. The above arrangements, as I before observed, were scrupulously followed, the procession being a large and imposing one for the size of the place. It was composed of deputations from the following Lodges, viz.:—Lodge of Edinburgh, Mary's Chapel, No. 1; Cannongate Kilwinning,

No. 2; Canongate and Leith, Leith and Canongate, No. 5; Journeymen Edinburgh, No. 8; Dalkeith Kilwinning, No. 10; Peebles Kilwinning, No. 24; St. Andrew's, Edinburgh, No. 48; St. James's Operative, Edinburgh, No. 97; St. John's, Jedburgh; St. Stephen's, Edinburgh, No. 145; Edinburgh Defensive Band, No. 151; Roman Eagle, No. 160; Free Operatives, Biggar, No. 167; St. John, Galway; Stow, No. 216; Celtic, Edinburgh, and Leith, No. 291; St. Clair, Edinburgh, No. 349; Caledonian, Edinburgh; Trafalgar, Leith; Kilmarnock Kilwinning Lodge; St. David's, Edinburgh, No. 36.

There were supposed to be nearly four hundred brethren in the procession, who with their numerous banners made a very fine show, and everything was conducted with order and decorum.

The following ingenious document was posted up at two or three of the most conspicuous places:—"Freemasonry versus Christianity! 'Have no fellowship with unfruitful works of darkness, but rather reprove them; for it is a shame even to speak of those things which are done of them in secret.' Ephes. v. 11, 12." This blow, it would seem, was aimed at the secrecy of our glorious Order; yet the generous author of this praiseworthy production conceals his name, thus performing the very act he himself condemns: but thus it is—persons without charity measure other people's grain by their own measure.

The procession having arrived at the site of the intended building, the ceremony was performed with the usual formalities. Spacious wooden galleries had been erected near the spot, which were filled principally by ladies, who seemed to take the liveliest interest in what was going on.

The Duke of Athole was supported by the following brethren:—J. Whyte Melville, R.W.D.G.M.; W. Forbes Mackenzie, Prov. G.M., as substitute G.M.; Henry Inglis, as substitute S.G.W.; Dr. F. D. McCowan, S.G.D., as J.G.W.; Rev. Alex. John Murray, of Eddleston, as G. Chaplain; W. A. Laurie, G. Sec.; Alex. J. Stewart, G. Clerk; Samuel Hay, Esq., G. Treasurer; John Deach, G. Bible Bearer; and Wolfe Murray, G. Sword Bearer.

The remainder of the names I could not get, as the regular officers were not present. Thirteen of the members of the Peebles Kilwinning Lodge were selected as bearers of the working tools, corn, wine, oil, &c. The members of the Grand Lodge numbered about thirty.

Immediately after the ceremony was over, we returned to the Tontine Hotel, where the Grand Lodge was closed, after which we went to the banquet prepared in the great hall of the Chambers Institution, which the citizens of Peebles may well be proud of, for few county towns can boast of such a room. There are seven large windows on one side, and six on the other. Between these windows were displayed the national flags of all countries, as if to remind one of the universality of Masonry. The table prepared for the accommodation of the Grand Lodge was on the dais, and extended across the room. There were also three tables extending the full length of the room; the extreme ends from the dais being occupied by the Grand Marshal and the two Grand Deacons. The tables were all well filled, and every one seemed to enjoy himself.

The dinner was followed by the following toasts:—"Holy Lodge of St. John." "The Queen." "The Prince Consort." "The Prince of Wales, as Lord High Steward of Scotland." "The Navy and the Army," replied to by Sir George Beresford. "The Earl of Zetland and the Grand Lodge of England." "The Duke of Leicester and the Grand Lodge of Ireland." "The Duke of Athole, M.W.G.M.," replied to by his grace. "The Provincial Grand Lodge of Peebles, coupling the name of Bro. W. F. Mackenzie, Prov. Grand Master," who replied to it. "Bro. J. Whyte Melville, R.W.D.G.M.," replied to by himself. "Health of the Provost, Bro. John Sterling." "Edinburgh Lodges;" replied to by Bro. F. D. McCowan. "Kilwinning Lodge of Peebles;" replied to by their R.W.M. Bro. Donaldson. "Free Operatives." "Lodge St. John Gola." "The Marquis of Tullibardine, son of the Duke of Athole," proposed by Bro. Forbes Mackenzie; the marquis replied. "Bro. Chambers, the founder of the Institution," who returned thanks. "The Lord Lieutenant, Earl of Peebles, Past Prov. G.M." "Sir Adam Hay, Vice Lieutenant of Peebles." "Bro. Elisha D. Cooke, coupled with the Grand Lodge of America;" replied to by Bro. Cooke. "The Senior and Junior Grand Wardens;" replied to by Bro. F. D. McCowan. "Prov. G.M. Bro. W. Forbes Mackenzie, as convener of the assembly." "Rev. Bro. A. J. Murray, acting Grand Chaplain." "Grand Bible Bearer, Bro. John Drancher." "The Duchess of Athole." "Bro. Wolfe Murray, Grand Sword Bearer."

The speeches were very appropriate, adding much to the enjoyment of the evening, which was increased by an excellent selection of music.

COLONIAL.

CEYLON.

COLOMBO.—Queen's Own Lodge (No. 58).—This military Lodge, under the Irish Constitution, attached to her Majesty's 50th Regiment, meets on the first Wednesday in each month at Colombo. The construction of most buildings in the tropics is but ill adapted to Masonic purposes; but this Lodge has the good fortune to possess a Lodge room combining comfort and convenience in a remarkable degree; this is the Race bungalow, well known to those who have visited Colombo as the large circular isolated building on the crest of the open ground called Galle Face, outside of the fort of Colombo. On St. John's Day, the 24th of June, the election and appointment of officers pursuant to antient custom, placed Bro. Major Tupper in the chair of W.M., who appointed Bro. the Hon. C. C. Chetwynd, S.W., and Bro. Hansbrow, J.W. The arrangements of an hotel in a warm climate are an exaggeration of the objectionable structure of tropical houses, rendering a Masonic banquet impossible; but the brethren met and dined together at Galle Face House, spending a pleasant evening in harmony, and forgetting neither "The Queen," "The Craft," nor "The health of Bro. Colonel Waddy," on his resigning the chair after a year of most efficient service.

NEW BRUNSWICK.

At a quarterly communication of the Prov. Grand Lodge of New Brunswick, held on Wednesday, the 1st day of March, 1859, Bro. Douglas B. Stevens, P.M. of Lodge No. 780, gave notice that at the next quarterly communication of this Prov. Grand Lodge, he would make the following motion:—"Whereas, from the number of private Lodges in this province, and the great increase of their members, as also from the extent and importance of New Brunswick, it is due to the Craft in this province to be placed on an equality with their brethren of the neighbouring provinces, and therefore it is incumbent on this Prov. Grand Lodge to move in the matter; therefore be it resolved, that a memorial be addressed to the M.W. Grand Master of the fraternity of Antient and Accepted Masons of England, praying that he will be pleased to appoint by patent a resident Prov. Grand Master for this particular district."

This notice of motion was sent to all the Lodges in the province, and on the 1st day of June it was, at a quarterly communication of the Prov. Grand Lodge, brought before the body for consideration; also a notice sent to each Lodge by the Deputy Prov. Grand Master, that a piece of plate "ought to be presented to the retiring Prov. Grand Master, to be kept in his family as a testimonial of his past services, and a mark of respect entertained for him by the brethren over whom he presided; and as Bro. Keith is now ready to resign, for the purpose of elevating our order in New Brunswick, the D. Prov. Grand Master hoped that the several Lodges would extend their liberality towards a good and ancient custom, and thereby enable the committee to be appointed for that purpose, to present the R.W. Prov. Grand Master, Bro. Keith with a gift that would convince him that his services have been appreciated."

The question with regard to a resident Prov. Grand Master was carried in the affirmative. Next was brought up the candidate for that office; the first being Bro. Joel Reading, P. Prov. S.G.W.; next Bro. Alex. Balloch, D. Prov. G.M. On a division, the choice of the brethren fell upon Bro. Balloch by a majority of nine.

[Our private letters show us that anything but a proper feeling exists between the brethren on the subject; the majority having been obtained through the representatives of the country Lodges, whose expenses in attending Grand Lodge are stated to have been paid by Bro. Balloch, who is very unpopular with the Lodges of St. John's; and it is feared, should he be appointed, it will tend to injure English Freemasonry in the colony to the advantage of the Irish and Scotch Lodges. Under these circumstances it is evident the M.W. Grand Master will have a difficult task in making such an appointment as will please all parties. If we might be allowed to make a suggestion, it would be that the M.W. Grand Master should abstain from making any appointment at present, and call upon each Lodge in the province to make him a return within a given time of three names of brethren, either of whom they would think eligible for the office, giving their reasons for recommending, and the position held by each of the brethren so recommended, not only in Freemasonry, but in the social scale of society.—ED.]

INDIA.

NORTH WEST PROVINCES.

LAHORE.—Lodge of Hope and Perseverance.—A dinner was given on St. John's day, the 24th June, on which occasion there was a large gathering, including Bro. Roberts, Financial Commissioner; the Rev. C. Sloggett; Dr. C. M. Smith; Captain McAndrew; and a large number of all services, besides the whole of the members of the Lodge, in all forty-five brethren and strangers. The W.M., Bro. H. Sandeman, who of course presided, rose and proposed the first toast, "the Queen and the Craft," remarking that the health of her Majesty was always heartily given and loyally responded to by every Briton; but that Freemasons delighted to give especial honour to it, inasmuch as she is the daughter of one Mason and the niece of another. Next followed, "the Earl of Zetland, M.W.G.M.," whose able ruling, and great services at the head of the Craft were appropriately alluded to, and acknowledged in a bumper by all the mystic brethren present, joined by the uninitiated. The Worshipful Master next proposed "the health of the Lieutenant-Governor of the Punjab, Sir R. Montgomery." This toast was most enthusiastically received. The Worshipful Master said, "That great and good man's services during the mutiny are yet fresh in our minds. Danger was, from the first, fully appreciated by him, and confronted with dignified courage. To his vigour and wisdom every European in the Punjab was indebted for his life, and all felt the greatest confidence in his administration, should a similar trial ever come again." (Cheers.) The next toast was "the Church," and was ably responded to in a few impressive words by the worthy pastor the Rev. C. Sloggett. The Worshipful Master next proposed "The Army." "Every one could appreciate," he said, "the noble services performed by the Military in India, especially during the late mutinies, and he felt that if occasion required they would do the same again. The fame of their deeds has resounded over the world—in the present European conflict, where Great Britain had so wisely determined to preserve a complete neutrality, should any European power dare to throw down the glove to her, that power would pay severely for its rashness." After the cheering for this toast had subsided, Captain McAndrew briefly acknowledged the toast, and said he felt proud of the service to which he had the honour to belong. It had been acknowledged to have done its duty on Indian soil, and would do the same if ever called upon to act against an European enemy. The Rev. C. Sloggett now rose and said he had been deputed to propose a toast which he felt sure all would pledge cordially, he meant the "Civil Service." None, he remarked, who have seen how nobly its members have borne themselves at all times, but especially during the late troubles, when many had to buckle on the sword and perform military as well as administrative duties, could fail to see that we have great hope for the future. The great services of the military have, he said, just before been alluded to. When we remember how gallantly they bore themselves at Alma and Inkermann, and more lately at Delhi, we may feel sure that the spirit of Englishmen has not deteriorated since the days of Crécy and Agincourt, and that the two services combined will enable us to brave all danger. The present time is one of stirring anxiety, for none can tell what news the next mail may bring; perhaps we may learn that some of the vast forces now on the move in Europe have been turned against our own dear little island. But whatever happens, whatever combinations are formed against us, England will brave them all so long as she has such devoted servants. The reverend gentleman concluded by calling for a bumper to the Civil Service, who, he said, are so devoted to their duties, so renowned for their incorruptibility, and so anxious for the welfare of the people entrusted to their charge. Bro. Roberts, in a neat speech, returned thanks for the civil service, and finished by hoping that its members would always be found true to their duty and their Queen. Next was given the "Medical Service," which was heartily responded to, and acknowledged by Dr. Smith, the deservedly popular and esteemed civil surgeon, who was greeted with long and loud applause. Bro. Roberts now gave "the health of the Worshipful Master, Bro. Hugh Sandeman." None who know that gentleman, he said, can fail to esteem him for the untiring zeal and interest with which he strives for the good of the community, whether in his official capacity as Accountant of the Punjab, or as Master of the Lodge of "Hope and Perseverance." "Bro. Sandeman," he continued, "is about to leave us to fill a higher appointment in Madras. We all must rejoice at his promotion; but the loss will be ours, the gain that of the Madrassees." This toast was drunk with all the honours and enthusiastic cheering. The Worshipful Master modestly acknowledged the toast. "It had been a pleasure," he said, "for him to aid in any work likely to benefit the community, from whom he had always received much consideration and support." He alluded to the difficulties that had to be mastered in the establishment of a Lodge—which, beginning with seven or eight members, now numbers twenty-two, all zealous good Masons. He had great pleasure in announcing to the brethren present that he had just received a warrant empowering him to convene a chapter of Royal Arch Masons (great cheering from the mystic few present); and he hoped that Lodge "Hope and Perseverance" would continue to prosper, as it certainly deserved to do. The Worshipful Bro. concluded by stating he should ever retain a lively remembrance of the kindly feeling evinced to him by all at Lahore. Several toasts were afterwards given, the details of which would occupy too much, they were the "Uncovenanted Civil Service," "the Railway Staff," "the Guests," "the Officers of Lodge Hope and Perseverance," and finally, "To all poor and distressed Masons." Several capital glees and songs were given during the evening; and all seemed much pleased with the entertainment.—[From the Lahore Chronicle.]

ROYAL ARCH.

NEW CHAPTER AT LAHORE.—The Brethren of the local Lodge have succeeded in establishing a Royal Arch Chapter, which was to be consecrated and opened for the first time on the 6th of July. The Principals' chairs will be filled by Comps. Hugh Sandeman, Terence O'Brien and William Ball. We heartily wish the infant Chapter, which is to be designated, the "Chapter of the Punjab," every success.

AMERICA.

ROYAL ARCH.

THE following we extract from the introductory remarks of Comp. Wm. Storer, in his report on correspondence, presented to the Grand Chapter of Connecticut:—

"In almost every jurisdiction from which we have received fraternal greetings, it is evident that Royal Arch Masonry continues to progress by a healthy growth, and that the interest of the institution were never more carefully guarded. It is indeed true, that in reference to the mere machinery of Masonic government, our respected Companions have not all been able to see 'eye to eye,' but so far as any Masonic principle is involved, your committee have scarcely discovered that the least disagreement exists among the various members of our wide spread companionship.

"The position of the General Grand Chapter of the United States—its supposed utility as a governing head of Royal Arch Masonry,—and the necessity and expediency of its continued existence; these are questions on which a diversity of opinions are entertained among the most enlightened members of our Order. But so long as Companions are permitted to express their honest sentiments, and to reason together with calmness and candour on these and other topics of interest to the true craftsman; so long as each is disposed to accord to all others the same right which he claims for himself—that of entertaining and expressing independent opinions; so long as each Companion is willing to believe that sincerity and honesty dwell in the hearts of those who differ with him in sentiment; there can be little danger or harm resulting from these discrepancies."

AMERICAN ITEMS.

A VETERAN.—Oliver Rice, a soldier of the revolution, died in Mayfield, Fulton Co. New York, last month. He was 92 years old. He was employed as an express rider in the revolution, and in that capacity erected commissions for Washington. He belonged to the Freemasons over twenty years, and passed through twenty degrees. He had laid aside $200 to defray the expenses of his burial with Masonic honours, with the request that a Mason should preach his funeral sermon, and his wishes were faithfully complied with.

A PLEASANT CONJUNCTION.—During the sessions of the Grand Lodge of Indiana, in May, a conjunction of five Grand Masters was witnessed, which proved a most pleasing event to the parties interested. By our invitation Grand Masters Wilson, of Canada, and Allen, of Michigan, came down, and with Grand Master Buck, of Illinois—already there—Hayless, of Indiana, and the present writer, Rob Morris, of Kentucky, they made up the cheerful quintette whose music yet rings in our ears. To add to the joyful occasion, we had Grand Secretary Reynolds, of Illinois, and Grand Lecturer Blanchard, of Michigan. It is an interesting thought that in the meeting of these Grand Masters of Illinois, Michigan, Canada, Indiana and Kentucky, considerably more than one-fourth the entire Masonic membership of North America was represented. Setting Illinois at 12,000, Indiana 10,000, Michigan 7,000, Kentucky 12,000, and Canada 5,000, we have an aggregate of 46,000 craftsmen, whose rulers thus in a quiet way met, conversed, laid their plans of usefulness, and parted with a profound impression that it had been one of the happiest occasions of their lives.—Morris's Voice of Masonry.

WISCONSIN.—The Grand Lodge of Free and Accepted Masons of Wisconsin, at their annual meeting in Milwaukee, re-elected all their officers of last year. Gen. Amos Cobb, of Mineral Point, was appointed D. Grand Master. There are now 107 Lodges in the jurisdiction—105 make returns, showing the following result:—Master Masons, 3,325; Fellow Crafts, 180; Entered Apprentices, 313.

CONNECTICUT.—Hiram Lodge, No. 1, of New Haven, has furnished seven Grand Masters of the Grand Lodge of Connecticut.

OHIO.—The number of affiliated Masons in Ohio, is at the present time 15,000.

THE WEEK.

THE COURT.—The stay of the Queen and her family at Osborne is drawing to a close, and their departure for her majesty's Highland residence is spoken of for the end of the present week. On Monday, the Queen and Prince Consort, with Prince Alfred, Princess Helena, and Princess Louisa, left Osborne at half-past ten o'clock for Aldershot camp, where they arrived at half-past one o'clock. At three the Queen drove to the neighbourhood of Caesar's camp, to witness the operations which were carried on there by the division under Lieut-General Knollys. Her majesty and her family remained on the ground till half-past six, and inspected the works carried on, which consisted of the formation of an intrenched camp, made by working parties in succession from the different brigades. The principal officers at the camp had the honour of dining with her majesty in the evening; and on the following morning the Queen again visited the intrenched camp, and remained till near one o'clock inspecting the defences thrown up, and was present during the manoeuvres executed. The royal family left the Pavilion at half-past three o'clock, and returned to Osborne. The Duke of Nemours has arrived at Osborne on a visit to her majesty.

FOREIGN NEWS.—There is little news of importance from the capital of France. The amnesty is much lauded in the government prints, and is looked upon with great suspicion by some of the expatriated Frenchmen for whose benefit it was professedly issued. Among these the most remarkable are Louis Blanc and the world-famed Victor Hugo who have published their reasons for not accepting "Louis Bonaparte's" offer; and their eloquent letters have been reprinted from the English into the continental journals, all of which in consequence have been stopped in Paris. The Emperor and his wife (who is said to be again pregnant) are at St. Sauveur, seeking repose of which the former is said to stand greatly in need. In Paris the appointment of Marshal MacMahon to command at Lille, on the Belgian frontier, coupled with the concentration of an army of 60,000 men there, is considered as an answer to the vote of the Belgian Chambers for the fortification of Antwerp. The new decrees on the press must be considered rather as a promise than a boon. The law is not altered, but its retrospective operation merely temporarily suspended. It is evident that the old repressive spirit survives, for there have again been razzias made upon English papers. Paris correspondents, alluding to the fact that France appears to be disarming, caution us against this movement as deceptive, and point to the significant circumstance that it was with an army on the peace establishment that France gained all her great battles in Italy. The Moniteur, in announcing the various nominations of the chief military commands, states that the augmentation in the number of these commands is in order to form a more equal division of the military forces of the empire. The rumour that the Grand Duke of Tuscany had left Paris is unfounded. He will remain here for some time yet. On Monday he was the guest of the Count Walewski at dinner.—A telegram from Vienna gives a decree for the reorganization of the Austrian cabinet, according to which Count Rechberg, foreign minister at present, is to continue to hold that post, as well as that of president of the Cabinet. Baron Hubner is appointed minister of police. Councillor Golochowski, minister of the interior. Councillor Kempen von Fichtenstamm, chief of the police, is dismissed. Baron Bach, formerly minister of the interior, has been appointed ambassador to Rome. The non-official portion of the Wiener Zeitung contains an article stating that there is a general feeling of anxiety in the public mind concerning the subjects which have been till now under serious deliberation by the imperial council, and which are—regulation of the control of the finances; free exercise of the Protestant religion; the regulation of Jewish affairs; the regulation of the municipalities. The representation of the provinces will later come under deliberation. The article concludes thus:—"Too great caution in advancing is as much to be avoided as too great haste."—The negotiations at the Zurich conference are slowly proceeding. A letter from Brussels, in the Nord, says there has only been one real sitting of the conference at Zurich, viz., that on the 8th. There appear to be many obstacles in the way of a settlement of the points to be discussed at the conference. Prince Gortschakoff has replied to a proposition of the Prussian government for uniting Russia, England, and Prussia, in a joint attempt at a settlement of existing complications in the south of Europe. The prince states that the Emperor of Russia has received the proposition most cordially.—With regard to the fortifications of Antwerp, we learn that in Saturday's sitting of the Belgian Chamber of Deputies, the project of law on the fortifications was agreed to. There were one hundred and six members present, of whom fifty-seven voted for, and forty-two against the project. Seven members abstained from giving their votes.—The strength of the King of Prussia is becoming gradually exhausted; his majesty has almost entirely lost his intellectual faculties, and his death would be a happy release both to himself and the queen. He is not considered to be in immediate danger, and the Prince Regent left Berlin on Monday evening for Ostend. Prussia has concluded a league with the Hanseatic Towns for the fortification of the seaboard of Northern Germany. We may also mention the attitude assumed by the press in Germany, where public feeling is in favour of the formation of a real Germanic power under the leadership of Prussia.—At Milan it appears that, notwithstanding all the talk of peace, things wear a suspicious aspect, and the constant movements of troops and storing up provisions for the army give much reason to fear that there is no real confidence among the people that peace will long continue. The Austrians are said to be doing all in their power to oppress and injure the inhabitants of Lombardy. Statements appear in the journals to the effect that the dynasty of Lorraine, in Tuscany, is to be succeeded by that of a foreign prince—meaning thereby, Prince Napoleon. A defensive league has been concluded between the states of Central Italy. Prince Herculani, the delegate of the government of the Legations, has signed the act of accession to the league. The National Assembly, after having proclaimed the forfeiture of Francis V. to the ducal throne of Modena, passed the following resolution, "The Assembly decrees the annexation of the Modenese state to the monarchical, constitutional, and glorious kingdom of the dynasty of Savoy, under the magnanimous sceptre of King Victor Emmanuel;" and further adopted the proposal to confirm the dictatorship of Signor Farini. M. Ricasoli, president of the Tuscan council of ministers, has addressed a proclamation to the army, which shows that the idea of a resumption of hostilities still occupies the minds of the Tuscan people. It appears that Madame Mario (Miss Meriton White) who was compromised in the Mazzinian attempt on Genoa, has been arrested at Bologna.—Madrid journals contain a paragraph to the effect that the Moderado party in Spain had sought the moral support of the Emperor Napoleon, in opposition to the O'Donnell cabinet; but his majesty had advised them to apply to the Emperor of Austria, for whom they had manifested great sympathy during the war in Italy.—The Emperor of Morocco is seriously ill, and the English physician has been summoned in great haste. Fears are entertained of disturbances taking place in case of his death.—The Europa has arrived at Liverpool, with dates from the United States to the 11th instant. A numerous body of Mr. Sickles' constituents had signed an address calling on that gentleman to resign his seat in congress. An incendiary fire at Memphis had destroyed property to the value of 150,000 dollars. From Mexico we hear that Juarez declines signing a treaty without the approval of the congress. A conspiracy was discovered in the capital on the 11th, for the purpose of assassinating the governor and taking possession of the government. The gold fever was raging on account of the discovery of gold in the Indian cemeteries of New Grenada, and of new discoveries on the Colorado. The crops in America are now safe, and a most abundant harvest has been reaped.—The Moniteur states that the Minister of War has given orders for a number of soldiers to return to their homes, and has granted furloughs to several others.—The King of Sardinia has delivered a speech on the affairs of Italy, characterized by the accustomed vagueness of royal speeches. The plainest passage is the following:—"The union, perfect order, and wisdom which the people of Tuscany, the Duchies, and the Romagna now display are admirable. Have faith in me, gentlemen, and be assured that now, as well as in future, I shall do everything in my power to promote the welfare of Italy."—A novel step has been taken with regard to the press in Russia. The Invalide Russe has received a "warning" for its freedom in commenting on several questions of European policy, and particularly for its insertion of an article on the necessity of assembling a congress to regulate the affairs of Italy and those of Turkey.—A letter from Jassy, in the Wanderer, of Vienna, says that the Chamber of Deputies sitting at Bucharest had agreed that a loan of 80,000,000 of piastres should be negotiated abroad, and that a discount and mortgage bank should be established.

INDIA.—By the Overland Mail we have received advices and papers from Bombay to the 21st of July. The most important news relates to the very large number of the Company's forces who have availed themselves of the permission to have their discharge. Some of the regiments are reduced to mere skeletons, and a free passage home will have to be provided for several hundred men. There is very little to report from the seat of war, a few skirmishes taking place here and there with small bodies of insurgents who are reduced to a state of despair. Further telegrams in advance of the mail of August 6th, state that the European discharge question still engages attention. The British ship Nathalie was wrecked off Bombay on the 23rd ult.; the mate and two seamen were drowned. The Bombay money market continues easy. Bombay harbour was crowded.

GENERAL HOME NEWS.—The ministers have all left town for their respective country seats, and London is now entirely bereft of the advantages of fashionable society. While the aristocracy are flying from the metropolis and the odours of Thames and Serpentine, it is satisfactory to find that the report of the Registrar General shows that the health of London is improving above the average. The deaths during the last two weeks have decreased from 1605 to 1188, but they still exceed by nearly 200 the weekly deaths in June. Last week there were registered in London the births of 917 boys and 864 girls, in all 1781 children.—There were two election contests on Saturday—for Hull, between Mr. Somes, Conservative, and Mr. Lewis, Liberal, the former being returned by a majority of 489; and for Berwick, between Mr. Hodgson, Conservative, and Mr. Majoribanks, the latter gaining the seat by a majority of one. Mr. Osborne was returned for Liskeard without opposition.—Earl Grosvenor, M.P., and Alderman Sir Peter Laurie have joined the council of the London Rifle Brigade. Lord Elcho and Captain George Montagu Hicks (lieutenant-colonel elect) had an interview, on Tuesday, with the Right Hon. Sidney Herbert, M.P., at the War Office, on various subjects connected with the brigade.—At the Court of Bankruptcy adjudication of bankruptcy has been made against John Edward Buller, a solicitor and scrivener, carrying on business at 56, Lincoln's-inn-fields, and residing at Enfield. His liabilities are stated at about £100,000, of which it appears that about £50,000 are in respect of breaches of trust, but this, it is supposed, is only a portion of the bankrupt's delinquencies. The assets are at present unascertained. A warrant has been granted for his apprehension.—A guard on the train between Liverpool and Manchester met a shocking death last week. Having been missed at one of the stations search was made, when the poor fellow was found dead on the top of a carriage. His head had evidently come into contact with the arch of a bridge.—We have to record the death of Mr. Bennet, who was injured by the accident that occurred on Wednesday evening, on the Tilbury and Southend railway. Mr. Lewis, the coroner for South Essex, opened an inquest on Saturday, at Tilbury Fort, which was adjourned, in order to take measures to secure the fullest investigation into the cause of the lamentable accident.—A serious explosion of gas, causing injury both to person and property, occurred at Brompton; and, as is too often the case in that description of casualty, it appears to have been the result of incautiously bringing a light into the room where an escape of gas was taking place. In the present instance the roof was blown from the house, and a lamplighter and several of the servants were seriously hurt.—One of the most extraordinary cases of fraud in the history of trade is about to be exposed before the Scotch Court of Session. Disclosures are now made which show, or at least allege, that for a long series of years the managing partners of the Carron Iron Company have been guilty of frauds upon their brother shareholders which, for daring and extent, throw into the shade the revelations which started the commercial world a year or two back. A suit, it seems, has been instituted in the Court of Session by Lieutenant Colonel Henry Dundas M'Lean against the company, charging the managers with systematically, and over a long series of years, falsifying their balance-sheets, to the end that their profits might appear to be much less than they really were; in consequence of which the said Colonel M'Lean sold certain Carron shares belonging to him to the company at a price greatly below their real value.—A young man was fined 5*l.* on Wednesday, at the Southwark police-court, for sending lucifer matches by railway without intimation. Fortunately the combustible package took fire as it was about to be placed in the luggage van, and so prevented probably a great deal of mischief.—An old man named Pannier, and described as a clerk and schoolmaster, was committed for trial at Marlborough-street, on a charge of forgery. The document alleged to be forged was a cheque for 3*l.* 16*s.* 8*d.* on the London and Westminster Bank, taken from the vestry-room of St. Ann's, Soho.—The circumstances connected with the murder of Mr. Broughton, near Leeds, are being narrowly inquired into, and two men convicted of burglary elsewhere are suspected of being the murderers. A man named Walter Beardon has been arrested on suspicion of having been concerned in this murder as principal or accessory. He was brought before the magistrates, and identified as one of two seen in the field about the time of the murder; and, which is of much more importance, it is shown that he pawned the watch of the murdered man shortly after the crime had been committed.—The funds yesterday were scarcely so well supported, but the transactions were pretty numerous, and the closing quotation of Consols was 95½ for money, and 95¼ buyers, for the account. There were no bullion operations at the Bank, but the demand for export to the continent continues, the dealers taking all available parcels for export. The inquiry for money was steady at former current rates, and the disposition to place paper was not much manifested. The New Russian Loan did not improve, being still quoted ½ discount to par, and the New Five per Cent. Indian Loan showed steadiness at about 98.

COMMERCIAL AND PUBLIC COMPANIES.—The business of the port of London during the past week has shown rather less activity. The number of vessels announced at the Custom House as having arrived from foreign ports, amounted to two hundred and fourteen. There were nine from Ireland and one hundred and four colliers. The entries outwards were one hundred and nine, and those cleared one hundred, besides twenty-three in ballast.—At the half-yearly meeting of the shareholders of the Great Northern Railway Company, a dividend was declared at the rate of £3 7*s.* 6*d.* per annum on the original stock, yielding £3 per cent. for the half-year to the "B," and 7*s.* 6*d.* per cent. to the "A" shareholders. The meeting went off more quietly than has lately been the case with the meetings of this company.—At the meeting of the shareholders of the Great Eastern steam ship, a resolution was agreed to, authorizing the directors to issue 30,000 new shares of £1 each, they being offered in the first instance to the present proprietors in the proportion of one to ten of their present holding. A proposal to accept the offer of Mr. Lever of £20,000 for chartering the ship for her first voyage was not acceded to.—The report and accounts presented at the meeting of the London District Telegraph Company this week were received and adopted. It was explained that the undertaking was making satisfactory progress, and that the public had taken the shares as a medium of investment. Strict economy would, it was asserted, be exercised in carrying out the works, which promise to be of great utility. The employment of female labour in the telegraph department would, it was affirmed, be attended with advantage.—From Birmingham it is announced that business has become better, and that the orders forward exhibit an increase. At Bradford and Huddersfield greater activity has been apparent; the position of affairs at Leeds indicating a steady revival. Moderately good reports have been received from Bradford and Halifax, the export trade continuing to exhibit symptoms of progress. Less activity has been exhibited in Manchester, through the partial cessation of the demand for India.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

BRO. C. EGAN is thanked; but, owing to his having directed his communication to a former, instead of the present, publisher of the Freemasons Magazine, it arrived too late for our present issue. It shall appear next week.

ERRATUM.—In alluding to the Prov. Grand Lodge of Dorsetshire last week, we inadvertently stated that the new Prov. G.M., Bro. Gundry, was installed by Bro. Cosens, whereas the ceremony was performed by Bro. the Rev. Thos. Pearce, D. Prov. G.M.

THE BALLOT.—A candidate is balloted for in a Lodge under Ireland (where one black ball excludes), and rejected from private feeling of some member against him. At the next regular meeting, upon motion made and carried, the ballot was reconsidered; the ballot box was passed round, and the candidate was unanimously elected. Was the reconsideration of the ballot proper? I forgot to add that the candidate was reported favourably of by the investigating committee.—P.M.—[Will some brother under the Irish constitution answer this?—Ed.]

BRO. R. B. WILLIS is thanked for his valuable communication.

RANDOM THOUGHTS.—II.

WISDOM—STRENGTH—BEAUTY.

Doric, Ionic, and Corinthian, shadowed forth in all their glory—what thoughts do not these words conjure up! They take us back to the palmy days of Athenian glory—tell of the wonderful magnificence of the Acropolis of Athens—scarcely make us wonder at the fanatical cry stirred up by sundry goldsmiths, “Great is Diana of the Ephesians,”—take us back to the time when Doria was first conquered by the Grecians (hardy then and strong in warfare, before luxury had enervated them)—and when various bands of colonists, under the leadership of “Ion,” son of Xuthus and Creusa, took possession of the pleasant groves and plains of Caria, banishing the original proprietors of the soil, naming it “Ionia” after their intrepid leader, and holding possession till, ages afterwards, driven therefrom by Cyrus. What an inexhaustible mine is there to the artist architect, who is enthusiastic in his profession and calling, the study of which in itself tends to ennoble the mind, yet which, while giving free scope to the imagination or soul of man, must of necessity tell him that all things are mutable, and that even his works, proud and substantial though they may be, must ultimately, like his own earthly tabernacle, crumble into dust! Thus while bringing out the soul, and showing to his brother the power of the intellect with which God has blessed his creatures, it still teaches humility. The pyramids alone, of all the creations of those early ages exist in their entirety, and there is something wonderful about this. There is a providence which has watched over them for a purpose, for how strikingly do they prove the truth of certain portions of holy writ—living witnesses to the trials of the Israelites while in captivity in the land to which Joseph’s brethren sold him.

“Doric, Ionic, and Corinthian!” Manly strength, matronly wisdom, and maidenly beauty, who is there that has thoroughly mastered these three Orders? Where is the history of architecture which has done justice to them, or which has fully perceived that beautiful symbolism with which Freemasonry alone has invested them—a symbolism based upon the most secure foundation, that of truth—a symbolism, in fact, which led to their original production. Architecture cannot be described by “Random Thoughts,” therefore, in despair, we give up the task of depicting its beauties. But with symbolism we can deal, however random our thoughts may be, and symbolism is the heart and soul of Masonry. We have said before, “Manly strength, matronly wisdom, and maidenly beauty,” that we will reverse the order, and place our reference to the latter, as Masons are in honour bound to do, in the vanguard of our remarks, and the word “Corinthian” will conjure up a great many of them—at least to those who understand its mysteries. This beautiful column refers us to its prototype—woman, lovely woman—and what beauty is there in this sublimary world to surpass that of the gentle daughters of our once sinless mother, Eve. What grace, what delicacy, what loveliness are there enshrined! So highly did our ancient brethren value the charms and graces of women, that their very architecture was founded on them—that in every temple and every stone they might be reminded of these, the loveliest beings in creation. Nay, more than this, our ancient brethren made them the supports of their Lodge—and, by symbolism, admitted them to their greatest mysteries. Corinthian and Ionic—of whom do these columns speak—of whom are the terms wisdom and beauty symbolical? Read the rudiments of architecture, store well in your mind that beautiful tale of the “acanthus leaf,” as related by Vitruvius, one of the best writers on this science. How beautiful and affecting is that charming tale of Callimachus and the young maiden’s basket of toys, placed by her grieving nurse upon the green grave in which its late mistress slept the still quiet sleep of death! To this distinguished and beautiful capital were added the most lovely proportions it was possible to conceive—that of the young maiden just entering upon the threshold of womanhood. This proportion it is which gives its grace and elegance to this queen of the orders—and truly by this symbolism, by early impressions and by association, it is the very incarnation of beauty. Wisely therefore has it been chosen to represent that great and distinguishing attribute which shines forth “throughout all creation, the animate as well as the inanimate parts thereof.”

While girlhood has been the type and proportion of this graceful creation of the artist’s brain, a production that has immortalized its happy inventor—man, exulting in the greatness of his muscular strength, has been the standard from which another column has been modelled, introduced by the Dorians, and first applied to the buildings which they “erected, completed and dedicated,” to the worship of their peculiar religion. This was indeed an emblem of strength, bearing the proportions of the full grown and developed and stalwart lords of the creation—and from the name of the people by whom this was substituted for the rude timber columns of previous ages, it was called “Doric.” Its proportions were calculated to sustain very heavy crushing weights, and as it appeared strong in itself, so was this column crowned with an entablature which would have been applicable to no other style. This, therefore, as it was produced by the Masonic body of old for the purposes of strength, was chosen also to be symbolical likewise of that quality.

Strong as man is, we see him yet again supported by woman, for woman, weak and powerless as she is to carry on a physical conflict, is yet again placed, though in a different phase, above man, being made the personification of wisdom as well as of beauty. And truly in everyday life do we find this to be the case, and well would it be for thousands if the advice of the staid matron were more often sought after and acted upon when given. Woman is possessed of forethought, which is in vain striven for by the majority of the lords of the creation, and in her every work shines forth that marvellous power of contrivance with which she is peculiarly endowed. Time after time you must have known women decide questions on the instant with unerring accuracy, which you had been poring over for an hour perhaps with no other result than to find yourself getting deeper in the tangled noose of difficulties. A witty French writer says, “When a man has toiled step by step up a flight of stairs, he will be sure to find a woman at the top.” Man is to fight, to contend with those dark enemies, the world and mammon. Woman is to be a helpmeet for him, to cheer him under difficulties, to strengthen his faith, and to assist in keeping him in that narrow path which leadeth to life eternal.

While man has been represented only as strength by the artists of old, woman has thus received a double homage, for has she not been shadowed forth in a twofold character, and characters most exalted—even wisdom and beauty. Upon the stately and handsome form of the matron was the Ionic order founded, while after the more graceful, delicate, and lovely shape of maidenhood was the happily conceived Corinthian order modelled; and well can we imagine the enthusiastic gaze of the Athenians when they beheld Callimachus’s temple rear high its majestic head, so proudly adorned with that sweet acanthus capital which even up to the present time has found no rival.

Woman then has furnished us with wisdom and beauty, while man has produced but strength, an element essentially important in the state to which he is called, but absolutely nothing when not combined with wisdom to divert its efforts and to give everything it produces the stamp of beauty. Man, therefore, ought not to be alone in the world; strong as he is, his step falters if he traverse its mazes in solitude, unaccompanied by that helpmeet which was created purposely for him, and uncheered by that smile which is worth more than the wealth of the Indies, and without which grim despair would soon assert its dominions, to the destruction of its unhappy victims. Well, therefore, was the power of woman shadowed forth by the ancients in their enduring columns, based as they are upon that strength without which woman would be incapable of breasting the storm of life, or the rough seas of human passion and prejudices. And well also were these three columns, when combined, chosen to represent those three glorious attributes which Masonry links together as wisdom, strength, and beauty.

MASONRY AND ITS MISSION.

[The following address was delivered before the St. German's Lodge, (No. 221), Irish Constitution, at Peel, in the Isle of Man, on the 24th of May, 1859, by Bro. ROBERT BRUCE WILLIS, W.M., No. 221; P.M., No. 212; P. Prov. S.G.D., Cumberland, &c. &c.]

THE subject, brethren, to which I wish to direct your attention this evening is one of the deepest importance, not only to the Craft in general, but also to ourselves individually, affecting, as it does, both our temporal and eternal interests most nearly: that subject is "Masonry and its Mission." We learn, on our admission into the Order, that it is an institution founded upon the purest principles of morality and virtue, and possessed of great and invaluable privileges to worthy men, and to worthy men alone. And here I will quote the words of a few distinguished brethren, both writers in years long since passed, and also those of more recent date. In a MS. written by King Henry VI., we read, "Itt beeth the skylle of nature, the understandynge of the myghte that ys hereynne, and its sondrye werkynge; sonderlyche the skylle of reckennynge of waightes and metynge, and the true manere of faconnyng al thynges for mannes use; headlye dwellynges and buyldynge of alle kynds, and all other thynges that make gudde to manne." Preston (1772) says, "Masonry is a science confined to no particular country, but extends over the whole terrestrial globe." "Freemasonry," says a learned foreign author, "is a moral order instituted by virtuous men, with the praiseworthy design of recalling to our remembrance the most sublime truths in the midst of the most innocent and social pleasures, founded on liberality, brotherly love, and charity." Bro. the Rev. F. S. Butcher briefly defines Freemasonry to be "the religion of benevolence." Dr. Oliver, in his "Antiquities of Freemasonry," says, it is a science which includes all others, and teaches mankind their duty to God, their neighbour, and themselves; and in another place he says, speculative Masonry is nothing else than a system of ethics founded on the belief of a God, the creator, preserver, and redeemer, which includes a strict observance of the duties we owe to each other, inspires in the soul a veneration for the Author of its being, and incites to the pure worship of the incomprehensible Trinity in Unity. Dr. Anderson says, "the end and purport of Masonry is to subdue our passions, not to do our own will; to make a daily progress in a laudable art, and to promote morality, charity, good fellowship, good nature, and humanity." From the above definitions (and did time and space allow I could adduce numerous others) we gather that Masonry is a beautiful system of morality, veiled in allegory and illustrated by symbols. Truth is its centre—the point whence its origin diverges, pointing out to its disciples a correct knowledge of the Great Architect of the universe, and the moral laws which he has ordained for their government.

Who does not know and feel that man is ordained to converse with his brethren, to impart mutual information by the interchange of their sentiments and reflections, and by the aid of sympathy to sooth his sorrows and assuage his pains? Who has not tasted the pleasures of social life, or been charmed with the more intimate union of friendship—for as the wise Solomon has it, "a friend loveth at all times, and a brother is born for adversity." (Prov. xvii. 17.) Therefore, who does not find in himself sufficient impulse to the use of the one and the enjoyment of the other. The principal intention in forming societies is undoubtedly the uniting men in the stricter bonds of love, and for mutual assistance; for men, considered as social creatures, must derive their happiness from each other; every man being designed by Providence to promote the good of others as he tenders his own advantage; and by that intercourse to secure their good offices, as being, as occasion may offer, serviceable unto them. And what society answers so fully to this description and unites so many of these purposes and advantages as Freemasonry? Founded on a liberal and extensive plan, the three great pillars of which are brotherly love, relief, and truth, its benignities extend to every individual of the human race, and its adherents are collected from every nation under heaven, upon which account Masonry is become the centre of union and the means of conciliating friendship among men that might otherwise have remained at a perpetual distance. From instances of popular tumults, factious panics, and of all passions which are shared by a multitude, we may learn the influence of society in exciting and supporting any emotion, while the most ungovernable disorders are raised, we find, by that means from the slightest and most frivolous occasions. He must be more or less than a man who kindles not at the common blaze. What wonder then, that moral sentiments are found of such influence in life, though springing from principles which may appear at first sight somewhat small and delicate.

At all times and in all ages we find endeavours have been made to overthrow, and to prejudice mankind against those institutions and men, whose principles and practices are for the benefit of society. We read that when Tertullus pleaded against St. Paul, the chief accusation on which he founded his plea was, his being a ringleader of the sect of the Nazarenes, and this sect (said the Jews) we know is everywhere spoken against. And why was this sect thus spoken against? Was it from any evil they knew of its professors, or from mere ignorance and prejudice? We find nothing of the former, but undoubted proof of the latter. And this I take to be pretty much the case in respect to Masonry, as flowing from the same corrupted source.

As to any objections that have been raised against the Order, they are as ridiculous as they are groundless, for what can be greater folly in any man than to attempt to vilify that of which he knows nothing; yet, strange to say, there are some foolish and envious men who attempt to injure and vilify the Order by bringing charges of infidelity, deism, rebellion, and other impure and unholy practices against it; and at the same time these men, who had the cool impudence to declaim against Masonry, and to write books on the subject, were never initiated into the noble Order, and consequently could know nothing concerning it. Contrast such men as Payne and Carlyle, (infidels), Adams, Barnet, Robison and Trevilian, Soane, E. C. Pryer, and other penny-a-liners, our opponents—if we can confer such dignity upon them as to style them opponents—with the names of Zetland, Leinster, Athole, and the Dukes of Sussex and Richmond, in our own time, besides hosts of others, as Wellington, the Archbishop of Canterbury, Washington, George Prince of Wales, and his brothers, and the long line of men, noble alike by their birth, station, talents and virtues, who for centuries have, with a just pride, boasted of belonging to the Craft; for to so high an eminence has its credit been advanced that in every age monarchs themselves have become the promoters of the art, have not thought it beneath them to exchange the sceptre for the trowel, have patronized our mysteries and joined in our assemblies. They call us atheists, but no infidel can be admitted into the Order; here, at the outset, they show their utter ignorance, for the Book of Constitution, published by the Grand Lodge, which is open to the inspection of every one, be he a Mason or one of the uninitiated (which book is particularly presented to the notice of every newly initiated member) as from it he will learn his duties to the Craft in general—in this book, I say, one of the first passages is, “As a Mason I would first recommend to your most serious contemplation the volume of the sacred law, charging you to consider it as the unerring standard of truth and justice, and to regulate your actions by the divine precepts it contains. Therein you will learn your duties to God, to your neighbour, and yourself; to God by never mentioning his name but with that awe and reverence which are due from the creature to his Creator, by imploring his aid on all your lawful undertakings, and by looking up to him in every emergency for comfort and support. To your neighbour by acting with him upon the square, by rendering him every kind office in your power, which justice or mercy may require; by relieving his distresses, soothing his afflictions, and by always doing to him as you would he should do unto you. To yourself by such a prudent and well regulated course of discipline as may tend to preserve the faculties of your mind and body in their fullest energy, and may enable you to exert most usefully the talents with which God has blessed you, as well to his glory as to the welfare of your fellow creatures.” What is there savouring of infidelity, rebellion, or anything impure in that?

The next grave charge against us, and one which many think weighs hardest upon us is that of deism. Here again see what the Book of Constitutions says:—“A Mason is obliged by his tenure to observe the moral law as a true Noachida, and if he rightly understand the Craft he will never be a stupid atheist or an irreligious libertine, nor act against conscience. In ancient times the Christian Masons were charged to comply with the Christian usages of each country where they travelled or worked, but Masonry being found of all nations, even of divers religions, they are now generally charged to adhere to that religion in which all men agree (leaving to each brother his own particular opinion), that is, to be good men and true, men of honour and honesty, by whatever names, religions or persuasions they may be distinguished, for they all agree in the three great articles of Noah, enough to preserve the cement of the Lodge.” And in an ancient MS. found in the British Museum, and lately published by Mr. Halliwell (which is well worthy the attention not only of Masons but of all antiquarians) full directions are given as to their manner of life, their duty to their superiors, their employers, and their God, and even how they are to conduct themselves when they attend at divine service in any of those noble buildings of which they erected so many to God's glory. These remain lasting memorials of their skill and perseverance, and also are sermons in stones, forcibly showing that Freemasons were neither atheists nor deists.

The charge of being nests of rebels and places for hatching conspiracies and revolutionary practices is only another specimen of the ignorance and imbecile credulity of our aspersers; it arose at the close of the last century:—

“About the year 1775-6,” says an interesting paper in the Freemasons' Magazine, “Adam Weishaupt, a professor of canon law in the University of Ingoldstadt, in Bavaria, in conjunction with some others, formed a secret society, called the Illuminati. Weishaupt himself is said to have been an extreme political reformer and an infidel; and the common belief was that the French revolution and its subsequent train of horrors were the results of conspiracies hatched under the auspices, and in the club, of the Illuminati. At the formation of his society Weishaupt was not a Freemason, but thinking that to be associated even in the slightest degree with so excellent and time honoured an institution would add credit and firmness to his new society, he became a member of a Lodge at Munich; here he at first drew over some young and enthusiastic members to join him, but as soon as they witnessed the development of his high degree they withdrew in disgust, and some of them betraying its principles, an examination was made into the charges brought against it, and the result was that the Elector of Bavaria suppressed the society in his dominions; it had not, in fact, and no proof can be adduced that it ever had, any connection with Masonry.” Had our calumniators looked into the Book of Constitutions, they would have seen that a Mason must be a peaceable subject, never concerned in plots against the state, nor disrespectful to inferior magistrates.

As to the charge of impure and unholy rites, is it possible that a body of men of mature age, amongst whom it is no uncommon thing to find many ministers of our holy religion, would meet for such a purpose; or even if they did, would they always open their Lodges and commence their proceedings with solemn prayer to the most high God. Would men of refined intellect, scholars, statesmen, fathers of families, and rulers of the land sanction any such improper proceedings by their presence—far less would they, as is often the case, present their sons for initiation into the Order? Would such words as the following have been addressed by a father to his son on his initiation, Prince Ferdinand being Grand Master, “I congratulate you on your admission into the most ancient, and perhaps the most respectable society in the universe. This moment, my son, you owe to me a second birth. Should your conduct in life correspond with the principles of Masonry, my remaining years will pass away with pleasure and satisfaction.” These are not light words, but well each brother knows that a good Mason must be a good man, and that they are pregnant with truth and sincerity.

What, then, is the mission of Freemasonry? It is to teach men the practice of morality, which Archdeacon Paley defines to be “that science which teaches men their duty, and the reasons of it.” And here let me most distinctly assert that Freemasonry is not a religion, though a reverend brother in America has well denominated it as “the handmaid of religion.” I think, indeed, the words of the celebrated Dr. Johnson will most plainly convey my meaning:—“When the obligations of morality are taught,” says he, “let the sanctions of Christianity never be forgotten; by which it will be shown that they give strength and lustre to each other; religion will appear to be the voice of reason, and morality will be the will of God.” Speculative Masonry is so far interwoven with religion as to lay us under the strongest obligation to pay that rational homage to the Deity which at once constitutes our duty and our happiness. It leads the contemplative to view with reverence and admiration the glorious works of the creation, and inspires them with the most exalted ideas of the perfections of the divine Creator. Its system exhibits a stupendous and beautiful fabric, founded on universal piety; unfolding its gates to receive the worthy professors of every description of genuine religion; concentrating as it were into one body their just tenets, unencumbered by the disputable peculiarities of sects and persuasions; in a word, it is the practice of every moral and social virtue. Its mission, then, is the promulgation and practice of virtue, or, as a reverend divine has explained it, the doing good to mankind in obedience to the will of God, and for the sake of everlasting happiness. The constitution of human creatures, and indeed of all creatures that come under our notice is such, as that they are capable of naturally becoming qualified for states of life for which they were once wholly unqualified. We find ourselves endued with capacities not only of perceiving ideas and of knowledge, or perceiving truth, but also of storing up our ideas and knowledge by memory. We are capable not only of acting, and of having different momentary impressions made upon us, but of getting a new facility in every kind of action—and of settled alterations in our temper and character; the power of the two last is the power of habit. Our happiness and misery are entrusted to our conduct, and made to dea pend upon it. Nature is often hidden, sometimes overcome, seldom extinguished. Force makes nature more violent in the return; doctrine and discourse make nature less impotent; but custom only alters and subdues nature. "A man's nature," says Lord Bacon, "runs either to herbs or weeds; therefore let him seasonably water the one, and destroy the other." Men's thoughts are much according to their inclination; their discourse and speeches according to their learning and infused opinions; but their deeds are according as they have been accustomed. We are so wonderfully formed that whilst we are creatures vehemently desirous of novelty, we are as strongly attached to habit and custom. Man is a bundle of habits, and therefore it is of the greatest importance to us to form right habits and to follow good examples, for example is everything—it is the school of mankind, and they will learn at no other. To form right habits, it is necessary that the human mind should be directed into proper channels for obtaining the right source of knowledge; and here Freemasonry steps in to our assistance, by directing our course. Whatever turns the soul inward on itself, tends to concentrate its forces, and to fit it for greater and stronger flights of science. By looking into physical causes, our minds are opened and enlarged. How is the mind filled—how lost in wonder—as we behold the moon travelling in her brightness through the dark blue sky, in the midst of ten thousand times ten thousand stars. What an idea does it give of the power and glory of the Creator—and yet what a poor idea. Far higher He is than the highest heaven; yea, they are as nothing in comparison. "Behold, even to the moon, and it shineth not: yea, the stars are not pure in his sight; how much less man, that is a worm, and the son of man which is a worm." Job xxv, 5, 6. The more accurately we search into the human mind, the stronger traces we everywhere find of his wisdom who made it. If a discourse on the use of the parts of the body may be considered as a hymn to the Creator, the use of the passions, which are the organs of the mind, cannot be barren of praise to him, nor unproductive to ourselves of that noble and uncommon union of science and admiration which a contemplation of the works of infinite wisdom alone can afford to a rational mind, whilst referring to Him whatever we find of bright, or good, or fair in ourselves—discovering his strength and wisdom even in our own weakness and imperfection—honouring them where we discern them clearly, and adoring their profundity where we are lost in our search—we may be inquisitive without impertinence, and elevated without pride; we may be admitted, if I may dare to say so, into the counsels of the Almighty, by a consideration of his works. The elevation of the mind ought to be the principal end of all our studies, which, if they do not in some measure effect, they are of very little service to us.

That great orator and philosopher, Cicero, says, "Est animorum ingeniorumque nostrorum naturale quoddam quasi pabulum consideratio contemplatioque nature."

Freemasonry has already been stated to be a moral system which (hereby proving its eastern origin), instructs its members by the aid of allegory and symbols, by the use of which senses are summoned to the aid of intellect, and amusement is judiciously blended with instruction. It finds

"Tongues in trees, books in the running brooks, Sermons in stones, and good in everything."

And this method of instruction has not only the sanction of the remotest antiquity, but also that of the Saviour himself, who continually spoke in parables; see also the parable of Nathan to David, and the custom of the ancient nations in sending earth and water to their conquerors in token of subjection. Thus, everything which meets the eye in a Freemason's Lodge is fraught with instruction; the Bible points out the faith which leads to happiness, and is dedicated to the service of God because it is the inestimable gift of God to man; the square teaches us to regulate our conduct by the principles of morality and virtue; and the compass to limit our desires to our station in life; while the very floor on which we tread reminds us of our chequered existence in this life. Our lectures enforce the duties of morality, and imprint on the memory the noblest principles which can adorn the human mind; they instruct us in the study and illustration of human science, and to trace the greatness and majesty of the Creator, by minutely analysing his works. The intellectual faculties expand as a desire for knowledge increases. What a sublime field for moral investigation and critical research do the seven liberal arts and sciences afford; the subtleties of grammar, rhetoric, and logic, the marvellous combinations of arithmetic, the universal application of geometry, the delicacy of music, and the sublimity of astronomy have each a separate charm to win the heart and point to a Creator. Such are the studies tending to elevate the mind which our noble Order lays down for its members, and he whose various talents shall allow him to overcome the impediments opposed to his advancement will be justly entitled to the distinction of a master of science, and a perfect moralist. Now here it may be said "This is all very well; but do all Masons act up to their principles?" Certainly not; were they universally acted up to by all the brethren throughout the world it would be a millennium. Amongst the various societies of mankind, few (if any) are wholly exempt from censure: among the disciples of our blessed Lord, Judas was a traitor, yet, because he was evil and yielded to Satan, did that make the eleven evil, or injure the truth which the Master he betrayed taught? Far from it; exceptio probat regulam; and although from universals you may deduce particulars, yet, to argue that because one member of a Lodge is a bad man that all are bad, is folly. We are often taunted with making too much of Masonry, but the truth is, we greatly underrate both its objects and capabilities, and are, therefore, often too ready to admit men among us whom we can hardly expect to bestow a single thought upon either. Our worst foes have been those of our own household, who have tarnished Masonic brightness and lowered the standard of its excellency; the uninitiated will not take the trouble to distinguish between such as are untrue to their obligation and those who continue faithful; did they so, they would find the good men and true vastly to preponderate. A man that has no virtue in himself ever envies virtue in others, for men's minds will either feed upon their own good or upon other's evil,—he who wants the one will prey upon the other; and whoever is without hope of attaining to another's virtue will seek to come at even hand by depressing another's fortune.

The human heart is naturally more full of envy than charity; and knowing this, it behoves all Masons to remember that Masonic life should be an exemplification of Masonic principles; and what can excel our three grand principles? By the exercise of brotherly love we are taught to view the whole human species as one family, and to see in every son of Adam a brother of the dust; as inhabitants of the same planet, we are to aid, support, and protect one another.

To relieve the distressed is incumbent on all men, but particularly on Masons, who ought to be linked together by an indissoluble chain of sincere affection. To sooth calamity, alleviate misery, compassionate misfortune, and to restore peace to the troubled mind, is the great aim of the true Mason. Truth is a divine attribute, and the foundation of every virtue. To be good and true is the first lesson we are taught in Masonry. On this theme we meditate, and by its dictates endeavour to regulate our conduct. "The knowledge of truth," says Bacon, "which is the presence of it, and the belief of truth, which is the enjoying of it, is the sovereign good of human nature." Virtue has been divided by some moralists into benevolence, which purposes good ends; prudence, which suggests the best means of attaining them; fortitude, which enables us to encounter the difficulties and dangers which oppose us in the pursuit of these ends; and temperance, which repels and overcomes the passions that obstruct it. Thus—benevolence prompts us to undertake the cause of a distressed orphan; prudence suggests the best means of going about it; fortitude enables us to confront the danger and bear up against the loss which may attend our undertaking; and temperance keeps under the love of money or ease, which might divert us from it. Thus we learn that no man lives too long who lives to do with spirit and suffer with resignation what Providence pleases to command or inflict. It might not inappropriately be asked—how is it that Masonry is found among men in countries where the light of the gospel has not yet shone? How is it that it is found among the Indians in America, the Mahometans in Syria and Turkey, and the Brahmins in India? Its existence proves two things—first; the truth of Masonic tradition—next; the antiquity of the Order. Not long since, an American missionary, a Mason, found out Lodges existing among some of the wildest tribes, corresponding almost exactly with our Lodges in their working; and Bro. Morrison in his essay on the ethics of Freemasonry, says, “Not long since some of you heard in this very place (Victoria Lodge, No. 4, Dublin), from an intelligent officer recently returned from India, that he obtained admission into a Lodge of Dervishes, in Constantinople, and their customs, traditions, signs, and secrets, were identical with our own. In all countries there is mixed up with the superstitions of their religion the first glimmerings of truth. Before the dispersion of the human family all had access to the Law of God, and from father to son, either in whole or in part, it was passed down the stream of time. The dispersion of the ten tribes carried much truth to the lands whither they were driven, but without assuming that the Bible was borne to all who possess the secrets of Masonry, we can easily understand how those portions which are its landmarks could be communicated and preserved among them.

With religion, whose sublime doctrines it cannot increase, whose precepts it cannot improve, Masonry does not interfere; she acts as a handmaiden, and teaches the brethren to remember that whatever we are and whatever we do, God's all seeing eye surveys us, and that while we endeavour to act as faithful Masons we must never forget to serve him with fervency and zeal. Inasmuch, however, as Masonry is professed by some nations not as yet converted to Christianity, and as it kindles benevolence and excites virtue so accordant with the tenets of the gospel, it may eventually (and let us hope that it may soon) have no slight tendency towards introducing and propagating among them that glorious truth; at least by humanizing the disposition, softening the manners and removing prejudices, may prepare the way for that most desirable event; for to Masonry the words of the old Latin poet may be aptly applied,

“Emollit mores, nec sinit esse feros.”

From its origin to the present time, in all its vicissitudes, Masonry has been the steady, unvarying friend of man. It has gone forth from age to age the constant messenger of peace and love—never weary—never forgetful of its holy mission—patiently ministering to the relief of want and sorrow, and scattering with unsparing hand blessings and benefits to all around. It comforts the mourner; it speaks peace and consolation to the troubled spirit; it carries relief and gladness to the habitation of want and destitution; it dries the tears of widowhood and orphanage; it opens the sources of knowledge; it widens the sphere of human happiness; it even seeks to light up the darkness and gloom of the grave, by pointing to the hopes and promises of a better life to come—all this Masonry has done, and is doing.

Such, then, is Freemasonry, and such its mission; to sum it up in one word—charity, the very bond of peace and of all virtues; the sentiment of charity, in its genuine conception, has a far wider meaning than the one conventionally assigned to it. Ask yon niggard—he will tell you charity begins at home, and consists in providing for his family; ask yon jolly, well fed, well to do looking man—he will say in giving away any surplus money he has no whim to gratify; ask the worldling—he will say, in heading a subscription list, no matter what the object; ask the devoted follower of some particular sect, and he will say, in industriously spreading the opinions of the sect to which he belongs. Yet all are wrong: let them refer to the Bible, and they will find it means love. Love it is through which (as announced by prophecy and inspiration), in ages long anterior to that in which it received its final interpretation from the great Teacher man must be reclaimed from hate and hard cupidity and the selfishness all prolific of misery, into the state of mind, temper, and mutual feeling wherein the unclouded brain admits what the purified heart suggests—that the bond of brotherhood in affection and sincerity conduces alike to the good of all and each—of the strong and of the weak—of the wealthy, and of him across whose path the res angustæ domi have cast their sombre shade. Now the purpose for which through storm and sunshine, good report and evil, the Order has persevered, is that of benefiting humanity through the medium and by the help of human hearts and heads; the real spirit of Masonry is not confined to the relief of the physical wants or the preservation of a brother's life in peril, but every day affords opportunity to promote his temporal good by lawful and honourable means; to help him, by enabling him to help himself; to extend our sympathy to his troubles, and our charity to his failings and imperfections; to make peace between friends; to warn one of his danger, another of his error; to be patient, tolerant, and forgiving towards all. It is for this reason that Masons are found so steadfastly to cherish each other's society, to live upon terms of mutual confidence and earnest sympathizing friendship. Other associations have died away in thousands in all ages, because their foundation was not firmly fixed—Masonry (says an American brother), is based upon the Rock of Ages, the storms of the world may beat upon it, but it will and does remain firm. Yes, Masonry, though hated, reviled, laughed at, persecuted, is still founded on truth, and the immutable laws of the Great Architect of the universe; and therefore it is still the bond of a great and powerful association, spread over the whole habitable world, honoured and protected by kings and statesmen, and cultivated and cherished by a multitude of wise, honourable, pious and conscientious men. But the tree is known by its fruits. Behold, then, the fruits of Freemasonry in its manifold charities, see in it the salvation of the bereaved female orphan, saved perhaps from a life of sin and shame, trained up to virtue and made a happy and creditable member of society. Behold it in the aged and infirm brother, who has failed in the battle of life, and now at the hands of his brother, in his declining years, finds a peaceful asylum to rest his tired spirit and sinking heart. Examine our schools, our hospitals. An ancient poet has beautifully said, “It is a pleasure to stand upon the shore and to see ships tossed upon the sea; a pleasure to stand in the window of a castle and to see a battle and the adventures thereof below: but no pleasure is comparable to the standing upon the vantage ground of truth (a hill not to be commanded, and where the air is always clear and serene) and see the errors and wanderings and mists and tempests in the vale below—so always that this prospect be with pity, and not with swelling or pride. Certainly it is a heaven upon earth to have a man's mind move in charity, rest in providence, and turn upon the poles of truth.”

It has been beautifully said that the Worshipful Master opens the Lodge at sunrise with solemn prayer; the Junior Warden calls the brethren from labour when the sun attains its meridian height; and the Senior Warden closes the Lodge with prayer at sunset, when the labours of our ancient brethren ended. The great luminary of creation rises in the east to open the day with a mild and genial influence, and all nature rejoices in the appearance of his beams; he gains his meridian in the south, invigorating all things with the perfection of his ripening qualities. With declining strength he sets in the west to close the day, leaving mankind at rest from their labours. This is a type of the three most prominent stages in the life of man—infancy, manhood, and age. The first, characterized by the blush of innocence, is pure as the tints which gild the eastern portals of the day; the heart rejoices in the unsuspecting integrity of its own unblemished virtues, nor fears deceit, because it knows no guile. Manhood succeeds; the ripening intellect arrives at the meridian of its powers. At the approach of old age man's strength decays; his sun is setting in the west. Enfeebled by sickness or bodily infirmity he lingers on till death finally closes his eventful day; and happy is he if the setting splendour of a virtuous life gild his departing moments with the gentle tints of hope, and close his short career in peace, harmony, and brotherly love.

THE DUKE OF WELLINGTON.

REAWAKENED DOUBTS RESPECTING HIS BIRTHPLACE.

It has been well observed by Sir Walter Scott that "There occurs in every country some peculiar historical characters, which are, like a spell or charm, sovereign to excite curiosity or attract attention, since everyone in the slightest degree interested in the land which they belong to has heard much of them and longs to hear more," and hence it is (we may add) that, from the days of Plutarch to those of Brougham,* men, the most eminent for their erudition, have been found devoting their researches to investigating the lives of the most celebrated characters that have flourished conspicuously amongst the fair, the learned, or the brave.

Indeed, biography has been (in some respects) not inaptly styled "the romance of history," but it is something more than that, it is its vital truth—its inner life—the records of peoples and ages gathered into one chronicle; and the history of many families, both of princes and of peasants, have, when truthfully related, exhibited incidents—strange, even more strange than fiction; and although we admit that none of our chronicles portray occurrences more extraordinary and romantic than those recorded in the red book of the peerage or the blue book of the peerage cases, yet, that circumstance does not justify (when we consider the deference due to the feelings of the living), the promulgation of doubtful statements respecting personages who—

"All their good being done, have lain them down,
To sleep with fame for ever."

An attempt has lately been made to reawaken doubts respecting the birthplace of the late Duke of Wellington. It will be in the recollection of our readers, that so far back as the year 1852 a paper, entitled "Historic Doubts on the Birthplaces of Celebrated Men," appeared in our publication; and from the information and research displayed by the article, and the favourable reception given to it as being a satisfactory elucidation of an oft mooted question, it was hoped that all doubts respecting the birthplace of England's most celebrated military hero had been set at rest; but it appears from the following communication, that there still exist some adventurous writers not indisposed to revive the subject.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE FREEMASONS' MAGAZINE AND MASONIC MIRROR.

DEAR SIR AND BROTHER,—I beg leave to state, that I have seen in a newly launched weekly periodical, an article respecting the "Birthplace of the Duke of Wellington," the chief statement in which is so contrary to that contained in my paper on "Historic Doubts," which appeared some years since in the Freemasons' Magazine, that I considered it to be my duty to promptly notice the matter; and as a delay of some weeks must necessarily have intervened before any comment on the subject

Of the many splendid orations of Lord Brougham, few, if any, surpass in chasteness of conception and fervid brilliancy of eloquence, the speech delivered by his lordship at the banquet given at Dover, in 1839, to the Duke of Wellington, as Lord Warden of the Cinque Ports.

could have appeared in the Freemasons' Magazine, I addressed the following letter to the editor of the Standard, who courteously afforded it a place in his journal:—

"To the Editor of the Standard."

"SIR,—A recent number of Once a Week contains the following novel statement respecting the birthplace of the late Duke of Wellington:—

"The great duke was born neither in England nor in Ireland. The future conqueror at Waterloo first saw the light on board a packet, about half way between the coast of Wales and Ireland; his mother, the Countess of Mornington, having been taken in labour while crossing from Holyhead to Ireland."

"Inasmuch as a lively interest attaches to every incident connected with the history of the celebrated British Nestor, he who was ever

'The sage in counsel, and the victorious in fight,' the following remarks may, perhaps, not be deemed uncalled for.

"On the demise of the late Duke of Wellington, a literary contention arose regarding the birthplace and birthday of his grace, when it was alleged by some writers that the duke was born at the family seat of the Wellesleys, Dangan Castle, in the county of Meath, in the month of March, 1769; and with equal pertinancy, a contrary opinion was advanced by other writers. Ultimately, however, the matter was fully elucidated by an article entitled 'Historic Doubts on the Birthplaces of Celebrated Men, with special Reference to the late Duke of Wellington,' which appeared in the Freemasons' Magazine for December, 1852.†

"In that disquisition were adduced extracts from the public journal extant at the period of the duke's birth; viz., the Dublin Mercury, the Dublin Freeman's Journal, and the Dublin Gazette, for May the 2nd, 1769—and also evidence of the oral and written testimony of the venerable Countess of Mornington (see letter of the Countess of Mornington to the editor of the Times, April 6, 1815), which conclusively proved, that 'her son, Arthur, Duke of Wellington, was born in Merrion-street, Dublin, on the 1st of May, 1769.'

"I have the honour to remain Sir, your very obedient Servant,

"THE WRITER OF THE ARTICLE ENTITLED 'HISTORIC DOUBTS,' &c.
"Belgravia, Aug. 3."

The publication of the above letter elicited an explanatory communication which, although I am not authorized to transmit a copy, yet it is but just toward the biographical correspondent of Once a Week, to intimate the purport thereof. The writer has the story from his own wife, who is a niece of a noble lady, "whose authority the duke is stated, in Once a Week, to have been born at sea." Now, from a dispassionate analysis of this explanation, it would seem that the amphibious story regarding the duke's alleged inopinate birth and marine birthplace, is one of those improbabilities so frequently narrated respecting the celebrities of distinguished families, and which from repetition sometimes acquire a credence bearing the semblance of truth; moreover, the story in Once a Week is only accompanied by secondary evidence, whereas the statement published in the Freemasons' Magazine for 1852, viz., that the late Duke of Wellington "was born in Merrion-street, Dublin," is sustained by primary evidence and being founded upon facts, is consequently incontrovertible. Nevertheless, I entertain no doubt whatever that the lady on whose authority the statement in Once a Week was made, believed the story to be true, and that "she told the tale as it was told to her," and it is also proper to observe, that the writer of the explanatory letter by no means infers in his communication that the lady mentioned as "the authority" was either the originator of the story, or a witness of the event. As the writer of the article entitled "Historic Doubts," I deem it proper to submit to your notice the above particulars; and considering that the candid statement and Adam-like justification of the correspondent of Once a Week is entitled to equal publicity with that vouchsafed to my former communication on this subject, I am induced to solicit the insertion of these remarks in the next number of the Freemasons' Magazine. Trusting that the present may be the last occasion requisite to claim the aid of the public press in order to delete doubts respecting the birthplace of Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington,

I have the honour to remain, dear Sir and Brother,

Yours fraternally,

Chester-street, Belgrave-square,
August 23rd.

CHARLES EGAN.

† "The duke was a member of the ancient and honourable Order of Freemasons."—See the Freemasons' Monthly Magazine for Nov., 1852.

‡ The precise birthplace of the duke was ascertained (from a source the most authentic) during the lifetime and by the royal desire of his late Majesty George the Fourth, but the fact was first publicly established by corroborative proofs in the Freemasons' Magazine for 1852. And though the Irish journals containing an announcement of the birth of Duke Arthur were, by his late majesty's royal command sought for (many years before the duke's death), the writer of "Historic Doubts" did not succeed in his efforts to discover the papers of May the 2nd, 1769, until October, 1852.

ARCHÆOLOGY.

ROCHESTER CASTLE.

[The following paper, describing the "Siege and Capture of Rochester Castle, by King John," in the year 1215, was written by G. R. CORNELL, Esq., F.S.A., for the late meeting of the Kent Archæological Society.]

The history of Rochester Castle is written in every history of the county and of the city. I propose merely to give an account of the siege and capture of the castle by King John in 1215, with notices of some of its defenders who were made prisoners when the castle was rendered to the King.

The Great Charter bears date the 15th of June 1215; in a few days after the King's plans were laid. He sent agents, amongst whom were William Geron, Hugh de Boves, and Geoffrey de Nevill, into France, Germany, and Flanders, authorising them to promise grants of the estates of the opposing barons (which he intended to confiscate) to such adventurers as would enter into his service, giving to his agents power to make formal grants beforehand. These foreign troops were ordered to be in readiness at Dover; by Michaelmas. Matthew Paris says that the King counterfeited the bishops' seals, and wrote in their names to all nations, saying that all the English were become apostates, and to any who would invade them the King would give the lands of those apostates. The King also raised as much money as he could, borrowing 1100 marks of the Master of the Templars, and 2000 marks of Hubert de Burgh, his justiciary; and he sent for all his jewels and plate from various abbeys and monasteries, where they had been deposited for safe custody, in order to raise money. At the same time he sent Walter, Bishop of Worcester (his Chancellor), John, Bishop of Norwich, and Richard de Marisco, to the Pope, to inform him of the coercion which had been put upon him by his subjects, whereby he had been forced to grant a charter, the articles of which he represented to be subversive of the regal power, and in consequence detrimental to that of the Holy Father as Lord Paramount, entreating the Pope to absolve him from his oath, that he might with a safe conscience use his endeavours to free himself from the concessions which he had made to his people.

Waiting the effect of these measures, the King retired to the Isle of Wight, where he spent his time as gentlemen from London sometimes do in modern days, lounging by the sea side, yachting, conversing with the fishermen, and passing away the time as well as he could until his foreign levies should arrive. The King's appeal to the Pope was eminently successful; he absolved John from his oath, and annulled the charter. At the same time he enjoined the barons to renounce the grant which they had enforced from their sovereign, threatening them with all the consequences of his anger and indignation in the event of their disobedience to his mandate. But the sturdy English barons were not intimidated by the fear of invasion by foreign mercenaries or of papal excommunication, and they took measures to defend themselves and support their cause in the best manner that they could.

One of the strongholds of which the barons possessed themselves at this critical period was Rochester Castle, which belonged to the king, and had been usually in the custody of the Archbishop of Canterbury. King John, in the third year of his reign, had restored the possession of the castle to Hubert, Archbishop of Canterbury, and it was in the possession of his successor at the period of which I am speaking, when the King, by his writ, required the Archbishop to give up the possession of the castle to him; but the Archbishop, Cardinal Stephen Langston, an Englishman, who had been put into the sea by the Pope in opposition both to the King and to the Dean and Chapter, and who, in this emergency, took part with the barons against the King, delivered it to the barons, who placed in it a strong garrison commanded by William de Albini, of Belvoir Castle, a valiant baron and military commander. They found there a large quantity of ammunition—by which we must not understand gunpowder, shells, congrève rockets and cannon balls, but bows and arrows, crossbows and bolts, stones for casting by engines, and such like old fashioned gear, which had been provided by the King for the defence of the castle—the knowledge of which was doubtless an additional inducement to the barons to possess themselves of a place so strongly fortified by nature and art.

The foreign troops arrived at Dover by the end of September. They came in great numbers from Brabant, Flanders, Normandy, Poitou, and Gascony. The troops from Brabant and Flanders were commanded by Walter Buck, Gerard Sotini, and Godeschall; those from Gascony and Poitou by Savaric de Mauleon, Geoffrey and Oliver de Buteville, brothers. A large body, no less it is said than forty thousand men, under the command of Hugh de Boves, perished in the sea on their passage; but notwithstanding this great loss, King John had force enough to enable him to overcome the opposing barons, and he immediately led his army to Rochester, which he invested. The barons had endeavoured to throw some succours into the castle, but without success. Nevertheless, William de Albini and his brave companions, hoping that Robert Fitz Walter and the confederate barons would be able to relieve them and raise the siege, resolved to hold out to the utmost, and courageously defended the castle from the 13th of October during a siege of eight weeks. King John attended the siege of Rochester in person, and was there from the 13th of October until the 5th of December, five days after the castle had been rendered to him.

Geoffrey de Vinsauf, in his "Itinerary of Richard, King of the English, and others to the Holy Land," gives us an authentic account of the siege of Acre in 1191, only twenty-four years before that of Rochester, some short extracts from which will give a notion of the manner of conducting the siege of a fortified place before the invention of guns and gunpowder. He says: "The King of France caused to be constructed mangonels and other machines, which he determined to apply day and night; and he had one petraria (or stone-caster) of vast force, to which the army gave the name of Bad Neighbour. The Turks also had one which they called Bad Kinsman, which, by its violent casts, often crippled Bad Neighbour; but the King of France repaired it again and again, until by many blows he had broken down a part of the city wall, and had shook the tower Maledictum. On one side was plied the petraria of the Duke of Burgundy, on another that of the Templars, while the engine of the Hospitallers never ceased to scatter dismay around. Besides these there was one petraria, built at the common expense, which they styled God's Petraria. By means of this engine a part of the wall of the tower Maledictum was at last hurled down for about ten yards in length. The Count of Flanders had also a large petraria, and also a smaller one, which two were plied incessantly close to one of the gates; but the great machines were two, of choice material and workmanship, which would throw stones to a distance almost incredible, and these King Richard had erected. He had likewise another very firmly built, which they called Berefred; it had steps to mount it, was covered with raw hides and ropes, and, being of most solid wood, was neither to be destroyed by the force of blows nor burnt by the streaming Greek fire. He also erected two mangonels, one of which was of such force that what it hurled reached the market-place of the city. These engines were plied night and day, and it is well known (says the chronicler), that a stone from one of them killed twelve men at a blow. These engines hurled such stones and flinty pieces of rock that nothing could withstand them, for they shattered in pieces whatever they struck, and, indeed, ground it to powder. The sappers of King Richard mined a tower which was at the same time assaulted by the engines, and when it began to totter Richard offered first two, then three, then four pieces of gold for every stone torn from its walls. Very many failed in this undertaking, while others were driven back by fear of death, for the Turks above manfully withstood them, and neither shields nor arms availed to protect them."

Acre, however, like Rochester, was at last taken by the besiegers; and if you substitute the city of Rochester for that of Acre, Rochester Castle for the tower 'Maledictum,' King John for King Richard, Savaric de Mauleon for the King of France, and William de Albini for the Sultan Saladin, Vinsauf's account of the siege of Acre may very well serve for that of Rochester; for by similar appliances and means of attack, and probably with the assistance of the King's ships in the Medway, which (as at Acre) blockaded the harbour, and cut off all supplies, and prevented any assistance to the besieged from the sea, the siege of Rochester Castle was carried on vigorously until the 30th of November, when the governor and his companions, finding no hope of relief, and that the outward walls were thrown down and their provisions exhausted, surrendered the castle and themselves at discretion.

On taking the fortress which had been so valiantly and perseveringly defended, King John was so much exasperated, that in his rage he hanged all the ordinary soldiers except the crossbowmen, and he would have put all his prisoners to death; but better and more prudent counsels (or perhaps avarice) prevailed. We shall see that the King made a good speculation by the sums which he exacted from such of his prisoners as could pay heavy ransoms for their lives; and he was persuaded by some of his friends and partisans, and amongst others by the Poictevin leader, Savaric de Mauleon, to exercise a reluctant clemency, for they represented to him that such extreme measures as he contemplated would be sure to bring a like fate upon his own soldiers under similar circumstances. They counselled him to spare the lives of the governor and the better sort of the prisoners, and to put them to ransom for their lives and liberty. The King, therefore, gave them their lives, but he sent them to Corfe Castle, Nottingham Castle, and other secure prisons, until they should agree with him for payment of such heavy fines as he thought fit to require of them."

An account here followed of the various persons so imprisoned by King John, and of what became of them.

MASONIC NOTES AND QUERIES.

MASONIC TOASTS.

TOASTS and health drinking are both of them going out of fashion in private society; nevertheless the toast still lingers among us at public dinners, city companies, and more especially among our Craft. May I venture to inquire if, beyond the usual Masonic toasts we hear in every Lodge, there are any others specially devoted to Masonic subjects?—BRBO.—[If Bibbo will look into any of the old pocket books, calendars, song books, and early works, even among the catchpennies, he will find many such toasts. And as these works may not be within his reach we will make a selection of a few, from Stephen Jones's Masonic Miscellanies, for his information:—"To all the kings, princes, and potentates that propagate or protect the royal art." "To the mother of all Masons." "All the female friends of Freemasons." "The secret and silent." "All that live within compass and square." "The absent brethren of this Lodge." "May Masonry flourish till nature expire." "The memory of the distinguished Three." "May every brother have a heart to feel and a hand to give." "May we never condemn that in a brother which we would pardon in ourselves." "May we be more ready to correct our own faults than to publish the errors of the brethren." These are a few that were in general use during the last, and part of the present, century. To quote further would be to fill pages of our space. Still we will add one or two couplets to show the rhyming kind.

"To each charming, fair, and faithful she,
Who loves the Craft of Masonry."

"To Masons and to Masons' bairns,
And women, with both wit and charms,
That love to lig in Masons' arms."

SIR CHRISTOPHER WREN.

Was Sir Christopher Wren buried with Masonic rites—or is there any engraving of his interment, so that we might be enabled to see if any of the mourners wore Masonic clothing?—DOMUS.—[This question should have been replied to before; but we hope "Domus" will not think it too late now, for we have, to oblige him, instituted a laborious and minute search, the result of which is now before him. In the Daily Post, of Wednesday, February 27th, 1723, there is the following paragraph:—"On Monday last died, Sir Christopher Wren, aged 92. He was formerly Surveyor General of the King's Works; he rebuilt St. Paul's Church, and all the rest of the Churches that were burned down in the great conflagration. He was deservedly reckoned one of the best and greatest Architects in Europe; but as his Character is universally known, it is Needless to enlarge upon that Head." The Post Boy, No. 5245, from Saturday, March 2nd, to Tuesday, March 5th, 1723, states:—"This Evening the corpse of that Worthy FREEMASON, Sir Christopher Wren, Knight, is to be interred under the Dome of St. Paul's Cathedral." And in The Post Man and the Historical Account, No. 6100, from Tuesday, March 5th, to Thursday, March 7th, 1723, we read:—"Last Tuesday Night the corpse of Sir Christopher Wren was carried from his late Dwelling House, to be interred in the Vault under the Dome of St. Paul's; the Hearse was preceded by a handsome cavalcade bearing torches, and followed by fifteen Mourning Coaches and Six, as well as by several gentlemen's Coaches."

"Domus" will gather, from the above extracts, all that we have been able to find on the subject—that Sir Christopher Wren's funeral was not different to the usual burials of his time; and although journalism was not in such efficiency as it is now, the above being good examples of the date in question, yet had there been anything so unusual as a Masonic interment we are inclined to think some comment would have appeared in one, if not more, of the papers extant. To the second query, respecting any plate being in existence, we can only add that we have searched the print room of the British Museum, and every account of engravings about the year 1723, and cannot find any trace, nor do we believe there is any such representation.

As our correspondent has started such an inquiry, which ought to interest every member of the Craft, perhaps it may not be deemed out of place, here, to allude to another matter in connexion with the memory of our former Grand Master.

Bro. James Elmes, a distinguished architect, published a work, entitled Memoirs of the Life and Works of Sir Christopher Wren, with a brief View of the Progress of Architecture in England, from the Beginning of the Reign of Charles I. to the End of the XVIII. Century; and an Appendix of Authentic Documents (4to. London, 1823)—and we wish that any representation we could make to Bro. Elmes would induce him, in these days of cheap reprints, to issue a less expensive edition of so valuable a book—in which he tells us, after deploring the unmerited neglect of Sir Christopher in his latter years, "He and native talent were out of fashion; and when ingratitude, and the injustice of intriguing foreigners robbed him of his rights, his honours, and his well earned rewards, the wits, the poets of the day, suffered this unequalled man to sink into the silent grave unnoticed but by his beloved son, Christopher, who erected the small mural monument in the crypt of St. Paul's, and began his work (Parentalia: or Memoirs of the Family of the Wrens, folio, London, 1750), illustrative of his honoured ancestors."

Notwithstanding this neglect in the lifetime of our once great and distinguished Grand Master, it remained for the boasted enlightenment of the nineteenth century to add a yet deeper insult to his talents, and this through the authorities of that very cathedral church which spread his name and fame through every part of the civilized world—for the dean and chapter of St. Paul's, and their architect, to their undying shame, removed the slab that bore the inscription—

"SUBTUS CONDITUR
HUIUS ECCLESIE ET VARIIS CONDITOR
CHRISTOPHORUS WREN,
QUI VIXIT ANNOS ULTRA NONAGINTA,
NON SIBI SED DOMO PULCHRO.
LECTOR ET MONUMENTUM REQUIRIS
CIRCUMSPICE.

Obijt xxv Feb. An^o. MDCCXXIII. æt. xci."

to make room for a back-front set of manuals to the organ, on the occasion of the funeral of the Duke of Wellington; and it is still absent from its place, standing, in three pieces, in the second recess of the south side aisle, the letters faded, and the whole at the mercy of any Goth, who may choose to deface it; while the very reverend the dean, and the cathedral architect, are reported to be decidedly against its being replaced, giving, as a pretext unworthy the name of a reason, "that Wren was so humble minded that he would have been shocked to see his name placed so conspicuously before the world."

Well might Mr. Godwin, in the discussion that followed Mr. Penrose's (the capitular architect's) paper on Various Matters connected with St. Paul's Cathedral, read before the Royal Institute of British Architects, and reported in the Transactions of that learned body (page 68)—well might Mr. Godwin, say we—beg "to express the hope that the well known epitaph or inscription to Wren should be speedily restored. It had become part of the history of the Cathedral and of London; and the numerous letters he had received on the subject convinced him that it was a very unfortunate thing it should have remained so long out of its place."

If the rumour which we have heard is correct, viz., that the dean and chapter are about to have the excellent old organ by Father Smith replaced by a modern "music mill," with hydraulic pressure bellows to extend down into the vaults, and to be placed on both sides the choir so as to do away with the screen, it becomes every Freemason to be up and doing and never to cease agitating the subject until the memorial (and it is the only one a grateful city has erected to the memory of Wren after he had resuscitated it from the flames), be again in its place. And if the Craft really venerate the name and fame of one who is so bright an ornament to their fraternity, they will not cease their exertions until successful.]

MATTHEW BIRKHEAD.

Can any one tell me what Matthew Birkhead, the author of our "Entered Apprentice" song, was? Was he connected with the stage? The Daily Courant, of Thursday, 17th of May, 1717, contains the following advertisement:—

"At the desire of several Ladies of Quality,
"For the benefit of Mr. Birkhead,
"By His Majesty's company of Comedians, at the Theatre Royal, in
"Drury Lane, this present Thursday."

Then follows the cast of a play, but Bro. Birkhead's name does not appear.—THESPIS.

THE GRAND MASTER'S SWORD OF STATE.

I am not sure whether you admit queries wholesale, but I am about to submit three to you at once. I have in my possession a copy of Anderson's Book of Constitutions, the edition of 1738. I am told this is scarce; is it so? What is its value? At page 230, after the list of Lodges, there occurs the following—capitals, italics, &c.; as written:—

"N.B. An IMPRESSION, in Folio, of the Grand Master's SWORD of State (formerly the Sword of GUSTAVUS ADOLPHUS, King of Sweden, and next of BERNARD, Duke of Sax-Weimar, with their Names on the Blade) which was presented to the Fraternity by our former Grand Master THOMAS HOWARD Duke of NORFOLK, richly adorn'd at the Hilt with Corinthian Columns of Massy Silver, and on the Scabbard with the Arms of NORFOLK in Silver, the Masons Arms, and some Embossings, &c. (perform'd by Brother George Moody the Sword-bearer) all explain'd, illuminated, and embellish'd, is to be sold by Brother JOHN PINE the Engraver, in Old Bond Street near Piccadilly. Where also may be had

"The small Engraven List of the Lodges, renew'd annually with their Removals."

Is this sword in use now? Where can I see the impression advertised, as well as the engraved list referred to?—G. A.—w. —(Our correspondent calls five queries three, and wants answers all in a batch! We will oblige him, as far as we can, but, for the future, pray let him send one at a time. The edition of 1738 is the scarce one. The value of old books, like that of old wines, depends on their condition. The writer bought a copy of the 1738 edition for four shillings, and has been offered six times that amount for it. We will ascertain if the Gustavus Adolphus sword is now used, and will also endeavour to direct our attention to where he can see the "impression" of it alluded to. The plate of the engraved Lodges is to be found in vol. iv., p. 253, of Picart's Ceremonies et Coutumes Religieuses de Tous les Peuples du Monde, 5 vols., fol., Amsterdam, 1736. And we wonder, like George III. and the apple in the dumpling, "How on earth it got there."]

WAS THE DUKE OF WELLINGTON A FREEMASON?

Though excessively pressed as to time, I feel it incumbent on me (as the originator of the Irish Masonic Calendar) to reply at once to "Enquirer," in last Saturday's number of your valuable and interesting publication. It is true that No. 494 has not appeared in the Calendar for a session or two lately, having neglected making returns, but it is equally true that the Lodge at present exists, is on the present Grand Lodge sheet and possesses patent evidence of the initiation of our late brother, the immortal Duke of Wellington; and vide also Oliver's History of Freemasonry, from 1829 to 1841, page 91.—M. FURNELL, 33°.

INTRODUCTION OF MASONRY INTO ENGLAND AND IRELAND.

As regards your paragraph on this head, I am neither able nor competent to sustain those antiquated assumptions, neither am I now prepared to offer my humble opinion as to the accuracy of your correspondent, of my former printer, of myself, or of the almost obsolete, musty old works from which I made extracts, and I have been fruitlessly turning them over for the last hour; however, they and my other Masonic books are always open to the research of qualified brethren; but one of my fondest wishes is attained if even the blunders of my crude effort should direct the attention of persons of more talent and information to dilate on the theory of a system coeval with the appreciation of philanthropy and mutual dependence in the human family. It is remembered here, that feeling the sad want of some periodical for the Irish Order, in 1847 I ventured on a task for which I was most unfit, from habits and from extensive agricultural engagements as a country gentleman. However, I deemed it worthy of a trial, and after encountering the prejudices of many, and particularly of that singular and venerated old man, the late Bro. John Fowler, abstruse, quaint, and mysterious as the musty and chaotic old documents amidst which he passed a long and studious life, I obtained the consent of our estimable Grand Master, and of the Grand Lodge, to the (then) daring innovation of a publication, provided I undertook all responsibility and expense, which I did, and devoted the proceeds to the Orphan School, as you will perceive by an original copy I send—the result was gratifying to the Order and to myself. It then became a printing speculation, in other hands, and so continued until within the last three or four years, when Grand Lodge wisely took the publication in charge. I alone am to blame for original errors, which the Grand Lodge tolerated, as she ever affectionately does the mortal deficiencies of her devoted and your faithful brother.—M. FURNELL, 33°.

REMARKABLE OCCURRENCES.

The list of "Remarkable Occurrences in Masonry," given in the Freemasons' Calendar and Pocket Book, as at present issued, suppresses many events which our elder brethren considered of importance, and a note of these may be interesting to your readers. The omissions referred to are supplied from the Freemasons' Calendar of 1766, and as there is no reason to reprint the list from the current Pocket Book, our brethren will understand that the details appended are those found to be wanting in the edition of 1859.

THE FREEMASONS' MAGAZINE AND THE CRAFT.

We are at all times loth to intrude the business affairs of the Magazine on our readers; but the following circular having been issued by a committee of our friends, it would be most ungrateful on our part were we not to acknowledge their kindness, and to give it additional publicity. At the same time, we wish it to be distinctly understood that this appeal is not intended to be one of a series, and that, under no circumstances, on the subscription list being once closed, will it be reopened. Once placed in a position of comparative security, we are determined that the Magazine shall maintain itself, or we shall retire from the field. We are proud to believe that, under the management which has prevailed since the dissolution of the partnership, the character of this journal has risen in the estimation of the Craft; of which we have proof in our gradually growing list of subscribers. Five years of labour and some hundreds of pounds we have up to the present time sacrificed in the endeavour to raise the character of the Masonic press (the partnership losses having exceeded £2,000), but it is to the last two years we more particularly refer (during which the undivided management and responsibility has devolved on one brother), as our claim to the confidence and support of the Craft. We have now put the Magazine on what we hope will prove a permanent footing, and we shall leave to the Craft to determine our future prosperity—to ensure which no exertions will be wanting on our part to render the Magazine the most perfect Masonic record ever published—whilst its literary contents shall entitle it to rank with the most successful publications of the day—every opportunity being taken to improve it in every possible manner, so as to command the largest possible amount of support.

In addition to the other attractions of the Magazine, arrangements have been entered into with the eminent engraver, Bro. Shenton, for the publication of a series of portraits of the more eminent members of the Order, commencing with that of the Grand Master, which will be forthwith issued, and which we trust will meet with the approval of the brethren.

[CIRCULAR].

DEAR SIR AND BROTHER,—Allow me to request the favour of your perusal of this appeal, and your aid should it meet with your approval.

Towards the close of 1858, Bro. H. G. Warren, the sole remaining proprietor of the Freemasons Magazine, found that the financial position of the publication had become such that it was a grave question whether he should not abandon it. Before taking this step he called a meeting of his friends, on the 6th January last, laid before them the whole facts of the case, and asked their counsel. This meeting was presided over by the R.W. Bro. T. H. Hall, Provincial Grand Master for Cambridge, and was attended by a number of distinguished Masons. After hearing Bro. Warren's statement it appeared to the meeting that it would be most desirable to maintain the publication of an independent and impartial organ of the Craft, and the more so that the reports are now published with the sanction of the M.W.G.M. The following resolutions were unanimously adopted:—

1. That in the opinion of this Meeting it is indispensable that the Craft should possess an independent, truthful, and temperately conducted Journal.
2. That this Meeting approves of the manner in which the Freemasons Magazine has been conducted of late, and considers it worthy of the support of the Craft.
3. Having reference to the explanation now given by the Editor as to the losses which he has incurred in carrying on the Magazine, this Meeting—with the view of securing its continuance, but without in any way fettering the independence of its management, and under the conviction that the journal will continue to be conducted in a fair and impartial manner—resolves to enter into a subscription with the view, as far as possible, of enabling the Editor to meet such losses; and the Brethren present pledge themselves to use their influence in increasing the number of annual subscribers, both amongst Lodges and the Brethren generally."

It was explained to the meeting that a subscription of a comparatively trifling amount, and a moderate increase in the number of weekly subscribers, would ensure all that was required to secure the future prosperity of the Magazine. Whereupon a committee was appointed, who, from the favourable replies they have received to their first address, have decided upon appealing to the Craft to come forward and provide the necessary funds, which an average subscription of ten shillings from each Lodge would effect. The committee therefore trust that their brethren will recognize the desirability of securing the continuance of a well conducted and impartial journal, and one which has given an independent support to the Grand Master, feeling that the brethren generally will agree with them that the manner in which the Magazine is now conducted entitles the proprietor to the generous assistance of the Craft.

The committee are also anxious to extend the circulation of the Magazine, and would suggest that if every Lodge in England which does not at present take it in, were to subscribe for one copy, the publication would not only be placed on a secure footing, but become fairly remunerative to the proprietor and editor.

The committee trust, therefore, that you will assist in this endeavour, by allowing your name to be added to the list of contributors, and by using your influence to augment the fund, and the number of regular subscribers to the Magazine. They would also be glad to receive the name of any brother willing to become a member of the committee.

I am, dear Sir and Brother, yours faithfully,

E. S. SNELL, HON. SEC.

REVIEWS OF NEW BOOKS.

First Impressions of the New World, by Two Travellers from the Old, in the Autumn of 1858. Messrs. Longmans.

Life and Liberty in America: Sketches of a Tour in 1857-8. By CHARLES MACKAY, LL.D. 2 vols. Smith, Elder, and Co.

NOT many years since, America was regarded as a dull, uninteresting country, whose citizens were actuated by a vulgar, disagreeable love of the almighty dollar, and who fastened on every traveller with a pertinacity to exhibit the worst side of a great nation. That we have not overstated the conclusion formed in this country of our American cousins, the test is easy, and we have only to turn to the works of Captain Basil Hall, Mrs. Trollope, and Mr. Dickens, for such an amount of sarcasm and travellers' stories as few works of the same kind can equal. This unfortunate estimate of a race allied to us by the same tongue and blood, is the more to be deplored, because, when the authors alluded to gave their impressions to the world, they were popular writers, read by thousands in the old country; and, however much their popularity may have waned since the period in question, still, to some extent, their dictum has been almost universally accepted here. Time was when both nations sought to attribute to each other certain conventional forms of wholesale folly and absurdity, and one was perpetually asserting, with peevish bombast, an independence which no one threatened, and a superiority which no one cared to dispute, whilst the other replied to all this with ill concealed sneers and witless jibes. Since that time kindlier and more generous feelings have taken place. The two cousins have read and seen much more of each other; they have learned to appreciate more strongly the genuine points in each other's character, and have fairly come to consider and criticise with discrimination and candour many things on which their sentiments differ; but when weighing them honestly they each feel that although certain peculiarities of the other side are not to their own way of thinking, yet the practice of them may be for the good of the nation adopting them; and so, like sensible individuals who differ in opinion, but are both seekers and admirers of truth, they have come to feel very proud of each other, and a friendship of no common order has sprung up between the peoples of two mighty nations.

The two works which stand at the head of this article are both written in the above state of mind, and they both testify to the interest which English travellers find in the United States, and the pleasing recollections their visits have left on the minds of the visitors.

"First Impressions of the New World" is a very impressionable performance by a lady, who travelled with her husband on some business connected with railways, and these "Impressions" are written for the special behoof and amusement of I. L. T., her little girl, and record such scenes and anecdotes as "mamma" saw, and heard, when travelling with "papa." The hotels, teamsters, professors, streets, waterfalls, are all charming in mamma's eyes, although the first occurrence she heard of on landing was not of a nature to inspire the most favourable feelings with regard to the new country, for she tells us:—

"Two topics seem at present to occupy the minds of everybody here—one the successful laying of the cable; the other the burning of the quarantine buildings on Staten Island. We were quite unconscious, when passing the spot yesterday, that the whole of these buildings had been destroyed on the preceding night by an incendiary mob; for such we must style the miscreants, although they comprise a large portion, it is said, of the influential inhabitants of the place. The alleged reason was that the quarantine establishment was a nuisance, and the residents had for months been boasting of their intention to destroy the obnoxious buildings. The miserable inmates would have perished in the flames, had not some, more charitable than the rest, dragged them from their beds. The yellow fever hospital is destroyed, and the houses of the physicians and health officers are burnt to the ground. At the very same moment New York itself was the scene of the splendid festivities in honour of the successful laying of the Atlantic telegraph cable, to which we have alluded."

Well might "mamma" find everything delightful, when "Mr. Tyson" is so very kind, and has such a stock of good sayings ready for all occasions, and "papa" is so pleased at being treated with so much distinction, and "niggers are such delightful characters," as well as Irish emigrants being so smart and quick; but all this, at last, becomes a sad bore and very much like little people floundering about out of their depth, not knowing how to return commonplace civilities without setting their faces on a broad grin to every conceivable variety of adjective which can accompany praise. The journal of the two travellers gives us some rather large and vivid pictures of themselves, showing them to be specimens of the well-to-do fussy kind of philanthropists, who are ever seeking to busy themselves in some schemes of good—provided it is to be done cheaply and at the expense of talk. As a specimen, "mamma" falls in with a veritable "Topsy," and sets to work to talk the nigger into sobriety of life and manners; and "papa," while visiting a slave pen, upon being shown a negro who, rather than give up some clothes, had run away from his wife, asks him "whether he cared more for his clothes than his wife, and gives him a lecture on the domestic duties!" Besides this, "mamma" has many little traits of "dear, restless, fidgetty papa's" oddities and whims, his indigestions and headaches from eating "hot quails and drinking Catabaw champagne," and how terribly irritated he is when travelling in Philadelphia, at the river appearing on the opposite side of the railway to which he had expected it, adding, "and we all know how irritable he can become." With the episode about the lady's maid's sickness we can only exclaim—what slip-slop to make up a book! But there is a redeeming point under all this wishy-washy nonsense, the book gives some very accurate statistics, of railways, schools and reformatories, and the working of a few ameliorating societies, all of which are, no doubt, very interesting and valuable. There are some one or two items among this portion of the subject which makes us think of the old proverb that "travellers see strange things," such, for example, as an old lady of seventy-two, who is described as "remarkably pretty," and a Kentuck innkeeper, one Jim Porter, standing "seven feet nine inches without his shoes," as well as the young ladies of the Cincinnati school who "translated Cicero into excellent English, and answered most difficult questions in logic."

We now come to the second work whose title stands at the head of this notice, Dr. Mackay's Life and Liberty in America. These two volumes are the experience of a tour in the years 1857–8, and about one third of them have previously appeared as letters, sent by the doctor while on his tour, and inserted in the Illustrated London News, and the rest, or about two thirds, is now printed for the first time. Dr. Mackay's writings have been long enough before the world to dispense with any remarks of ours upon his style—that is well known; and in the present books he gives us some excellent sketches, occasionally slight in structure, but vigorous and interesting. He, too, has gone over much of the same ground as the two travellers referred to above, and sees with the same favourable eyes, but there is a greater sobriety of judgment and much more discrimination in his remarks upon the same subject, although there is a general coincidence between the two works. Dr. Mackay is no novice at description; hence his pictures of the New World scenery is grand and striking. Niagara, of which so much has been written, was never so distinctly brought to our mind's eye as by Dr. Mackay's description. And so it is with all he touches. The chapter devoted to the firemen of New York originally appeared in the Illustrated London News, but it is so well worth quoting, that we shall make no apology for reproducing it here. The doctor tells us:—

"Whatever the Americans are proud of—whatever they consider to be a peculiarly good, useful, brilliant, or characteristic of themselves or their climate—they designate, half in jest, though scarcely half in earnest, as an 'institution.' Thus, the memory of General Washington—or 'Saint' Washington, as he might be called, considering the homage paid to him—is an institution. The Falls of Niagara are an institution; the Plymouth Rock, on which the Pilgrim Fathers first set foot, is an institution, as much so as the Blarney Stone in Ireland, to which an eloquent Irish orator, at a public dinner, compared it, amid great applause, by affirming that 'the Plymouth Rock was the Blarney Stone of New England.' 'Sweet potatoes' are an institution, and pumpkin (or punkin) pie is an institution; canvas-back ducks are an institution; squash is an institution; Bunker's Hill is an institution; and the firemen of New York, a great institution."

"The fire system, in nearly all the principal cities of the Union, is a peculiarity of American life. Nothing like it exists in any European community. As yet the city of Boston appears to be the only one that has had the sense and the courage to organize the fire brigades on a healthier plan, and bring them under the direct guidance and control of the municipality. Everywhere else the firemen are a power in the State, wielding considerable political influence, and uncontrolled by any authority but such as they elect by their own free votes. They are formidable by their numbers, dangerous by their organization, and in many cities are principally composed of young men, at the most reckless and exorbitant age of life, who glory in a fire as soldiers do in a battle, and who are quite as ready to fight with their fellow creatures as with the fire which it is more especially their province to subdue. In New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, and other large cities the fire service is entirely voluntary, and is rendered for 'the love of the thing,' or for 'the fun of the thing,' whichever it may be. The motto of one fire company at New York, inscribed on their banner, is,

'Firemen with pleasure,
Soldiers at leisure'—

a couplet which characterises the whole spirit of their organization. The firemen are mostly youths engaged during the day in various handicrafts and mechanical trades, with a sprinkling of clerks and shopmen. In New York each candidate for admission into the force must be balloted for, like a member of the London clubs. If elected, he has to serve for five years, during which he is exempt from jury and militia duty. The firemen elect their own superintendents and other officers by ballot, as they were themselves elected, and are divided into engine companies, hook and ladder companies, and hose companies. The engine and accessories are provided by the municipality; but the firemen are seldom contented with them in the useful, but unadorned state in which they receive them, but lavish upon them an amount of ornament, in the shape of painted panels, silver plating, and other finery, more than sufficient to prove their liberality and the pride they take in their business. The service is entirely voluntary and gratuitous, having no advantages to recommend it but those of exemption from the jury and the militia, and leads those who devote themselves to it not only into great hardship and imminent danger, but into an amount of expenditure which is not the least surprising part of the 'institution.' The men—or 'boys,' as they are more commonly called—not only buy their own costume and accoutrements, and spend large sums in the ornamentation of their favourite engines, or hydrants, as already mentioned, but in the furnishing of their bunk rooms and parlours at the fire stations. The bunk or sleeping rooms, in which the unmarried, and sometimes the married, members pass the night, to be ready for duty on the first alarm for fire, are plainly and comfortably furnished; but the parlours are fitted up with a degree of luxury equal to that of the public rooms of the most celebrated hotels. At one of the central stations, which I visited in company with an editor of a New York Journal, the walls were hung with portraits of Washington, Franklin, Jefferson, Mason, and other founders of the Republic; the floor was covered with velvet pile carpeting, a noble chandelier hung from the centre, the crimson curtains were rich and heavy, while the sideboard was spread with silver claret-jugs and pieces of plate presented by citizens whose houses and property had been preserved from fire by the exertions of the brigade, or by the fire companies of other cities, in testimony of their admiration for some particular act of gallantry or heroism which the newspapers had recorded."

Dr. Mackay also devotes a chapter to Americanisms, which throw some curious lights on the mutation of language. It must not be forgotten that the Puritan element had great and unbounded influence in the early days of American colonization, and we accordingly find such words as "platform" and "exercised" in common use, as, for example, "Mr. ——— was much exercised by an attack on him in a newspaper." Some words in use amongst us have had a characteristic impression made on them which alters the signification, such as "clever," which is intended to mean amiable, and "amiable" to mean stupid; but why "thin-skinned" means stingy, we are at a loss to account. There is a vigorous puritanical twang with "whole souled," such as we occasionally meet with in the writings of the elder Puritans, Thomas Becon, and others. They have also a wordy coinage of their own which, if not always elegant, is often expressive—thus to "make a splurge"—"to honey-fugle"—"to lobby"—the "real grit"—to "foot a bill"—are phrases which almost explain themselves, while "go-a-headitive" and "declension"—a declension to a ball—are nothing but clumsy solecisms.

Although everyone who has read the Knickerbocker Magazine must know the history of "Bunkum," yet we hope it may be new to others, as well as that of the term "Bogus," Dr. Mackay gives the following derivations:—

"Buncombe, or Bunkum.—A diffuse and angry orator having made a somewhat irrational and very unnecessary speech in the House of Representatives at Washington, where nobody thought it worth while to contradict him, was afterwards asked by a friend who met him in Pennsylvania Avenue why he had made such a display. 'I was not speaking to the house,' he replied; 'I was speaking to Buncombe'—a county or district by the majority of whose votes he had been elected. Hence Buncombe, or Bunkum, has become a phrase in America—and to some extent in England also—to express that extra parliamentary oratory which appeals to the passions or prejudices of the outside people, or sections of the people, and not to the reason and sound sense of a deliberative assembly.

Bogus, false, or sham; said to be derived from the name of a man notorious for issuing counterfeit notes. Hence 'bogus' news, a 'bogus' meeting, a 'bogus' baby, a 'bogus' senator, a 'bogus' convention."

A "dough-face" is a man of no opinion, but who can be readily kneaded into any that is found desirable. "To be under the weather," is a very expressive phrase. But the great puzzle, of which the Americans are wonderfully proud, is, "a bunch of sprouts," and as Dr. Mackay tells his story well, we cannot do better than let him enlighten us in his own words:—

"An Englishman who had steamed down the Mississippi with a captain who was not 'clever' in the American sense of the word, seeing on his arrival at New Orleans, a great assembly of people at the levee, and hearing a great disturbance, asked the captain what was the matter.

"Oh, nothing particular," said the captain. "It's only Jones, an editor, who has quarrelled with Smith, another editor, and given him a whole bunch of sprouts."

"A bunch of sprouts?" inquired the Englishman.

"Yes, a bunch of sprouts," said the captain.

"And what is a bunch of sprouts?" inquired John Bull, bewildered.

"Don't you know?" rejoined the captain.

"I don't," said John Bull.

"Then more fool you," was the reply, on giving which the captain turned upon his heel, and walked away.

"The Englishman, not altogether discouraged, applied to the clerk for information.

"Oh, editors are always quarrelling here," he replied. "It is but one editor who has given another a bunch of sprouts."

"But what is a bunch of sprouts?"

"Don't you know?"

"Not I."

"Why, what a fool you must be."

"The story is that the Englishman asks the same question since that day, no one knows how many years ago, of thousands of people, but never obtains an answer; that the idea has taken entire possession of his mind, and that he is wandering over the United States asking every one he meets, 'What is a bunch of sprouts?' Receiving no satisfactory reply, he hurries on from place to place, and from person to person, worn to a skeleton, the mere shadow of a man—a kind of Flying Dutchman—a spectral presence—a wandering Jew—asking the old, eternal question, never to be answered on this side the grave, 'What is a "bunch of sprouts?"' Should this unhappy citizen of our fortunate isles ever read these pages, the spell that is upon him will be broken, and he will learn that a 'bunch of sprouts' is a slang expression for the whole discharge of a revolver, barrel after barrel."

Dr. Mackay has dealt largely with the Western and Southern States, and familiar as we all are with the great system of river navigation in them—knowing, as we do, that there are great cities daily growing up on the confines of unexplored and primal forests, and the slavery, the swamps, and the unhealthy luxuriance of those parts—he has yet contrived to render them a study of interest to us. Cincinnati has been long known to Englishmen by name, and a name which we have all felt very much puzzled to account for, but after the clear description our author has given us we shall not so easily forget it, as a vast manufacturing city covered with a black mantle of coal smoke, like Leeds or Manchester, but not like them, producing cotton or woollen goods, but Catawba champagne and pickled pork. The champagne is made from the produce of a Mr. Longworth's vineyards, which now, after years of exertion, rival many of the vine grounds of Europe. The pork is turned out by machinery, properly slaughtered and salted; and so plentiful are swine in Ohio, so much more plentiful and cheaper than coal, that ere now pork has been burned instead of fuel, to keep up the fires of the steamboats on the Ohio."

We are not about to follow Dr. Mackay down the Mississippi, either in prose or verse—for the doctor writes it both ways—as we wish our readers to consult the book for themselves, but we feel so strongly interested with his pictures of New Orleans, that we cannot resist the temptation of an extract:—

"The most prominent public building in New Orleans is the St. Charles Hotel, an edifice somewhat in the style and appearance of the palace of the King of the Belgians, at Brussels. During the twelve days that our party remained under its hospitable roof it contained from seven hundred to seven hundred and fifty guests; and its grand entrance hall, where the gentlemen congregate from nine in the morning till eleven or twelve at night, to read the newspapers, to smoke, to chew, and, let me add, to spit, presented a scene of bustle and animation which can be compared to nothing but the Bourse at Paris during the full tide of business, when the agioteurs and the agents de change roar, and scream, and gesticulate like maniacs. The southern planters, and their wives and daughters, escaping from the monotony of their cotton and sugar plantations, come down to New Orleans in the early spring, and, as private lodgings are not to be had, they throng to the St. Louis and the St. Charles hotels, but principally to the St. Charles, where they lead a life of constant publicity and gaiety, and endeavour to make themselves amends for the seclusion and weariness of winter. As many as a hundred ladies (to say nothing of the gentlemen) sit down together at breakfast—the majority of them in full dress as for an evening party, and arrayed in the full splendour both of their charms and of their jewellery. Dinner is but a repetition of the same brilliancy, only that the ladies are still more gorgeously and elaborately dressed, and make a still greater display of pearls and diamonds. After dinner the drawing rooms offer a scene to which no city in the world affords a parallel. It is the very court of Queen Mab, whose courtiers are some of the fairest, wealthiest, and most beautiful of the daughters of the south, mingling in true Republican equality with the chance wayfarers, gentle or simple, well-dressed or ill-dressed, clean or dirty, who can pay for a nightly lodging or a day's board at this mighty caravanseral.

"So much for the indoor life of New Orleans. Its outdoor life is seen to the greatest advantage on the levee, where steamboats unload their rich freights of cotton, sugar, and molasses from Mississippi, Arkansas, and Tennessee, and of pork, flour, corn, and whisky, from the upper and inland regions of Missouri, Illinois, Ohio, and Kentucky, present a panorama that may be excelled in Europe for bustle and life, but not for picturesqueness. The river can scarcely be seen for the crowd of steamboats and of shipping that stretch along the levee for miles; and the levee itself is covered with bales of cotton, and other produce, which hundreds of negroes, singing at their work, with here and there an Irishman among them, are busily engaged in rolling from the steamers and depositing in the places set apart for each consignee. These places are distinguished one from the other by the little flag stuck upon them—flags of all colours and mixtures of colours and patterns; and here the goods remain in the open air, unprotected, until it pleases the consignees to remove them. New Orleans would seem, at first glance, to overflow with wealth to such an extent as to have no room for storage. The street pavements actually do service for warehouses, and are cumbered with barrels of salt, corn, flour, and molasses, and bales of cotton, to such an extent as to impede the traffic, and justify the belief that the police must either be very numerous and efficient, or the population very honestly disposed. The docks of Liverpool are busy enough, but there is no life or animation at Liverpool at all equal to those which may be seen at the levée in the 'Crescent City.' The fine open space, the clear atmosphere, the joyousness and alacrity of the negroes, the countless throngs of people, the forests of funnels and masts, the plethora of cotton and corn, the roar of arriving and departing steamboats, and the deeper and more constant roar of the multitude, all combine to impress the imagination with visions of wealth, power, and dominion, and to make the levée as attractive to the philosopher as it must be to the merchant and man of business."

Dr. Mackay tells us that the Americans are not an irreverent people, and he instances their feelings towards Washington in the following passage:—

"In natural beauty the Potomac is rich, but there is no place of any historic or even legendary interest on its banks between Agnia Creek and the capital, except one; but to every traveller, whatever his nation, that one is the most interesting spot in the United States. But interesting is too weak a word to express the feeling with which it is regarded by all the citizens of the great republic, young or old, male or female. It is their Mecca and their Jerusalem—hallowed ground, consecrated to all hearts by the remembrance of their great hero and patriot—the only one whom all Americans consent to honour and revere, and whom to disparage even by a breath, is in their estimation a crime only second to blasphemy and parricide. Mount Vernon, the home and tomb of George Washington, is the sacred spot of the North American continent, whither pilgrims repair, and on passing which each steamboat solemnly tolls a bell, and every passenger uncovers his head, in expression of the national reverence. Our boat did not stop to allow us to visit the place—a circumstance which I have since much regretted, as I never had another opportunity; but in the summer season, when travellers are more numerous, sufficient time is usually allowed for the purpose on the downward trip from Washington. But the bell on the upper deck tolled its requiem for the departed; and captain, crew, and passengers took off their hats and remained uncovered until Mount Vernon was left behind, and the home and grave of the hero were hidden from sight among their embowering verdure."

From every part of these two volumes of Life and Liberty in America, we gather expressions of liking for the people and their country. The only subjects which strike our author disagreeably are the "institutions" of slavery, tobacco chewing, and its consequent expectoration; the draughty, uncomfortable railway cars, with their anthracite stoves, and the monstrous extortions practised by their hackney coachmen. In all else Dr. Mackay writes in an appreciative and genial humour with America and the Americans; and as his reception was flattering, so we hope the entertaining volumes he has penned will be as agreeable to our cousins on the other side of the Atlantic as they are to us on this side, and prove that to a traveller who inquires for himself, and not like Captain Basil Hall, who visited America thoroughly prejudiced, that those children of the same common mother, who we ought to regard as brothers, are in no way behind the old country in the arts of peace and civilization.

NOTES ON LITERATURE, SCIENCE, AND ART.

This day (Saturday), September 3rd, a private view of the Liverpool Society of Arts will be held. We hear that, in addition to works by Messrs. Duncan, Gavin, Herring, and other native artists, the exhibition will include several examples of the Düsseldorf school, two by Leu, one by Achenbach, and about twenty others; together with works from other Continental schools, Paris, Belgium, and Bremen.

A story by Mr. Charles Dickens, which has been long talked of, has at length made its appearance in the New York Ledger. It is called "Hunted Down," and is intended for an illustration of life assurance. The American critics do not seem much struck with its beauties. The New York newspapers positively announce that Mr. Dickens has engaged to give a series of readings in the principal American cities for a consideration of £10,000. We believe it is true that an offer of this nature has been made to our illustrious countryman; but we are not aware that he has accepted it; and we believe the amount named to be exaggerated after the ordinary American custom.

The arrangements for the meeting of the British Association in Aberdeen next month are fast reaching completion. The New Music Hall, in which the principal of the Association's meetings will be held, is now ready for the seating, and presents a very fine appearance. The proceedings will be commenced by His Royal Highness the Prince Consort delivering an address in the new hall on the evening of Wednesday, the 14th of September.

The cartoons of Peter von Cornelius, from his earliest works to the last, have been placed together in the Berlin Academy, forming in themselves an exhibition which will be shortly opened to the public. These cartoons fill several large rooms of the Academical building.

In consequence of the approaching departure of the Right Hon. James Wilson for India, he has been compelled to decline the Treasurership of the Newspaper Press Fund, of which he still continues a Vice-President. The right honourable gentleman has expressed a hope that on his return to England, five years hence, he may find the fund a thriving institution. David Cato Macrae, Esq., barrister-at-law, has been elected Treasurer of the fund.

The Siccle, speaking of the prizes proclaimed at the annual sitting of the French Academy, says:—"M. Gilbert, who received a prize two years ago for a remarkable eulogium on Vauvenargues, obtains this year the prize for one on Regnard. M. Gilbert is the young man whose romantic marriage was at one moment a subject of conversation. Although a poor teacher, and the son of a workman, he married the wealthy Madlle. Schneider, whose brother he had educated. The prize for poetry has been carried off, against a hundred and forty competitors, by a young woman of twenty-five, a child of the people, a teacher, living on the produce of her lessons in the midst of her family of artisans. She has written a charming piece of poetry, full of simplicity and devoid of all declamation. It is M. Legouvé who is charged to read these two prize works. The name of the young woman is Madlle. Ernestine Drouet; she was pupil of Beranger, who took great pains with her, and at the age of eighteen she obtained the diploma of superior instruction.

The Council of Legal Education have issued a number of rules for the public examination of students in Michaelmas term, 1859. The mode of conducting the examinations is set forth, but these do not differ materially from the rules heretofore in force. The examination is to commence on Saturday, the 29th of October, and will be continued on the Monday and Tuesday following. It will be divided very much as heretofore. The list of books and authorities with which the examiners are expected to be acquainted is also given.

Lord Brougham is at present staying at Tynemouth, enjoying the fresh breezes of the North Sea. It is the intention of several of the mechanics' institutes and working men's institutes on the Tyne to present addresses to his lordship.

Sculpture (says the Athenæum) is at last secure of a home in England. Her Majesty's Commissioners for the Exhibition of 1851, and the Horticultural Society have finally agreed; and the works at Kensington will be proceeded with as soon as the money is subscribed. Of this there is little doubt. The Council of the Horticultural Society, at their last meeting, accepted the terms as altered by Her Majesty's Commissioners to meet the views expressed at the general meeting of the society. In our opinion, from what we have heard of the details, the agreement is liberal and fair to both parties, and such as becomes two important institutions acting in conjunction for a great purpose. Nearly 4,000 feet of beautiful arcades will form a noble palace for sculpture (and frescoes), and a noble adornment for the garden,—the greater part open and the rest glazed, and offering both a pleasant and instructive promenade at all seasons. It is a design that the metropolis may be proud of. The people of England may be proud of it, for no shilling in aid will be asked from Government. Of this voluntary aid of £50,000 (in addition to the £50,000 agreed to be expended by the Commissioners on the arcades) there is no doubt. Already the Council have received notice of munificent donations from Her Majesty and the Prince Consort, and of the Prince of Wales, and the younger branches of the Royal Family becoming life members,—and two hundred and thirty other ladies and gentlemen have put down their names, and the names of their children, as life subscribers, and have also subscribed for debentures various sums, amounting together to above £20,000; so that with donations, life members, and debentures, there is already promised above £28,000.

Mr. Laurence Oliphant is expected to deliver a lecture, on China and Japan, in Dunfermline, about the end of October, a subject on which, from his opportunities as private secretary to Lord Elgin, he is peculiarly qualified to instruct his hearers.

The library of the late Baron de Humboldt, bequeathed by him to his old valet, has been purchased for 40,000 thalers, the Vienna journals state, by Lord Bloomfield, minister of England at Berlin.

Mr. Robert George Wyndham Herbert, B.C.L., Fellow of All Souls (late of Balliol College), barrister-at-law of the Inner Temple, has been appointed secretary to Sir Geo. Ferguson Bowen, K.C.M.G., governor of Queensland, Moreton Bay. Mr. Herbert, in 1851, obtained the Hertford scholarship, "For the Encouragement of Latin Literature;" in 1852, the Ireland scholarship, "For the Promotion of Classical Learning and Taste;" in the same year, the Chancellor's prize for Latin verse, "Avium migrationes;" and, in 1854, the Eldon law scholarship.

The Builder says that the Dublin National Gallery is proceeding, being now more than half up, and first floor of joists laid. It will be connected with the Royal Dublin Society's house by a Corinthian colonnade of quadrant form, and similar to that uniting the corresponding wing of the Museum, with the exception that the screen wall between the pillars will be omitted. Without referring to the merits of these new buildings, the Royal Dublin Society's premises will surely be rendered more architecturally important by their erection, and that body will have no reason to regret their concession of the site of the 1853 Industrial Exhibition. Messrs. Cockburn are the contractors, and the iron girders, &c., are being supplied from the Oxman Town foundry, Mr. W. Turner, proprietor.

The monument to Agnes Burns, eldest sister to Robert Burns, has been erected in St. Nicholas churchyard, Dundalk, where the mortal remains of the poet's favourite sister are interred. The monument has a very chaste and characteristic effect. About £70 was contributed by the inhabitants of Dundalk and its vicinity towards the erection of the monument.

It is stated that busts of Cicero and Agrippina and a statue of Apollo, all in bronze, were found a few days ago in removing some earth for a road near Pompeii, and were placed in the Museum at Naples.

The exhibition of the works of living artists, which was to have taken place in the Museum at Naples in June last, has been fixed for the 1st September next.

The Lombardia announces that King Victor Emmanuel has directed the minister of his household to entrust to two Lombard artists the execution of two paintings, one representing the battle of Solferino, and the other the taking of San Martino, an episode of the same battle in which the Piedmontese, who formed the left wing of the allied army, were the sole actors. His majesty has also signified his pleasure that a Lombard sculptor be commissioned to execute a marble monument recording the heroic defence of the city of Brescia against the Austrian troops in 1849. The cost of all these works of art is to be defrayed by the privy purse.

Some people will be surprised to hear, not that Leigh Hunt is dead, but that he only died on Sunday last. He had scarcely exceeded the age allotted to man (he was in his seventy-fifth year), and yet, to almost all but an inner circle of friends, he was one of a generation long since passed away. Hazlitt, Lamb, Shelley, Byron—these are the names with which the name of Leigh Hunt will ever be associated. He has outlived them all. Some of them perished in early youth, and he, their friend, has lived to see the judgment of posterity passed on those whom he knew in the intimate intercourse of every-day life. Leigh Hunt played a conspicuous part during a stormy period in our political history. Whatever differences of opinion may separate between him and us, no English journalist can ever forget what he once suffered for that freedom of the press which, partly through his exertions, is now one of the brightest features in the British constitution, and the proudest boast of Englishmen. If we do not agree with his political opinions, we cannot but thank the man who stood forward as a champion of a free press in days when the liberty of writing was scarcely understood even in this country. Leigh Hunt has outlived all the opposition he once encountered, and those who only knew him in later years, found it hard to realize in that genial, venerable old man, full of pleasant anecdote, the uncompromising partisan who defied a government fifty years ago. And yet he kept working on to the last—working with all the fire and energy of youth; for no one who read his last "Occasional" in the Spectator of Saturday, August 20th, a week before his death, would have believed that the hand that penned it would so soon be cold in death. He is now gone from us for ever, and almost the last link is severed which united us with the writers, wits, and poets of the early part of this century. A more kindly, more loving, more sympathising nature was never known than his, and his death has left a blank which it will be difficult indeed to fill.

PRESENTATION.—We have just had submitted to our notice a very choice specimen of artistic workmanship, in the shape of a presentation cup, the work of Bro. Wyon, of most graceful proportion, with grapes and foliage clustering about, chased up with all the care of a Benvenuto Cellini; it stands upon a black marble cube adorned with monograms. The inscription bears the names of two brethren known by almost everybody, it is this—"An expression of personal esteem from W. Campbell Sleigh to John Mott Thearle, 1859." The first we need not remind our readers is the eminent criminal lawyer, and the second our esteemed brother, the Masonic jeweller of Fleet-street.

Poetry.

SIR MARMADUKE POLE.

BY WILLIAM ALLINGHAM.

SIR MARMADUKE POLE was a sturdy old knight,
Who in war and in peace had done every man right;
He lived with his neighbours in loving accord,
Save the Abbot and Monks, whom he fiercely abhorred,
This rough old Sir Marmaduke Pole.

He sat like a king in his old castle hall,
With guests round his table, and servants at call;
He whoop'd to the falcon, he hunted the deer,—
If down by the Abbey, his comrades could hear
A growl from Sir Marmaduke Pole.

Now Sir Marmaduke lay on his leave-taking bed;
And he smiled on the mourners, and tranquilly said,
"I can trust my poor soul to the Lord God of Heaven,
Though living unpriested, and dying unshriv'n;
Say goodbye to old Marmaduke Pole."

But his lady and others do sorely repine
He thus should decess like an ox or a swine.
A message in haste to the Abbey they send;
For there's frost on the tongue, and the arm cannot bend,
Of sturdy Sir Marmaduke Pole.

Says my Lady, "Too long have I yielded my mind."
Says Richard, "To go with the world I'm inclined."
"O Mother of Mercy!" sobs Jane his young spouse,
"O Saviour, thou wert not disown'd in this house!"
And she prays for Sir Marmaduke Pole.

Good Abbot Ambrosius forgets every wrong,
And speeds to the gate which repell'd him so long.
The stair ("Pax vobiscum!") is strange to his tread.
He puts everyone forth. There's no voice from the bed
Of quiet Sir Marmaduke Pole.

Again the door opens; they enter the place,
Pale, rigid, and stern, lies the well-belov'd face.
"The Church, through God's mercy and blessed Saint John,
Has received in her bosom a penitent son."
So parted Sir Marmaduke Pole.

Who feasts with Sir Richard? Who shrives Lady Jane?
Whose mule to the Castle, jogs right without rein?
Our Abbey has moorland and meadowland wide,
Where, hawking and hunting, so proudly would ride
This headstrong Sir Marmaduke Pole.

In the chancel they buried Sir Marmaduke Pole;
And sang many masses for good of his soul.
Amidst praying and chiming, and incense and flame,
His bones fell to dust. You may still read his name
In blurr'd letters,—Sir Marmaduke Pole.

REMEMBRANCE.

BY THE LATE CHARLOTTE BRONTE.

COLD in the earth and deep snow piled above thee,
Far, far removed, cold in the dreary grave!
Have I forgot, my only love, to love thee,
Severed at last by Time's all severing wave.

Now, when alone my thoughts no longer hover
Over the mountains on that northern shore,
Resting their wings where heath and fern-leaves cover
Thy noble heart for ever, ever more.

Cold in the earth, and fifteen wild Decembers
From those brown hills have melted into spring:
Faithful, indeed, the spirit that remembers
After such years of change and suffering!

Sweet love of youth, forgive if I forget thee,
While the world's tide is bearing me along;
Other desires and other hopes beset me,
Hopes which obscure, but cannot do thee wrong.

No later light has lightened up my heaven,
No second morn has ever shone for me;
All my life's bliss from thy dear life given—
All my life's bliss is in the grave with thee.

But when the days of golden dreams had perished,
And ev'n despair was powerless to destroy;
Then did I learn existence could be cherished,
Strengthened and fed without the aid of joy.

Then did I check the tears of useless passion—
Weaned my young soul from yearning after thine;
Sternly denied its burning wish to hasten
Down to that tomb already more than mine.

And even yet I dare not let it languish,—
Dare not indulge in memory's rapturous pain;
Once drinking deep of that divinest anguish,
How could I seek the empty world again?

MORNING.

MORNING clouds are fleecy and white,
Drifting freshly o'er the valley.
Trees are awaying,
Winds are playing,
Musically, musically,
In the branches, to and fro.
Airy light,
Bending low
To the rillet at my feet.
Life is sweet!
Merrily, merrily,
Bright birds, sing ye,
Mid the green of emerald buds:
How the ringing
Of your wild singing
Echoes, echoes in the woods!
And the tinkling music swells
From the silver-toned sheep-bells,
Chiming and climbing
Up the golden dells.
Rillet fleet,
Kissing my feet,
Life is sweet!

ON A VILLAGE CHURCH NEAR THE SEA.

BY T. MITCHELL.

TIME-HONOURED pile, relic of former days,
Within whose walls our ancestors of yore
Their fervent prayers to Heav'n were wont to raise,
And the great Saviour of mankind adore.
Would that some mightier, holier harp than mine,
Were tuned in honour of thy ancient shrine!
Who, as he gazes on thy tower proud,
And rapturously walks thy walls around,
Would not draw contrast 'twixt the busy crowd,
And the tranquillity of holy ground?
Who would not say, in some such spot may I,
When this short life is ended, peaceful lie?

DREAMS.

DREAMS are but interludes which fancy makes;
When monarch reason sleeps, this mimic wakes:
Compounds a medley of disjointed things,
A court of cobblers and a mob of kings.
Light fumes are merry, grosser fumes are sad,
Both o'er the reasonable soul run mad;
And many monstrous forms in sleep we see,
That neither were, nor are, nor e'er can be.
Sometimes forgotten things long cast behind,
Rush forward in the brain, and come to mind;
The nurse's legends are for truths received,
And the man dreams but what the boy believed.
Sometimes we but rehearsed a former play.
The night restores our actions done by day;
As hounds in sleep will open for their prey.
In short, the farce of dreams is of a piece,
Chimeras all, and more absurd or less.

LEIGH HUNT.

SE MONICA TI FAI.

If you become a nun, dear,
A friar I will be;
In any cell you run, dear,
Pray look behind for me.
The rose, of course, turns pale, too;
The doves all take the veil, too;
The blind will see the show.
What! you become a nun, my dear!
I'll not believe it—no!
If you become a nun, dear,
The bishop Love will be;
The Cupids every one, dear,
Will chant, "We trust in thee;"
The incense will go sighing,
The candles fall a dying,
The water turn to wine.
What! you go take the vows, my dear!
You may—but they'll be mine.

CORRESPONDENCE.

entertained by Correspondents.]

THE PROVINCIAL GRAND LODGE OF WILTSHIRE.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE FREEMASONS' MAGAZINE AND MASONIC MIRROR.

SIR AND BROTHER,—On perusing your excellent publication of the 27th instant, I saw the report of the meeting of the Provincial Grand Lodge of Wiltshire, at Chippenham, on the 23rd instant; and, among other matters, the account of my calling the attention of the Provincial Grand Lodge to the rule in the Book of Constitutions, at page 49, "That the Provincial Grand Officers must all be resident in the province, and subscribing members of some Lodge therein; but the Most Worshipful Grand Master may grant a dispensation for non-residence. A fee of two guineas for Grand Wardens, and one guinea for any subordinate officer, shall be paid to the general fund of charity for such dispensation." I think it will be apparent to all persons and brethren who can read plain English that no one has a right to provincial rank unless he resides in the province, or unless there is such dispensation granted by the Most Worshipful Grand Master for non-residence, and, before any non-resident is appointed, such dispensation should be read in open Lodge, and a minute thereof made in the Secretary's book. At least, such is the course usually adopted, as I have been informed by many old and very experienced Masons. It was attempted to be shown that the Right Worshipful Provincial Grand Master had the power of granting such dispensation. But, supposing that to be the case, have ever any such dispensations been granted? Perhaps some old and experienced Masons will have the kindness to inform their younger brethren how in this matter the law should be interpreted.

I think that Bro. White—the Somerset member who thought severely to rebuke me for making the observations I did, in accusing me of doing the same thing in an adjoining province to which I objected in Wiltshire—should have taken care to let some of his rebuke be a correct statement of the facts. My answer to his rebuke is, that Col. Tynte did me the honour to give me the right to wear the Somerset purple in the year 1843 or 1844, about eleven years before the rule I referred to found its way into the Book of Constitutions, which I believe was in the year 1855. And thereby hangs a tale—how did it get there?

I beg to repeat what I stated in Grand Lodge—that I had no personal or vindictive motive in making the observation I did against the Somerset brethren, for whom I entertain the highest respect, being myself a Somersetshire man, and having been initiated in that province. I was only anxious that charity should have its due, and, in order that no one should be damaged by what I said, I abstained purposely from mentioning the matter until all the officers had been appointed.

I am, Sir, yours fraternally,

J. W. BROWNE,

P. Prov. G.S.W. of Wiltshire, M.E.Z. No. 453.

Swindon, August 30, 1859.

[The law was brought forward by Bro. Dobie, when President of the Board of General Purposes, and has been continually violated. Indeed, it would be worth while for some brother to move for a return of the number of dispensations applied for and granted. We never heard of more than one dispensation being applied for, and that was refused.—ED.]

THE MARK MASTER'S JEWEL.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE FREEMASONS' MAGAZINE AND MASONIC MIRROR.

DEAR SIR AND BROTHER,—Where is the line of demarcation? I appealed to you as being of excellent authority in matters of Masonic jurisprudence, contending that in the Craft Lodge such jewel should not be worn but at a banquet held in another apartment, or even in the same room if all Lodge business was over and all matters placed where the eye of curiosity could not dive—and find, that such or any other jewel might be borne at the pleasure of the wearer. You replied that it was not so, but added that the Victoria Cross, or other medal, might be worn in Grand Lodge—recollecting, doubtless, what H.R.H. the last G.M. wore there.

If the Mark Master's jewel is not to be worn at a banquet, what think you of the banqueting room of a celebrated Lodge, decorated with emblems of the Rose Croix, the walls bearing many shields of Templars, with horns of Foresters, and a large engraving, handsomely framed, respecting the Order of Foresters, hung in the centre place of the wall opposite the fire place. Minute books of two Craft Lodges and Mark Master's Lodge mixed, open for the inspection of any who might walk up the stairs and enter the silent Lodge room—with working tools and tracing board displayed?

Where is the schoolmaster? Do send him to those naughty boys, and tell him to transfer the horns and tableaux to some other and more fitting place than amongst Holy Templars and Knights of the Rose Croix—and do tell us where is the line of demarcation.

Yours most truly,

R. E. X.

APPOINTMENT OF GRAND OFFICERS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE FREEMASONS' MAGAZINE AND MASONIC MIRROR.

DEAR SIR AND BROTHER,—Grand Lodge has lately created a new Grand Office, viz., that of Assistant Grand Pursuivant, to which I presume the M.W. Grand Master will appoint at our ensuing Grand Lodge. It is thus acknowledged that in Grand Lodge alone resides the power of creating new Grand Offices. For the last few years, however, the Grand Master has annually appointed an Assistant Grand Secretary and given him rank before the Grand Organist, and I am informed that Grand Lodge never having created that office, the appointment, consequently, is illegal. It appears for the first time in the edition of the Book of Constitutions published in 1855, and as the former edition was published only two years previous, it is evidently during that period that the M.W. Grand Master made the first appointment, and yet during that period the office was certainly not created by Grand Lodge. Such being the case, if the office is necessary would it not be better for the Board of General Purposes at once to recommend Grand Lodge to legalize it?

Ere I close this letter I will allude to another subject that requires attention. In your account of the Masonic services of the Grand Officers for this year, you state that the S.G.W. Lord de Tabley is about to take the Junior Warden's chair of the Lodge of Unity, No. 403, Crewe. Now is it not a pity that after a slumber of more than a quarter of a century, his newly awakened Masonic zeal should have been stopped by the head of our Order, for the Book of Constitutions states that the Grand Wardens cannot act as Wardens of a private Lodge. Now, pray inform the Craft of the utility of that law when they are allowed to fill the far more important office of W.M. Would it not be far better to substitute for it the law relating to Provincial Grand Wardens, which is as follows:—"No brother can be appointed a Provincial Grand Warden unless he be the Master or Past Master of a Lodge, &c." The two laws are certainly at variance, and one of them ought to be repealed—which of the two might, I think, be left to the common sense of Grand Lodge.

I am, dear Sir and Brother, yours fraternally,
P.M.

MASONIC MEMS.

THE Mount Sinai Chapter of Instruction will hold their first convocation for the season at the Red Horse Tavern, Old Bond Street, on Saturday, September 3rd, at eight o'clock, and will continue to meet every Saturday during the winter season.

THE Albion Lodge of Instruction (No. 9) will resume its labours for the winter season on Saturday, September 3rd, at seven o'clock, at Bro. John Gurton's, Red Horse Tavern, Old Bond Street.

GRAND LODGE.

The following is the detailed programme of the business to be transacted on Wednesday, September 7th, 1859:—

The minutes of the Quarterly Communication of the 1st of June, and of an especial Grand Lodge held on the 23rd of June, will be read, and respectively put for confirmation.

The report of the Board of Benevolence for the last quarter, in which are recommendations for grants to

Bro. Noah Wardle, of Lodge No. 421, Marple, for..... £30

Bro. William D. Laws, of Lodge No. 95, Sunderland, for... £30

REPORT OF THE BOARD OF GENERAL PURPOSES.

The Board of General Purposes beg to report that on the 15th of March last, on the complaint of the Deputy Provincial Grand Master for Sussex, they caused a summons to be issued to Bro. Thomas Heward, of the Mariners' Lodge, No. 878, at Littlehampton, to attend and produce the warrant and books of the said Lodge; that, failing to attend on the 19th April, he was peremptorily summoned to attend at the next meeting of the Board; that on the 17th May he again failed to attend, but forwarded a communication, praying for further delay, which was granted; that since then he has neither attended nor taken any notice of the communications of the Board, and the Board have, therefore, felt it their duty to suspend him from all Masonic functions, and now report the same to the Grand Lodge.

The Board also report that it has been brought under their notice by the M.W. Grand Master that the members of certain Provincial Lodges are in the habit of wearing embroidered on their aprons other emblems than those sanctioned by the Book of Constitutions. The Board have directed a communication to be made to the Provincial Grand Master of the province, directing his attention to the circumstances, and requesting him to take the necessary steps for the discontinuance of a practice which is in violation of the law (p. 118).

The Board further report that they have received an application from Messrs. Elkington & Co., the lessees of the tavern, requesting the grant of a sum of money, to be expended in repairs of the great hall; that they have caused inquiry to be made under the authority of the Grand Superintendent of Works, who reports that the repairs necessary may be completed for a sum not exceeding £275, and that competent persons are ready to undertake the work. The Board, therefore, recommend that the sanction of Grand Lodge be given for such outlay.

The Board also report that they have caused the organs in the great hall and temple to be carefully examined, and an estimate made of the expense of putting them into an efficient state. The Board have reason to believe that the cost will not exceed the sum of £70, and they, therefore, recommend that they be authorized to expend that amount.

Complaints having been made to the Board of the inconvenience to which provincial brethren may be put by the late period at which the Quarterly Communication papers are issued, they have made arrangements by which, for the future, such papers will be printed and circulated as speedily as possible after each Grand Lodge.

The Board have much pleasure in recommending that the following Lodges, which have made the necessary returns, be removed from the list of those which are summoned to show cause at the next meeting of Grand Lodge why they should not be erased, viz.:

Howard Lodge of Brotherly Love, No. 64, Arundel.

Derbyshire Lodge, No. 143, Longnor, Staffordshire.

St. David's Lodge, No. 474, Milford.

Combermere Lodge, No. 880, Liscaud, Cheshire.

Peveril of the Peak Lodge, No. 940, New Mills, near Glossop.

Then follows the cash account.

METROPOLITAN.

HIGH CROSS LODGE (No. 1056).—The second annual festival of this Lodge took place at the Railway Hotel, Northumberland Park, Tottenham, on Friday, the 26th ult., at three p.m., for the purpose of installing the Worshipful Master elect. The Lodge was duly opened in the first, second, and third degrees for passing and raising two brethren. After which Bro. J. G. Willson was duly installed W.M. Bro. Dominy was elected Treasurer, and the new W.M. appointed as his officers for the ensuing year, Bros. T. W. Dominy, S.W.; J. Wright, J.W.; S. D. Potts, Sec.; E. Wilden, S.D.; W. P. Smith, J.D.; Sells, I.G. Bro. Bradley was elected Tyler. Bro. S. D. Potts, P.M., duly invested the officers with their respective collars, and delivered a very impressive charge to each on his duties to the Great Architect of the universe, the brethren, and to this Lodge in particular. The Lodge was then closed in due form and solemn prayer. The brethren afterwards adjourned to the pavilion in the pleasure garden to dinner. After which they proceeded to the Lodge, where an excellent dessert awaited them. This Lodge, being so delightfully situated at an easy distance from the City of London, affords an agreeable trip to the brethren of the various Lodges, who honour it with their presence as visitors. The dinner gave the greatest satisfaction. The evening was spent in that spirit of brotherly love which ought ever to animate Freemasons.

INSTRUCTION.

ROYAL JUBILEE LODGE (No. 85).—At the weekly meeting of this Lodge, on Sunday last, Bro. Ireland, W.M., worked the third ceremony and lectures of the degree much to the edification of a numerous meeting. It was proposed by Bro. Haydon, and seconded by Bro. Hoad, that the sum of ten guineas from the funds be voted to the Royal Masonic Institution for Boys, which was carried unanimously; in proposing this vote, Bro. Haydon made some observations on the increased necessity of affording support to this charity, in consequence of the governors having resolved on admitting the whole of the boys into the establishment in Lordship-lane, and which would entail a very considerable increase in the expenditure of that establishment. By this donation the W.M. pro m. of the Lodge becomes a governor during the existence of the Lodge.

PROVINCIAL.

CHANNEL ISLANDS.

JERSEY.—Lodge La Césarée (No. 860).—The usual monthly meeting of this Lodge was held on Thursday, August 25th, under the presidency of Bro. Schmitt, P.M., in the absence of the W.M., who was detained by urgent domestic circumstances, but nevertheless arrived in time to close the Lodge and to preside at the banquet. There was a large attendance of members, and among the visitors were the Rt. Worshipful Prov. Grand Master, Bro. J. J. Hammond; Bro. Percival, S.W., of the Scientific Lodge, Cambridge, No. 105; Bro. Luxton, Wisconsin Lodge (America), No. 18; Bro. Hopkins, Past Prov. S.G.W., for Warwickshire; Bro. Embling, of the Royal Clarence Lodge, Brighton, No. 338; Bro. Charles Johnson, S.D., of the Royal Sussex Lodge, No. 722; and other brethren, members of the local Lodges. The Lodge having been opened in the first degree, the circular convening the meeting was read, from which it appeared that the work of the evening would be heavy, consisting of two initiations and six raisings, but of these only two actually took place. The minutes of the last meeting were read and confirmed. A printed communication was announced from Grand Lodge, in reference to irregular Lodges in Turkey, which was ordered to be received and entered on the minutes. Letters were read from the Yarborough Lodge, No. 302, and from the Royal Sussex Lodge, No. 722, in reply to applications made by the Secretary of La Césarée, on behalf of the proposed Masonic Temple. In the former it was stated that Bro. Baker had been appointed a delegate to act with the members of La Césarée on the building committee, and that discussion on the question of pecuniary aid towards the accomplishment of the object was deferred until the views and plans of its promoters should be more matured and better understood. The Royal Sussex Lodge mentioned the appointment of Bro. James Johnson, P.M., to represent the members on the building committee, and expressed best wishes for the successful completion of so desirable an undertaking, without however giving any promise of pecuniary assistance. The Lodge was then opened in the second degree, and the usual questions having been put to Bros. Leigh and Neel, the Lodge was opened in the third degree. On their readmission they were raised to the sublime degree of M.M., with the accustomed ceremonies, which were impressively performed by Bro. Schmitt. It was announced, that since the last meeting a highly esteemed member, Bro. Picot, had been removed from his earthly Lodge, and that as a mark of deserved respect, his funeral rites had been attended by a very large number of the Brethren, though without Masonic honours and observances. It was ordered that the Lodge should wear the emblems of mourning for the space of three months. Bro. Schmitt proposed as a joining member Bro. William Smith, who, though initiated into Masonry in England, had recently taken the third degree in La Césarée. The Lodge was then closed with the usual solemn ceremonies, and the brethren, having ratified their fraternal vows, retired to an adjoining room at about half-past nine, for refreshment and an hour's social intercourse. It may be added, that the ground for the proposed Temple has been purchased, that the plans are nearly finished, and that the architect hopes in the course of a few days to place them in the hands of the brethren authorized by the Lodge to decide respecting them.—H.H.

CUMBERLAND.

CARLISLE.—Union Lodge (No. 389).—This Lodge held a meeting at the Old King's Head, August 30th. It being the regular monthly meeting, the Lodge was opened by Bro. F. W. Haywood, S.W., assisted by the Past Masters of the Lodge. The visitors present were, Bro. Bradshaw, No. 793; Bro. Shann, No. 424; Bro. C. J. Banister, P.M., No. 267, W.M., No. 56, who officiated as Deacon. Bros. Wilson and Armstrong being present, and desirous to take the third degree, were examined, and afterwards raised to the sublime degree of M.M., which was very efficiently done by the S.W., assisted by Bro. Bradshaw as S.W., Bro. Ritson as J.W. There was a full attendance of the brethren of the Lodge, and after the business was ended the visitors and members adjourned to refreshments, and spent a very happy evening. This Lodge is showing signs of great improvement, and a stimulus is given to its members by the D.Prov.G.M. conferring the purple upon Bro. Haywood, to the satisfaction of the Lodge. The usual loyal and Masonic toasts were given and responded to, and the brethren separated at eleven o'clock.

DURHAM.

GATESHEAD.—Lodge of Industry (No. 56).—The regular monthly meeting of this Lodge was held at the Grey Horse Inn, on Monday, August 22nd. Present: the W.M. Bro. C. J. Banister in the chair, assisted by Bros. H. Hotham, P.M., Prov. S.G.W., Northumberland; Anthony Clapham, P.Prov.G., Registrar; and the officers of the Lodge. Bro. Geo. Green being present, and wishing to take the second degree, was examined; and Bro. Belsher, of Lodge No. 793, was also passed, at the request of the W.M. of that Lodge, by Bro. Anthony Clapham, P.M., in his usual impressive manner. Bros. Emmerson, Wm. Green, Wm. Robinson, and Barker, wishing to take the third degree, were severally examined and raised to that sublime degree by the W.M., who distinguished himself in explaining the tracing board, working tools, and giving each the charge with his usual earnestness. Mr. John Jackson Brumwell was proposed and seconded as a candidate for Freemasonry; and, the business of the Lodge concluded, it was closed in due form and with solemn prayer at ten p.m., and the brethren separated.

LANCASHIRE (WEST).

LIVERPOOL.—Merchants' Lodge of Instruction (No. 294).—On Tuesday, the 30th August, this Lodge held its regular meeting at the Masonic Temple, No. 20, Hope-street, Liverpool, when the whole of the seven sections of the first lecture were ably worked; the questions being put by Bro. Younghusband, W.M., No. 294.

NORTHUMBERLAND.

NEWCASTLE.—Lodge of Instruction, under the Warrant of No. 24.—A meeting of this Lodge was held at the Freemasons' Hall, Blackett-street, Newcastle-on-Tyne, on Tuesday, August 23rd, 1859, Bro. Anthony Clapham, P.M. as W.M. There were also present, Bros. H. Hotham, P.M.; S. Bell, P.M.; Bros. Lambton as S.W.; Harding as J.W.; A. Gillespie, Treas.; Banning, Sec.; and a very full attendance of the brethren. Bro. C. J. Banister, P.M., was appointed Lecture Master, and proceeded to deliver a beautiful lecture on the tracing board in the first degree, which was acknowledged by the brethren, who wished a vote of thanks to be recorded on the minutes. To this the Lecture Master objected: he said that being one of the founders of the Lodge, it was no more than his duty to do all in his power for its welfare. The Lodge was opened in the several degrees, and the officers instructed in their several duties. This Lodge is working well, and numbers all the working Masons of Newcastle and Gateshead; and from the zeal of its young members, and the kindness of the Past Masters of the district, it is bringing about a correct uniformity. Four brethren were proposed as joining members, and the Lodge was closed at ten o'clock.

WORCESTERSHIRE.

KIDDERMINSTER.—Lodge of Hope and Charity (No. 523).—This Lodge held its usual monthly meeting on Monday, August 29, when Bro. the Rev. M. S. A. Walrond, of Kidderminster, and the Apollo University Lodge, No. 460, Oxford, was unanimously elected a joining member and Chaplain to the Lodge. Bro. J. Cope was raised to the sublime degree of Mark Master. The visitors were Bros. B. Brooks, P.M., No. 824; Stourbridge, Prov. G. Dir. of Cers.; and H. T. Woodward, of Kidderminster, hailing from No. 843, Sydney, New South Wales.

MARK MASONRY.

PROVINCIAL.

NEWCASTLE.—Lodge of Mark Masters (L.C.)—A meeting of this Lodge was held on Wednesday, August 24th, at Freemasons' Hall, Newgate-street, Newcastle-on-Tyne. In the absence of the R.W.M., the chair was taken by the S.W., Bro. Septimus Bell, assisted by the rest of the officers. Bro. Penman having been balloted for some time previously and wishing to receive this degree was admitted in due form, attended by the Deacons, Bros. A. Gillespie and C. I. Banister. The acting W.M. was very impressive in the performance of the ceremony. After the remaining business was completed, a candidate was proposed, seconded, and recorded, and the Lodge was closed at nine o'clock. The brethren adjourned to refreshment and spent a very happy hour.

ANTIGUA.

SAINT JOHN'S LODGE (No. 723).—At the meeting held on Wednesday evening, the 13th July, 1859, at the Lodge Room in the city of Saint John's, Antigua, Bro. Chas. Alexander, W.M., presiding, it was moved by Bro. Joseph Shervington, P.M., seconded by Bro. John Shervington, P.M., and resolved unanimously, "That this Lodge tenders its sincere congratulations to Bro. the Right Worshipful Daniel Hart, upon his appointment, by the Grand Master of England, to the distinguished office of Provincial Grand Master in the Island of Trinidad, Grenada, and Saint Vincent—a post which his abilities as a talented and worthy member of the brotherhood so well merits—and the duties of which every Craftsman here feels convinced will be so ably performed as to secure the unqualified approbation of the head of the Order, by whom he has been appointed." It was also resolved, "That a copy of these resolutions be respectfully enclosed to our brother, the Right Worshipful Provincial Grand Master, whose period of service in his exalted position the members of the Saint John's Lodge feel the assurance will be marked with the satisfaction of the brethren of those Lodges within his jurisdiction; and that the Worshipful Master be requested to carry out the foregoing."

ST. VINCENT.

ROYAL VICTORIA LODGE (No. 755).—The brethren of the Masonic Craft have, during the last few days, been actively engaged in the prosecution of their duties, owing to the arrival in the island of the Right Worshipful Bro. Hart, appointed by the M.W. Grand Master the Earl of Zetland, Prov. Grand Master of the Lodges comprised in the district of Trinidad, Grenada, and St. Vincent. On Saturday evening, the Prov. Grand Master met the brethren of "Victoria Lodge, No. 755," now, by virtue of the powers in him vested, designated by the honourable title of "The Royal Victoria Lodge," and, after some time occupied in the examination of the record, and other necessary business, he delivered to the brethren an address. On Wednesday evening, the brethren of the Royal Victoria Lodge entertained the Prov. Grand Master at dinner, at Miss Amiel's hotel. At seven o'clock, twenty-two members of the Craft sat down to a very excellent repast, to which we have no doubt, as good workmen, ample justice was done. The usual loyal and Masonic toasts followed, and at eleven the party separated, after a pleasing reunion, throughout which harmony and good fellowship prevailed. We cannot close this brief notice without observing, that we have heard the Prov. Grand Master spoken of in high terms of commendation by the brethren—they seem to regard him as an ornament to their Order. He has been pleased, we are further informed, to appoint one of the brethren, J. H. Brown, Assistant Prov. Grand Secretary.—From the Guardian Newspaper of the 21st July, 1859.

GAPE OF GOOD HOPE.

BRITISH LODGE (No. 419).—On St. John's day, the 24th of June, the brethren of this Lodge presented the retiring Worshipful Master, Bro. J. S. Rowe, with a Past Master's jewel, as a mark of their appreciation of the manner in which he fulfilled the duties of the office occupied by him during the past year. On the evening of the same day, upwards of fifty members of the Craft dined together at the Masonic Hotel.—Cape Argus.

AMERICA.

VERMONT.

THE LECTURES OF PRESTON IN THE UNITED STATES.

THE M. W. Bro. Philip C. Tucker, at the last Grand Lodge, held in January, gave an interesting address; part of which, on the subject of uniformity of working, we quote:—

"Much has been said and written about the lectures of the Order, and uniformity of work has been the subject of free discussion for several years past, in most of the Grand Lodge jurisdictions of the United States. The Grand Lecturer of New York informs us, notwithstanding all this discussion, that he found, during the last year, no less than five different systems of work and lectures existing in that State, and that four of them prevailed in a single Lodge—so that, until the labour began, the brethren did not know which particular system was to be the order of the evening. Some Masons are apt to be so prejudiced in favour of the particular mode of work, and the lectures in which they were taught, as to turn from all investigation, even as to their correctness. I have known some brethren so perfectly carried away with some petty passages, gaudily ornamented with stuff of the slightest tinsel, as to stop their ears against reason and argument, and stick to their fancies through life, at the expense of 'leaving truth and common sense behind.'

"It is my purpose to say a few words to you as to the work and lectures—and those only—which are authorized to be taught in this jurisdiction.

"Several years previous to 1788, William Preston was Master of the Lodge of Antiquity in London, that Lodge being one of the four old Lodges which met at the Apple Tree Tavern in Charles-street, Covent-garden, in Feb. 1717, and constituted themselves into a Grand Lodge, the first regularly organized Grand Lodge of which we have any knowledge. Bro. Preston gives us the following account of his action while Master of this old Lodge of Antiquity.

"'When,' says he, 'I first had the honour to be elected Master of a Lodge, I thought it proper to inform myself fully of the general rules of the society, that I might be able to fulfil my own duty and officially enforce a due obedience in others. The methods which I adopted with this view, excited in some of superficial knowledge, an absolute dislike of what they considered as innovations; and in others, who were better informed, a jealousy of pre-eminence which the principles of Masonry ought to have checked. Notwithstanding these discouragements, however, I persevered in my intention of supporting the dignity of the society, and of discharging with fidelity the trust reposed in me. As candour and integrity, uninfluenced by interest or favour, will ever support a good cause, many of my opponents began to discover their error, and not only applauded, but cheerfully concurred in the execution of my measures; while others of less liberality, tacitly approved what their former declared opinions forbade them publicly to adopt.

"'This success exceeding my most sanguine wishes; I was encouraged to examine with more attention the contents of our various lectures. The rude and imperfect state in which I found them, the variety of modes established in our meetings, and the difficulties which I encountered in my researches, rather discouraged my first attempt; persevering, however, in the design, I continued the pursuit; and assisted by a few brethren, who had carefully pursued what ignorance and degeneracy had rejected as unintelligible and absurd, I diligently sought for, and at length happily acquired, some of the ancient and venerable landmarks of the Order.

"'Fully determined to pursue the design of effecting a general reformation, and fortunate in the acquisition of the friends that I had made, I continued my industry till I had prevailed on a sufficient number to join in an attempt to correct the irregularities which had crept into our assemblies, and exemplify the beauty and utility of the Masonic system.

"'We commenced our plan by enforcing the value of the ancient charges and regulations of the Order, which inattention had suffered to sink into oblivion, and we established these charges as the basis of our work. To imprint on the memory the faithful discharge of our duty, we reduced the most material parts of our system into practice; and to encourage others in promoting the plan, we observed a general rule of reading one or more of these charges at every regular meeting, and of elucidating such passages as seemed obscure. The useful hints afforded by these means enabled us generally to improve our plan, till we at last succeeded in bringing into a corrected form, the sections which now compose the three lectures of Masonry.'

"This bears the date of January 1st, 1788, and shows who had arranged the lectures at that time, and upon what principles they were put into form. Bro. Chase, of New Hampshire, however, tells us that Preston did this work as early as 1772. I have not at hand the means of verifying that statement, but I presume it to be correct.

"About the year 1800—twelve years after the publication of Preston's 'Illustrations'—an English brother, whose name I have been unable to obtain, came to Boston, and taught the English lectures as they had been arranged by Preston. The Grand Lodge of Massachusetts approved them, and they were taught to Thomas S. Webb, and Henry Fowle, of Boston, and Bro. Snow, of Rhode Island, about the year 1801. Bro. Benjamin Gleason, who was a student of Bro. Webb, received them from him, and embodied them in a private key of his own. About the year 1805, Bro. Gleason was employed by the Grand Lodge of Massachusetts to teach them to all the subordinate Lodges of that jurisdiction, and was paid for that service fifteen hundred dollars. To those lectures the Grand Lodge of Massachusetts still adheres, with a very slight variation in the Fellow Craft and Master's degrees.

"Bro. Snow afterwards modified and changed the lectures he had received—mingling with them some changes from other sources—so that the system of lectures descending through him is not reliable.

Bro. Gleason was appointed Grand Lecturer of the Grand Lodge of Massachusetts in 1805, and that Grand Lodge appointed no other Grand Lecturer until 1842. He was a liberally educated man, graduated at Brown University in 1802, and was a public lecturer on Geography and Astronomy. He was a member of Mount Lebanon Lodge in Massachusetts, in 1807, and died at Concord, in that State in 1847, at the age of 70 years. He visited England, and exemplified the Preston Lectures, as he had received them from Bro. Webb, before the Grand Lodge of England, and the Masonic authorities of that Grand body pronounced them correct.

"In the year 1817, Bro. John Barney, formerly of Charlotte, Vermont, went to Boston, and received the Preston Lectures there, as taught by Gleason, and as they were approved by the Grand Lodge of Massachusetts. I am unable to say whether he received them from Bro. Gleason himself, or from Bro. Henry Fowle. My impression is that he received them from Bro. Fowle. In possession of these lectures he returned to Vermont, and at the Annual Communication of our Grand Lodge, in October, 1817, visited that Grand body and made known the fact. The subject was submitted to a committee for examination, which reported that these lectures 'were according to the most approved method of work in the United States,' and proposed to give Bro. Barney letters of recommendation 'to all Lodges and brethren, wherever he may wish to travel, as a brother well qualified to give useful Masonic information to any who may wish his services.' The Grand Lodge accepted and adopted the report of its committee, and Bro. Barney, under the recommendation thus given, visited many of the then existing Lodges of this State, and imparted to them a knowledge of these lectures. Among others, in the year 1818, he visited Dorchester Lodge in Vergennes, and imparted full instruction in them to R. W. Samuel Wilson, now and for several years past, Grand Lecturer of this State. Upon this occasion Bro. Barney wrote out a portion of them in private key, and Bro. Willson wrote out the remainder. Both were written in the same book, and that part written by Bro. Willson was examined carefully and approved by Bro. Barney. That original manuscript is still in existence and is now in possession of my son, Bro. Philip C. Tucker, jun., of Galveston, Texas, to whom Bro. Willson presented it a few years ago. Bro. W. has a perfect copy of it, and refers to it as authority in all cases of doubt. Bro. Gallup, of Liberty Lodge, at Franklin, was one of the original Grand Lodge Committee, and is still living to attest the correctness and identity of these lectures, as taught by Barney in 1817.

"These are the only lectures which have been sanctioned in the jurisdiction from October, 1817, to the present day. The Grand Lodge has sanctioned no others. My predecessors, Grand Masters Robinson, Whitney, White, Wales and Haswell, sustained them against all innovation, and to the extent of my power I have done the same.

"I think, upon these facts, I am justified in saying, that the lectures we use are the true lectures of Preston. Webb changed the arrangement of the sections as fixed by Preston for one which he thought more simple and convenient, but, as I understand, left the body of the lectures themselves as Preston had established them. Subsequently to 1818, Bro. Barney went to the Western and South Western States. He was a man in feeble health at the time, and pursued Masonic lecturing as a means of subsistence. Upon his return to this State a few years afterwards he stated to his brethren here—as I have been credibly informed and believe—that he found different systems of lecturing prevailing at the West and Southwest, and that upon presenting the lectures he had been taught at Boston, in 1817, to different Grand Masters, they were objected to; and that various Grand Masters would not sanction his lecturing in their jurisdictions, unless he would teach the lectures then existing among them; that desiring to pursue this occupation, he did learn the different systems of lecturing then existing in different States, and taught them in the different State jurisdictions, as desired by the different Grand Masters of each.”

THE WEEK.

THE COURT.—The Queen and Prince Consort, with Prince Alfred, Prince Arthur, Princess Alice, Princess Helena, and Princess Louise, arrived, on Monday afternoon, at Buckingham Palace from Osborne, and at nine o'clock in the evening (with the exception of Prince Alfred) left by the Great Northern Railway for Edinburgh. The Queen arrived at York five minutes before the appointed time. Her Majesty was attended throughout the journey from King's Cross by the deputy chairman and one of the directors of the Great Northern Railway. At Biggleswade, where the first stoppage for water took place, her Majesty expressed her perfect satisfaction with the arrangements made for her convenience and comfort. Shortly afterwards the curtains of the royal carriage were drawn, the lights dimmed, and her Majesty retired to rest. The Queen alighted at St. Margaret's station, Edinburgh, at eight o'clock the next morning, and immediately proceeded through the park to Holyrood amid the acclamations of her Scottish subjects. The Prince of Wales met his illustrious parents at St. Margaret's station. The Queen's arrival was announced by a royal salute. The journey throughout was performed without the slightest interruption. Prince Alfred, on Monday night, at eleven o'clock, embarked at Dover for Calais, on his way to Marseilles to join the Euryalus in the Mediterranean, his leave of absence having expired. The night of Monday was an exceedingly “dirty” one, we are informed by the annalist of his royal highness's progress.

FOREIGN NEWS.—From Paris we learn that the Emperor Louis Napoleon will shortly proceed to Cherbourg, and also pay a second visit to Lyons. Count de Morny has delivered a speech to the general council of the department of the Puy de Dome; he takes a view of the state of the press in France and England, in which few will concur, and says that there is in France no means of preventing a journal from publishing what seems to it right—“the government is only armed against the press with the power of warning and suspension, which are repressive measures.” The Presse exposes the hollowness of this statement. The Emperor has at last spoken on the Italian question, for we may presume that the Constitutionnel is the exponent of imperial policy. That journal says:—“The emperor having agreed at Villafranca to the restoration of the former reigning princes, has caused words of reconciliation to be heard in the duchies. His majesty has not yet given up all hope of success, and will fulfil loyally to the end his disinterested mission; but if he should not succeed to re-unite the princes and the people in mutual accord, it is not his intention to force either the one or the other. It is at the wish of his majesty to follow the errors of the former Austrian policy, whose armed intervention in the affairs of the Peninsula has ended for ever. We have given the Italian people advice which we have deemed wise and prudent, which if they do not follow it will grieve us, but which we could not press upon them by force. To us Italy owes her independence; we shall not take away again from her what we have given her yesterday. The formation of an eighth military district, the headquarters of which would be at Nantes, is about to be completed. The troops forming the garrison in the 3rd and 4th divisions, the headquarters of which are at Lille and Chalons-on-the-Main, have been considerably increased. The regiment of the Imperial Guard, having suffered severe losses at Magenta and Solferino, are being reorganized, and the vacancies caused by death filled up. The 4th battalion of the Imperial Guard is also maintained. The government is about to increase the artillery, but the cavalry is about to be diminished.—The Zurich Conference drags its slow length along. It is believed that the Plenipotentiaries will be enabled to quit Zurich at the latest in a fortnight.—The administrative organization of the Lombardo-Piedmontese Kingdom is in progress, and advices have been received from Rome to the 27th inst. The Duke de Grammont had held a conference with Cardinal Antonelli on the subject of the reorganization of the legations. It is asserted that the government of Bologna had dissolved a regiment in which some Mazzinian volunteers had attempted to cause an excitement. One French division only will remain in Rome. The garrison of the Pope is on the march to Pesaro, where the troops are being concentrated. An earthquake had taken place at Norcia; 200 persons were killed, and a large number injured; 9,000 of the population are engaged in the neighbourhood of the town. The Pope has despatched assistance.—A new combination has been formed at Frankfurt by the bank of Nuremberg, the bank of Frankfurt, the house of Rothschild, the banking-house of M. Erlangen, and Messrs. Hirsch and Frohlich, for contracting the Bavarian four-and-a-half per cent. loan, to defray the military expenses. Eight millions of florins of the loan have been left for public subscription. The loan is issued at 98½.—From Borneo we have news of a painful character. A general massacre of Christians, it is said, took place there on the 24th of May.—It would seem that the Russian government are about to take control of the funds in the various banks of the empire deposited for charitable purposes by the trustees of clerical and other foundations, or which have to await a decision of a court of law. Through this order of the State Council the amount of capital available for the temporary use of the finance minister will be largely extended, and will aid him in perfecting arrangements which it is presumed he has in view.—Advices have been received from Constantinople to the 24th inst. The Sultan had been on the point of death from a severe attack of fever, but his health is now restored. He has since had a lengthened conference with the Grand Vizir with reference to the interview of the Sultan with M. Thouvenel, respecting the carrying out of the Hat-Humayoun, and also upon various financial matters, that in particular concerning the Customs tariff. The semi-official Journal de Constantinople says the rumour of a fresh modification of the ministry is unfounded. Letters from Syria to the 18th inst. state, that fears are entertained of an extension of the civil war in that province. The Druses were devastating the country by setting fire to people's property; the Europeans are said to be fleeing from the towns. Some silk factories had hoisted the French flag for protection. The French consul had sent for troops, but the Turkish force was insufficient.—The state of health of the King of Prussia becomes worse every day; he is said to be losing his hearing as well as his sight.—The Constitutionnel having published a long article against the letter of M. Louis Blanc, lately given in the London papers, without publishing the document, that gentleman writes thus to the Constitutionnel:—“Sir,—You have thought fit to blame the determination I have adopted with regard to the amnesty. I cannot say that blame on your part has occasioned me either annoyance or surprise. You quote in support of your vituperation the opinion of the Morning Chronicle, a paper without the slightest weight on this side of the Channel, and known throughout England as the organ of a government which is not the English government. I am not sorry you have such an ally. But perhaps you will deem it just that the public should be allowed to become acquainted with the subject of the discussion, the better to form an opinion of the value of the comments upon it. Therefore I have the honour to send you, with a request that it may appear in your columns, a letter in which I set forth my views on the amnesty, and which the Times, and almost all the English papers, have published. To deprive you of any pretext for refusing, I have taken care to strike out five or six words which your political touchiness might be alarmed at. I only ask you for fair play; is it asking too much in that country which you pretend is free?—I am, &c., LOUIS BLANC.”

INDIA.—The Bombay mail has arrived, and brings intelligence that the ex-King of Oude has been released from his long confinement at Fort William. His queen, who has continued to reside at the house near Calcutta occupied by the king till the time of his arrest, sent a petition to Lord Canning, praying for his release, and suggesting that no more fitting occasion for it could be chosen than the issue of the proclamation on the restoration of peace. Lord Canning, whether with reference to the petition or not, addressed a letter to the king, informing him that he could leave Fort William when he pleased. He did so on the 9th ult. A number of state prisoners were released with him, including the late vizier of Oude, Nawab Ali Nukky Khan, and Tikoot Rae, formerly in the service of the Queen. The king has left a favourable impression upon those who have come in contact with him during his imprisonment. It seems he has been fleeced by people who have pretended they could obtain his release, and government has urged him not to fulfil any outstanding promise of further bribes. His majesty has at length consented to receive the pension granted by the Indian government pending the reference of his case to England. 36,000 rupees have been paid on account. The military exodus goes on swimmingly, or rather preparations for it. The Englishman says that about 5000 may be expected to go from Bengal alone. It never was thought the movement would be so serious. Had government only given the men the option of discharge or re-enlistment with bounty; we should not have been in our present dilemma. A general order has been issued by Lord Clyde, almost begging the men not to avail themselves of the Governor-General's offer! It comes too late. Here and there a handful repent, and withdraw their claim; but the total of them will be very insignificant. Advertisements are out for the passage home of 2305 soldiers from Bombay, Goa, and Kurrachee alone—“effective European troops.” It is melancholy. Thirteen of the Berhampore mutineers are to be tried by court martial. Grain riots have occurred at Quilon and Cochin. At the former place, on the 25th and 26th June, some men of the 45th Native Infantry attacked a number of shops in the Bazaar, and plundered to the amount, it is said, of 7000 to 8000 rupees. At Cochin the riot was precisely similar; but the loss sustained by the dealers is put at only 500 rupees. A cyclone visited Calcutta on the 26th ultimo, and played sad havoc among the telegraphic lines. On the Barrackpore road the strongest lines were swept away for miles. Two steamers, besides many sailing vessels, were wrecked in the Hooghly, involving loss of life and immense destruction of property.

GENERAL HOME NEWS.—Lord Palmerston has called two cabinet councils this week, to which ministers have been summoned from the country.—A Post-office notice appeared, announcing that on the 12th September the late evening delivery will be extended to many additional places within about six miles of the General Post-office. Certain conditions are stated as necessary to be complied with, as to letter-boxes and care in attaching the proper initial letters. Letter-boxes save the postmen a great deal of time, and are a great convenience to them, particularly when they have to traverse the streets in rainy weather.—It appears from the report of the Registrar-General that the health of London is now in an average state. The deaths in the last week were 1217, and last week the births of 840 boys and 870 girls were registered.—Some months ago, at an inquest held on the body of a woman named Wright, a verdict of wilful murder was returned against George Royal, a man with whom the deceased had cohabited. The man had, however, disappeared from Poplar, the district where they lived, and a proclamation offering a reward for his apprehension was issued. Royal has at length been brought in custody before Mr. Selfe, at Thames police-court, charged with murder, and after some preliminary examination a remand was ordered, to allow of witnesses being called for the prosecution.—A case of hideous brutality was investigated before Mr. Tyrwhitt, at Clerkenwell police-court, in which a mother seems to have divested herself, not only of her woman's nature, but even of her human nature. The charge against her was that she had pulled her daughter, dying of consumption, out of bed, and dragged her about the room by the hair of the head. From the evidence it further appears, that the poor girl expired in a few minutes after this treatment. Meantime the woman is committed to prison for an assault upon a neighbour who interfered to protect her victim.—An escape has been made from the Artillery Prison, at Woolwich, of five men, who were awaiting sentence for various offences of which they had been convicted. Four of the prisoners were subsequently captured, in a very clever manner, but the fifth is still at large.—At the Court of Bankruptcy an application for the discharge of Thomas Hawkins, brush maker, of Charles-street, Westbourne-grove, from custody was refused. A second-class certificate was granted to Alfred Marchant, a clothier and draper at Maidstone. Adjudication of bankruptcy was made against Paul Emile Chappuis, reflector manufacturer and dealer in photographs, carrying on business at 69, Fleet-street. It is rumoured that John Edward Buller, the bankrupt solicitor of Lincoln's-inn-fields, has fled to Sweden.—The boiler of a steam-tug burst on its passage down the Tyne on Friday, when the fireman was blown into the water and drowned. The circumstances attending this catastrophe involve a serious charge against the person in command of the tug, as it arose from putting on a heavy pressure of steam for the purpose of "going ahead" of another boat that was proceeding in the same direction.—At the adjourned inquest held to investigate the circumstances attending the death of Mr. Marcus Bennett, who was killed by the accident on the Tilbury and Southend Railway, on the 17th instant, a verdict of accidental death was returned.—A serious fire broke out a day or two since in the coach-building premises of Mr. Knapp, at Clapham, which was not extinguished until the factory itself was almost completely destroyed and much damage done to the adjoining property.—In the important case of Smethurst's conviction the public interest continues undiminished, and the demand for a stay of the execution of his sentence is almost universal. Sir George C. Lewis, the Home Secretary, has consulted with his colleagues and with the Lord Chief Baron (who tried Smethurst); but the result has not at present transpired. No formal communication has yet been made from the Home Secretary with regard to the fate of the prisoner; but there appears to be a strong impression in the minds of those in authority who are well enabled to form an opinion on the subject that the law will take its course, and that the advisers of the crown will not consider themselves justified in recommending the prisoner to her majesty's clemency.—On Wednesday morning the passenger steamer Bride struck on a sunken barge at London Bridge, and, filling with water, went down almost immediately. Fortunately the passengers were not many in number, and got safely conveyed on shore. The barge had sunk the same morning, and the captain of the luckless steamer had not received notification of the fact.—James Turner, a labourer, and a man named Keefe, were charged before Mr. Elliott, at the Lambeth Police Court, on Wednesday, with attempting to poison Honora Turner, wife of the first-named prisoner. According to the evidence, a quantity of sugar of lead had been mixed with some beer, a portion of which was drunk by the woman Turner and another woman, both of whom were taken ill. A remand was ordered for further investigation.—A case was brought under the notice of Mr. Dayman, at Westminster Police Court, involving the question of whether certain coals delivered to order were "Silkstones," and so whether a breach of the Coal Act had been committed. There being some hiatus in the evidence, however, it was found necessary to withdraw the prosecution.—A further slight rise in the value of public securities occurred yesterday, and the market was sustained in its improved condition to the close of business. Foreign stocks and railway shares were also better; but the extent of transactions was unimportant. Consols were last quoted 95½ to 95¾ for money and the account. There were no bullion operations at the Bank of magnitude, and the quotation for silver still exhibits flatness. It was announced that the payment on the Indian five per cent. loan had reached £1,600,000; the price of this security was buoyant at 99½ to 99¾.

COMMERCIAL; AND PUBLIC COMPANIES.—The accounts from the manufacturing districts report business to be generally very quiet. At Birmingham trade is dull, but the markets good. At Halifax they are moderately good but firm, and the same at Manchester. The Bradford markets are reported as very quiet, and those of Leeds satisfactory. At Newcastle business is generally dull, but the state of the iron trade is better. The lace trade of Nottingham has somewhat improved, and the commercial interests generally are better. At Sheffield there is a fair trade doing, more especially with the Continent. At Wolverhampton the staple trade of the town is improving.—The Peninsular and Oriental Company's steamer Behar, has brought the first parcel of tea ever received in this country by the overland route, thereby anticipating by some six weeks the ordinary arrivals. It is fine Kaisow, the produce of the new season, and has, we learn, been purchased by Messrs. Bullivant and Wilson, of Eastcheap, at the full price of 3s. 4d. per pound.—During the past week there has been rather more activity in the port of London. 275 vessels were reported at the custom house as having arrived from foreign ports. There were 5 from Ireland, and 289 colliers. The entries outwards amounted to 125, and those cleared to 96, besides 18 in ballast. The departures for the Australian colonies have been 5 vessels, viz., 1 to Port Phillip of 1,127 tons, 2 to Sydney of 1,485 tons, and 2 to Van Dieman's Land of 1,384 tons;—total, 3,996 tons.

PUBLIC AMUSEMENTS.

PRINCESS'S THEATRE.—Monday night witnessed the close of Mr. Charles Kean's management of this theatre, and in the midst of a crowded audience he brought to a termination one of the most remarkable managerial careers in the history of the British stage. The play chosen was "Henry VIII," one of the earliest of Mr. Kean's Shakespearian revivals, and peculiarly appropriate from the fact that the celebrated farwell of Wolsey could be taken in a double sense, and be understood as referring not merely to the mimic character, but to the actor, who then laid aside his greatness as director of the theatre. In that sense was it taken by the audience, who, when this passage was given, applauded most vehemently. Throughout the play the audience manifested the utmost enthusiasm, and at the end the applause was deafening, when Mr. and Mrs. Kean crossed the stage, the whole house rising, the ladies waving their handkerchiefs, the men cheering, stamping and shouting. After a short wait Mr. Kean appeared on the stage in evening costume, and delivered a most elaborate oration, which occupies nearly two columns of the daily papers, but which did not seem to weary the audience, though all that was said might have been more eloquently expressed in a fourth part of that space. It recapitulated the particulars of the various revivals, and enlightened the audience as to the amount expended for the delectation and "instruction" of the play-going multitude, by this Rothschild among managers; the sum total being somewhat astounding to those unacquainted with theatrical finance. Whatever we may think of the taste of Mr. Kean's commercial statement, we are most happy to give him our highest praise for the spirit which has characterised his management and the artistic feeling which has prevailed throughout even the most minute details of his beautiful "revivals."

Obituary.

BRO. C. J. LACON.

WE have to record the death of Bro. C. J. Lacon, of the St. James' Union Lodge (No. 211), who was initiated about the year 1845, and served in rotation the offices of J.D., S.D., and J.W.; he was afterwards appointed Secretary, and performed the duties of that office for several years, with satisfaction to the Lodge and credit to himself. In consideration of his services, he was elected an honorary member of the Lodge. Many brethren have, no doubt, excelled Bro. Lacon in Masonic attainments; but none ever surpassed him in zeal, or in the endeavour to discharge faithfully the duties of his office.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

"J. B."—We should prefer a personal interview before giving an answer.

A YOUNG MASON is informed that all the numbers of our present series will be kept in print until the close of the year.

"THE BALLOT."—In reply to a question in your last, I may state, that the Irish Constitutions have no restriction as to renewal of ballots; many Lodges have, but not all. So, I suppose the case to be a brother entertaining a doubt as to the identity of an individual, or of some act attributed to one, and not sufficiently experienced to suggest a postpositement, adopting the silent alternative of blackball—and possibly being one of the first to render justice subsequently, when fully satisfied of the candidate's eligibility. I have known such an instance and it may apply in this.—M. F. 33°.

"BRO. STEPHEN JONES."—The answer in our last week's "Notes and Queries" was communicated by Bro. Jeremiah How, whose signature was omitted through the carelessness of the printer.

THE SEAL OF SOLOMON.

CONSIDERING the labours of our Craft at the building of the first temple, and the important position in Masonry assigned to King Solomon, his magnificent seal ought to prove an interesting subject of investigation by the brethren of the Order. This signet is described as "the sacred stamp of Israel," bearing a device significant of promised spirit and grace, and the motto, "The Lord knoweth them that are his."

A circle surmounted by a cross is meant to represent in the East a sceptre and dove; and this is the device upon the seal of which we write. The prophet Job, grandson of Keturah, Abraham's second wife, carried many holy things and customs into Persia, from which country Hebrew ideas were disseminated all over the East among the Assyrians and Babylonians, as well as elsewhere.

The gate of Semiramis (of which Mr. Bryant gives a learned account) was itself an emblem, and the name a compound of "Sama Ramis," or "Romis," signified "the Divine Token," "the type of Providence;" and as a military ensign, it may with some latitude be interpreted "the standard of the Most High." It consisted of the figure of a dove, which was probably encircled with the iris, as those two emblems were often represented together. All who understood that standard, or who paid any deference to that emblem, were styled "Semarim" and "Semorim." One of the gates of Babylon was styled the gate of Semiramis, undoubtedly from having the sacred emblem of Sama Ramis, or the dove, sculptured by way of distinction over it.

The subject of the dove is connected with religion in all tongues, and this mysterious emblem seriously contemplated affords scope for much comment. It teaches faithfulness, love, truth, beauty, timidity, and Christianity.

The rod, or sceptre, was of more ancient origin as a mark of sovereignty than the crown. Many of these staves had a device upon them, especially in Persia—sometimes an apple or a pomegranate, an eagle or a dove; perhaps the Hebrew nation had the same, for their rods or staves regulated their steps and journeys.

Solomon's reign was the most glorious, and his crown shone the brightest beyond all of those recorded in the Hebrew Book of Kings. During the whole of his life he had peace on every side, and each of his subjects sat under the shadow of his own vine and his own fig tree. Solomon perfected the hereditary right of the Hebrew nation, which was to be entrusted with the revelations of God, in preference to all other nations. And he felt the awful responsibility he was under to maintain unpoluted truth and wisdom. In erecting the earthly temple, which was the wonder of the world, he doubtless intended to present the pure type of heaven's everlasting one; for Christ is the true temple. He himself spake of his own body.

We may also observe that the Psalms of David, particularly the 15th and 20th, forcibly make use of the image "a holy seal," which is described there as being set upon the inspired people of the Lord.

AN EXCURSION VERY FAR WEST.

I HAD lately arrived in the New World, after forming intimacies on board the ocean steamer with several wandering spirits like myself; and together we resolved to explore the unknown region which lay before us. Together we visited its newly built cities, with their spacious churches and stately halls; traced the course of its noble river glittering with rapids, until at length we reached the glorious Niagara, to look on which for a single day is worth a thousand miles' journey.

We had still another desire—that of seeing the Indians of the woods, the former possessors of this vast continent, in their natural state. The hunting grounds to which they have retreated were still many hundred miles further west; but fortune favoured our wishes so far that it was the season when they come down in thousands to a military post at the head of Lake Huron, to receive the gifts annually presented to them by government as a compensation for the lands ceded by them to the whites.

Such an opportunity was not to be slighted, so hiring a cutter and crew together with an experienced guide, at the foot of the lake, we were soon speeding on after the setting sun—sometimes out of sight of land, tossing among the sweet fresh waves, at others coasting along the silvery sands which alone divided the primeval forest from the lake, and anon threading our way through groups of fairy islets—until at length we cast anchor at Drummond's Island, fifteen hundred miles west of the Atlantic.

A quiet spot, it was said to be at other seasons, inhabited but by a small military party and a few traders, with two or three hundred civilized Indians dwelling in the vicinity. But now the summer sun shone down on a whole city of wigwams, congregated on the broad green sward, spreading up from the shore, and the air resounded with the murmur of its ten thousand inhabitants—Ottawas, Winnebagoes, Minominies, and Sioux.

To us who were new to those regions, that city was deeply interesting, for it contained innumerable phases of life such as we had never before witnessed. It was to us a novel sight—each little flotilla of canoes coming skimming across the lake like a flock of sea-birds, with a gay union jack floating as proudly as an admiral's flag from the stern of one, in token of its owner's chieftainship; and then to see the occupants of each little craft, as it touched the strand, spring out into the water, and, with a wild yell, such as issues from Indian lips alone, lift their light boat, and rush with it out of reach of the waves, which otherwise would soon have wrecked its light frame of laths and covering of birchen bark!

The Indian's task was then done, and he flung himself idly on the grass, or else, joining some others, smoked a pipe of cherry wood, with a carved stone bowl, whose length and size would have made three English "clays" hide their diminished heads and stems. With all his chivalry in war, the Indian is woefully deficient in the attention due to the gentler sex, or he would never have left to his slender young squaw (as the English have corrupted the pretty Ojibbeway word "equa") the weary task of unloading the canoe. Indian dignity says woman is the inferior being, and deeply does he make her feel it, for on her devolves all the menial labour—the erection of the wigwam, the arrangement of its contents in the shape of mats and furs, weapons and ornaments, pots and kettles, and wooden bowls. Then she must fetch wood from the bush, and water from the lake to cook her husband's sturgeon soup, and feed the gaunt vicious looking dogs which are his companions in the chase, and the half tamed fox that is the wigwam pet; and, when all this is done, she has for the first time leisure to attend to the babe, who, with the patience and endurance which perhaps ages of practice have rendered inherent in his race, has remained quietly all this time in his wooden cradle, leaning against a tree.

The Indian, however, does not altogether escape the penalty due to his want of gallantry: on no human being does time tell so hardly as on the Indian woman—and the soft, beautiful winning companion of the red man's youth becomes the coarse, haggard, hideous hag with whom his latter years must be spent. Certainly, Indian customs permit his taking to himself a second helpmate; but, with her other charms, the squaw loses her low sweet voice, and the loud harsh tones of the aged virago ring through the wigwam in ceaseless vituperation of her husband and rival.

Onward we passed through the wigwam city, glancing curiously in at the open doors, and pausing where anything of interest presented itself. What a busy, active scene it was: women bustling to and fro from the bush or lake, or laboriously bruising maize with a heavy wooden pestle in a huge mortar, hollowed by fire out of the trunk of a tree, all the while chattering and jesting, with their low silvery laughter, to their companions, who sat at their doors weaving fine rush mats of various colours, or engaged in some of the many descriptions of curious needlework in which the Indian women excel.

Through the mazes of their city moved the Indians themselves—grave, reserved, and dignified—passing with haughty superiority the laughing squaws, only pausing now and then to speak, with stately language, to some of their own sex. Despite their apparent coldness, they were interesting and intelligent-looking men, with their lofty features and glittering eyes, keen and bright as the knife and tomahawk that each bore in his belt. Like the women, those from no great distance wore mostly clothes of British manufacture, though made in Indian fashion; but those from more remote territories were probably much as the early navigators found them—clad in skins, and daubed with paint, in broad streaks of black, white, and vermillion, and though, doubtless, to the learned in such matters, the lines were indicative of peace and amity, they yet added greatly to the wildness and ferocity of the wearer's appearance, and it was easy to comprehend with what terrors the significant tracery of the war paint must have surrounded these Sioux and Winnebago warriors as they came leaping and yelling on towards their foes, their nearly naked bodies flaming with paint, and plumes of brilliant coloured feathers streaming from the long scalp tufts, which, according to the rules of Indian chivalry, every warrior wears, so that, in case of defeat, his conqueror may bear off his scalp in token of victory; and, setting aside our civilized horror of that bloody trophy, there is something nobly chivalric in thus providing for the glory of an enemy.

But in the stern and worn aspect of many of these men, and the amazing acuteness of their senses of sight and hearing, it was easy to trace their life of forest hardship—outlying days and nights on the war-path and in pursuit of the moose and the deer, and following up their game during hours of intense toil, urged on by the terrible knowledge that they must be successful or there would be no food within their lodges; and probably the sufferings of those hours form a fair set off to the menial labours of their squaws.

It astonishes one to hear from the lips of those wild warriors tones soft and clear almost as a woman's; and they are certainly not without their influence in rendering effective their far famed oratory, as we had an opportunity of judging when, during our stay, a council was held by the officers of the post and the principal chiefs, to settle the preliminaries of a treaty.

The scene was a most interesting one. The English officers and officials were in full uniform, and their scarlet and gold flashed imposingly in the eyes of the chiefs, who were mostly attired in their war costume, with fresh suits of paint, and long eagle's feathers floating from their war tufts over their naked shoulders, while endless silver bracelets and bells flashed in the sunlight and jingled softly on their wrists and leggings. In addition, many of the chiefs wore mantles of scarlet cloth draped classically round them; while others were wrapped in large skins, emblazoned in savage heraldry with their "totems"—that is, the resemblance of the animal whose name they bear, which they regard as their titular spirit, and believe watches over their safety.

After the "pipe of peace" had been smoked, the proceedings began; and that council might advantageously have been taken as a model by many a more civilized assembly, so close and courteous was the attention each member paid to what fell from another—until in his turn, taking in his hand the wampum belt (the badge of peace), he addressed the meeting with great earnestness and dignity, and with much gesticulation, and, moreover, in a voice so skilfully modulated that, when once we had gained the clue to the subject, we scarcely needed to await the interpreter's translation to learn the speaker's opinion, though sometimes we were struck by admiration of the force of language and richness of imagery the speeches preserved even in translation.

As the council drew near its close, a chief we had hitherto overlooked came forward to address the assembly. He was a calm, intelligent looking man, with a mild, thoughtful expression in his deep eyes, contrasting forcibly with the flashing orbs of those around him. He was without paint or feathers, or show or glitter of any sort; but, when once he began to speak, his words flowed with startling energy, and were full of the closest and most subtle reasoning. He was in every way the most powerful man there, being king of the Winnebagoes, the ruler of a mighty nation, and an orator so renowned, even among an eloquent race, that they had bestowed on him the name of the Son of Thunder.

In one corner of the council sat a richly dressed Indian woman, a most unusual intruder on such a scene, for the squaw has no voice in either public or private affairs, but must submit in all things to the will of her husband, like a bondswoman as she is. But this woman sat calmly by, neither seeking to attract notice nor yet shrinking from it, but watching with wrapt attention every word which passed in the assembly, while every now and then her form dilated or her eye flashed, according as affairs progressed agreeably to her wishes, or the reverse. She was the queen of the Winnebagoes, and had obtained this unprecedented consideration partly in consequence of her being a great chief's daughter, but principally from her great genius for politics, in which she was unequalled by any man of her nation; and it was said the Son of Thunder never took any step of importance without consulting his wife upon it.

Subsequently to this we saw much of their Winnebago majesties, who paid us many visits, for wherever the Son of Thunder was, there was his queen also, not walking behind in slavish Indian fashion, but by his side, his most trusted friend and counsellor. He was wont to say emphatically that "she was a woman who never told a lie," if it were so the Winnebagoes were much better and the other Indian nations much worse than we had hitherto believed. But she certainly was a highly talented woman, and, all Indian though she was, her wit and powers of mimicry made her a most amusing visitor.

As a body the Indians are remarkably intelligent, and can readily comprehend the use of any scientific instrument; what amazed them most was the wonders of a microscope, but seeing it in the possession of a doctor, they muttered significantly—"mishihwininie"—(medicine-man, or conjurer), evidently considering that the whole secret was to be found in his powerful magic. Yet one of the wildest of these Indians, who had never before seen a map, so far comprehended one shown to him as to be able to trace on it with his own hand the course of a river near the Bear Lake; and other Indians to whom the map was subsequently shown, said it was done correctly.

Shortly after returning from the council, a sudden clang of music and a group of dark forms outside our tent, drew us to the door. It was a party of young Indians come according to custom, to do us honour by dancing before our residence. Dancing among the Indians is not as with us, a mere amusement, but enters into nearly every phase of their lives. Indeed, except a council, a dance more or less solemn appears to precede every step of importance.

This complimentary dance began with a slow circular movement, beating time to a monotonous song, with the addition of drums and hollow calabashes filled with peas, the whole being productive of anything but harmony. But this soon changed to a mask, and men with heads covered by those of wild animals, and clad in their skins, performed strange antic dances illustrative of the animal they personated. In return for the honour done us, the Indians received a gift of provisions. The present duly acknowledged, they went on their way, and we soon heard their savage music echoing from the door of the nearest officer's house.

Some of our party inquired from the chiefs if they could not gratify us with a sight of their celebrated war dance; but they shook their heads solemnly:—"The hatchet is buried," they said; "let us not pretend to dig it up, lest our young men dream it is true." In other words, they dreaded the excitement.

In the evening we strolled through the Indian camp, to see what was going on. The warmth of the weather had brought all the inhabitants out of their close wigwams, and they stood grouped around the entrances; the women gossiping and laughing together in their musical voices, the men standing or sitting together in circles, either smoking or listening to some legend or tradition, related by one of their number; or, as in two or three cases, singing in a low recitative love songs, or the warlike deeds of their forefathers. But the greatest number were collected where the boom of the drum and the rattle of the calabash announced that the dance was being held before the wigwam of some chief.

In these dances the women though spectators, are not allowed to mingle, nor are they permitted to join in any other social gathering, except the "medicine dance," and there they enjoy equality with the men. The "medicine dance," which we had subsequently an opportunity of seeing, is the festival of a society of men and women who pretend to almost unlimited magical powers, and are highly revered, and their impostures implicitly believed by the simple people among whom they dwell.

As we strolled down towards the shore, we were surprised by seeing a number of glowing fires, like gigantic fireflies, flitting across the lake, and sending long gleams of quivering light over its glassy surface. The Indians were fishing by torch light, and the fires streamed from huge pine torches, borne in the prows of the canoes to attract the dazzled fish, and at the same time enable the spearsman to take aim, which he usually does unerringly.

And now it grew late, and we departed from the city of wigwams, highly pleased with the quietness, order, and decorum of its uncivilized inhabitants.

"Were spirits permitted to be sold on the island, you would have witnessed a very different scene," replied one of the residents, to whom we had imparted our sentiments. "The red man loves whisky, and, like pouring fire water on fire, it influences the fierce natures that only slumber, to a pitch of ungovernable fury. The ancient feuds between their tribes are ever ready incentives to battle, and the war whoop, the tomahawk, and the rifle are the speedy followers of the 'fire water.' It is the Indian's greatest failing, and has done more for his destruction than all the encroachments of the whites."

ENGLISH MASONIC CHARITY.

In a series of letters in the Voice of Masonry (published by Bro. Rob Morris, at Louisville, Kentucky), from the pen of Bro. Elisha D. Cooke, at present on a visit to the united kingdom, we find the following on the English Masonic charities:—

"From what I have seen and can learn, the Lodges in London usually meet some time in the afternoon, say from three to five o'clock. About seven or eight o'clock they repair to the banquet, which is generally good enough for a prince, and this is the case nearly (and with some Lodges quite), every time they meet. Those who are fond of joking, say it is the fourth degree in Masonry. Thence originated the saying that in England they are knife and fork Masons, and here, I must confess, that while we hang very heavily on the one extreme, our English brethren by far outweigh us on the other. But, after all, the amount of charity dispensed by the Freemasons of England is almost incredible. They can point with pride to their Female School, the graduates of which are ornaments to society; to their Male School, which is producing some of the most useful men the country can boast of; and last, but not least, to their Benevolent Institution for aged and decayed Masons and their wives. These three institutions are supported by voluntary contributions, and it is at the festive board they get many of these large contributions. It is when the work is done, and the J.W. has called them from labour to refreshment, at the time when the social feeling is perfectly developed, that the British hearts beat most responsively to the calls of their less fortunate brethren. Is not this a glorious work to be engaged in; what a beautiful theme for contemplation! Think of them taking the little orphan child, and while giving it food and clothing, furnishing the young tender mind with good and wholesome information, thus teaching it the duties of an E. A., and when it becomes an F. C. placing it in a situation in which it may put the information already obtained to a proper use. Nor stopping here, but watching with care until it becomes a M.M., yea, even through life, and when old, feeble, and tottering with decay, and through misfortunes, so destitute as to need Masonic assistance, furnishing a home in which even old age is nursed with that tender care and affection, that when the hour of death comes and the M. M. is called from this imperfect to that all perfect Lodge above, he passes away thanking the Divine Providence that gave birth to an institution founded on the principles of brotherly love, relief and truth."

ARCHÆOLOGY.

BRITISH ARCHÆOLOGICAL SOCIETY.

THE proceedings of the forthcoming congress at Newbury are attracting considerable attention, and are looked forward to with much interest. A programme of the intended excursions, &c., has been published, from which it appears that the first day, Monday, September 12th, will be chiefly devoted to the general meeting, the Earl of Carnarvon's opening address, and visits to objects of interest within the town; Tuesday, excursion to the first battle field, the Countess of Craven's park, Roman encampment at Speen, Donnington Castle, Avington, Wickham, and Speen Church, &c.; Wednesday, Silchester, Upton Court, Alvermaston, Brimpton, and Thatcham Churches, &c.; Thursday, visit to Grimsbury Camp, and other similar objects of interest on the White Horse Hills; Friday, visit to the President at Highclere Castle, thence to Reading, reception in the council chamber, the Abbey ruins, Friary, churches of St. Lawrence, St. Mary, St. Giles, &c.; Saturday, excursion to the Vale of White Horse, and visit to the many objects of interest in that locality. A meeting will be held in the Mansion House on the evening of each day, when papers on various objects of local and national interest will be read.

ARCHÆOLOGICAL AND NATURAL SOCIETY OF SOMERSET.

ON Monday week the members of this society proceeded to the ancient town of Glastonbury, for the purpose of holding their eleventh annual meeting. The annual meeting took place at twelve o'clock; Mr. F. H. Dickinson presided. The Rev. F. Warre then read the annual report, from which it appeared that the society is making progress, and continues to further the objects for which it was established. "The committee would refer to the volume of proceedings recently issued as an indication of the progress which is being made towards collecting materials for a County History, and they feel assured that the periodical issue of these volumes will be the means of creating and sustaining more generally an interest in the objects and pursuits to which the society is devoted. The outlay, however, which the production of such a volume involves, without any of those special donations from individual members which other societies of a similar nature frequently obtain, necessarily absorbs so large a proportion of the annual income, as to leave a very small balance for carrying out other purposes equally important. The committee are likewise engaged in preparing portions of Collinson's History of Somerset, according to the suggestion of R. W. Falconer, Esq., M.D., of Bath, to be used as the basis of a more complete and correct history of the district to which the sections respectively relate. During the past year the committee have provided a fitting case in which to deposit the Pigott Collection of Drawings. It is with great regret the committee have to report that, on the sudden disappearance of the late curator, it was found that a considerable amount of subscriptions had been collected by him, but not paid in to the treasurer. The exact amount of the defalcation has not yet been ascertained, but it is partly covered by the value of the collection of objects of natural history, &c., belonging to him, which remains in the museum as the property of the society." Upon the motion of Mr. W. A. Sanford, the report was unanimously adopted. Mr. W. A. Sanford read an interesting paper on the arrangement of specimens in the museum at Taunton.

The Rev. F. Warre read a paper on the word "Pig," as applied to a cross in Bridgwater, &c., by H. N. Sealy, Esq. The Rev. Mr. Jones and Mr. Serel also read interesting papers on "The reputed discovery of King Arthur's remains at Glastonbury," and "St. John's Priory." Under the guidance of the Rev. F. Warre, the company then proceeded to visit the Abbey kitchen, almshouses, barns, &c.

MASONIC NOTES AND QUERIES.

FREEMASONS' MANUAL IN FRENCH.

A BROTHER has advised me to look at the French Manuals on Freemasonry as I wish to see all I can bearing on the subject. What Manuals are they that I am referred to?—F. H. R.—r.—[There are hosts of French Manuals extant but, perhaps, the most popular is that by Bazot (Etienne François), entitled, Manuel des Franc Maçons: there have been three editions printed in Paris; the first, in 1809; second, 1812; and third, 1817. And they were followed by Le Truiler Expert  Ouvrage pouvant servir de Complement ou Manuel du Franc Maçon, 12mo., Paris, 1828.]

LATOMUS.

The seal of the new Grand Lodge of Canada, given in the last number of the Freemasons' Magazine, bears the word "Latomorum" in its inscription. I am also aware there is a work called Acta Latomorum, and I know that we accept it as Latin for Freemason; but from whence is it derived? Λατόμος (Latomus) is, according to Littleton's Latine Dictionary, 4to., London, 1678, "A Quarryer, one that getteth stones out of the quarry, an hewer of stones, a Mason," but I do not find even this in any of the modern classical dictionaries, and I want to know how we arrive at "Latomorum"?—LAPICIDA.

ROYAL AND SELECT MASTER.

[In Masonic "Notes and Queries," p. 92, "REX" asks if the degree of "Royal and Select Master," alluded to by Bro. Elisha D. Cooke, "is part of pure and ancient Masonry? What degree is it?" and "To what rite does it belong?" We are enabled to add a scrap of information for "Rex." It is no part of pure and ancient Masonry, and we strongly suspect its transatlantic origin, for we have seen the title of a book, written by one Cornelius Moore, called The Craftsman's and Freemason's Guide, containing a Delineation of the Rituals of Freemasonry, with the Emblems and Explanations so arranged as greatly to Facilitate in Acquiring a Knowledge of the Rites and Ceremonies of the Several Degrees, from Entered Apprentice to that of Select Master of the Order of Priesthood, 12mo. (317 pp.) published at Cincinnati, Ohio, 1853.]

MASONIC BIOGRAPHY.

Have any extended series of Masonic Biographies appeared either here or abroad? of course those in the old series of the Freemasons' Magazine, Quarterly Masonic Magazine, and the present Freemasons' Magazine excepted.—A. D.—r.—[There are several such foreign works; one by Bazot is popular in France, it is entitled Biographie des Francs-Maçons et quelques autres Etrangers, chefs des Sectes, Créateurs des Rites, &c. &c., and gives an Introduction to Masonry in France from 1725 to 1828.]

THE LUCK OF EDENHALL.

I read in a new work, viz., White's Northumberland, as follows:—

"Come," said Sir George Musgrave, on my return to the hall, "let me show you the Luck at once;" and opening a leathern case which he brought from his muniment room, he took out an ancient drinking glass and placed it on the table. Curiously did I scan the precious relic—the famous Luck of Edenhall—fearing to touch it until assured that its owner had no superstitious dread of seeing it in a stranger's hand. Imagine a tall tumbler, of old-fashioned glass, green and specky, expanding in easy curve from the bottom upwards, and terminating in a graceful lip, and enamelled with a geometrical design in crimson, blue, and yellow, and you see the Luck which has been in the possession of the Musgraves for many generations. It has a threefold value: in the mysterious tradition which associates it with the fairies; in the sacred use to which in all probability it was once applied; and as a specimen of ancient art. The leathern case is with good reason believed to be workmanship of the fifteenth century; it bears the monogram I. H. S., which identifies it with the church, and we may believe the Luck to have been a chalice used for sacramental purposes, made at Venice, perhaps in the tenth century. I was permitted to complete my examination of the Luck by drinking a draught of sherry from it; then restored to the case, it was locked up once more in its receptacle in the muniment room."

Can you, or some of your antiquarian correspondents to the "Masonic Notes and Queries," give me any idea of what the geometrical design in crimson, blue, and yellow, is like? I am induced to put this query, because I have occasionally seen Masonic emblems and monograms on early glass vessels.—T. T. S.—N. North Shields.

WAS THE LATE DUKE OF WELLINGTON A FREEMASON?

The Duke of Wellington was a Freemason; and I am in possession of two notes from his grace to myself, one stating that he was not a Freemason, and one acknowledging that he was. In the latter he says, "I do not consider myself a Freemason, never having been in a Lodge but once, and that many years ago," or words to that effect. The notes are carefully put away, and I cannot find them at this moment, but, when I do, you shall have copies. I am probably the only person holding proofs on this interesting subject, together with the illustrious duke's own reasons for saying he was not a Freemason, mistaken though he was in that opinion, not knowing fully the nature of our institution.—J. RANKIN STEBBING, W.M., No. 1087, St. Andrew's Lodge, Southampton.—[From Bro. Stebbing's communication, it would seem that the great duke had been initiated, but never made sufficient progress in the royal art to comprehend its principles and practice.]

ABRIDGMENT OF THE BOOK OF CONSTITUTIONS.

Have any of the various editions of Anderson's Book of Constitutions ever been abridged, or published in a smaller form?—T.A.C.—[There have been some abridgments of Anderson, several Pocket Companions and others, but the most curious is an 8vo., entitled The Complete Freemason, or Mulla Paucis for Lovers of Secrets, published about 1764, and having an engraved title page designed by Bro. Powers and engraved by Bro. Larken.]

ANCIENT MS., WHERE DEPOSITED?

I saw in an imperfect copy of The Use and Abuse of Freemasonry, by Captain George Smith, Inspector of the Royal Military Academy at Woolwich, Provincial Grand Master for the County of Kent; and R.A., 8vo., London, 1783, at p. 313, the following note in reference to the existence of an ancient MS. "Also MS. in the possession of Mr. Wilson of Broomhead, in Yorkshire, written in the reign of King Henry VIII." Can any one tell me what the MS. was about;—in whose possession it is;—or who was Mr. Wilson?—E. E. D.

ORIGIN OF THE BOYS SCHOOL.

Who was the first promoter of the Boys School? I have not any of the reports at hand, and should be glad to know through your columns.—P. G.—[The Boys School was established 1798, and sanctioned by the Duke of Athol, (the Grand Master of the then termed Antient Masons) and was originated in the following manner:—

"The United Mariners' Lodge, No. 23, observing with concern the distressed circumstances of several of their brethren, and the exposed situation of their children, at the same time viewing with pleasure the daily progress making in the Freemasons' charity in St. George's Fields, for female children, induced them at a meeting held on the 3rd day of July, 1798, to consider the means to establish a Masonic charity for clothing and educating the sons of indigent Freemasons; and for that purpose they immediately opened a subscription, which, at their second meeting, increased beyond their most sanguine expectations, that enabled them to receive six children to the benefit of this charity. But as it is their intention to extend the same, the Fraternity at large, the humane and benevolent in general, are therefore most earnestly solicited to contribute towards accomplishing this laudable undertaking, whose object is to clothe and instruct the sons of indigent Freemasons, and to train them up in the knowledge of virtue and religion, and to inculcate strongly on their minds, obedience to their superiors."

The foregoing extract is taken from the Rev. John Cole's Illustrations of Masonry, 8vo., London, 1801, and we hope will prove acceptable to the querist.]

MASONRY AND THE DRAMA.

In most of the song books, Pocket Companions, and other works of the same kind, bearing on Masonry, there are numerous prologues and epilogues spoken by the principal actors and actresses, in most instances before certain Lodges that had, in theatrical language, "given the company a bespeak." Now what I want to know is, if these public displays of Masonry were usual in the early part of the last century?—C. BEACHE.—[Until the public processions were prohibited, owing to the Scald Miserable burlesque in 1747, we seldom trace Lodges going to theatres; but after these processions were abolished, then the "bespeaks" were very numerous. The earliest we know of is important, as it was attended by a Grand Master, and the Masons sang The Entered Apprentice, for which a scene of Shakespeare had been altered. But as we deem it a curiosity we will give the extract entire. At the end of The Antient Constitution of the Free and Accepted Mason neatly engraved on copper plates, 8vo., two editions, London, 1731, we read—

"On Friday, the 27th day of December, 1728, the Right Hon. the Lord Kingston, Grand Master of the Antient Society of Free and Accepted Masons, bespoke a play, viz., the second part of "King Henry IV.," to be acted on the Monday following, at the Theatre Royal in Drury-lane, for the entertainment of the brethren, and ordered a new prologue to be spoke on that occasion; as also a scene to be altered for introducing the 'Prentice's Song, as published in the Constitutions, which was done accordingly, and all the Freemasons in the pit and boxes joined in the chorus, to the entire satisfaction of the whole audience."

We omit the prologue and epilogue referring "C. Beache" to the Book itself.]

CHARLES DIBDIN.

Particulars are wanted of the Lodge, dates of initiation, &c., and what offices, if any, were held by the celebrated Charles Dibdin, the naval song writer and composer, who was one of our brethren.—M.C.

DR. KANE, THE AMERICAN TRAVELLER.

Being in company with some brother Masons lately, some among them stated that almost all the celebrated travellers of late years had been, or were Masons, and Dr. Kane was cited as an example. Can you inform me if such is correct?—BRITO.—[If our correspondent will take the trouble to turn to the Freemasons' Magazine for July, 1857, p. 215, he will there find that a Masonic flag was presented to Dr. Kane, by the Masons of Nova Scotia, and presented by our brother, Dr. Kane, to the Grand Lodge of Massachusetts, upon his return from his Arctic expedition. See also an obituary notice of Dr. Kane, in the Freemasons' Magazine, p. 369, for May, 1857.]

AMERICAN MASONIC PERIODICALS.

I am desirous of consulting some of the numerous American periodicals on Masonry, but inquire far and near, as I do, I cannot hear of any brother who has such a collection, nor do I believe there are any to be found in our public libraries. It is impossible to purchase all of them, as the cost would be enormous. Lately I had a little Masonic book imported for me from New York, and after it had been five months in transitu, from the date of my ordering it, I had to pay eight shillings and sixpence for a pamphlet, published last year, containing just fifty-nine pages! What I want to know is, how are we to get a sight of American Masonic publications? and, if admissible to ask such a favour, can any brother kindly furnish the readers of this Magazine with a list of such periodicals?—S. B. W.

MASONIC CHARTS.

A brother inquired of me where he could obtain a Masonic chart? All I knew of them was that Jeremy L. Cross published in the United States, The True Masonic Chart, a Hieroglyphic Monitor; containing all the Emblems, explained in the Degrees of Entered Apprentice, Fellow Craft, Master Mason, Mark Master, Past Master, Most Excellent Master, Royal Arch, Royal Master, and Select Master. Designed and duly arranged according to the Lectures. To which is added, Illustrations, Charges, Songs, &c., with Additions and Engravings. This, I am informed, has gone through sixteen editions, the last dated New York, 1801. I was also told that some one used to travel about London, offering to sell Masonic charts to the different Lodges. If any brother remembers this, perhaps he will kindly afford the information, and also a description of what is known amongst us as a Masonic chart?—BIBLIOPOL.

THE LADY FREEMASON.

Having often heard about the lady Freemason, I am inclined to ask you to solve my doubts on the point, for I have no means of elucidating the facts for myself. Is the legend that a lady was made a Freemason true, or is it only a quiz on the Craft?—A YOUNG MASON.—[The legend is perfectly true, and may be seen, very happily told, in Burke's Anecdotes of the Aristocracy, as well as in the Freemasons' Magazine for July, 1856, p. 480.]

DR. HEMMING.

Is anything known of the late Rev. Dr. Hemming, who, with others, altered the ritual at the Union in 1813, and sat as Master of the Lodge of Reconciliation. He was, it is said, Chaplain to our late M.W.G.M., H.R.H. the Duke of Sussex. Where can a biography of him be found?—F. R.

WREN'S CANDLESTICKS.

In Preston's Illustrations of Masonry, thirteenth edition, corrected and revised by Stephen Jones, 8vo., 1821, page 172, occurs the following note:—"It appears from the records of the Lodge of Antiquity that Mr. Wren at this time attended the meetings regularly, and that, during his presidency, he presented to that Lodge three mahogany candlesticks, which are still preserved, and highly prized, as a memento of the esteem of the honourable donor." Would it be too exacting to request some member of the Lodge of Antiquity to furnish a description of these gifts of G.M. Wren?—A NEOPHYTE.

RED CROSS OF ROME AND CONSTANTINE.

Is there such a degree among the higher grades as the Red Cross of Rome and Constantine? And if so, where is it held, and who are eligible to be received into it?—D.—T.

LODGE WARDENS.

In an old plate representing the interior of a Lodge room, and published by authority, the Wardens' chairs are placed, both together, at one end of the table, and the Master's at the other. How long did this observance last?—CRITO.

REVIEWS.

WORKS ON ORGANS.

1. A Short Account of Organs Built in England from the Reign of King Charles the Second to the Present Time. By SIR JOHN SUTTON, Bart. London: Masters, Aldersgate-street.
2. Scudamore Organs, or Practical Hints respecting Organs for Village Churches and Small Chancels, on Improved Principles. By the Rev. JOHN BARON, M.A., Rector of Upton, Scudamore, Wilts, and late Michel Fellow of Queen's College, Oxford. London: Bell and Daldy, Fleet-street.
3. The Organ: Its History and Construction; by E. J. HOPKINS, Organist of the Temple Church. Preceded by an Entirely New History of the Organ, Memoirs of Builders, &c.; by E. F. RIMBAULT, LL.D. London: Cocks and Co., New Burlington-street.

EACH of these works—the two former of which are comparatively little known, the latter extensively known, and of acknowledged merit—are well worthy of a notice in our pages. Organ building, an art so intimately connected or rather associated with that of church building, as to have become an almost equal matter of interest to the Craft (whose province it has ever been to promote and encourage the fine arts in any and every department) with architecture itself—has made rapid strides within the last two centuries, and may now be said to have arrived perhaps as nearly at perfection as can ever be the case with any art.

The first two of these works seem to tend decidedly to the depression, the latter as decidedly to the exaltation, of the noble art. Sir John Sutton's work was published anonymously, but there never was any real secret as to its authorship, for independently of its being openly and unreservedly spoken of at the time, the author's views with regard to organ building were so well known that it could scarcely have been written by any one else. And one word with regard to the author himself, which, as all that we have to say of him is in his praise, cannot be considered offensive. At the time at which he published the work he was a Fellow Commoner of Jesus College, Cambridge, in the beautiful chapel of which (at the time undergoing a thorough restoration) he erected an organ, which he undertook to play himself at the chapel services, making provision at the same time for the formation and maintenance of a choir. He has since joined the Church of Rome (in which step, as he was doubtless actuated by earnest and conscientious motives, no one will presume to judge him), so that his college is deprived of his future services; but the organ which he erected, and the choir which he originated, still remain as monuments of his generous munificence.

The list and account of the principal organ builders, from Father Schmidt (or Smith, as he is more commonly called,) downwards, may of course be relied on, and contains some interesting particulars, giving us at least the probable history of some well known organs, e. g.—

"A more celebrated man than Loosemore,* and indeed than any other of his time, was Ralph Dallans, but the remains of his handiwork are unfortunately very scanty. Amongst those known we may reckon the organ of the parish church of Rugby, Northamptonshire;† and Anthony Wood says, that he also built the instrument for the Music School at Oxford, and that it contains four stops. Now, at the present time, there exists still in the school a small organ, evidently of this date; it may possibly be the identical instrument. It now contains six stops, and has a modern set of keys; but an inscription upon it informs us that it was repaired by Samuel Green in 1770."

* The builder of the organ in Exeter Cathedral.

† Warwickshire?

We may add to this account that this curious little organ contains what is now considered a rarity—a wooden twelfth.

The author tells us that his principal object in publishing his work, was the hope that it might, in some measure, check the great destruction of the fine old organs which, for some sixty years, had been going on in this country. A practice heartily to be condemned, truly—when will people learn that old organ pipes will not bear to be replaced by new ones?—an object praiseworthy in itself, but carried out to an excess which has gone far to damage the work itself, and mar the cause it advocates. A case in point occurs to us. George III. once on a time visited Salisbury Cathedral; being much gratified with his visit he asked the dean what would be the most acceptable present he could make to the cathedral. "Why," said the dean, "our organ is very old, and ——" "Oh, I'll give you a new one," said the king, and as the means of providing it chiefly depended on the contributions of the gentlemen of Berkshire and Wiltshire, desired that it might be considered his contribution as a Berkshire gentleman. A new and fine organ was erected by Green, in Salisbury Cathedral, but St. Helen's Church, Abingdon, has since enjoyed the tones which Salisbury Cathedral has lost. The authorities of that church were not aware of the fact (as an eminent musician who knew the instrument lately said, figuratively, to us) that their organ possessed pipes of silver.

"The reason," says Sir John Sutton, "why these beautiful instruments are so often destroyed, is, that the clergy and those in authority are persuaded by their organists that the instruments in question are not fit to play upon; by which they mean that it is impossible to show off upon them in the most approved fashion, for they have neither pedals, swell, or any of those complicated contrivances with which these modern music mills (as Mr. Jebb aptly calls them in his lectures on the choral service) are crowded. Every lover of true cathedral music must have experienced how much these modern alterations and additions to the organ mar the effect of that most devotional manner of performing the church service."

He then proceeds to observe that the attention is continually drawn from the voices by the clattering of composition pedals and changing of stops; that organists thunder on the pedals so as to drown the small choirs our cathedrals now possess, consisting (as he says) of about ten boys and six or eight men, three or four of whom are most likely disabled by old age or drunkenness—and much more to the same purpose. In fact Sir John Sutton has clearly made his idea of giving a sketch of organ building from the revival of the art in the reign of Charles II. to the present time, in a great measure an excuse for making a crusade against pedals, swells, and every conceivable mechanical contrivance for adding to the comfort of the organist and the power of the instrument. Again, after giving a fair account of the organs of St. Paul's Cathedral; Christ Church, Oxford; and Trinity College, Cambridge, as built by the celebrated Father Schmidt, he comes to the Durham Cathedral organ by the same builder. After giving the particulars of such stops, &c., as it formerly contained, he proceeds as follows:—

"It has been put into the hands of Mr. Bishop, who has added pedal pipes, new chorus, &c., &c. The instrument is now nearly twice the size it was at first; the two fronts being placed further apart than in the original arrangements, to give room for the additions.* The writer cannot but think the additions lately made to this organ unnecessary, as the instrument was perfectly effective before; at the same time he does not fear in this case the usual consequences of increasing the size of a cathedral organ, viz., the destruction of the choral service, since the management is in the hands of perhaps the first cathedral organist in England, and one who thoroughly appreciates the solemn choral services."

Now, all this is really much too strong. We are willing to agree with Sir John Sutton that "fugue playing is not the chief object in an English cathedral," but by no means that the introduction of pedals and pedal pipes has been so "mischievous" as he contends it has been. It is not our purpose here to enter into a dissertation upon church music, which would perhaps scarcely be suited to these pages. We will merely say that we go very far

* Since the publication of Sir John Sutton's book, the organ of Durham Cathedral has again undergone a change, and has been moved from the choir screen to the ground; a change on which (at least as regards its position) we shall take the opportunity of saying a few words in the consideration of the architectural arrangement of organs. We may add that we have every reason to believe that the services at Durham are still in every way worthy of the praise bestowed upon them by Sir John Sutton.

with Sir John Sutton in his opinion as to the character of the music that ought to be performed in our cathedral churches—viz., the music that was written for them—that is to say, the music of what may be called the Tudor School, the compositions of Tallis, Gibbons, Aldrich, Farrant, Blow, Purcell, &c.—in short, that of which Boyce's score, in three volumes, may be taken as a type. Much as we love the compositions of Handel, Beethoven, Haydn, Mozart, &c., we by no means wish to see them introduced, as is but too often the case, into our cathedrals, and for these simple reasons, viz.:

1. That, grand as they are, their character is different from that of the music of the English Church.

2. That their composers never intended them for the service of the Church of England, or they would not have written them in orchestral score.

3. That, even had they been so intended, we should not wish to have them performed otherwise than in their integrity—that is, with that orchestra which in English cathedral services is out of the question.

But, agreeing with Sir John Sutton in some points, and especially as to the excellence of tone in the old organs, which will probably never be surpassed—why such a crusade against pedals and pedal pipes, which, without drowning the voices of one choir only, can be used with great effect with the full organ in accompanying both, or even one, and undoubtedly give at once depth, strength, and solemnity to the harmony? And why should Mr. Jebb,* for whose opinion in many particulars we have the highest respect, call an organ with modern mechanical additions by the opprobrious name of a "music mill"? Why should not our organs have the advantage of any mechanical appliances that ingenuity can invent, to give variety to the music performed upon it? As for the rattling of stops and composition pedals, of which Sir John Sutton complains, that evil has long been obviated—both stops and pedals being now made to work as quietly as the most fastidious person can desire, and composition pedals being by some makers dispensed with altogether by the application of the pneumatic principle to the draw stops in their place. And why should Sir John Sutton suppose that the organist of Durham cathedral (whose taste we impugn not) is the only organist in England who can refrain from using them all at once, and so making them a positive nuisance? That some of our cathedral choirs are small, no one will deny; but why fix upon them the charge of drunkenness and inefficiency, when it is well known that, whatever evils of this kind may have once existed, they are fast disappearing? And why suppose that organists generally have a tendency to overpower them when weaker than usual? We cannot but think all this very uncalled for—very unnecessary—questionable as to its taste—and calculated to do rather harm than good.

One word more before we pass to the consideration of Sir John Sutton's last chapter, on the important subject of the architectural arrangement of organs. Our author appears to us somewhat inconsistent, since, while he condemns some modern improvements, he praises others, and, though he abuses the additions of Bishop, Hill, and other eminent organ builders of modern date, as making organs too large, he commends the large organs built by Harris, Snetzler, and others, which, from the account he himself gives of them, must have been nearly, if not quite equal, in size to many of those built now, which he condemns as "music mills."

Now, as to the architectural question, we quite agree with him as to the quaint beauty of the form of Father Schmidt's organ cases, and prefer the tryptich form to any other. It is observable that all these old organs are built in what may be called the tower form—that is to say, with four projecting towers of pipes; whereas in most modern organs the front is entirely flat, or, if projecting in any part, still not curved. As for the "indicate fat cupids by way of angels," and other grotesque absurdities which adorned the organs of Harris, and the "innumerable pinnacles and incorrect Gothic details" which Green used to "engraft upon his tasteless boxes," there can be no question about their propriety or impropriety. But we do not at all see why Sir John Sutton should be so very severe upon the practice of placing the cathedral organ upon the choir screen. In many cathedrals it would be difficult to place it anywhere else. Look at St. Paul's, and who could think of any other place? In Westminster Abbey, though the effect of the divided instrument is not as unsatisfactory as might have been expected, we yet cannot consider the change a happy one. Look again at the disastrous effect of the removal of the Canterbury Cathedral organ from the screen into the triforium of the choir, with its heavy movement ninety feet in length, the only way of connecting the pipes with the keys—the happy idea of a worthy dean, now deceased, who thought to throw open the view from east to west, but who forgot that, first of all, the screen against which stood his own decanal stall, and seen above that the beautiful stone screen inserted by Prior Goldstone, about 1500, between the two western pillars of Bell Harry Tower to strengthen them, would intercept nearly as much as the organ, the view just thrown open. Again:—"What," he says, "can have a more distressing effect than the cumbrous organ at York, with its details taken from the stalls, and its iron-looking pipes?" This, like many others, is a matter of taste, and one in which we differ from Sir John Sutton. There can be no doubt that, as regards sound the screen is the best place; all the best musical judges are now of this opinion, and it is by many allowed that an organ may be easily so arranged, placed in such a case, as to be even in this place, abused as it has been, a positive architectural ornament. We have no objection to diapered pipes, though that, again, is a matter of taste; but as regards the York organ, the very points which offend Sir John Sutton would strongly commend it to us. Placed on one side, as at Winchester; in the roof, as at Canterbury and Ely; on the ground, as at Durham—the effect can never be equal to the place assigned now to the organ by almost invariable custom and old association; and it is to be hoped that no more eccentric experiments will from this time be tried on that noble instrument, the cathedral organ.

Let us now turn our attention to Mr. Baron's work, on what he calls "Scudamore Organs." This gentleman is rector of the parish of Upton Scudamore, from whence arises the name "Scudamore Organs." Mr. Baron attended the architectural congress at Oxford in the summer of 1858, on which occasion he exhibited and explained the instrument so called, and which the public had been led to think was constructed on some new principle. But, in the mean time, Sir Henry E. L. Dryden, Bart., of Canons Ashby, Northamptonshire, had been examining the instrument, and declared that there was no new principle at all, it being nothing more or less than an ordinary organ of the simplest possible kind, without a case, and with all the large pipes at one end and the small ones at the other, graduated after the fashion of Pandean pipes, and that there was no new invention, no new principle whatever in the matter. It really scarcely appears to us of sufficient importance to write a book about, and Mr. Baron, moreover, though evidently an earnest man, is, we cannot but think, mistaken in some of his theories. For instance, in his preface, he says—

"From first to last, however, the religious considerations of the above fourfold question, ought evidently to be regarded as of the highest importance. How far will the organ help the soul to lift itself heavenwards and draw nigh to God? How far will it really help both choir and congregation to sing with heart and voice His praises? In a council gathered to provide an organ for such objects, the mere secular musician, however accomplished, will be worse than useless. A musician, to be of real value, must be a religious man, acquainted with church music and the structure of the organ, and also a member of the Church of England. If the advice of such a musician cannot readily be procured, the loss will not be great, because the organ builder, if of real merit, must know more than enough of the theory and practice of music, to be trusted for the musical excellence of such a plain and straightforward instrument as I trust to show in the following pages a village organ ought to be."

"If the organ builder be of merit"—but Mr. Baron has been running down the organ builders of acknowledged merit. A member of the Church of England—highly desirable on general principles we confess, as belonging to that Church ourselves; but we do not see the necessary connection between Church of England principles and a knowledge of organ building. "Acquainted with the structure of the organ"—we should think so, though we cannot see that religious feeling, though necessary to man, is necessary for building an organ. An infidel is quite as capable as a religious man of knowing that an open and stopped diapason, dulciana, twelfth, fifteenth, and flute are sufficient for a small building, and not for a larger one. Who ever heard such a question raised before? On the principle laid down by Mr. Baron, the builders of organs for Roman Catholic places of worship must be Roman Catholics; for Dissenting communities, Dissenters, &c. Now, it happens, as we are informed on good authority, that there is not a Roman Catholic organ builder in London, and yet the Roman Catholics get just as good organs as we do.

"The blowing handle is not essential, inasmuch as an easier and more seemly arrangement is to furnish the bellows with a treadle, to be worked in small organs by the player himself."

Easier—we are quite sure that it is not so. More seemly—yes, if to mar the whole effect of the music is more seemly. In small organs—they must be very small.

We were present at one of Mr. Baron's exhibitions of Scudamore organs, and the opinion of every one then seemed to be that, out of four organs exhibited, the largest, consisting of four stops, was the only one fit for practical use, and that, if larger, it would be better than it then was.

Altogether, organ building, though it may be Mr. Baron's hobby, is clearly not his forte. We need not go all through his book; it contains a number of fallacies with which we need not weary our readers. Let us say a few—necessarily a few words—on the really valuable work of Messrs. Hopkins and Rimbault, gentlemen who evidently know something more of the subject they have undertaken to illustrate than the two amateurs, who, however good may be their intentions (and we doubt not their excellence as regards their own consciences), will, we sincerely hope, be unable to carry them out, and so reduce organ building from the perfection at which it has now arrived to the imperfection exemplified in Scudamore organs.

A brief notice can by no means do justice to the elaborate work of Messrs. Hopkins and Rimbault, and we have not space to give to it, that large amount of attention to minute detail which it so well deserves. We can but give a short sketch of its contents.

The first part is occupied by Dr. Rimbault's history of the progress of the art of organ building, from the earliest ages to the present time; the second part by Mr. Hopkins's lucid explanation of the instrument itself, together with an excellent and useful list of the principal organs in England and other parts of Europe, with their contents; and a chapter on tuning and temperament, which deserves especial praise, and which contains a number of clever examples of the musical effect of improper tuning.

Among many passages of interest, we offer to our readers the following curious description of an organ at Winchester, of the eleventh century, translated by Mr. Wackerbarth from a Latin poem by the Monk Wulstan:—

"Such organs as you have built, are seen nowhere, fabricated on a double ground. Twice six bellows above are ranged in a row, and fourteen lie below. These, by alternate blasts, supply an immense quantity of wind, and are worked by seventy strong men, labouring with their arms, covered with perspiration, each inciting his companions to drive the wind up with all his strength, that the full-bosomed box may speak with its four hundred pipes, which the hand of the organist governs. Some when closed, he opens, others when open he closes, as the individual nature of the varied sound requires. Two brethren (religious) of concordant spirit, sit at the instrument, and each manages his own alphabet. There are, moreover, hidden holes in the forty tongues, and each has ten pipes in their due order. Some are conducted hither, others thither, each preserving the proper point (or situation) for its own note. They strike the seven differences of joyous sounds, adding the music of the lyric semi-tone. Like thunder the iron tones batter the ear, so that it may receive no sound but that alone. To such an amount does it reverberate, echoing in every direction, that every one stops with his hands his gaping ears, being in nowise able to draw near and bear the sound which so many combinations produce. The music is heard throughout the town, and the flying fame thereof has gone out over the whole country."

Mason, in his "Essays on English Church Music," gives the following metrical translation of eight lines of Wulstan's poem. He was not aware of the original, but quoted from Dom Bedos, who in his turn took the passage from Du Cange's Glossary.

"Twelve pair of bellows, rang'd in stated row
Are join'd above, and fourteen more below:
These the full force of seventy men require,
Who ceaseless toil, and plentifully perspire;
Each aiding each, till all the wind be prest
In the close confines of th' incumbent chest,
On which four hundred pipes in order rise
To bellow forth that blast that chest supplies."

Dr. Rimbault's treatise contains much more that is curious and interesting, but which perhaps would not equally interest all our readers; while the subsequent work of Mr. Hopkins goes into the most minute details of the internal construction of the organ in a laborious and painstaking, but yet lucid manner, which is calculated to render his book of great real value to any clergyman or other individual in any way concerned in the erection of an organ, especially if of any size; but yet by no means so as to make the same impression upon us as on one of his reviewers; who tells us that "any one who has spent half an hour over the book, must be convinced that a small organ is an absurdity, and that architects,

* This is spoken of as a large organ. What would its builders have thought of the organ at St. George's Hall, Liverpool, which contains one hundred and eight stops and eight thousand pipes?

if they would build churches worthy of the nineteenth century, must provide suitable accommodation for a large organ."

Mr. Baron must have strangely misunderstood Mr. Hopkins, if he thinks that a church musician of his eminence could for an instant intend to advocate the building of none but large organs; Mr. Hopkins lays down general principles, as applying to organs generally, to large and small alike, for a small organ may, for its size, be made as perfect an instrument as the giants of York, Leeds, and Birmingham.

Before we close this subject, let us once more give some little consideration to the architectural question, and especially to the case of the organ. As we have before stated, it is quite possible so to arrange an organ as to make it an architectural ornament. Among the organs, the cases of which we may thus commend, the following occur to us—those of St. Paul's, York, Winchester, Gloucester, Peterborough, and Ely Cathedrals; the Chapels of King's College, Cambridge, of New College and Magdalen College, Oxford; and again, of Westminster Abbey and the Temple Church in London. Westminster has, as we have before said, a divided organ in two gothic cases. The organ of St. Paul's is what may be called of the square tower form, and is a beautiful, and indeed noble specimen of this kind; and it is with very deep regret that we have heard since we began to write this paper, that a scheme has been set on foot for supplying St. Paul's Cathedral with a new organ, in a divided case. Enough violence has been done to the great architect of St. Paul's (Sir Christopher Wren) by removing the inscription under the west front of the organ, to make room for another key board, an inscription which, from the associations connected with it, has become actually a portion of the history of the Cathedral itself.*

Among other organ cases remarkable for their beauty, we must especially mention that at New College, Oxford, built in two square towers, with an opening between them in the form of a Gothic arch. This arch discloses the central portion of the great west window to a spectator standing in the centre of the east end of the chapel. We do not, however, commend it so much on this account as for its intrinsic beauty and elegance, which we should admire just as much for themselves, if the instrument stood before a brick wall instead of a window by Sir Joshua Reynolds. The organ at Magdalen, again, is in the square tower form, and also in a form somewhat more approaching to the triptych one which we hope to see again encouraged.

A brief allusion to one more kind of organ will for the present conclude our remarks on this interesting subject. We mean a kind, several of which have been lately built by Gray and Davison, Bevington, and other eminent builders, with scarcely any case, the pipes being arranged externally so as to supply the place of a case, such as the one at the American end of the Great Exhibition of 1851 (now, we believe, in the church of St. Ann, Limehouse, by Davison), and another in the large Roman Catholic church in St. George's Fields, Lambeth (Hill); but little of which is seen, and yet none badly placed, the pedal pipes lying on the ground of the organ loft, as at Westminster Abbey, and some of the metal pipes forming a semicircle downwards in front of the west window, the large pipes standing outside, the smaller ones in gradation between them. Thus no musical effect of the organ is marred, no architectural feature of the church is hidden, and the appearance of the whole arrangement is pleasing to the eye. There are few organs indeed whose arrangement does not admit of some improvement; let us hope that the books which have appeared on the subject of organs generally, good, bad, and indifferent, may tend to the promotion and encouragement of the noble art of organ building.

Freemasonry Past and Present, in its relations to Society. A Sermon preached at Allington Church, Dorsetshire, on Thursday, August 11th, 1859. By the Rev. HENRY RAWLINSON, M.A., of St. John's College, Oxford.

MASONIC sermons preached in the temple of God, in the face of a congregation but few of whom belong to the Craft, must of necessity but briefly allude to our ceremonies and mysteries, but are peculiarly fitted to display in all their purity the grand principles upon which our Order is founded; and if unfortunately the shortcomings of some of our brethren have occasionally given those of the outer world opportunity to cavil and taunt us with professions which we do not carry out in our lives, the reverend brother truly states "there is no association, civil or religious, aye, or even our own church also, which would not suffer from so severe a judgment." After alluding to the earliest works of architecture with which we connect our Order, and those works in monasteries and cathedrals, still extant, as a proof of the skill of the operative Masons of the middle ages, our reverend brother says:—

"For many years (since, I believe, the seventeenth century), we have ceased to be operative, and have now become speculative Masons; and giving to Freemasonry a wider range, we keep another and a nobler object in view—the cultivation of the mind, and the most enlarged charity and goodwill to all. And while professing to be the servants of the Great Architect of the universe, we lay the foundation of our society on the basis of religion. Having no further use for our working tools, we carry the emblems of them into real life, and from the square learn morality, from the level equality, and from the plumbline justice and uprightness of life. Thus squaring our actions by Masonic rule, and endeavouring to harmonize our conduct by the precepts of that Divine Being from whom all goodness emanates—and remembering that we are all sprung from the same stock, are participants in the same frail and fallen nature, and sharers of the same blessed hopes, and that no eminence of station should cause us to forget that we are all brethren—we keep in sight the criterion of moral rectitude (which, like Jacob's ladder, forms a line of union between Heaven and earth), and look forward hopefully to that time when we shall be summoned from this sublunary sphere to arise from the tomb of transgression to Heaven itself, where the Great Architect of the universe lives and reigns supreme, and where, through the all-sufficient merits of a crucified Saviour, we shall 'shine as the stars for ever and ever.' And thus it is that this speculative Masonry that we profess, not only harmonizes so completely with the description given by Solomon of wisdom and her house with her seven hewn pillars, but exhibits also a general coincidence of principle and design with the Christian scheme.

"Such, brethren, is the faith—such the hopes of a Freemason. While, then, you have seen our predecessors in the Craft fulfilling their mission by erecting, as operative Masons, those noble structures of mediæval times, whose very ruins and moss-grey stones bespeak their pristine grandeur and bear witness to the skill and zeal of their noble-minded builders, we, who have succeeded them, having no longer any call for illustrating the genius of their art, and fully recognising the truth of the words of the text, that 'the Most High dwelleth not in temples made with hands,' endeavour to be built up a habitation of God through the spirit. And oh, 'what an incentive to holiness, to purity of life and conduct lies in the fact that the body of a saint is the temple of the living God—a truer, nobler temple than that which Solomon dedicated by his prayers—and a greater even than Solomon consecrated by his presence! This poor, pale, sickly, shattered form is the casket of a precious jewel. This mean and crumbling tabernacle lodges a guest nobler than palaces may boast of. Angels hover round its walls, and the Spirit of God dwells within.'"

Throughout the sermon there is a vein of true religion and charity which shows our reverend brother to be a true minister of the gospel—but who has deeply studied, and understands the foundation upon which our Order is based—and the important truths which its ceremonies are designed to inculcate.

NOTES ON LITERATURE, SCIENCE, AND ART.

WITH reference to the rumoured engagement with Mr. Dickens to lecture in America, we find it stated, on the authority of the New York Evening Post, that he is under engagement to give sixty readings at sundry places in the United States, in the course of the autumn; and that the honorarium is to be $25,000, paid at starting, besides one-fourth of the net profits of the entertainments. The Leader says:—We incline to the opinion that the projected engagement will not be carried out.

A Paris correspondent, dating Monday last, states that the annual exhibitions at the Beaux Arts commence on Wednesday next, when the models sent in for the prize in sculpture will be open to the public, and continue on view for three days. The exhibition of paintings, engravings, and gem-cutting will take place on succeeding Wednesdays, Thursdays, and Fridays, and the prizes will be exhibited, together with the works sent home from the French school in Rome, from the 25th of September to the 2nd of October.

Prince Lucien Bonaparte has printed a catalogue of the works edited by him in the various dialects of Europe—also a list of works now in the press. The more recent works are the Canticles in Basque, the Gospel of St. Matthew in the vulgar dialects of Venetia, Milan, Naples, and Bergamo. Among other labours, the Prince has printed the Song of Solomon in four English dialects—Lowland Scotch, and the dialects of Cumberland, Newcastle, and Westmoreland, preserving, for the use of linguists and historians, the exact state of language in those districts, as spoken by the native population in the reign of Victoria.

We hear of an Electro Printing Block Company, formed to bring into practical operation certain patents known as Collins's Patents, "for the cheap reproduction, on an enlarged or reduced scale, of original drawings and existing engravings, maps, and prints, and for making therefrom electro blocks for surface printing, either at the hand or steam press." It is stated that by these patent processes illustrated works can be executed at an immense saving in cost, and that the processes must be largely employed in all branches of trade "where the first cost of expensive engraving has, under the present system, to be renewed with every variation in size or form." Amongst the names attached to the prospectus we notice Messrs. Wm. Bradbury, F. M. Evans, A. J. Copeland, M.P., Herbert Ingram, M.P., Charles Knight, Mark Lemon, and S. L. Sotheby.

* See our last week's impression, p. 168.

It is stated that the Duc d'Aumale has lately purchased a library in Paris for £15,000, said to be very rich in rare and fine editions. The Duke's library was already one of the finest private collections in the world, and he one of the leading members of the Philobiblion Society.

The fourth general meeting of the International Association for obtaining a uniform decimal system of measures, weights, and coins, will be held on Monday, the 10th of October, at four o'clock, in St. George's Hall, Bradford, Yorkshire. M. Michel Chevalier, vice president, will take the chair. Beyond routine business, the association will chiefly occupy itself with the metre, the litre, and the gramme, as the respective units of length, capacity, and weight, as recommended by the British branch.

The annual meeting of the Académie Française, for the distribution of prizes for literary performances and meritorious conduct took place last week, at the Institute. It was presided over by M. Guizot, who delivered an address suited to the occasion. Not a political allusion was to be heard; but some eloquent periods were introduced upon the march of humanity and civilisation, and upon the exercise by the humbler classes of virtues that proved that good examples of disinterestedness and of courage were to be found in the smallest villages—instances the prizes having been gained by two females of the poorest condition for the admirable fulfilment of their duties towards their families. In the literary department two ladies were victorious. The sitting was terminated by the reading of the poem which had gained the honours of the day, entitled "The Sister of Charity in the Nineteenth Century," by Mdlle. Ernestine Drouet.

Lieut. J. D. Kennelly of the Indian Navy, and Secretary to the Bombay Geographical Society, has been recommended by Lord Elphinstone for employment as explorer in North-Eastern Africa, in the regions just visited by Captains Burton and Speke. "Mr. Kennelly," says the Poona Observer, "is a fine, athletic, active man, in the very prime of life. He is familiar with the use of astronomical and meteorological instruments, and goes most liberally supplied therewith. Dr. Silvester, we believe, accompanies him as draughtsman and naturalist, and they leave some time in November. They will proceed at once to the lake districts, and endeavour to circumnavigate the northernmost of the lakes."

In the Stockholm state library a number of highly curious MSS. from the hand of Swedenborg have been discovered. They are, most of them, diaries or daily records of his inner and outer life. In that referring to the year 1734, the famous mystic alleges very natural, and not altogether delicate, reasons as the cause of his visions.

The town council of Berlin has just subscribed £1,600 to a foundation in honour of Humboldt, destined to afford aid to learned men and travellers in the prosecution of the studies to which he devoted his long life.

Two forcible and excellent lithographs, published by Mr. Schenk, of Edinburgh, now lie before us. One of Lord Loughborough—a great Masonic authority in Scotland—is boldly and cleverly drawn by Mr. Wilson, with all the vigour and none of the dreary blackness that is the usual attendant of German lithographs. The series of Scottish M.P.s, of whom Colonel Sykes, M.P. for Aberdeen, is one of the most rugged and sturdy looking, promises well. The stormy ledger lines on the brow, the deep pits under the eyes, the almost fierce mouth, are finely touched-in, without the usual cosmetic flattery of popular portraits.

POSTHUMOUS REWARDS OF GENIUS.—At Lord Northwick's sale, we read in the Court Journal, a picture by Patrick Nasmyth brought £750! Poor Patrick never made more than sixty pounds a year! This picture, full of beauties, was the labour of a fortnight. "Genius and its rewards are briefly told." Patrick sleeps in Lambeth churchyard, little known; even within the sound of the steam hammer of his less illustrious brother. Yes, in Lambeth churchyard lies all that is mortal of our English Hobbins; nay, of a better artist than Hobbins, able as he was.

CHRISTMAS MUSINGS.

BY W. HEATON.

CHRISTMAS has come with its boisterous breath,
And its leafless trees and bowers,
While the flowers all round
Lie hid in the ground,
And wait for the summer hours.
Where is the daisy's crimson fringe,
The pink and the damask rose,
And the bells of blue
In the woods which grew
Where the murmuring streamlet flows?
Where is the lark with its matchless song,
And the thrush's joyful tune,
And the cuckoo's note
Which did sweetly float
Through the woods in the month of June?
Hopes and delights which were young and fair,
And joys that were fresh and gay,
Like the choicest flowers
In the springtide hours,
They have long since died away,
And left the snow on the mountain brow,
And frost on the window pane;
While the friends we loved
Are by death removed
To the grave's deep dark domain.
But music floats on the midnight air,
Through the leafless trees 'tis borne,
And voices sing
Of a glorious King,
Who came on this joyful morn.

When the mistletoe and the berries red
Of the holly-bush are seen
On the old church walls
And the ancient halls
With leaves from the ivy green.
And many a bough from the old yew tree
On each picture frame is spread,
While the box tree gay,
On this festal day,
Is torn from its woodland bed,
And hung in the homes of my fatherland—
The homes of the gay and proud,
While the log fire glows,
And the cold wind blows,
And snow doth the grass enshroud.
Then raise a song to old Christmas true,
As they did in the days of yore:
To the Saviour born
On this happy morn
Be glory for evermore.

THIBAUT, KING OF NAVARRE, TO HIS LOVE.

Oh! could I but forget
Her beauty, her sweet tone,
And talking, and that lovely look at one,
My martyrdom, I think, were ended yet.
But, ah! I cannot bear myself apart;
And great simplicity
Is hope in me.
Only such thrall
Gives one the heart
To go through all.
And how could I forget
Her beauty, her sweet tone
And talking, and that lovely look at one?
My martyrdom's too sweet.

LEIGH HUNT.

MEETING ON THE LEVEL.—In the American Voice of Masonry we find the following definition of meeting on the level, by Bro. H. N. Marks, of Kentucky:—"It is said that Masons meet upon a level; generally speaking they do. They fail to take some Masonic periodical whereby they might hold converse with the wise and the good through the medium of their writing. And when we meet together to interchange the greetings of an exalted friendship, and to counsel and admonish each other upon the theme best adapted to the purposes for which we associated, we say nothing of importance, because we know nothing of importance. Yes, Masons 'meet upon a level!'"

CORRESPONDENCE.

[THE EDITOR does not hold himself responsible for any opinions entertained by Correspondents.]

THE CALENDAR.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE FREEMASONS' MAGAZINE AND MASONIC MIRROR.

DEAR SIR AND BROTHER,—The Calendar Committee seem to treat all suggestions from brethren with perfect contempt. For several years past there have been letters in the Magazine from correspondents pointing out things that sadly required altering; but still the Calendar is as useless as heretofore. Not only are there a number of Lodges that have ceased from their labours, figuring away in the list, but with existing and working Lodges a very great evil is allowed to continue. In this list there is no distinction made between those Lodges which meet all the year round (which might be done with a simple asterisk) and those which have a summer vacation. The consequence is, brethren from a distance are often sadly disappointed. I will give you an instance. A friend had occasion to visit a town not one hundred miles from here, and, looking at the Calendar, he found that on a certain date he could kill two birds with one stone, though at a personal inconvenience—transact his business, and enjoy the pleasures to be always found in a Lodge of good working Masons. Arriving there, he found to his mortification that the Lodge met regularly during the winter months, but not at all in the summer. To make the Calendar really serviceable to the brethren, this difference should be clearly stated, and it would be a great improvement if the months of installation were likewise given in a separate column. As the Calendar is issued by the Executive, we have a right to expect that it should be a perfect one; but red tapeism seems not altogether abolished from the office of the Committee specially appointed to amend, revise, and correct this, at present, very useless pocketbook.

I am, dear Sir and Brother, yours fraternally,
Dudley, Sept. 3, 1859. A PROV. GRAND OFFICER.

THE MASONIC MIRROR.

MASONIC MEMS.

A PROVINCIAL GRAND LODGE is to be held at the Freemasons' Hall, at Leicester, on the 14th, when the building will be consecrated and dedicated by the Right Hon. the Earl Howe, Prov. G.M. The Prov. Grand Masters of Derbyshire, Warwickshire, Staffordshire, and the Channel Islands, and other eminent brethren, are expected to attend.

WE understand that the brethren of Norfolk intend to invite Bro. B. B. Cabbell, their G.M., to a grand banquet next month, to testify their respect for him as a brother, and their sense of the services he has rendered to Masonry in the province of Norfolk since his installation.

METROPOLITAN.

SUPREME GRAND LODGE.

THE regular quarterly communication was held in the Temple, on Wednesday last, the 7th inst., the R.W. Bro. Admiral Sir Lucius Curtis, Prov. G.M., Hants, presiding as Grand Master, supported by the R.W. Bro. Sir W. W. Wynn, Prov. G.M. for North Wales and Shropshire, as D.G.M.; Bros. Col. Browning, P.G.W., as S.G.W.; John Savage, S.G.D., as J.G.W.; Roxburgh, G. Reg.; the Rev. Wentworth Bowyer, G. Chaplain; W. Gray Clarke, G. Sec.; King, P.G.D., as S.G.D.; Slight, J.G.D.; Jennings, G. Dir. of Cera.; Pocock, G.S.B.; Daukes, G. Supt. of Works; Horsley, G. Org.; Farnfield, Asst. G. Sec. Bros. Havers, Scott, Hopwood, Potter, S. B. Wilson, J. N. Tomkins, T. R. White, Faudel, and Phillips, P.G.Ds.; Bros. Walmsley, Spiers, Philippe, Masson, P.G.S.Bs.; Chevalier Hebel, &c., &c.

The minutes of the last Grand Lodge having been read and confirmed, the Grand Secretary read the report of the Board of Benevolence, from which it appeared that in June, eight petitions were relieved by votes, amounting to £97 2s., and £30 recommended to be given to Bro. Noah Wardle, of No. 421, Marple; in July three petitions were relieved with £40; and August seven petitions, with sums amounting to £90 10s., and £30, recommended to be given to Bro. Wm. D. Lowe, of No. 95, Sunderland.

The report was received, and the two sums recommended, granted.

The report of the Board of General Purposes which appeared at p. 176 of our last number, was then read.

The President of the Board of General Purposes said it became his duty to move "That the report just read be received," and in doing so he felt it due to Grand Lodge to make a few remarks on two statements in the report which did not require confirmation. The report stated that it had been brought under the notice of the Board that the members of certain Lodges were in the habit of emblazoning on their aprons emblems not warranted by the Book of Constitutions. This was so directly opposed to the spirit and laws of Masonry, that the Board had called the attention of the Prov. Grand Master to it. The next subject to which he had to direct attention was, the future publication of the official reports of the proceedings in Grand Lodge. Complaints had been made by many members that they did not receive those reports until about ten days before the following Grand Lodge. These complaints appeared so reasonable, that the Board, having given their attention to the question, had made arrangements for issuing the report as early as possible after each quarterly communication. (Hear, hear).

Bro. W. P. Scott, P.G.D., having seconded the motion—

Bro. the Rev. G. R. Portal rose to ask a question relative to the Lodge at Littlehampton, but was stopped on a point of order, the only question before Grand Lodge being the reception of the report.

The resolution having been put and carried,

The President of the Board of General Purposes said it now became his painful duty to move a resolution on the subject referred to by Bro. Portal. It was with great regret that he felt called upon to move a resolution asking Grand Lodge to confirm the suspension of Bro. Heward, of the Mariners' Lodge, No. 878, at Littlehampton, from his Masonic duties. The Board had received a complaint from the D. Prov. Grand Master that Lodge, No. 878, had neglected to make the usual returns. On inquiry they found that Bro. Cheriman had been the last Master, and that Bro. Heward had been the proprietor of the house at which the Lodge was held. The Lodge had fallen into difficulties, and Bro. Heward, who was the Secretary, had left the house, taking with him the charter and furniture of the Lodge. The Board summoned Bro. Heward to appear before them, when he wrote a very proper letter, in which he stated that the Lodge, consisting principally of the masters and mates of vessels, had fallen into difficulties during the Crimean war when the trade of the town was much interfered with, but that if time were given him he would call a meeting and endeavour to revive the Lodge. Time was given him; but nothing being done, a second summons was sent to him by the Board, in May or June, when he again asked for time—promising to call a meeting in a fortnight. That he had not done, and since that time he had taken no notice of the communications of the Board of General Purposes beyond simply writing a letter acknowledging that he held the furniture and charter of the Lodge, by which he stated he had lost money. (Hear.) This was an instance among many of the great inconvenience which arose from allowing the master of a house where a Lodge was held to become the custodian of the charter and property of a Lodge. (Hear.) Whether Bro. Heward should even have been appointed the Secretary of the Lodge was another question; but he held a letter in his hand from that brother, stating that he held the charter and regalia, and declining to give it up. He therefore would now move that the suspension of Bro. Heward be confirmed.

Bro. Roxburgh, G. Reg., seconded the resolution, thinking it most important for the interest of Masonry that the authority of the Board should be upheld.

Bro. the Rev. J. R. Portal said there could not be two opinions with regard to the justice of suspending Bro. Heward; but he objected to the present motion upon two technical points. In the first place, he did not see the necessity of the motion at all, as all that the Board of General Purposes had to do, according to the Book of Constitutions, was to report that they had suspended a brother; and Grand Lodge was not called upon to express any opinion upon the subject unless an appeal was made against the decision of the Board. In the second place it was laid down at p. 45, that all subjects of Masonic complaint against Lodges or individual brethren were to be heard and determined by the Prov. Grand Master or his deputy, and it was not shown why this case had been allowed to come to London, whilst the Prov. or D. Prov. Grand Master might much more easily have arranged it on the spot.

Bro. Savage, S.G.D., fully concurred with the last brother that the suspension was justified, but was of opinion that Grand Lodge ought not to be called upon to express an opinion unless an appeal was lodged against the suspension as laid down at p. 100 of the Book of Constitutions.

Bro. Spiers, P.G.S.B., stated that in a case which occurred in his province no report of a suspension of a brother was made to Grand Lodge.

Bro. Stebbing was of opinion that this subject ought never to have been brought before Grand Lodge or the Board of General Purposes at all. It ought to have been adjudicated upon by the Prov. Grand Master or his deputy, when probably local interest might have been brought to bear upon the brother, and led to a conclusion which might have rendered the suspension altogether unnecessary. A great deal might be done through the influence of neighbours and friends which could not be effected through the Board of General Purposes.

Some further discussion ensued in which Bros. Gregory, Mason, Adlard, and Symonds, took part, and in which it was shown that the complaint was laid before the Board of General Purposes by the D. Prov.

Grand Master, who had failed in inducing Bro. Heward to surrender the charter of the Lodge.

Bro. the Rev. J. S. Sidebotham moved that the matter be referred back to the Provincial Grand Master of Sussex.

Bro. Havers briefly replied, and contended that it had always been the practice, or ought to have been, to take the opinion of Grand Lodge relative to the suspension of a brother, and no such power should be allowed to exist in any but the supreme body. The Board of General Purposes had not, or ought not to have, the power of suspending a brother without the confirmation of Grand Lodge; and even if there were not many precedents for the course now proposed to be taken, he would call upon Grand Lodge to make a precedent for the future, and thereby prevent the supreme power being exercised by other than themselves. With regard to what had been stated relative to the Provincial Grand Master, it was not until the Deputy Provincial Grand Master had done his best to secure the charter of the Lodge for the brethren that he had remitted it to the consideration of the Board of General Purposes, whose power to deal with it could not be questioned.

The resolution was then put and carried, with five dissentients.

THE HALL.

The President of the Board of General Purposes would, as an introduction to his next motion, read a paragraph from the report of the Bard: "The Board further report that they have received an application from Messrs. Elkington and Co., the lessees of the tavern, requesting the grant of a sum of money, to be expended in repairs of the great hall; that they have caused inquiry to be made under the authority of the Grand Superintendent of Works, who reports that the repairs necessary may be completed for a sum not exceeding £275, and that competent persons are ready to undertake the work. The Board, therefore, recommend that the sanction of Grand Lodge be given for such outlay." He might mention that their house had cost them a large sum in repairs—in ten years grants having been made for the purpose to the extent of £1,500. It had been proposed by Messrs. Elkington and Co. that a grant of £500 or £700 should be made for repairing the hall. The question had been referred to the Grand Superintendent of Works, who had reported that the necessary repairs might be made for £275. He believed that the tenants were satisfied with what was proposed to be done, and he, therefore, moved that that sum be granted.

Bro. W. Pulteney Scott seconded the motion.

Bro. Masterman thought that the lessees ought to repair the house themselves. Were they not bound to do so under the lease?

Bro. Havers: They were not.

Bro. Masterman: Then they ought to be. The lessees got the benefit of the house, and the Craft had the benefit of paying for the repairs, which was no benefit at all. (Laughter.)

Bro. Stebbing rose to oppose the motion, as he thought it most ridiculous to expend £275 on the repairs of the hall, when they were on the eve of a discussion with regard to the future arrangement of the premises; which might make those repairs perfectly useless. He looked upon this as a most reckless expenditure of £275, abstracted from charity. (Cries of "No, no.") He maintained that it was so; for, though the money was not avowedly subscribed for that purpose, whenever they had a surplus of money they transferred it to the funds of one of their charities. (Hear, hear.) He thought, on the eve of making alterations in their property, the expenditure most inopportune, and that the utmost they should be called upon to do before the whole question was taken into consideration should be to keep out wind and water. (Hear, hear.)

The resolution was then put and carried.

THE ORGANS.

The President of the Board of General Purposes had next to bring forward a resolution, which he believed was to be opposed by one of his earliest friends. It was a question in which neither himself nor any member of the Board of General Purposes had the slightest personal interest, nor could have. It related to the organs. They had received from the Grand Organist an opinion that the present organs were perfectly useless, and he was opposed to all expenditure upon them. The Board had come to the conclusion to recommend that they should be repaired at an expenditure of £70, but they had not done so without the fullest consideration. He held in his hand a report from Mr. Bates—he believed he ought to say Bro. Bates, for he was a highly esteemed member of the Order—the organ builder, of Ludgate-hill, which stated that not only could he put them into serviceable repair, but that if properly looked to from year to year they would last for twenty-five years. He took the opinion of that gentleman as that of an upright man, and he stated that he could efficiently repair the organs for £70, and guarantee to keep them in good order for £5 5s. a year; the reason they were out of order being, that they were not sufficiently used. Seeing that in Bro. Bates's opinion the organs might be made serviceable for twenty or twenty-five years at a moderate expenditure, and not believing that organs which they had had in use but a comparatively short time could be altogether worn out so as to render new ones necessary, he would move that £70 be granted for the repair of the organs.

Bro. Dr. Hinxman seconded the motion. He had seen Bro. Bates, who assured him that he could keep the organs in good repair at an expense of £5 5s. per annum each (not £5 5s. the two), which sum should include every expense. The cost of repairing the organ in the temple he estimated at £40, and that in the hall at £25.

Bro. Horsley, G. Org. said he was sorry to intrude himself upon the brethren. Indeed this was the only subject upon which he would venture to address them. He had now had the honour to hold his office for nearly three years, and when he was first appointed he was asked to examine the organs. He did so, assisted by a most competent person, and he found them in such a state of rack and ruin, that the first thing he recommended was that they should discontinue the payment of £12 12s. a-year for keeping them in repair. He sent his report to the Board of General Purposes, but whether it was received he had never heard. Last year another committee was appointed to examine the organs, on which were Bros. Roberts and Le Veau and upon their consulting him (Bro. Horsley) he repeated that the organs were perfectly useless; and that to attempt to repair them would be to throw the money away. He recommended that they should have two entirely new organs, which might be obtained for about £300—£200 for the hall and £100 for the temple. No notice was taken of his report, and the first intimation he received of the proposed expenditure of £70 for repairs, was when he saw it on the printed paper of business—not having been at all consulted with regard to it. He had the greatest respect for Bro. Bates, with whom he had had business transactions, and knew him to be a gentleman of the highest honour and probity, but he was convinced from the rottenness of the materials that they might as well throw the money in the Thames as attempt to repair their present organs. He was convinced that they were utterly worthless, and he would recommend that they should either have new organs, or wait until the whole question of the property was under consideration. In the meantime he could manage to play a little on the organ in the Temple, and when they met in the hall it would be better to dispense with the music altogether, or to hire an harmonium. He would move as an amendment that that part of the report which recommended an expenditure of £70 on the organs be not approved.

Bro. the Rev. J. S. Sidebotham seconded the amendment; considering that as the Grand Registrar was the legal adviser of the Craft, so ought the Grand Organist to be as regarded the organs, and they were bound to act upon his opinion.

Bro. Col. Browning thought it would be useless to expend £300 upon new organs, when they had the assurance of Bro. Bates that those they now had might be put in good repair for £70. As to the rottenness of any portion of the materials, that was for Bro. Bates to consider in making his contract, and not for them.

Bro. Jennings, G.D.C., said that the question of the organs had been fully considered by the Board, after placing them under the closest inspection. They had heard the opinion of the Grand Organist, that the organ in the gallery was utterly useless, and that in the temple worthless; but they must recollect that the Grand Organist was a player of extraordinary skill and standing, and that he was in the habit only of performing on instruments of a character commensurate with his position in the profession, and great allowances ought, therefore, to be made for his opinion, that nothing could be done with the present organs. They should also recollect that they had the organs inspected by a manufacturer, who stated that for every purpose of the Craft he could put them in repair, and guarantee to keep them so for twenty-five years at an annual cost of £5 5s. each. When they considered the solemn silence with which they had opened their business that evening, and the entire absence of any attempt of the Grand Organist to produce any notes from their organ, it surely became them to make an effort to give better effect to their ceremonies if they could do so through an expenditure of £70. He (Bro. Jennings) had taken considerable pains to make inquiries on the subject, and he was authorized by Bro. Bates to say that, if he did not put the two organs in a satisfactory condition, he "would make no claim for payment." (Hear, hear.) If they were placed in such a condition that any ordinary player could perform upon them, how much more might they not expect from the skill of their esteemed Grand Organist. (Cheers.)

The amendment was then put and negatived, and the original resolution carried.

ERASURE OF LODGES.

The President of the Board of General Purposes had now the painful duty to move that seven Lodges be erased from their books; but, if any brother had anything to advance why in any case the erasure should not be proceeded with, the Board would willingly consent to its being held over to give an opportunity for resuscitation, though he looked upon the Lodges proposed to be erased as defunct. In the first place he should mention that, since their last meeting, five Lodges had been removed from the list proposed to be erased, simply on the ground that they have complied with the requisition of Grand Lodge, and made the necessary returns. And here he might be allowed to say that, in some instances, this had been done under circumstances highly honourable to the brethren in the provinces, who had come forward and paid the dues for a quarter of a century, in order to revive the Lodges; and he had great pleasure in omitting them from the resolution he had to move. He would now go through the list of those proposed to be erased, begging them to recollect that they would only put them in a position sub judice until the resolution was confirmed; and if anything could be done to resuscitate either of the Lodges in the meantime, there would be nothing to prevent its being taken out of the list at their next meeting. The first Lodge on the list was No. 49, Lodge of Concord, London, and was formerly held at the Turk's Head, in the Strand. The Lodge had not met for many years past, and ought properly to have been erased.

before. It had come to his knowledge within a few days that some zealous brethren were exerting themselves to recover the warrant, and resuscitate the Lodge. He wished them every success, and should have great pleasure if they enabled them on the next occasion to take it out of the list. The next Lodge was No. 366, School of Plato, Cambridge, which was reduced to three members—the warrant being in the hands of the junior member, who declined to hold a Lodge, and the Prov. Grand Master was of opinion it ought to be erased. He now came to No. 459, Lodge of Benevolence, Sherborne, regarding which he had a letter from Bro. Highmore, a most zealous and active Mason, stating there was no chance of resuscitating it. The Lodge had not met since 1851, and it was believed the warrant was in the possession of the widow of the last W.M. and would be recovered and returned to Grand Lodge in a few days. The next was No. 751, Prince Edwin's Lodge, Eye, Suffolk. It had not met since 1852, and the remaining members had determined not to make any exertions to revive it, and the D. Prov. G.M., the W. Bro. Fleming, reported that it might be already considered as defunct. He then came to No. 765, the Roden Lodge, Wein, in the province of North Wales and Shropshire, the Prov. Grand Master of which (Bro. Sir Watkin Wynn) they had the pleasure of having among them that evening acting as D. Grand Master. The Prov. Grand Secretary reported that the Lodge was defunct, and that there was no prospect of reviving it. The next was No. 806, Castlemartin Lodge, Pembroke, South Wales, which the Prov. Grand Master (Bro. Johnes) reported as also defunct. He now came to the last on the list, No. 878, the Mariners' Lodge, Littlehampton, which had occupied their attention in the early part of the evening—the Lodge having fallen into difficulties and the warrant being in the hands of the Secretary who was the keeper of the house where the Lodge had been held—both the last Master of the Lodge (Bro. Cheriman) and the D. Prov. Grand Master recommended that under the circumstances the Lodge should be erased as the only means of resuscitating Masonry in Littlehampton. The R.W. brother concluded by moving a formal resolution for the erasure of the Lodges.

Bro. Hopwood, P.G.D., seconded the motion, which was carried nem. con.

All business being ended, Grand Lodge was closed in due form.

OLD CONCORD LODGE (No. 201).—On Thursday, the 24th ult., upwards of fifty brethren of this Lodge celebrated their summer anniversary at the City of London Hotel, Anerley. At the dinner Bro. C. Maney, W.M., presided, faced by Bro. Swainston, S.W., and amongst the visiting brethren present we observed J. Suter, P.M., No. 219; Jas. Queeley, P.M., No. 219; H. Norman, P.M., No. 209; W. F. Blackburn, P.M., No. 169; W. Carter, P.M., No. 165; W. Oxley, P.M., 274; J. Coverley, P.M., No. 257; J. M'Davitt, No. 362; T. Lewis, No. 53; W. Davies, P.M., No. 663; E. Sison, No. 118; J. Clark, No. 211; J. Edney, No. 107; and J. Smith, No. 1,044. After dinner the President gave "The Earl of Zetland," followed by "Lord Panmure, D. Grand Master of England," in complimentary terms, and next proposed "The health of the Rev. Bro. Laughlin, their Chaplain," who in reply said, he thanked them sincerely for the generous manner in which they had received the mention of his name. He cordially concurred in all that had been said in reference to Masonry. He believed that every minister who became acquainted with it would find it to be really and truly the handmaid of religion. The W.M. then gave "The Visitors," coupling with the toast the name of Bro. Norman, No. 209, who briefly replied. Bro. Kennedy, No. 201, then rose to propose "The health of the President." They all knew how indefatigable their brother was in the discharge of his duties, how creditably he had ever performed them, and with what honour to the Lodge to which he belonged. The present not being a meeting where the principles of Freemasonry need be fully dilated upon, left him but little to add. He would, therefore, simply propose the health of their President, thanking him for his attendance, and congratulating him on having such a numerous assemblage around him. Bro. Maney, in returning thanks, said he hoped he had ever been, and should ever be found, doing his utmost towards the promotion of the interests of the Craft. He feared he did not merit the compliment that had been paid him, but at any rate he endeavoured to discharge the duties intrusted to his hands faithfully and honestly, to the best of his ability. If he had done so satisfactorily it gave him additional pleasure, and he should ever feel proud that he had been of at least some service to the Order. Some very excellent singing and music interspersed the toasts.

INSTRUCTION.

ALBION LODGE (No. 9).—This Lodge held its first meeting for the season on Sunday last, at Bro. Gurton's, the Western Masonic Hall, Old Bond-street; Bro. Collard presided as W.M. The Lodge was opened in the first degree, and the ceremony of initiation and lectures worked by the many eminent brethren present.

ROBERT BURNS (No. 25).—This Lodge commenced the winter session on Friday, the 2nd; Bro. Newall presided as W.M., who, having opened the Lodge in the three degrees, proceeded with the ceremony of raising and lectures in connection with that degree, the whole of which were performed admirably, and greatly to the satisfaction of the members. An expression of regret was evident at the absence of Bro. Watson, at present in Dublin.

CRYSTAL PALACE LODGE (No. 1,044).—This Lodge, held at the City Arms, West-square, Southwark, had a very numerous meeting on Monday last, to witness and take part in working the fifteen sections. Bro. D. R. Farmer officiated as W.M.; Bros. Thomas, S.W.; Bradley, J.W.; Anslow, P.M. The Lodge was opened at seven o'clock, and the sections of the first lecture were worked by Bros. Stewart, Newall, Newman, Charnock, Blackburn, Crawley, and Thomas. Those of the second lecture were given by Bros. Walkley, Oliver, Daly, Warren, and Arnold; and of the third lecture by Bros. Anslow, Smith, and Hill. We have rarely seen the fifteen sections more ably illustrated. Several visitors became joining members, among them, Bro. Coggin, P.M. No. 276, who took the opportunity of impressing on the brethren and Lodges of Instruction in particular, the desirability of supporting the Freemasons' Magazine, as the only authentic organ of publicity the Craft possessed, by subscribing to which they would derive much information not otherwise to be obtained.

PROVINCIAL.

HAMPSHIRE.

WINCHESTER.—Lodge of Economy (No. 90).—The ordinary monthly meeting of this Lodge took place on Wednesday evening, August 31st, at the Masonic Hall, adjoining the Black Swan Hotel, when there were in attendance the W.M. (Bro. J. L. Hasleham), Bros. F. La Croix, S.W.; G. Oakshott, P.M., (J.W. pro tem.); S. Everett, P.M.; C. Sherry, P.M.; G. Durant, P.M.; W. Russ, P.M.; J. Withers, P.M.; W. Cowen, P.M.; G. P. Jacob, P.M.; and Bros. Elson, Snary, Butcher, Gerrard, Huggins, Smith, Waterman, &c. After the Lodge had been duly opened, and the minutes of the last meeting read and confirmed, the W.M. proceeded to read some documents and communications received from Grand Lodge, and called attention to the motion given notice of by Bro. Binckes, which, to some extent, bore upon the motion given notice of for this evening by Bro. Sherry.

Grand Lodge and the Provinces.—Bro. C. Sherry, P.M., then rose to address the Lodge in introducing the motion of which he had given notice at the last meeting, and in the course of his preliminary remarks, he said most of the brethren present would remember what he had advanced upon this subject at former assemblies, and therefore there was no necessity for his going at any length into details upon the present occasion, especially as those brethren who might not have been present had the opportunity of reading the reports of their meetings in the Magazine. The motion of which he had given notice for this evening was as follows:—"That a memorial be presented to the Board of General Purposes, asking them to take into their consideration the present representation of provincial Masons in Grand Lodge, with a view of affording them a fair share in the election of all Boards connected with the Order, and requesting them to bring the subject before Grand Lodge." Bro. Sherry proceeded to argue that it would be seen, on application to the Book of Constitutions, that the provincial Masons had not that share (under present circumstances) in the representation of Grand Lodge to which they were duly entitled. In the "Regulations for the Government of the Craft," (at p. 16), occurred the following:—"The public interests of the fraternity are managed by a general representation of all private Lodges on record, together with the Grand Stewards of the year, and the present and past Grand Officers, and the Grand Master at their head. This collective body is styled the United Grand Lodge of Antient Free and Accepted Masons of England, and its members rank in the following order," &c. The Book of Constitutions also, in the course of its general directions, provides that the Grand Master and Grand Treasurer, the Board of General Purposes, the Colonial Board, and the Committee of Benevolence, are to be annually elected by Grand Lodge, that is to say, by the Worshipful Masters, Past Masters, and Wardens of every Lodge on the English register. In practice, however, (said Bro. Sherry) these elections are really in the hands of those members of Grand Lodge (greatly predominating in the attendances) who happen to be resident in or near London, while those at a distance are, for the most part, precluded, by the expense of the journey and the claims of their business occupations, from being present in London and exercising their franchise. Under these circumstances a very great injustice is inflicted upon a large portion of the provincial Masons, indeed, on all those whose homes are at any distance from the metropolis, who, nevertheless, are so numerous as to constitute a vast majority of the members of Grand Lodge, and from whom the greater part of its funds are derived. The consequence is, that the virtual charge of the finances of Grand Lodge is thus invested in the power and management of those parties in whose appointment to office the chief contributors to those finances have practically no voice. The only means by which this widely felt grievance could be remedied, in his (Bro. Sherry's) opinion, was the issue of voting papers (hear, hear), to the Masters of all Lodges, to be filled up in open Lodge by those members entitled to vote, were they present in Grand Lodge; and this in place of obliging the said members to poll in London if they exercise their privilege at all. Then, and then only, the brethren of every Lodge would have the opportunity of exercising their full share in the elections, as provided they are entitled to in the "Book of Constitutions," (p. 66, clause 24), where it says, "The majority of the members of a Lodge, when congregated, have the privilege of giving instruction to their Master, the immediate Past Masters and Wardens, before the meeting of the Grand Lodge; because such officers are their representatives, and are supposed to speak their sentiments." Having held the views he had expressed upon the subject, he had lately made an application to the Grand Secretary in London, and that officer had kindly sent him down some particulars, which showed the great distinguishable difference in the attendance of the London and the provincial brethren at Grand Lodge during the last two years. The returns he had received gave him the following details in this respect:—

Quarterly Meetings.	No. of London Brethren present.	No. of Provincial Brethren present.	Total.
1857—June 3	150	11	161
September 2	191	7	198
December 2	196	39	235
1858—March 3	178	42	220
June 2	148	30	178
September 1	104	11	115
December 1	212	40	252
1859—March 1	213	46	259
June 1	130	42	172
Totals....	1522	268	1790

These figures showed that the attendance of London Masons had been four fifths more than that of the provincial brethren. He thought it was quite time something should be done to ensure to all an equal voice under equal opportunity of exercising it, such as vote by proxy would create, and for the purpose of bringing the question into the proper course of discussion, he had prepared the following memorial, which he would read to the Lodge:—

"To the Board of General Purposes,—

"The memorial of the Worshipful Master, Past Masters, Wardens, and brethren of the Lodge of Economy, No. 90, in open Lodge assembled,—

"Sheweth.—That according to the Book of Constitutions, 'the public interest of the fraternity (of Free and Accepted Masons) are managed by a representation of all private Lodges on record,' with the addition of a Grand Master, Grand Officers, &c., and that this collective body is styled 'The United Grand Lodge of Antient Free and Accepted Masons of England.'

"The Quarterly Communications of Grand Lodge are held in London, where the general business of the society is transacted, and the various Boards of Management are from time to time elected.

"That while in theory such representation is 'general,' it is proved in practice to be only 'partial,' the proportion of the London brethren constituting more than four fifths of the total attendance.

"That this inequality arises from the difficulties caused by distance and expense under which the members of country Lodges labour as compared with brethren resident in the metropolitan district.

"That though of late years these difficulties have been partially mitigated by the facilities afforded by extension of railway accommodation, yet the expenditure of time and money still presents a serious obstacle to such an attendance of provincial brethren as is desirable.

"That various plans have been devised with a view to promote such regular attendance, but the circumstances alluded to, and others which may be adduced, have only been attended with limited success.

"That your memorialists are of opinion that in the election of the various Boards of Management, some scheme should be introduced by which the entire English Craft shall be fairly represented in Grand Lodge. They would therefore humbly suggest that 'voting by proxy' be adopted.

"Your memorialists therefore respectfully urge upon your Worshipful Board to take this subject into your consideration, and also to submit the same to Grand Lodge. And your memorialists will ever pray, &c.

"Dated this 31st of August, 1859."

Bro. Durant, P.M., said he begged to second the motion, and he could not conceive that any opposition could be offered to it either on the part of the M.W. Grand Master or any of his officers. He thought the memorial was worded in such respectful terms that they could not take umbrage at it; and more than that, he fancied they would be glad to have the opinions of more of their brother Masons from the country, under the means proposed, to share in the management of the affairs of the Craft. He thought the memorial, with any little clerical error that may be apparent, corrected, should be sent to the Board to which it was addressed.

Bro. F. La Croix, S.W., asked how proxy papers would be managed, supposing the system were adopted?

The Worshipful Master said, in case the idea was received and adopted, the working of it would not be difficult under the superintendence of the officers duly appointed to the task.

Bro. Sherry said when they went to London under the present system, papers were put into their hands with certain names on them. They in Winchester could recommend any one of themselves for instance. Each member voting in the elections scratched out all the nominated names above the number for election, leaving the fourteen he individually approved of for office. They might have proxy papers sent down upon the same principle. He certainly did not wish to assume to himself the prescribing of any exact rule, but (as in the wording of the memorial he had sought to express) he wished to have some system adopted under which proxy votes could be received in London from provincial members; and at the same time the metropolitan members of Grand Lodge could exercise the same privilege.

Bro. Oakshott, P.M., said he must confess that he fully concurred in the motion then before the Lodge. He did really consider that—extending as the body was every year—it was absolutely necessary every member should have a voice in the affairs of Grand Lodge as far as possibly could be managed with fairness, and he could not conceive any measure better calculated for that purpose than the one suggested in the memorial. It was throughout most respectfully worded, and offence could not be taken with it; at least if such a thing should arise there would be no reason for it. All the provincial Masons wanted was a fair share in the doings of Grand Lodge, and they were not asking too much when they demanded it, when it was considered what heavy expense and inconvenience they were put to to be present at the time of Lodge meeting, compared to the advantage of metropolitan members. They thought the best and fairest possible means for putting all on an equality was, the allowing country Masons to vote by proxy. When they asked for that they were only asking for what they had a perfect right to expect. Since they sent a large sum of money every year towards the general fund they had a right to ask how it was expended, as well as to have a vote in its outlay. It was the case with subscribers to any public institution to have a vote regarding the general expenditure, and they, in the same way, had a right to join in the regulation of the Masonic disbursements. He was very much pleased to see Bro. Sherry take so much trouble and show so much energy in regard to the affair; he sincerely hoped the subject would be met in a proper spirit by Grand Lodge, and he trusted that body would say all had a right to vote by proxy.

Bro. La Croix, S.W., called attention to what he thought must be a clerical error in the memorial. He alluded to the word "universal."

The Worshipful Master remarked that it would be necessary for brethren to confine their observations strictly to the matter before the Lodge. The memorial referred to members of Grand Lodge voting by proxy in the election of the Boards of Management.

Bro. Russ, P.M., also observed upon the wording of the memorial. He supposed it was intended to ask for the privilege of voting either by personal attendance or by proxy.

The Worshipful Master explained that there was merely a slight error in the transcription of the memorial.

Bro. Jacob, P.M., observed that the system of voting by proxy was already adopted in the election of recipients of the charity benefits, a branch of their affairs which commanded a great deal of interest. By adopting the prayer of the memorial he thought a good deal more union and fellow feeling would be observable.

Bro. La Croix also thought it would tend in every way to raise the interest felt in the affairs of the Craft and increase their numbers.

Bro. Smith asked whether, if the question were brought before the Grand Lodge, some plan should at the same time be suggested or specified for carrying their idea into practice. He thought that would be better than merely expressing a wish to have a change, and leaving what they meant indefinitely stated. The distribution and collection of the proxies would require arrangement.

Bro. Jacob said every Lodge being responsible for itself, no difficulty would be experienced in that respect.

Bro. Everett, P.M., thought there could be no objection to the way in which the subject had been brought forward. For five or six years past a great deal of litigation and party feeling had exhibited itself in Grand Lodge, and there had been much more bitter feeling and animosity than there ought to have been. Out of good never cometh evil, it was frequently said, but a great deal of evil arose out of the objectionable exhibitions sometimes taking place at Grand Lodge. He did not think that the creation of such ill feeling and animosity had anything to do with the manner in which Freemasonry was intended to be carried out, and the sooner all jealousy was got rid of the better.

Bro. Sherry then briefly replied. He said he was exceedingly glad to find such a large number of P.M.s. present that evening, showing, as it did, the interest with which they looked upon the subject named in the notice paper calling them together. He believed there were more present that evening than there had been for some months. He would add just one word in respect to an observation that had fallen from Bro. Smith, to the effect that some definite scheme should be sent up for adoption. Perhaps it might be forgotten that the Board of General Purposes performed the duty of framing all laws for the Order. As he proposed in the memorial he had that evening submitted to the Lodge, the best plan was to call upon the Board to introduce some scheme themselves, that should recognize the principle recommended. They did not intend to memorialize Grand Lodge, but the Board of General Purposes, that the latter in due course might recommend to Grand Lodge to take the subject into consideration. He thought it would be too dictatorial to send up their own definition of the scheme to be adopted.

The observations made by Bro. Sherry were very generally approved and supported by the whole body of the Lodge.

The Worshipful Master observed that the best thanks of the brethren of the Lodge were due to Bro. Sherry for the indefatigable zeal he had shown and the trouble he had bestowed in getting up information for the introduction of so important a subject. The Worshipful Master also proceeded to remark that that mighty engine "the Press," he alluded, of course, more particularly to their own Magazine (hear, hear), would continue to stimulate the brethren not only of the Province of Hampshire, but of the provinces generally, to come forward as one man and assert their claims to a fair representation in the election of the various Boards appointed by the Grand Lodge. The Worshipful Master concluded by putting the motion to the meeting, expressing how satisfactory it would be for him to see it adopted unanimously and the memorial signed by all present in open Lodge.

The motion was carried nem. con., and the memorial signed accordingly by the following members then present:—Bros. J. L. Hasleham, W.M.; Charles Sherry, P.M.; George Durant, P.M.; John Naish, P.M.; Wm. Cowen, P.M.; George P. Jacob, P.M.; William Russ, P.M.; Samuel R. Everitt, P.M.; Geo. Oakshott, P.M., J.W. pro tem.; Fred. La Croix, S.W.; John Henry Elson; Henry Butcher; Henry Huggins, Prov. G. Sec.; J. Waterman; Alfred Smith; Isaac Snary; William John Gerrard; James Withers, P.M. A motion was then carried, admitting Bro. Harry Grant as a joining member of the Lodge, the general feeling of the members being gratefully expressed for the long and valuable services rendered to the Lodge by that brother. The Lodge was then duly closed, and the brethren adjourned for refreshment and spent an hour or so in that unity and concord for which the Lodge is so eminently conspicuous.

NORTHAMPTONSHIRE.

PETERBOROUGH.—St. Peter's Lodge (No. 646).—The Lodge was held as usual on Thursday last, the 1st of September. Bro. George Cattell, W.M., in the chair, a great many other brethren being present. The minutes of the previous Lodge being read and confirmed, a ballot was taken for Bro. William Wells as a joining member, he having been initiated in the Lodge of Corcyra, at Corfu; he was unanimously accepted. The W.M. passed Bro. Wells, who had previously taken the first degree, to the second degree, and also explained the second tracing board. The Lodge was honoured with the presence of a brother of the candidate, Bro. Capt. Grenville Wells. There being no other business before the Lodge, it was closed in due form, and the brethren adjourned to refreshment and spent the evening very agreeably.

SUSSEX.

PROVINCIAL GRAND LODGE.

THE annual Provincial Grand Lodge was held in the New Music Hall, Hastings, on Friday, Sept. 2nd. Bro. G. C. Dalbiac, R.W.D. Prov. G.M., presided, supported by Bros. Cordy, P. Prov. S.G.W., as D.G.M.; Bacon, Prov. S.G.W.; Powell, Prov. J.G.W.; Farmor, P. Prov. S.G.W.; Verrall, Prov. G. Treas.; Gavin Pocock, G.S.B., Prov. G. Sec.; Wood, Prov. S.G.D.; Woolven, Prov. J.G.D.; Bannister, P. Prov. S.G.D.; E. Scott, Prov. G. Supt. of Works; J. Fabian, P. Prov. G. Supt. of Works; Schilling, Prov. G. Dir. of Cers.; Wellerd, Prov. Assist. G. Dir. of Cers.; Smithers, P. Prov. G. Dir. of Cers.; Bowmer, Prov. G.S.B.; Stuckey, P. Prov. G.S.B.; Kule, Prov. G. Org.; Butcher, Prov. G. Purst.; Burchell and Collins, Stewards; the W. Masters, P. Masters, Wardens, and about seventy brethren. Amongst the visitors were Bros. J. Symonds, P.M. 21, and member of the Board of General Purposes; and Bro. H. G. Warren, Past G. Steward, &c.

The Prov. Grand Lodge was opened at three o'clock. On the lists of the Lodges being called over it was found that all excepting No. 878, Littlehampton, were represented. The minutes of the last Prov. G. Lodge were read and confirmed. A most favourable report was read from the Finance Committee, showing a balance of £85 19s. 5d. in hand. Bro. W. Verrall was unanimously re-elected Treasurer. The Prov. G. Sec. read a statement prepared from the returns, shewing the progress of Freemasonry in Sussex during the year ending June 1859.

The Deputy Provincial Grand Master thus addressed the Provincial Grand Lodge:—

"Brethren, it is now my pleasing duty to offer to the officers of the past year my grateful thanks for the efficient support with which they have enabled me to conduct the duties of the province, and for the zeal which has characterized their efforts to maintain in every instance our ancient landmarks, the interests of the Craft in general, and of this Provincial Grand Lodge in particular. I believe this to be a fitting opportunity, without detaining you long, to take a slight review of the past year in order that the brethren may be fully acquainted with the manner in which the executive have performed the trust reposed in them, and also to recall any particular incidents that have occurred since we last met, and to mention one or two subjects I wish to impress upon Masters of Lodges and upon the brethren generally. These and a few statistical facts, comparing the funds and our present numbers in the province with those of the year 1855 (the year immediately succeeding our reconstitution as a Provincial Grand Lodge), will, I feel satisfied, be acceptable to the brethren, as manifesting the steady progress Freemasonry is making amongst us, and proving that the officers of the last year have acted with that zeal transmitted to them by those worthy Past Provincial officers who have set them so bright an example, many of whom I delight in seeing here to-day; and more particularly that the brethren may know how the finance has been looked after, the funds applied and the great objects of Freemasonry always borne in mind. This is only our fifth annual meeting since the re-organization of the Provincial Grand Lodge. The first returns in 1854, show a total of 199 members; by the returns up to June 30th of this year, we have 329 subscribing members. In 1855 there were fifteen initiations, in this year thirty. In 1855 the quarterage, &c., amounted to £23 14s. 6d.; in this year to £40 12s. 6d. In 1855 your balance was a nominal one, as the whole of the Provincial Grand Lodge regalia was not paid for till 1856, when I perceive there was £3 15s. 11d. in hand. You have now a balance in the Prov. G. Treasurer's hands of £85 19s. 5d., and at the end of our next year I feel justified in stating that it will amount to £100. In 1856 you were enabled to vote fifteen guineas to the Masonic charities—in 1857 ten guineas—in 1858 twenty pounds, and there is notice of motion for a similar sum to be voted this day, amounting altogether to £66 5s. in the four years. By a strict regard to economy, the total expenses of management (exclusive of insurance and Tyler) has averaged £4 16s. 6d. per annum. This statement will, I am sure, convince the brethren how much is due to the Finance Committee for their very able management, but more especially to the valuable and earnest services of our esteemed Prov. G. Sec. and Prov. G. Treas., to the latter for his care of our exchequer, and to the former for devoting so much valuable time to our interests, conducting our correspondence so ably, and bestowing such care on the regalia, &c. (now the paid property of the Prov. Grand Lodge, which may be estimated at a value above one hundred guineas); and it is with the highest gratification I am enabled in Prov. Grand Lodge to tell Bro. Gavin E. Pocock how much satisfaction we all feel that his usefulness has been recognized and rewarded by the M.W. Grand Master of England, and that by his presence we are honoured by the attendance of an officer of the Grand Lodge of England. I am indeed proud of the position I hold in this province, for in my visits to the several Lodges and my intercourse with the brethren, I have seen nothing but excellent working, harmony, and good feeling prevailing amongst all, an earnest wish to carry out the principles of our Order in accordance with the Book of Constitutions and in strict allegiance to our most respected and M.W.G.M. Lord Zetland, a nobleman who presides over Masonry with the hearty good wishes of all Sussex Freemasons, and who I feel convinced may count on the cordial support of this province should faction ever assail him. (Much applause). I will now remark on one or two points which I trust the Masters of Lodges and the brethren generally will bear in mind, especially as they are subjects clearly enjoined in the Book of Constitutions, and the infringement of them has on more than one occasion been brought before the Board of General Purposes. Lodges of Emergency should rarely be called—nothing but a sheer necessity can warrant them. I would beg to refer W.M.s. to pages 80 and 83 of the last edition of the Book of Constitutions relating to the examination of candidates prior to passing and raising. They must reply correctly and audibly, so that every brother may hear; the Worshipful Master should not be satisfied with the Deacon putting the words into their mouths, but the candidates should themselves be perfect in the required replies; the same remarks apply to their answers to the Wardens, which should be given distinctly and audibly. The clothing of the brethren must be strictly in accordance with the Book of Constitutions, and the Worshipful Master of each Lodge is responsible for the observance thereof. This rule has been ever adhered to in Sussex, but some Lodges in England having lately been called to account for a deviation therefrom, is my reason for mentioning it. I would also caution Masters of Lodges with reference to mendicants; I am grieved to say that many unworthy Masons from all parts make it their business to travel the country merely to impose upon the charity of the unwary, and as soon as each new Master is appointed, to make him their prey. A little caution on this head will prevent much imposition and preserve the charitable funds for the deserving and really needy brothers. In March last I was necessitated to report to Grand Lodge the Howard Lodge, No. 64, and the Mariners' Lodge, No. 878, for non-payment of arrears; I am happy to say No. 64 has since adjusted all claims; through the exertions of kind brethren ever zealous in our cause, that Lodge starts afresh under very favourable circumstances—may it flourish and prosper long in the country. I regret to say No. 878 has made no arrangement for the settlement of arrears, and the case will come before the Grand Lodge on Wednesday next. A petition for a fourth Lodge to be held in Brighton, at the request of certain brethren, was forwarded by me to the Grand Master during the present year: without a decided opposition to the prayer of the petition I did not feel justified in according to it that warm and cordial support I otherwise should have done, from a feeling that the time was premature for such an application. I can assure the brethren whose names were appended to it, that as I find our numbers increase and our influence extend, I shall feel it a duty as well as a pleasure to co-operate with them, and will give my support and recommendation for the formation of additional Lodges either in Brighton or any other town of the province, if I see it to be the wish of the brethren and am convinced it is for the good of the Craft in the locality from whence the petition emanates. I understand that petitions from several of our increasing populated coast towns will very probably, ere long, be sent to me, to all of which I shall give my very best attention. In conclusion I will allude to a painful occurrence, but one which must be continually befalling us—our respected Bro. Benjamin Vallance has passed from us. Our beloved brother was amongst the first of the Prov. Grand Officers at our re-organization in 1854, and a P.M. of No. 338. He was appointed

Senior Grand Warden, and although then in declining health, he exerted himself greatly to our benefit, and I am sure every one here will unite with me in bearing testimony to his worth as a man and a Freemason, and confirm my statement of how much we esteemed him while living, and how much we now mourn his loss. To each and all of you, my brethren, my best thanks are due, and I entreat you to believe me truly grateful for your co-operation and assistance in bringing the Provincial Grand Lodge of Sussex to the state of prosperity which it now possesses, and which I sincerely trust it may long enjoy.

The following brethren were then appointed and invested Provincial Grand Officers for the year ensuing:—Bros. Powell, (No. 45), Prov. S.G.W.; Bannister, (No. 47), Prov. J.G.W.; Tayler, (No. 338), Prov. G. Chaplain; Henry Verrall, re-appointed Prov. G. Reg.; Gavin Pocock, G.S.B., re-appointed Prov. G. Sec.; I. Scott, (No. 338), Prov. S.G.D.; Moleworth, (No. 45), Prov. J.G.D.; Freeman, (Nos. 394, 1034), Prov. G. Supt. of Works; Weller, (No. 47), Prov. G. Dir. of Cers.; Moppett, (No. 394), Prov. Assist. G. Dir. of Cers.; Tasker, (No. 394), Prov. G.S.B.; Kuhe, (No. 338), re-appointed Prov. G. Org.; Smith, (No. 45), Prov. G. Pura.; Ambrosini, (No. 1034), Howell, (No. 47), Cottell, (No. 45), and Chittenden, (Nos. 338 and 390), Prov. G. Stewards; Ancock, Prov. G. Tyler.

The report on provincial organization, to promote the interests of the Masonic Schools, was taken as read.

Bro. John H. Scott, Prov. S.G.D., said—R.W.D. Prov. Grand Master, with your permission I have a resolution to propose with regard to the report for the Masonic Schools. Those who have read that report will find that a circumstance is brought to the knowledge of country brethren with which I believe they have hitherto been unacquainted. It is that the application for admission into these schools from the provinces far exceeds the support which the provinces give to the schools. Now I am quite sure that it is only necessary to bring this fact to the notice and consideration of provincial brethren to induce them to exert themselves to the utmost to alter a state of things which if allowed to continue, will be a blot upon their generosity as men and their profession as Masons. I do not know that we of this province have much to reproach ourselves with on this score. During the short time this Provincial Lodge has been resuscitated it has contributed largely to the charities—several private Lodges also subscribe liberally; but still we might do more. We have done well collectively—let us individually strive to do what we can to support so good a cause. I think it would be very desirable if each Lodge would annually appoint a charity steward and member for the charities, whose business it should be to solicit donations and subscriptions from the brethren of his Lodge. We all know that there are many brethren who would willingly subscribe if solicited, but who, for want of solicitation, never bestow a thought upon the matter, and the charities consequently lose their assistance. There are many brethren who, though they cannot afford to give a guinea to each of the Masonic charities, would gladly give five shillings to one, if not to all. This is a trifling sum in itself, but it soon swells to a large amount when multiplied. I will not now detain this meeting with a detailed plan how this charity steward should carry on his operations—that had far better be left to the decision of each Lodge for itself—but will simply move that the following resolution be sent to each Lodge in the province as a recommendation from this Provincial Grand Lodge:—

“That in order to promote the interests of the four Masonic charities, the members of each Lodge in this province be recommended to elect annually, on the night of installation of the Worshipful Master, its ‘member for the charities,’ who shall solicit donations and annual subscriptions from the members of his Lodge, distribute amongst them copies of the rules and regulations, afford or obtain information, and present to his Lodge a report of his labours at the expiration of his year of office.”

Bro. Wood, P. Prov. S.G.D., stated that he had the greatest pleasure in seconding so admirable a proposition. He entirely concurred in what had fallen from Bro. Scott with regard to how much good might be effected by individual exertion, and adduced the large sums subscribed to the Boys School and the Royal Institution when he served as Steward to show that the brethren need only be asked to ensure their subscribing liberally to the charities.

Bro. Symond having briefly explained the objects of the Committee bringing the matter under the notice of the Prov. Grand Lodges, the resolution was unanimously carried.

The R.W.D. Prov. G.M. proposed, and Bro. Cordy, P. Prov. S.G.W., seconded, “That this Provincial Grand Lodge shall meet annually in the month of August or September, instead of September or October.” Carried unanimously.

Bro. Gavin Pocock proposed, and Bro. Tayler, Prov. G. Chaplain, seconded, “That two governorships for fifteen years in the Royal Masonic Benevolent Institution for aged Freemasons and their widows be purchased from the funds of this Provincial Grand Lodge at a cost of £20, and that the privileges of one be given to the W. Master (for the time being) of the Royal Clarence Lodge, No. 338, and of the other to the W. Master for the time being of the South Saxon Lodge, No. 390.” Carried unanimously.

The sum of £10 was unanimously voted to the family of a deceased brother, who was initiated in the year 1801, and who had recently died, at the age of 88.

The D. Prov. Grand Master announced that the next annual meeting of the Prov. Grand Lodge would be held at Brighton. The Prov. Grand Lodge was closed in antient and solemn form.

THE BANQUET.

The brethren afterwards re-assembled at the Swan Hotel, where a very elegant dinner was served, under the presidency of the R.W.D. Prov. Grand Master, supported by about seventy of the brethren.

On the removal of the cloth the health of Her Majesty was drunk and cordially responded to.

The R.W.D. Prov. Grand Master said that the next toast to which he had to call their attention was, “The health of the Earl of Zetland, M.W. Grand Master of England,” a nobleman who had proved himself every way worthy to fill the high position to which he had been called; and who, when unwarrantably assailed in his office had, by his dignified and candid behaviour, not only vindicated his position but shown himself worthy of the respect and esteem of the brethren. (Applause).

The R.W.D. Prov. Grand Master next said, that if the M.W. Grand Master had proved himself worthy of their esteem and regard, so also had the Deputy Grand Master, Lord Panmure. That noble lord, though he had only for a short time taken an active part in Grand Lodge, had proved himself a worthy follower in the footsteps of the Earl of Zetland, and was universally respected. In proposing the health of that noble lord, he should couple with the toast “The Past and Present Grand Officers,” and he was sure the toast would lose none of its value from the fact that it included their worthy Prov. G. Sec., Bro. Pocock. (Cheers). All who had any knowledge of Bro. Pocock would rejoice at his having become an officer of the Grand Lodge of England, feeling assured that he would always do justice to any position to which he might be called. (Cheers).

Bro. Pocock, G.S.B., assured the R.W.D. Prov. Grand Master and the brethren that he deeply felt the compliment paid him in having his name associated with so distinguished a toast. He felt assured that the Deputy Grand Master, the Board of General Purposes, and the Grand Officers were actuated by but one desire, that of rendering the greatest possible benefit to the Craft; and it was their wish that the Masters, Past Masters, and Wardens of the various Lodges throughout the country, should attend to their duties in Grand Lodge and judge for themselves on the questions brought forward for the government of the Craft. For many years the country brethren had not taken that active part in the management of the Craft that they should do, but he felt assured that no parties would feel more delighted at their doing so than the Grand Officers. He thanked them for the kind manner in which they had received the toast, and he could assure them that when he received the unexpected honour of being appointed to Grand Office he regarded it not as a compliment paid to himself, but to the province of Suffolk, of which it was his greatest pride to be an officer. (Applause). He had to express his obligations to the Lodges in the province, all of whom had congratulated him on his appointment to office in Grand Lodge, and which he believed was generally approved by his brethren. He thought it a high compliment to the province that after the Prov. Grand Lodge had laid dormant for twenty-seven years it should so rapidly have grown into importance that one of the humblest of its officers should have had the honour of Grand Office conferred upon him. So long as it should please the right worshipful brother who presided over the province, to honour him with his confidence, he would do his best to promote the interests of the Craft in the province, but if at any time the D. Prov. Grand Master could find a brother whom he thought would better serve the province as Prov. Grand Secretary, he would most cheerfully retire. He begged them to accept his best thanks not only for the reception they had given him that evening, but upon every occasion when he had had the honour to meet them. (Applause).

The R.W.D. Prov. Grand Master had now to propose to them the health of his grace the Duke of Richmond, Prov. G.M. for Sussex. Although his grace did not now take an active part in Masonry, he was assured that there was no assembly in the county of Sussex, whether he was regarded as a soldier, as an agriculturist, as a landlord, or a Mason, in which his health would not be responded to with the greatest enthusiasm. (Cheers). He felt assured, indeed, that if his grace were to perceive that the officers to whom he had intrusted the charge of Freemasonry in the province did not do their duty he would soon bestir himself and evince to the brethren that he still took great interest in the prosperity of the Craft. (Applause).

Bro. Verrall, Prov. G. Treas., said, that as senior officer of the province, a most pleasing duty had devolved upon him, that of proposing a toast, which he knew would be acceptable to every brother present, the health of their R.W.D. Prov. G. Master. (Loud cheers.) His indefatigable exertions on behalf of the Craft could not be properly appreciated by those who only saw their R.W. brother in public, as it was not then that they could see the anxiety which he evinced for the welfare of every Lodge in the province, and how careful he was as an individual in the performance of the duties which devolved upon him. Those who had attended the quarterly communications in Grand Lodge were aware how closely their R.W. brother attended to his duties in that assembly; and it gave him the greatest pleasure to propose the health of the D. Prov. Grand Master, assuring him how delighted they were all times to meet him in the various Lodges of the province. (Cheers).

The R.W.D. Prov. Grand Master assured the brethren that he never more deeply felt the want of the gift of eloquence than upon the present occasion, being wholly unable efficiently to express his deep obligations for the manner in which his health had been proposed and received. He could assure the brethren, however, that no person could take a deeper interest in the prosperity of the Craft than himself; and if he knew of any brother whom he thought could better serve the province than himself, he would at once resign his office, honourable as he felt it to be, into his hands. (No, no). He thanked Bro. Verrall for so kindly proposing the toast, and the brethren for so cheerfully responding to it. He would now ask them to fill a glass to the health of the visitors who had honoured them with their presence that day, and with that toast he would couple the names of Bro. Symonds, a member of the Board of General Purposes, and Bro. Warren. He had not enjoyed the pleasure of Bro. Symonds's acquaintance until that day, but his exertions in the cause of Masonry and in furtherance of the excellent charities were not unknown to the brethren, and he was sure would ever secure him a cordial welcome amongst them. (Cheers.) Bro. Warren was, he believed, well known to them all by his connection with the Freemasons' Magazine. (Cheers.) He could assure that brother that the articles in the Magazine were read with the greatest interest, and duly appreciated in the province of Sussex, where the brethren fully acknowledged the utility and importance of the publication. (Cheers.) He hoped that the Magazine would continue to receive increased and increasing support, so as to fully remunerate the brethren connected with it for their exertions. He further assured Bros. Symonds and Warren they should be happy to again welcome them in Sussex with any friends who might accompany them. (Applause.)

Bro. Symonds thanked the R.W.D. Prov. Grand Master and the brethren for the great kindness which had been extended to him, and especially for the reception given to the report of the committee on the charities, which bore the names of himself and Bro. Lyall. Masonry had been defined as consisting of charity, but he thought it might be more strictly defined as sympathy, for whilst they met together upon occasions like this and sympathized in each others' enjoyment, so also did they not forget the wants of their poorer brethren. This was only the second visit that he had paid to a Masonic Lodge in Sussex, his former visit being to the Derwent Lodge, when though a perfect stranger amongst them, he received a most fraternal and hospitable reception, for which he had to tender them his most grateful thanks. He had entered upon the investigation with regard to the charities, under the conviction that their action was not properly understood by the brethren, and he had a remarkable proof that he was right in his opinion—the D. Prov. Grand Master of West Yorkshire writing to inform him that prior to the publication of the report he was under the conviction that the children of London brethren had the largest share of the benefits arising from the schools; he was now however convinced to the contrary, and forwarded £20 as a donation to their funds. (Cheers.) He thanked the brethren of Sussex for appointing a committee to aid the charities, and observed that he should have wished to have included the Benevolent Institution for Aged Masons and their Widows in the report, but had no authority to do so; though he felt that that institution was deserving of the widest support. He again thanked the R.W.D. Prov. Grand Master and the brethren for the compliments paid him, and assured them that he had been extremely gratified at observing the harmony and good feeling prevailing in the province. (Applause.)

Bro. H. G. Warren thanked the R.W.D. Prov. Grand Master for the compliment paid through him to the Freemasons' Magazine. He was sure the managers would fully appreciate that compliment; and when the D. Prov. Grand Master stated that the utility of the Magazine was well understood and appreciated in Sussex, he (Bro. Warren) felt it to be no idle compliment, as he was bound to state that were every province to send them an equal number of subscribers in proportion to their Lodges, the Freemasons' Magazine would be indeed a thriving and valuable property. (Cheers.) He could assure them that no efforts would be spared to ensure a continuance of the good opinion of the brethren—and that there was no part of their labours in which the managers took greater delight than in bringing the claims of the charities to support prominently before the brethren. In the name of himself and other visitors standing around him, he thanked them for the manner in which the toast had been proposed and received, assuring them that they had felt the greatest pleasure from their visit, which they would be happy to have the opportunity of renewing. (Applause.)

Bro. Symonds had obtained permission to propose a toast which he had great gratification in offering to their notice—"Prosperity to the Provincial Grand Lodge of Sussex." It was almost supererogatory to propose that toast after the gratifying statement of the D. Prov. Grand Master that day, and which he had listened to with the greatest attention; and which would do much to stimulate other provinces to exertion when brought under their notice, as he had no doubt it would be in the pages of the Magazine conducted by Bro. Warren. (Hear.) He felt that much of their success was dependent upon having an excellent and efficient D. Prov. Grand Master—an excellent Grand Treasurer, and most indefatigable Grand Secretary. These combined would be sure to command success—and therefore it was that he had peculiar pleasure in proposing "Prosperity to the province of Sussex." (Hear, hear.)

The R.W.D. Prov. Grand Master next rose to propose "The health of the Prov. Grand Wardens, Bros. Powell and Banister," who might be said to represent the eastern and western divisions of the province. Bro. Powell had so well filled the duties of Prov. J. Grand Warden, that there could be no doubt as to his fitness for the duties of the higher office, which he was sure he would most efficiently carry out. Bro. Banister was an old Mason, to whom he paid no compliment in saying he was well known throughout the province. The fact that he had filled the office of Master of his Lodge four times in a period of ten or eleven years, and on the last occasion at great inconvenience when he was suffering from ill health, was a sufficient proof of the interest he took in the Craft. He was glad to see him in improved health to-day, and hoping he might long continue so, was sure the brethren would cordially join him in the toast. (Cheers.)

Bro. Powell, Prov. S.G.W., had great pleasure and gratification in acknowledging the highly complimentary manner in which the toast had been proposed and responded to. Both himself and brother Warden fully appreciated the high honour conferred upon them, and if the love of Masonry were not sufficient to induce them to endeavour efficiently to discharge their duties, the very handsome manner in which the D. Prov. Grand Master had conferred their offices upon them would be more than sufficient to do so. (Applause.)

The R.W.D. Prov. Grand Master said the next toast on his list was, "The health of the Prov. Grand Officers, Past and Present." He was deeply indebted to the Past Grand Officers for the manner in which they had performed their duties, and he felt the utmost confidence that those appointed that day would discharge their duties so as equally to merit the approval of himself and the brethren. He would, with the toast, couple the health of Bro. John Scott, W.M. of No. 338. (Cheers.)

Bro. John Scott had been so taken by surprise in having his name coupled with the last toast, that he felt altogether unable to address the R.W.D. Prov. Grand Master and the brethren in the manner he should have wished to do had he known that he should have the honour of being called upon to respond to a toast. As time pressed, however, he need not occupy them at any length in assuring them that the Prov. Grand Officers duly appreciated the honour which had been conferred upon them, and that the officers of this year were fully determined to perform their duty so as to emulate those who had preceded them, and merit the approbation of their excellent D. Prov. Grand Master when they retired from office. (Cheers.)

The R.W.D. Prov. Grand Master next gave "The health of the Masters and Wardens of the various Lodges present."

Bro. Banister, Prov. J.G.W. and W.M. No. 47 (Derwent, Hastings), acknowledged the toast, and said that although he had been a Mason for twenty-three years, he had never attended Grand Lodge until the last occasion, when he heard a discussion which he deeply deplored, but whenever he was required to support order and decorum he should be happy to go again. With regard to the charities, he felt they were all highly deserving of support, and was glad that a movement had been made, which he trusted would have the effect of increasing their usefulness and adding to their prosperity. (Hear, hear.)

Bro. Wilson, W.M., No. 64 (Howard, Arundel), felt he ought to be satisfied with the eloquent response of the brother who had just addressed them, were it not that No. 64 had been but recently resuscitated, and he felt most deeply the kind reception he had that day met with after having been almost dead to Masonry for a period of twenty or thirty years. He was deeply indebted to the Prov. Grand Secretary and other brethren for the kind assistance they had given in resuscitating that Lodge, and thereby restoring him to the Craft. He was an old man, having been nearly fifty years a Mason, and though from circumstances, and his Lodge being dormant, he had been for some time separated from the Craft, he had always taken the greatest interest in its prosperity, as shown by the fact that he had attended the Prov. Grand Lodge on its resuscitation at Brighton six or seven years since, and had been present at each subsequent meeting. He was proud to see the Craft in the province so worthily presided over, and he trusted that their D. Prov. Grand Master might long be spared to bind the brethren together in the bonds of friendship and brotherly love. (Cheers.)

Bro. Howell, J.W. of No. 47, said he had heard a great deal said about the necessity of the country brethren attending Grand Lodge. He had done so upon the last occasion, and heard language used which, were he to come back and report in the province of Sussex, would not give them any very exalted idea of the manner in which the business was conducted. To speak plainly, they must not go to Grand Lodge to learn manners (laughter), and he for one should not care to visit it again. (Laughter.)

Bro. Verrall, Prov. G. Treas., could not let the observation of the brother who had just spoken pass without explanation. He stated that they "must not go to Grand Lodge to learn manners." That might be true; but he (Bro. Verrall) would go to assist in restoring order and putting down such scenes as those to which Bro. Howell had alluded. (Cheers.) That he looked upon as the duty of all good Masons, and that his brethren were in the wrong, they should remonstrate with them on their errors, and endeavour to restore unity and brotherly love amongst them. (Cheers.)

The health of the Stewards, with thanks to them for their arrangements for the comfort of the brethren, was then drunk; and, the Tyler's toast having been duly honoured, the company separated at an early hour, the evening's amusement having been enlivened by some excellent singing from various brethren.

BRIGHTON.—Royal York Lodge (No. 394).—The regular monthly meeting of this Lodge was held at the Old Ship Hotel, Brighton, on Tuesday evening last, Bro. Moppett, the W.M., presiding, supported by the whole of his officers and numerous visiting brethren. A successful ballot was taken for Mr. Miller, Kingston; Bros. White and Hudson were passed to the second degree; and Bro. Bull raised to the sublime degree of M.M. Six gentlemen were proposed for initiation. A very numerous gathering is expected at the next Lodge (Oct. 4th) and banquet.

WORCESTERSHIRE.

DUDLEY.—Lodge of Perseverance (No. 838).—The annual meeting of this Lodge, and the festival of St. John the Evangelist, took place at the Swan Hotel, Dudley, on Wednesday, the 30th of August. Lodge was opened by Bro. Horton, the W.M. (Prov. G. Assist. D.C.), assisted by his officers. The W.M. elect, Bro. G. B. Bradley, was then installed into the chair in ancient form, by Bro. W. Bristow, P.M., No. 313, and Prov. G. Reg. The following brethren were afterwards invested as officers:—G. H. Horton, P.M.; J. Marsden, S.W.; Bradley, J.W.; J. Willisroft, Treas.; C. Russell, Sec.; H. Foley, S.D.; G. Pitt, J.D.; J. Kendrick, Steward; W. Harper, I.G.; and J. Foster, Tyler. Lodge having been closed in due form and with solemn prayer, the brethren adjourned to celebrate the festival. The following visitors were present:—Bro. the Rev. A. G. Davies, P.M., Nos. 730 and 819, Prov. S.G.W.; Bro. M. Dennison, P.M., Nos. 818 and 730, P. Prov. G. Reg.; Bro. W. Bristow, P.M., No. 813, and Prov. G. Reg.; Bro. W. Wigginton, J.W., No. 819, and Prov. G.S.B.; and Bros. W. Sheppard, W.M., No. 313. The usual loyal and Masonic toasts were duly given and honoured, and there was some good singing by Bros. Bristow, Ramsden, &c. Bro. the Rev. A. G. Davies, proposed the health of the W.M. and of the Prov. G.M., the R.W. Bro. H. C. Vernon. He alluded to the pleasing fact of the Prov. Grand Lodge having made the Prov. G.M. a life governor of the Girls School, by a donation of £50 last year, and hoped that the Prov. Grand Lodge would vote £50 at the next meeting (in September), for a similar purpose. He said the life of the Prov. G.M. was insured by the Prov. Grand Lodge for £100. Bro. Dennison afterwards proposed the health of Bro. Royd, the D. Prov. G.M., and the rest of the officers of the Prov. G. Lodge, stating that there was a very fair sprinkling present, viz.: Bro. Davies, the Prov. S.G.W.; Bristow, Prov. G. Reg.; Wigginton, Prov. G. Sword Bearer; and Pitt, Prov. G. Steward. Bro. W. Sheppard, W.M., of No. 313, returned thanks on behalf of the visiting brethren. The dinner provided by Bro. Joseph Beddard, was excellent.

PROVINCIAL CHAPTER.

SOUTHAMPTON.—Royal Gloucester Chapter (No. 152).—A convocation was holden at the Freemasons' Hall, Southampton, on Thursday, September 1st, under the presidency of Comp. G. Martin, M.E.Z., assisted by Comps. J. R. Stebbing, H.; and Benister, as J. The following Companions were nominated for office during the ensuing year:—Comps. G. Martin, 1st Principal; Euright, 2nd Principal; G. Dunlop, 3rd Principal; G. W. Clarke, Scribe E.; W. Gordon, Scribe N.; George Lungley, Principal Sojourner; George Lockyer, Janitor. On this occasion the Chapter was visited by Comp. Bayes, of Peterborough; and Comp. Stebbing proposed a vote of congratulation upon the occasion; Comp. Bayes having been formerly an energetic member of this Chapter. Comp. Sharpe concurred, and a suitable resolution was passed. The M.E.Z. had great pleasure in conveying this unanimous expression of fraternal regard, and hoped for future visits from the distinguished Companion. Comp. G. W. Clarke proposed that three guineas be subscribed to the fund raising to commemorate the services of the late Comp. Ferrand; the proposition was seconded and carried unanimously.

SCOTLAND.

THE DUNCAN BAN MACINTYRE MONUMENT.

ON Friday, September 2nd, the foundation stone of a monument to the bard of Glenorchy, was laid at Dalmally in presence of an immense Masonic and Highland gathering, many of the members of which went from Glasgow. A procession, which received additions at almost every turn of the road, set out from Inverary in the morning, and reached Dalmally at one in the afternoon. From thence it proceeded to Beacon-hill, where, after all present had occupied their appropriate places, the Rev. Mr. MacIntyre offered up prayer.

Bro. Colin Campbell, R.W. Prov. Grand Master, proceeded with the ceremonial of laying the foundation stone of the monument, with full Masonic honours.

In a glass bottle, which was deposited in a receptacle underneath the stone, the following articles were enclosed:—A volume of Duncan Ban MacIntyre's poems, the Masonic Calendar and Pocket-book for 1859, copies of the Morning Journal, Herald, Bulletin, Daily Mail, Perth Advertiser, the coins of the realm, and a sketch of the life of the poet, from which we take the following:—

"Duncan Ban MacIntyre, commonly known throughout the Highlands as Donnacha Ban Nan Oran, was born in Drinnan-licert, Glenorchy, in the year 1724. His early life was spent as forester to the Duke of Argyll, and afterwards to the Earl of Breadalbane. He entered the royal army, and was present at the battle of Falkirk, against the attempted restoration of the ancient Stuart dynasty. Leaving the army, Duncan Ban MacIntyre went to reside in Edinburgh, where, in an humble sphere of life, he exhibited rare poetic powers. His writings reflect the feeling of the Highlanders of his own time, and have consequently become popular as household words among the Gaelic-speaking population of the present day, and they promise to be enduring as the Gaelic language itself. His genius developed itself in many sweet and tender songs, as well as by numerous poetical compositions remarkable for their fire and patriotism, as well as for their humour and satiric wit. His writings have done much to perpetuate Celtic nationality, and to keep in memory the habits and customs of the ancient Highland clans, now fast disappearing in the altered circumstances of society in Great Britain. He died at Edinburgh, in 1812, where a monument has since been erected in Greyfriar's churchyard to his memory."

The stone, a fine block of granite, having been duly placed in its position, which, it is to be hoped, it will occupy for many ages.

Bro. Colin Campbell congratulated the committee upon the success which had attended their undertaking to perpetuate the memory of a native bard whose simple, touching lyrics were so much appreciated by the Gaelic speaking population of the Highlands, and whose untaught genius did such honour to the country of his birth.

Captain D. Campbell, chairman of the committee, as lord of the works, said—I congratulate my country on a demonstration, in the land of the sensitive and conservative Gael, so auspicious to the future, for it is not until the various races of an empire like ours learn to respect one another's feelings and nationality that they may truly be called a united people. Duncan Ban MacIntyre, the object of our gathering, can bear to be compared with the most distinguished among the Celtic or Scottish poets of his native land: but the history of Celtic poetry, like that of the royal dynasty of Scotland, may be said to have been consummated at the battle of Culloden; for the revolution, which proved fatal to both, though consummated in the Lowlands and England long before, had not until after the battle exercised any influence on the condition of the patriarchal clans. Duncan Ban MacIntyre fought in favour of the Hanoverian succession, but all his sympathies as a poet and a Highlander reverted to the fallen dynasty after the battle of Culloden, in consequence of the excesses committed by the army of the Duke of Cumberland. The oppression of his native race deeply affected the heart of Duncan Ban; and when he found that the rebellion, which was confined to a small minority of the clans, was assumed to have embraced the whole, and that the parliament passed penal enactments, stripping the very clans who fought against the rebellion of the national costume and arms, he sung of the injustice and humiliation to which his country was subjected in strains exciting and affecting. He had thus endeared himself to thousands whose sympathy with the Stuart kings survived their fall—nay, even to thousands who, like himself, were opposed to their bigotry and despotism, but whose feelings led them to ascribe their errors and misfortunes to the enslaving theology in which they were educated, and under the fatal influence of which they were impelled.

The multitude assembled on the hill then dispersed, after having given cheer after cheer, that made the rugged old hills send back such echoes through the glen as had not disturbed its silence since the days of ancient Highland chivalry. The picturesque procession then descended the hill, and returned to Dalmally, where they dined in the inn. The chair was occupied by Capt. D. Campbell, and the duties of croupier were discharged by the Rev. John MacIntyre of Kilmonivaig. On the conclusion of the repast, the chairman said—Gentlemen, fill your glasses, and let us dedicate a bumper to her Majesty the Queen. She is now in her Highland home, and well deserves a Highland welcome. Let us drink her health with Celtic honours.

The chairman again rose and called for another bumper to the health of "The Prince of Wales, the Duke of Rothesay and Lord of the Isles." The toast was drunk amid great cheering.

The chairman then rose to claim a flowing bumper to the toast of the evening. He said:—Gentlemen,—Although it would have been to me a labour of love to preface the next toast with some remarks, I feel that by not anticipating the Croupier, to whom the committee have assigned a toast involving the matter on which I would have to speak, that I am ensuring the company a high treat. The Croupier is the gentleman who is best entitled to speak of Duncan Ban MacIntyre, as he is the survivor of those who originated the movement in honour of the bard. (Cheers). He is also of all men living the best qualified and most able to do justice both to the poet's genius and his worth. I will, therefore, simply content myself with begging you to join with me in dedicating a full bumper to "The immortal memory of Duncan Ban MacIntyre, the Glenorchy Bard—the immortal Celt is entitled to be drunk with Celtic honours." (Immense and enthusiastic cheering, and the toast was given with three times three). Collector Campbell here sang, in the Gaelic, one of Duncan Ban's sweetest songs, the great majority of the company taking up the chorus.

The Chairman next gave "The health of the Prov. Grand Master of Argyll," which was drunk in a bumper, and with hearty Highland cordiality.

Collector Campbell, who by special permission, acted as Prov. Grand Master for the day, returned thanks.

The Croupier proposed the "Monument Committee, coupled with the health of James Dewar, Esq.," through whose united endeavours so large a measure of success had been attended in carrying out the great object for which so many Highlanders from so many different and distant parts of the country had assembled. He was happy to say that the feeling which had impelled them to meet to do honour to Duncan Ban was not confined to the Highlands of Scotland alone, but extended to every place where the Highland tongue was understood—a tongue which was the only language of the bard. They all owed a debt of gratitude to the Committee for their zealous exertions to accomplish the object which they had in view—to do honour to a man who was an honour to the race to which he belonged, in doing honour to whom they were doing honour to themselves. If they regarded the bard in his individual capacity, they would find him very unfavourably situated for the attainment of that varied knowledge which belonged to those who were differently circumstanced in life. He had no access to schools; he was totally illiterate; he knew no language but his own—but, in knowing that, he knew one of the most ancient of the languages spoken at the present day, intimately connected with the Eastern or Oriental tongues. The bard himself, indeed, ventured on the assertion (which the Rev. Croupier, however, said he would not presume to second) that “Gaelic was very sweet from the mouth of Eve” (great laughter); but if he could not go so far as Duncan Ban in regard to the antiquity of the Gaelic, he would, however, say that it was closely interwoven with that most ancient tongue the Sanscrit, the principal language of India, and which was connected with that of Persia, of Greece, and Rome, and of all Europe. Of great advantage, therefore, was it to the bard that he knew the Gaelic; but he laboured under the disadvantage of knowing no other. Nevertheless, his numerous poems were descriptive—some of them of character, some were patriotic, some martial, some social, and some of them were expressive of the tenderest passions of the human heart (hear, hear); and in whatever of these departments he engaged he won the admiration and love of his countrymen. (Cheers.) He generally began his poems with a statement, which might be called his text, and this he treated with masterly skill. Although illiterate, he was observant in a very great degree, as every page of his poems proved. His martial songs were calculated to rouse the patriotism and courage of his countrymen, and in his own day must have had the happiest effect; and he lived in a stirring time of war, when those countrymen had to maintain a hard combat with a powerful enemy. (Hear, hear.) Such was the extent of his observation that his descriptions, not only of the scenery of mountains, of the beauty of the valleys, of the fields, the streams, the woods, were most minute and accurate, but he even dwelt on the smallest insect with the most happy effect. He describes that noble animal the deer in all its varieties—in action, at rest, in its own social position—in such a way that if there were a Gaelic Landseer, he would make a fortune in a short time by committing to canvas the word-pictures of the bard. (Loud cheers.) The Rev. Croupier then gave a most interesting review of Duncan Ban’s poems.

The toast was drunk with enthusiasm.

Mr. James Dewar replied.

Collector Campbell proposed the toast of “The Masonic deputation,” coupled with the health of Duncan Campbell, Esq., of Glasgow, who was most enthusiastic in the Highland cause. Although Masonry was as old, if not, indeed, older than the time of Solomon, he would venture to say that there was no instance on record of the foundation stone of any structure having been laid with Masonic honours, where almost all the Masons were dressed in kilts. (Laughter.)

Mr. D. Campbell replied.

Several other toasts followed, and the company, after having drunk “Doeh-an-dorus,” separated.

AYRSHIRE.

A number of the Glasgow Lodges proceeded, on Thursday, the 25th August, by the Glasgow and South-Western Railway, on a pleasure excursion to the land of Burns. Among the Lodges represented were—the Glasgow Kilwinning, No. 4; Thistle and Rose, No. 73; Thistle, No. 87; Union and Crown, No. 103; St. Mary’s, Patrick, No. 117; St. Patrick, No. 178; Star, No. 219; Shamrock and Thistle, No. 275; Duntocher and Fairley Union, No. 332; St. George, No. 333; and St. Clair, No. 362. The party left Glasgow at a quarter-past eight, and arrived at Ayr shortly after ten o’clock. They were there welcomed by the brethren of St. Paul’s, Royal Arch, and Kilwinning Lodges of Ayr, and the procession, which would then number about six hundred, marched through the town of Ayr, headed by the Glasgow Thistle Band. The brethren were gaily dressed, and the aprons, jewels, insignia, and flags, gave the whole a most imposing appearance, while we have not seen a more respectable turn out for many a day. The weather was exceedingly fine, which contributed much to the enjoyment of the excursionists. They proceeded to the monument, and first visited the “Auld Brig o’ Doon,” and there, accompanied by the band, the brethren joined in singing, “Ye Banks and Braes o’ Bonnie Doon.” Afterwards they went to the new brig, and thence to the monument, where a number of appropriate speeches were delivered. They then proceeded to the cottage where Burns was born, and after inspecting it, broke up into picnic groups, and partook of refreshments in the adjacent fields, where the usual loyal, patriotic, and Masonic toasts were given and enthusiastically responded to. Bro. Neil B. Dalveen, assisted by some of the Ayr brethren, then marshalled the Lodges into the order of procession, and they returned to Ayr, and, after viewing some of the places of interest, by train to Glasgow.

COLONIAL.

EAST JAMAICA.

The inauguration of this Provincial Grand Lodge took place at the rooms of the Friendly Lodge, No. 291, Hanover-street, on Wednesday evening last, the 6th inst., on which occasion there was a large assembly of the members of the Craft—the Provincial Grand Lodge of Scotland being present.

The V.W. Bro. Robert McClelland, Master of the Royal Lodge, No. 250, installed the Right Worshipful Robert Hamilton, M.A., and M.D., of Clifton Mount, St. Andrew, as Prov. Grand Master.

The Right Worshipful Prov. Grand Master then appointed and installed, as Prov. Grand Officers, for the current year, the following brethren:—Alexander Fiddes, D. Prov. G.M.; John Burger, Prov. G.S.; Solomon Melhado, Prov. J.G.W.; Abraham H. De Lavante, Prov. G. Chaplain; James W. Whitbourne, Prov. G. Reg.; John Ware, Prov. G. Sec.; McClelland, Prov. S.G.D.; Joseph Francis, Prov. J.G.D.; James Derbyshire, Prov. G. Sup. of Works; Henry Garcia, Prov. G. Dir. of Cera.; John J. Duval, Prov. G.S.B.; Michael Lawton, Prov. G. Pursuivant; and Jules Desnoues, as Prov. G. Tyler; Simon E. Pieterz, of Lodge No. 754, was unanimously elected Prov. Grand Treasurer. The Prov. Grand Master delivered an address suitable to the occasion.

THE WEEK.

THE COURT.—The Queen and her family are enjoying themselves in perfect good health in the Highlands. Her Majesty visits her neighbours, and among the names of those so honoured we find particularly mentioned Mr. and Mrs. Farquharson of Invercauld. The Prince has been deer-stalking, accompanied by Sir George Grey, who is on a visit at Balmoral, and with Sir James Clark and Lady Churchill constitute almost the entire Court which is in attendance on the royal family. Strange to say, we do not see the names of any branch of the great house of Phipps mentioned in the Court Circular of this week.

FOREIGN NEWS.—The Emperor and Empress are enjoying their relief from the fatigue and gew-gaws of the Tuileries, and the bizarre adulation of the provincial magnates of the south may be (and no doubt is) an agreeable change from the more ornate periods of the polished worshippers of imperialism in Paris. It is confidently asserted that a fresh interview between the Emperor of the French and the Emperor of Austria will probably take place at some Swiss town. A letter which appeared in the Independence Belge, the writer of which pretends to expound the policy of the Emperor Napoleon with respect to Europe, and particularly England, tells us plainly that we must have war with France, but that there is no danger of such a war as long as Lord Palmerston and the Liberal party remain in power. According to a telegram from Paris, the French government has ordered twenty new iron-plated frigates to be constructed. The French Ambassador at Florence has been recalled. The Constitutionnel contradicts certain assertions made by a Paris correspondent of the Independence of Brussels in a letter to that journal, in which the policy of the Emperor Napoleon towards England is treated of as it relates to the peace of Villafranca. The answer of the King of Sardinia to the Tuscan deputation still affords material for the comments of the French press. The Débat says that a Congress is now necessary; the Constitutionnel applauds Victor Emmanuel; the Union thinks his answer was wanting in energy and sincerity; while the Independence regards it as vacillating. From other sources as well as the Paris press we gather that the answer of the King is proof of a caution which doubtless is partly caused by a subservency to France. Rear-Admiral Du Pouty, who had been summoned by the Emperor to St. Sauveur, has just quitted the Imperial residence and proceeded to Cherbourg. There is no truth in the statement of the Correspondance Havas that the French soldiers of the class of 1853 are to be discharged. A sad accident has happened in Paris. An English lady was accidentally burnt to death through a lighted match being thrown upon her dress. —The official Wiener Zeitung, in its evening edition, contradicts the alarming rumours which have been current regarding the continuance of the Zurich conferences. It hopes for a satisfactory conclusion, and considers the presence of the French troops of occupation which have been left in Italy to be of service to the interest of order. A Berlin letter of the 1st says that the Russian government has recently transmitted, by Baron Budberg, a note to the effect that the affairs of Italy cannot be settled in a durable manner except by a congress. This note has strengthened Baron Schleinitz in his idea of pointing out to the European powers, in a diplomatic despatch, the attitude of Prussia on the Italian question. —A telegram from Zurich, dated yesterday, states that Austria desires to obtain a guarantee from Sardinia against future intrigues in Italy, previous to Austria making any concessions at the conferences. —A Vienna letter says that the Austrian government is urging the Southern of Austria Railway Company to use the greatest activity in the construction of the line from Nablœna to Catarsa. This break, which separates the Trieste line from that of Italy, by preventing the direct transport of troops from Vienna to Verona, materially retarded the arrival of reinforcements on the field of battle. Count Degenfeld, Austrian governor of Verona, has published a proclamation, declaring that, in consequence of the frequency of acts of brigandage and attempts at murder in the provinces of Vicenza and Belluna, such crimes shall be punished by martial law. According to the Presse of Vienna, the difficult question of the share of the Austrian debt to be paid by Lombardy has been settled. The Ost Deutsche Post, in contradiction of a statement made that there are no Protestants in the Austrian empire, gives an account of their numbers in the various sections of the empire, and concludes by saying that Protestantism is represented there by 3,000,000 of inhabitants.—Victor Emmanuel received the Tuscan deputation on Saturday. Signor Gherardina, a member of the commission, addressed to the King the following following words:—"If the wish of Tuscany for annexation with Piedmont only served for the aggrandisement of your majesty's state we should entertain doubts as to the acceptance of our wish by your majesty; but our wish being inspired by the love of Italian nationality, we hope that the thought of Italy will decide your majesty to accept it. The king replied:—"Gentlemen,—I am deeply sensible of the wish of the Tuscan Assembly. I thank you in my name and in the name of my people. We have received your wish as a solemn manifestation of the will of the Tuscan people, who, after having made the last vestige of the foreign domination in Tuscany to cease, desires to contribute to the constitution of a strong kingdom which shall defend the independence of Italy. But the Tuscan Assembly will have comprehended that the accomplishment of its wish can only take place by negotiations which are about to begin on the affairs of Italy. I will second your desire, becoming myself strong by the rights which are given me by your wishes. I will support the cause of Tuscany before the powers in which the Assembly places its hopes, and especially before the magnanimous Emperor of the French, who has done so much for the Italian nation. I hope that Europe will not refuse to practise towards Tuscany that work of redressing grievances which it has, under less favourable circumstances, practised towards Greece, Belgium, and the Danubian principalities. Your noble country gives an admirable example of moderation and concord. You will add those virtues to that one which ensures the triumph of all honest undertakings, and which overcomes all obstacles, namely, perseverance."—The vote respecting the annexation of the Duchy of Parma to Piedmont has been made known. There are 63,403 votes in favour of the annexation and 506 against it.—The statement that the Papal troops had been despatched to the Legations has not been officially confirmed. We learn from Bologna that several members have moved the following resolution:—"The inhabitants of the Romagna will no longer submit to the temporal government of the Pope." The assembly has decided upon taking this motion into consideration.—The Bavarian minister, M. von Abel, died on Saturday. The subscription to the military loan is closed; a great number of applications for shares had to be refused or reduced.—The last accounts respecting the King of Prussia, state that his majesty's health had slightly improved.—The Belgian Senate adopted the first article of the bill concerning the fortifications of Antwerp by a vote of thirty-four against fifteen; four members abstained from voting.—The Diario of Barcelona of the 2nd instant, states on high authority that the basis of the Concordat, which was signed at Rome on the 25th of August, was—the absolute sale of the landed property taken from the clergy. The value realized by such property to be paid to the clergy in bonds not transferable. The same journal congratulates the Pope and Signor Rios Eas on the spirit of conciliation manifested in this affair.—The Faithful of this day, states that Prussia and Austria have informed the Danish government that the affairs of Holstein are being treated by the Federal Diet. Prussia and Austria stated that this communication needed no further reply from Denmark.—The steam ship North America, arrived at Liverpool last night from Quebec, which she left on the 27th ult. On the 28th she passed the steamer Indian, from Liverpool, which was on its way to Quebec. The political news by this arrival is unimportant. The anti-Catholic journals were denouncing certain known Roman Catholic bishops for interfering in the educational question. We have New York advices by this arrival to the 27th. The only thing of importance was the arrival at New York of the Moses Taylor from Aspinwall with 2,120,000 dollars in Californian gold. The news from California was anticipated. The New York stock market had improved.—On Tuesday the resolution for the overthrow of the Pope's government was voted unanimously by the national assembly of Bologna. It was further unanimously decided that the abuses of the Pontifical rule should not be debated upon. The following are the terms of the resolution:—"We, the representatives of the people of the Romagna, calling God to witness the righteousness of our intentions, declare that the people of the Romagna, strong in their right, will no longer submit to the temporal government of the Pope." A proposal for the annexation of the legation to Piedmont was submitted to the assembly, it was signed by fifteen members. Amongst the names are those of Marquis Bonari, Marquis Costabili, and Count Gozzadini.—While the French papers are expressing their admiration of King Victor Emmanuel's vague reply to the Tuscan deputation, the Italian journals consider his answer as an equalled acceptance of the offer of Tuscany, and the people of that country are abandoning themselves to joy in the same belief, and are everywhere illuminating their houses, and shouting with enthusiasm Viva il Re d'Italia!—A letter from Vienna says that great dissatisfaction prevails there with respect to the affairs of Central Italy, but there it is said, no probability of any attempt to restore the dethroned dukes of force.—Advices have been received from Constantinople to the 31st ult. Disturbances have taken place in Candia, caused by the collection of certain taxes from the Greek inhabitants. Two of the tax-gatherers had been murdered, and two battalions of soldiers have been sent to arrest the chief leaders of this affray. A Circassian deputation had arrived at Constantinople and presented to the ambassadors of the several powers a declaration protesting against the invasion of their country by Russia, and stating that the whole of their provinces would be forced to submission, if abandoned by the Porte.

INDIA AND COLONIES.—There is little to interest the general reader in the intelligence received by the last Bombay mail. Preparations were being made for the conveyance of the discharged European troops to their native country, but there appears to have been some difficulty in inducing officers to volunteer taking charge of them during the homeward voyage. There seems to be no doubt that Lord Clyde has earnestly urged the men to reconsider their late decision, and it is thought that some few will yet change their minds at the last hour. There is little to tell of the movements of the rebels, unless it be that the Rajah of Boondee has returned to life. The total number of vagabonds on the frontiers of Oude is estimated at 8,000, but fever is busy with them, and they are suffering likewise from want of food and the simplest necessities of life. The news from Calcutta, however, is disastrous; but at present our knowledge of the facts is confined to the following telegram from Sir William O'Shaughnessy.—On the night of the 26th a cyclone passed over Calcutta, and the following morning every line was interrupted. Our strongest constructed lines have been swept away miles on the Barrackpore road. Seven large trees fell in different places, destroying posts and wire. Two steamers have been wrecked in the Hooghly, besides many sailing vessels; lives lost, and immense destruction done. The Candia mail steamer was seen off Saugor just as the gale commenced. She is supposed to have run out to sea again, and no tidings have since been received of her. Every available hand I have is at work repairing damages done to the line.

GENERAL HOME NEWS.—All the Ministers have now left town, and we presume the business of the country is being judiciously transacted at Broadlands by the Premier and his private secretaries. It is barely possible that the public service may not be vitally injured by the dismissal of the various heads of departments to their grouse shooting and ruralizing.—The great topics of the day which have most interest at present are the Smethurst conviction and the builders' operatives' strike. The interest in the former has suddenly gone down to zero, in consequence of the reprieve which our gracious Sovereign has accorded to the convicted prisoner. What his future fate is to be does not excite much interest. There is but slender prospect, as it is said, of his receiving a free pardon, though this would appear to be the course demanded by justice. If he be a murderer, hang him; if not, set him at liberty. As for the builders' strike, that appears to have degenerated, as far as the general public are concerned, into the dryness of an absolute bore; but, as far as the poor fellows "out on strike" are concerned, we fear that the pinch is becoming somewhat severely felt, and that the monotony of which they will have to complain will shortly be the dreary one of hungry children and empty larder. Meanwhile, their former employers look ruefully at engines with no steam up, at circular saws and mechanical contrivances without end, in which a vast capital is sunk, and which are "eating their heads off" and devouring the interest of capital, for want of the journeyman's motive power to make them productive. It is easy to predict that this state of things cannot last. We sincerely trust the dispute may be speedily adjusted, and that a friendly spirit may be restored between masters and men. To avoid a lingering bitterness of feeling, great judgment must be exercised and mutual concessions made.—According to the report of the Registrar General for the past week, the health of London is improving, and the mortality is below the average of the season; the registered number of deaths amounted to 1047, being 76 less than the ordinary average number (1123) corrected for the increase of population. The births of 878 boys and 833 girls were registered during the week.—There has been a meeting of factory delegates in Manchester to protest against "one self-acting minder attending to two pairs of mules," an arrangement from which very injurious results are anticipated.—A somewhat extensive seizure of counterfeit coin has been made at the White Horse public-house, Baldwin's-gardens. The landlady of the house, Mrs. Jane Hutton, was charged with the possession of the spurious money, before Mr. Tyrwhitt, at Clerkenwell Police-court, yesterday, and after some evidence being taken was remanded till Wednesday next. Bail was accepted to the amount of £400.—Mr. Nicol, of Lombard-street, has been re-examined at the Mansion House on a charge of having converted to his own use a bill of lading which had been entrusted to him. The defendant indignantly repudiated the charge of fraudulent design, and stated that he had acted under the advice of his solicitor in retaining the document. It was determined, however, that the case should be sent for trial, and defendant's own recognizance in £1,000 was accepted.—The man Royal, who stands committed on the coroner's verdict, for the murder of his wife by poison, has been examined at the Thames Police-court, before Mr. Selfe, and remanded.—The 6th of October is the day appointed by the Court of Quarter Sessions of Middlesex, for the hearing of applications for the renewal, transfer, or grant of licences for music, or for music and dancing.—At the Middlesex Sessions, Henry Jones, Thomas Gallagher, and Samuel Harmer were convicted of stealing in the dwelling-house of Charles Walker, a cash box, containing £25, his property. The prisoners [were] each sentenced to three years' penal servitude. After the sentence was pronounced, Jones declared his innocence of the crime laid to his charge, and said he was in Birmingham at the time of its commission. When the trial was over an officer said Jones was wanted on two charges at Birmingham, and he would have been taken on those charges had he been now acquitted.—A man of the name of Normington has been apprehended on suspicion of being the perpetrator of the murder at Leeds.—At the Court of Bankruptcy, Chapman and Littlepage, of Harp-lane, City, and Bermondsey-street, Southwark, coopers and basket makers, passed their last examination; and Robert Smith, of Swaffham, iron and brass founder, engraver and agricultural implement maker, was also allowed to pass. In the case of J. Salmon, a boot and shoe manufacturer, of 38½, Brick-lane, Spitalfields, and No. 2, Baker's-terrace, Limehouse, and No. 3, Theatre-street, Norwich, who applied to pass his examination, upon accounts showing debts and liabilities about £15,700, and assets about £5,800, an adjournment was ordered for investigation.—On Wednesday, a number of prisoners were tried at the Middlesex Sessions, and found guilty of various offences. The most remarkable case was that of Elizabeth Newman, who pleaded guilty to stealing a fowl, the property of Thomas Gunston. When asked what she had to say in her defence she replied, "that as long as she had a hand to use she did not mean to want in a country where there was plenty." She had often been convicted of robberies of poultry before. The assistant judge told her it was evident she had a predilection for poultry, which she would not be able to indulge in for some time, as he must sentence her to twelve months' hard labour.—At the Court of Bankruptcy the choice of assignees was arranged under the failure of Eliza Medland, who kept the Metropolitan Dining-rooms, Cheapside, and William Foot, builder, of Victoria terrace, St. Donatt's road, New cross, Deptford, passed his last examination.—The arrangement of the account in the Consols market on the 7th inst. occupied the chief attention, and quotations exhibited heaviness towards the close of business; the value for money then being 95½ to 1, and for the account, 11th October, 95½ to 1. Indian loan scrip was dealt in as high as 100 to 1, and left off at 100, or 3 per cent. prem. on the official minimum of 97. There was not much activity in foreign stocks or railway shares, but the demand for money was less urgent, while £60,000 Australian gold was sent into the Bank.

COMMERCIAL; AND PUBLIC COMPANIES.—The port of London during the past week has been moderately active. The number of vessels announced inwards at the Custom House as having arrived from foreign ports amounted to 252. There were 8 from Ireland, and 72 colliers. The entries outwards amounted to 109, and the clearances to 105, besides 16 in ballast. The departures for the Australian colonies have been 8 vessels—viz., 3 to Port Phillip of 3214 tons, 3 to Sydney of 2666 tons, and 2 to New Zealand of 1798 tons, making a total of 7678 tons.—The weekly reports from the manufacturing districts indicate the existence of a quiet state of trade, but generally agree in describing future prospects as more satisfactory. At Birmingham and Manchester a general improvement is asserted to have taken place, business operations having increased in consequence of the advices from India and Australia being of a more favourable character. The carpet trade at Halifax is stated to be animated, and in other branches a moderately good trade has arisen. The symptoms at Huddersfield are more favourable; but there has not been much activity, though the tone of trade is good. From Nottingham it appears that trade in most branches is somewhat better; but the winter season is looked forward to as the one in which the greatest buoyancy will be manifested. The shoe trade at Norwich has been in a satisfactory condition, and it is expected that it will continue so. In connection with business at Sheffield, the announcement is made that the rolling mills have been busily engaged with the manufacture of crinoline steel.—The report adopted at the meeting of the Railway Passengers' Assurance Company was satisfactory, and the dividend declared was at the rate of four per cent. per annum, reserving the balance for the usual charges and risks on current policies. The increase of business is very encouraging, the amount received and due for premiums of insurance in the six months ending the 30th of June being £15,177, viz., £2,675 for railway, and £12,502 for general accidents insurance. The income for the corresponding period of 1858 was £10,771, thus establishing for the past half-year an increase of 41 per cent. The available balance to be dealt with was £9,557. The satisfactory progress of the company is attributed to the absence of litigation, and to the promptitude with which bond fide claims are adjusted. Careful as the directors are to protect the institution against unfounded claims, they view it as a most unwise policy to raise unnecessary difficulties, on purely technical grounds, and the rapid augmentation in the number of annual policies affords proof that the course pursued has secured confidence.—Among the numerous assurance companies which have presented their various claims to public support of late years, there is one which we would especially recommend to the attention of our readers. The importance of life assurance has long been acknowledged, but there has always been one great obstacle to its development among the industrial classes—the want of a given value to the policy at any moment should the assurer be unable to keep up the payments of the premium, or should the object to secure which the policy was originally effected have ceased. This objection is met by the Consols Insurance Association, the purpose of which is to give a defined value in consols to every policy from the moment it is issued—a value stated at the back of the policy, and so invested in the public funds as to prevent its being at any time alienated. It would be useless to trace the principles of life assurance from the day when a uniform premium was charged for all ages, to the present system of a varying premium, according to the age and health of the assured—the one fact always staring us in the face, that, after a payment of 25 or 30 years, if the assurer became unable to keep up his premiums, his assurance altogether ceased—all he had paid was forfeited, the policy becoming lapsed, or the assurer being obliged to take whatever might be offered him by the office in which he was assured for his policy, however arbitrary the amount. Under the arrangements of the Consols Insurance Association no such alternative can ensue—a given amount of every premium being invested to insure the carrying out of arrangements made. By the system of the Consols Insurance Company every assurer may withdraw from the company at any moment, and with the full security that what he has subscribed will never be altogether lost. Supposing, for instance, a man of twenty-five determines to set aside £3 a year for life insurance, he will find that 20 per cent., or one fifth, is devoted to meet expenses, whilst a further sum must be provided for the contingencies of life, and for which the company have to provide, if not by life premiums, through the shareholders' capital. Under ordinary circumstances the £3 per annum is altogether gone if at any given time the assurer cannot keep up his payments, and some offices even boast that their lapsed policies pay all their expenses; but in the case we have quoted, under the Consols system, a man of twenty-five so assuring at £3 per annum would not only have his life assured throughout the first year for the benefit of his family, but would at the end of that period have £1 7s. 6d. standing in his name in consols, which he could appropriate as he thought fit. And should the party remain insured for ten years, his policy would be worth £14 15s. for £30 paid; at the end of fifteen years, £22 18s. for £45 paid; and at the end of twenty years, £31 16s. for £60 paid, the person having all the time been assured to the extent of £134 2s., receivable at any moment on the death of the assurer. The advantage of such a system cannot be overrated; and the funds stand in the names of the trustees, whose position is such as to command public confidence, their names including Lord Keane, the Right Hon. W. F. Cowper, M.P., Lord Claude Hamilton, M.P., Dr. Southwood Smith, and Mr. Mann, of the General Registrar's-office, Somerset-house. The plan upon which the company is founded peculiarly recommends itself to notice, having been originally submitted to the Government by Dr. Farr, of the Registrar's-General's-office, as the groundwork of a national insurance office—a responsibility which the Government, as might be expected, declined, as foreign to its powers, having always delegated commercial transactions to private individuals, as instanced in the cases of the Bank of England and savings banks. Dr. Farr has since consented that his plans should be carried out by a private association on certain conditions, as will be seen by the following from his own pen:—"The chief features which I contemplated were the rendering life insurance safe, equitable, and well accommodated to the wants and to the means of the public, by divesting the policyholder of the risk of losing a large portion of his payments or of forfeiting his policy through inability on his own part to pay the annual premium, as well as of the risk arising under an imperfect audit, and by giving him the option at any time of employing the accumulating deposit to his account as a security, or of withdrawing it for use in other ways. This would bring insurance within the reach especially of young men entering life, and of classes who cannot prudently lock up irretrievably a large portion of their prospective income under the old system of insurance, however ably it might be carried out by some existing companies. In the absence of the direct Government security and audit, it is indispensable that the investments under these plans should be made in the safest and the most easily convertible securities—I mean the Three per Cent. Consolidated Annuities, commonly called Consols; that the current value of each policy, determined from the valuation table by the actuary, and vouched by some competent authority, should every year be circulated among the policy-holders; and, moreover, that the addition to the net premium should be sufficient, with the paid-up capital of the society, to discharge all necessary expenses, and to cover the risks. An extensive association founded upon these principles, and carrying them out with skill, prudence, integrity, and energy, will do a great public good." These are the principles which the Consols Insurance Association is established to carry out, and, as a security for which, Dr. Farr, the original projector of the scheme, though not of the Company, has consented to become the auditor.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

"THE PHILADELPHIA."—We have received a communication upon this subject from Bro. Rule, P.G. Purst, who speaks favourably of the members of this irregular Lodge. With regard to our assertion as to the canvassing for members, we can, if Bro. Rule wishes it, introduce him to a gentleman who was offered initiation in this body for a very small sum indeed; and who also received from the touter a copy of 14 lectures, in extenso.

"GEORGIUS."—The MS. is doubtless extremely curious, but to say nothing of its great length, has no Masonic bearing that we can discover.

LONDON, SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 17, 1869.

EXAMINATION OF CANDIDATES.

It has been judged advisable by the compilers of our Constitutions, to enjoin that an examination (upon subjects previously communicated) shall be required of every brother desirous of receiving a higher degree; attaching considerable importance to an observance of this rule. It has been further decreed that the said examination shall take place in open Lodge, in order that the members present may enjoy an opportunity of watching the proceedings, and be enabled to judge, collectively, of the candidate's fitness for advancement. That such caution and circumspection is not altogether uncalled for, we may conclude, from the preface in the Constitutions to the above-mentioned requirement, viz.—“Great discredit and injury having been brought upon our antient and honourable fraternity from admitting members and receiving candidates, without due notice being given, or inquiry made into their characters and qualifications; and from passing and raising Masons without due instruction in the respective degrees—it is declared that a violation or neglect of any of the following laws shall subject the Lodge offending to erasure; and no emergency can be allowed as a justification.” Let us see how much this warning avails; will it not be found indeed that there are many Lodges which, according to its strict wording, would be liable to erasure?

A Mason who has attained the third degree, without a gradual and increasing proficiency having been required during his onward progress, instead of being indebted to his Lodge for its leniency, has good reason to reproach the members thereof for a very mistaken kindness; although, by a little more exertion and attention, by being let off so easily, he is yet a sufferer, and the Lodge greatly in error. There are several important reasons (either of which, in itself sufficient) why instruction should accompany advancement. In the first place, the Constitutions have so ordained. Secondly, it is but fair to the Craft that an ample knowledge of the science, as far as the brother has proceeded, should be communicated, that an unfavourable, or merely moderate opinion of the Order may not be conceived by him, owing to the paucity of information afforded. Thirdly, the brother has a right to be placed upon a par with Masons of his own degree; and whether or not he insists upon adequate information being rendered, it is nevertheless the duty of the Lodge by which he has been advanced to take care that he is not defrauded of his just dues; and lastly, because by peremptorily requiring a certain proficiency before the conferring of a higher degree, you compel the candidate to seek and acquire information, whereas after attaining the third degree, instruction, on his part, must be voluntarily sought for. As a general rule, brethren imperfectly grounded in the rudiments of the science, when they have arrived at the position of M.M., having nothing further to desire in the Craft for which an examination is obligatory, are naturally loth to acquire, by laborious study, additional, and what appears to be unnecessary, knowledge. Such brethren—and many there are so situated—usually content themselves during the remainder of their Masonic career, with attending occasional Lodge meetings, and remain invariably mere spectators of the ceremonies.

A really strict Master—one exact in observance of the usages and customs sanctioned and ordained by the Constitutions—is rarely disliked, even though the members of his Lodge, under former rulers, have been accustomed for a series of years to laxity and indulgence. A fixity of purpose, and unyielding determination to adhere to our antient landmarks, cannot but be commended; at first some dissatisfaction may be manifested at the rigorous sway of the new ruler, and the curtailment of certain abuses, but this will be short lived, and the efforts of an able and sincere Master will nearly always be properly appreciated. It is to brethren of this stamp that the Craft is indebted for a steady though tardy improvement in Lodge discipline—brethren who, regardless of former years of apathy and unmindful of the opposition of indolent members, work in a regular and constitutional manner. Questions addressed to candidates for preferment are expected to be answered without prompting from attendant deacons; when this is the case, brethren taking their seats as Master Masons, having received all three degrees, or even the third only, in such a Lodge, enjoy a complete knowledge of the subjects comprised throughout; differing materially from those Masons with whom aprons and certificates are the only proofs of brotherhood.

This desirable state of affairs ought not to be of merely occasional occurrence, and the attention of the Craft might be advantageously directed to the professions made by every W.M. prior to his installation. If any Mason of experience be asked whether, when a strange brother has joined his Lodge (the same never having previously held office) information, or ignorance on Masonic matters, chiefly characterise him, the answer, in most cases, will be condemnatory of the system of instruction pursued by the new member's mother Lodge. Instances of a perfected knowledge of the mysteries of the Craft, together with its antient usages, are, on the part of joining brethren who have never held office, rare and exceptional, which fact if admitted, shows at once the evils of one existing system; indeed if one of these brethren, when requested to occupy the chair of an absent officer, discharge its incumbent duties with credit to himself and to the satisfaction of the members present, there is an anxious and universal inquiry as to what Lodge he hails from, and liberal commendations are showered upon that Lodge. Nothing exemplifies so strongly the regularity of a Lodge's proceedings and the constitutional manner in which its arrangements are conducted, as the fact of the brethren who have therein received degrees, becoming, in turn, expert workmen.

It may be observed that a distinction has been drawn between the customary acquirements of the officers of the Lodge and of members generally, for though it is at all times a refreshing and gratifying sight to witness the various ceremonies properly conducted and the actors efficient, yet this excellence may be superficial, and perhaps leave hidden the more defective parts of a Lodge system. There are few Lodges which are utterly regardless of fraternal censure, to avoid which great pains are frequently taken, in perfecting the officers in a knowledge and exercise of their respective duties; by so doing visitors are favourably impressed, and the Lodge gains a character for good working, and thus far, justly. The claims of recently admitted members, however, should not be made subservient to an exclusive attempt (in other respects most praiseworthy), at rendering the Lodge's working on nights of public meeting highly extolled by visitors; the Master, Past Masters, and other veterans contenting themselves but too often with imparting instruction to the officers connected with the working, and unless upon earnest entreaty, leave the newly admitted to gather what information they can from conversing with older Masons.

It is necessary to prove a complaint before suggesting a remedy; let us suppose this has been done and that the evil is admitted, the subject of improvement becomes a difficult question to grapple with; for beyond what is at present in force in the Constitutions, Masonic legislation cannot go. A more careful and exacting exercise of the authority vested in them may be suggested to Masters of Lodges, as well as a real, instead of a nominal, examination of candidates, whose advancement should be made entirely dependent upon their proficiency; but unless well supported and occasionally kept up to their work by vigilant members, very little can be expected. However the present system may be denounced and its faulty arrangements exposed, no amelioration can take place until the officers and members of private Lodges are thoroughly convinced of the extent of the evil; these may be persuaded by argument, but cannot be compelled by an assumption of authority.

Let us imagine that a candidate for Freemasonry, after the requisite preliminaries have been duly observed, presents himself for initiation. Unless the ballot has proved adverse (an occurrence of extreme rarity), this desire is promptly attended to; at the expiration of the time necessary to complete the ceremony of initiation, the Lodge is in all likelihood summoned to refreshment, and the new brother informed that upon a return to labour a further insight into the lessons of the Craft in the form of a charge, and an explanation of the tracing board, shall be afforded him if time shall permit, and in the majority of cases, time, or rather the flagging attention of members, does not permit of these important matters being imparted to him. The initiate is told that in consequence of the lateness of the hour, the additional information will be deferred until the next meeting, at which a similar procrastination possibly occurs. A month having elapsed since initiation, the newly initiated member presents himself for advancement, and eventually, after a similar probation, obtains the degree of Master Mason, without perhaps having received the explanation of a single tracing board or the slightest instruction concerning his future duties as a Mason. Nothing has been exacted but a parrotlike repetition of certain answers to questions addressed to him before the confirming of the degrees of Fellow Craft and Master Mason; during which he has been entirely dependent upon the kind prompting of an attendant Deacon.

On the night of initiation, nothing, if possible, should be omitted, but if the Master is compelled, by the lateness of the hour or other sufficient cause, to close the Lodge without completing the revelation proper to the degree, the ceremony of passing should be deferred until the candidate is thoroughly conversant with the lessons appertaining to his former degree, and a far stricter examination than the one usually in vogue should be deemed imperative. Prior to the conferring of either the second or the third degree, the candidate should be placed in the centre of the Lodge, every other brother (not even excepting Deacons or the Director of Ceremonies) being seated in their assigned places. In conformity with the ritual the regular questions should next be addressed to the candidate, and by him answered to the best of his ability; after which, if his proficiency so far be apparent, brethren who are members of the Lodge should be allowed to interrogate him upon subjects connected with the degrees he has taken. These questions to be in all instances put through the W. M., who would decide as to their fairness. Of a Fellow Craft a good deal might be expected. He should give evidence of having carefully perused the Constitutions; and should be questioned thereon, for on attaining a higher degree, he is at once eligible to become in his turn a ruler in the Craft, being enabled to hold any office in a Lodge, not even excepting that of Master, which may be granted by dispensation, or upon the establishment of a new Lodge. Should a brother recently received into the society be placed in such a rank as to have to administer summary justice, or to decide upon the legality of a disputed point, an ignorance of the Constitutions would render him liable, unwittingly, to violate the statutes, and prevent him from adhering to our antient landmarks; besides which he would be subjected to the scorn of his Lodge for having consented to occupy a position for which his unfitness is so evident.

There are, doubtless, many Lodges where the observances herein suggested, together with others of a stricter nature, are attended to with zeal and rigour, though it can scarcely be disputed that the great majority are not sufficiently particular. Yet even if it be conceded that a minority of Lodges, or even one Lodge only, neglect so important a feature in our system, and such a stringent command of the Constitutions, this would justify our enlarging upon the subject. Not even one individual brother should be turned loose on the Masonic world with an imperfect education in matters relating to the Craft. Very slight care and attention would guard against this possibility, and in future years the duties of the principal officers in properly instructing neophytes—always a laborious and occasionally an irksome task—would be lessened by the superior capabilities of members generally, they having severally experienced, in their days of learning, the kindness and patience of brethren who, though not naturally inclined to soften the labours of the executive, yet considered it a duty to impart instruction. From brethren so situated much might be expected, and the careful system under which they were advanced in Masonry, would exemplify its advantages by the proof of so vast an accession of competent teachers. Until such a desirable state of affairs is generally prevalent, Masters, when unassisted by voluntary instructors, must consent to do the work themselves; it is certainly a thankless undertaking to seek out unwilling brethren and instruct them in things they do not at once comprehend, and of which they are content to remain in ignorance, not perceiving the necessity of gaining information, when, perhaps, the patient and attentive Master has been the same day engaged for hours in drilling refractory and incompetent officers. There are probably three or four candidates for a degree at the next Lodge meeting, the Master requests a previous attendance, one of them comes at the specified time, and after an hour spent in his behalf, another appears, and last of all, the Master has to make personal search for a missing brother, who, if not found, either presents himself for the degree totally unprepared, or calls upon the Master at an inconvenient hour, and grumbles at not receiving a welcome reception.

A good Master has much to contend with; for though the advisability of refusing instruction if candidates neglect an attendance at meetings specially convened in their behalf, may be recommended, such conduct bears the appearance of churlishness, and until brethren have been some little time admitted into the Order, they cannot comprehend the labours and responsibilities of a Worshipful Master.

The position of Master confers on a brother the highest preferment in Craft Masonry. Elected by the members of a Lodge to preside at its meetings and watch its interests, being answerable to the Grand Lodge for the correct performance of these duties—such a trust should never be lightly or carelessly entered upon; but at the expiration of his year of office a Master ought to hand over the Lodge to his successor in a state requiring neither alteration or reorganization. This desirable termination to official labour demands the most strenuous exertions on the part of the various officers, under the immediate and active superintendence of a vigilant ruler: the duties necessarily devolving upon this latter personage (clearly defined in the Constitutions), however well acted up to in a general sense, should be accompanied by a certain amount of zeal, perseverance, and fixity of purpose. Yet if it be a Master's earnest wish to obey the spirit, as well as the letter, of the Constitutions, there is no part of them that deserves a more literal construction being placed upon it than the laws imperatively requiring strict examinations prior to the conferring of higher degrees on brethren otherwise qualified for advancement. The vigorous and hearty co-operation of every member of a Lodge is necessary, to enable even the most painstaking and attentive Master to continue his Lodge in as perfect a condition as is compatible with the errors of human nature.

Even those brethren most favourably disposed towards the continuance of our present lax system of instruction, will generally admit the possibility and desirability of Lodge examinations being rendered more exacting in their requirements, and what is there, then, to delay the adoption of a new and more satisfactory plan? Nothing, we believe, but the want of a public suggestion to that effect, when, should the attention of the Craft be obtained, improvement may result.

A GREAT FRENCH FAIR.

"THE fair, the fair," was the universal theme of conversation when, about the middle of April, we first arrived in the old city of Caen, in Normandy. We had frequently, in our own country, visited towns where fairs were held, and had always heard them reprobated as chartered nuisances—magnets for drawing together the disorderly and dishonest and beguiling the thoughtless and unwary; and more than once had we heard of petitions being presented to Parliament praying their abolition.

But here, to our astonishment, were staid, elderly men, gentlemen of position, and members of the local government, as warmly interested in the coming fair as any young man or maiden in the commune. Beneath its influence they forgot to praise, as Frenchmen generally do, their city and all pertaining to it—the fair cultivated country in which it lay, its picturesque little river, its fair Caen stone quays, and the large exports of the same stone, with which our own new palace at Westminster is built: nay, they even forgot to draw attention to the number and beauty of their old churches, many of which are of a very high order of architecture—some, it is said, equal to any in Paris. And we must admit that never during our stay did we pass the old parish church of St. Pierre without pausing to admire the proportions of its lofty spire, with its low trellised bulwark and airy pinnacles, and to wonder at the exquisite delicacy of the stone tracery. As they stood out against the clear blue sky, they more resembled some rich design in lace than chisellings in a material that had stood, and would stand, the wear and storms of ages.

As in a fortnight's time this much talked of fair would fill the boulevards of Caen, which were said to be handsome and spacious, we resolved to visit them first. But on our arrival we found that, instead of, as with us, a city of canvas springing up as by magic, the good Normans were leisurely and characteristically erecting a substantial city of wood, subdividing it into streets, distinguished by names painted in large letters, and the booths told off in numbers. Passing further on along the boulevards, we came to a succession of barnlike buildings, occupying the space between the rows of lofty trees, shading one side of the avenue. These, we were told, were to be theatres; while on the opposite side a range of smaller buildings were rising up, to offer refreshment to the fair goers. So being haunted by no doubts as to obtaining entertainment both for body and mind on our own fair visits, we hastened on some mile further, and, escaping the din of hammers, enjoyed a delightful walk along the broad boulevard leading by the river side.

Each day revealed to us yet more and more how completely the coming fair absorbed the thoughts of all classes. We had broken part of our microscope, but could not get it repaired until after the fair; we had ordered a travelling case, but the advent of the same event was given as sufficient cause for its noncompletion. On proposing a visit to Bayou and its cathedral, our landlady advised delay until after the fair, or we should find it so dull; and, to complete the proofs, we heard two ladies extolling the beauty of their spring dresses, which, however, were not to be worn until the opening of the all important fair.

At length the first Sunday in May dawned bright and clear, but from that hour we had no farther sleep, so incessant were the trotting and prancing of skittish ill broken horses, being led by to the adjacent country; and if there chanced to be a lull, it was filled up by half a dozen diligences, with their heavy wheels and cracking whips, rushing by at redoubled speed, literally crammed with visitants to the fair.

Our first glance out of window that morning was worth remembering. We might have fancied the grey old city had enticed the fair into its principal streets, and was coquetting with it there. It was not that every shop was open and its contents displayed to the utmost advantage, and rendered more attractive by here and there a statuette or a vase of flowers—that was a scene of weekly recurrence; nor was it altogether the crowds of bustling pedestrians pushing aside the staid bonnes bound to the market of St. Pierre, or returning thence laden with vegetables and flowers. But it was the multitude of gay flags and streamers floating in every direction; the liberal display of evergreens and flowers in balconies above shop windows; and last, but most decidedly not least, for it was the most remarkable feature of the whole, the broad sheets of canvas slung from house to house across the streets, and bearing in large letters, within gaily decorated borders, the names and callings of those who traded in the quaint old gabled houses on either side. The whole aspect of things roused a suspicion—which the first servant who entered our room confirmed—that the fair was that morning opened.

Our continental residence had not rendered us oblivious of the beautiful Sabbath rest of our own land, and even had there been no Protestant church to claim our attendance, we should certainly not have turned our steps fairwards. But on the Monday we joined the living tide setting in that direction, and ere long found ourselves in the thick of a scene of bustle and vociferation we have never seen equalled, which may be believed when it is remembered that the vendors were French men and women.

The clerk of the fair might with good faith have addressed himself "to all persons about to marry," and recommended an inspection of his establishment before they made their purchases elsewhere, and certainly they must be hard to please if they could not make their selections there. Never in my life did I see, in so small a space, such a variety of merchandise as was there exhibited. Every craft under the sun seemed represented, save that of undertaker, and probably those merry gentlemen of lugubrious aspect were plentiful in the fair, having an eye to both pleasure and profit by enjoying the sights and thickening the crush.

As we passed on along the planked streets and beneath the outstretched awnings, it was impossible not to admire the gay contents of the temporary shops on either side. What heaps of gorgeous silks and velvets were piled upon their counters and spread around their walls; what pyramids of glowing ribbons, and draperies of rich lace, much of which was manufactured in Caen itself. Then followed splendid displays of plate and porcelain, to be succeeded in their turn by homely woollens; then flashing caskets of jewels met our view, blazing diamonds, meek pearls, and lovely cameos, and all the long array of gems leading down to those of trifling value, which might suit the calibres of small purses.

Clocks, furniture, carpets, groceries, crockery, all came in their turn, for the fair was in truth a great mart, and, as we found, the goods were supplied by the chief traders in that, and many other cities, and sold by persons in their employ; and from the thousands of country people every day visiting the fair, and making large purchases there, it evidently formed the commercial harvest of the year. As was becoming, the legitimate fair stock of toys and gingerbread were not forgotten, but presented themselves temptingly in gaily decorated bowers, and snow white draped saloons. Nor were smaller fairings of all kinds wanting, and the humbler rows of sheds resounded with the cries of those presiding over whole shops full of articles, varying in value from three quarters of a franc to three farthings, and certainly not the least surprising sight in the fair was the variety and prettiness of the articles offered at such prices.

Sauntering on we passed the precincts of business, and entered on those of pleasure. The big barns, the little barns, and the wine shops, we had seen in course of erection, were all in full play; while between them along the broad avenue, as far as the eye could reach, undulated a sea of holiday folk, numbering many thousands, all apparently in the best humour with the bright sunshine, the rustling trees, and the abundant entertainment provided for all who chose to look. For the theatrical booths, greatly as they varied as to pretension and price, yet accorded in other matters pleasing to the populace. Along the front of each was spread a painting of what was supposed to be performing inside—and which generally depicted some thrilling scene—while to add to the attractions, ever and anon there issued from the open portals some of the players who promenaded the platform, or performed some scene for the amusement of the public, or executed some neat footed dance, to the music of the band, which each theatre kept working at high pressure. And that favourite French instrument, the drum, being paramount in each, it is impossible to overrate the extent of the din, or how completely it drowned the announcement of the performances within, even though they were generally vociferated through speaking trumpets, such as are used at sea.

However, ignorance as to what they should see, did not deter visitants, for as fast as one audience ebbed out through the open doors, another flooded in, and on one occasion we tided in with it. Considering the decided love of the French over our own countrymen for spangles, gilding, and frippery generally, we were surprised at the freedom from such equivocal splendours on the part of this little theatre, compared to theatres of a like standing in our own land. There was an abundance of light, and a freshness, trimness, and simplicity in their decoration which agreeably surprised us, and a like remark was applicable to the costumes of the performers. Would we could say as much for the performance; but though it was not wanting in passable acting, sprightliness of dialogue, or in completeness of plot, on all the flowers was visible the trail of the foul serpent which mars so much of what would otherwise be pleasant and sometimes profitable among our neighbours.

Once more at liberty, we resolved not to risk the chances of another performance but pursue our way through the fair. A short distance farther brought us to the domain of animal learning and science, where fortunetelling ponies, histrionic dogs, learned donkeys, and drilled canaries, put in no unsuccessful claim on public patronage; and these were again succeeded by the lotteries for coarse confectionery so common in our own fairs, and an extensive growth of merry-go-rounds, here a sad misnomer, for they crept round at the saddest of paces, and there was a whimsical gravity on the faces of the juvenile riders of the dogs and swans, which stood so solemnly in their places round the circle.

After passing a few unpromising attempts at agricultural machinery, our attention was next attracted by a kind of van with a pair of fine horses, such as is sometimes driven by our own commercial travellers, drawn up across the avenue, and closing the extreme end of the fair. On the top was crowded an unusually large band, with a drum of superior calibre, which were making all the noise they could, while the eyes of a considerable crowd were fixed on an individual standing in front of the driver's seat. He was a tall, handsome man, with coal black moustache and hair, attired in a fancy costume of violet velvet, braided, and tagged, and striped with gold, which we understood he was pleased to style a Polish dress; on his head was a gold laced shako, with a flowing plume of white and violet, and by his side, sheathed in steel, hung something which—but that it was smaller—might have passed for a Turkish scimitar. With folded arms and lofty bearing, this splendid personage stood as if unconscious of the crowd thickening round him, until suddenly drawing his scimitar, he flashed it over his head, and on the instant his musicians ceased, then waving his sword towards his audience, he began, with great volubility, to harangue them on the healing qualities of a small box of ointment he held in his hand!

Never were we more surprised. We had thought that so stately a person would have descended to nothing less important than reading the fates of men through the medium of the stars. But our charlatan was wiser than we were. The Norman peasants, among whom he stood, cared far more for their present bodily ills, than they did for their chances of future happiness; and as this remedy professed to cure every one of the diseases most frequent among them for the small sum of fivepence, and as it was moreover recommended by a catalogue of the most wonderful cures, it soon became popular, and the music after a time recommenced, while a rapid interchange of boxes and half franc pieces took place round the orator.

Every morning while the fair lasted this velvet clad dispenser of ointment was to be found in the same place, addressing the public with unvarying success. And on the only evening we made our way through the fair to view its pretty illuminations of coloured lamps, we are exceedingly mistaken if we did not see the same individual gorgeously arrayed in pink and silver, and with a jewelled turban wreathing his brow, seated on a divan beneath a tent set up in a peculiar low hung cart, and driving an excellent trade in love charms, and those against witchcraft and sickness, among the female peasantry, young and old.

By law the fair is limited to fourteen days, but the weather having been sometimes unfavourable during the first week, the mayor was pleased to grant it another week's grace, to the infinite delight of the inhabitants, and, I doubt not, to the advantage of their coffers. But it is on the second Sunday that the fair reaches its height, on which day it is computed that not less than forty thousand country people visit, and great preparations are made for their entertainment. Among other things, the year we were there, was a balloon, and the promise of wonderful performances in the hippodrome, which occupied an angle of the boulevard.

Yet, after all, to an English eye, the greatest attractions and novelties of the fair were to be found in the groups which thronged it. Not in all the fictitious life displayed within the walls of those theatres—not in all the pictures lining those temporary galleries, was there to be seen aught stranger than some of those who, in the truthfulness and simplicity of real life, moved unconsciously among the crowd.

In a country which values elegance and fashion so highly as France, of course their votaries were not wanting among the congregated thousands, and many were the city belles attired in the last Parisian mode who swept through the crowd, acknowledging with graceful bend the salutations of the spruce gentlemen who loitered about the fair. Then there was the little red legged, blue coated soldier, looking longingly at everything, but without money for a single purchase, and the stout red legged, blue coated officer, with his pinched up waist, who, for all his swagger, was in the same category.

Here and there, the centre of a group of joyous girls, or escorting some demure demoiselle, was a Sister of Charity, with her clear eyes and her fresh face glowing beneath her linen coif—that enhancer of female charms. Then came the grisette, mincing along, and shading with a parasol the gaily capped head, for which she neither desired nor was permitted a bonnet. Once or twice the eye fell on the funereal figures of a few cloistered nuns, buying silks and wools for the embroidery which is the solace of their secluded lives, and shrinking timidly from the crowd, as if alarmed at the bustling world beyond the convent gate.

Far other seemed the feelings of the jolly looking priests, as, clad in their long serge cassocks and black and white bands, they strode in twos and threes among the crowd, giving and returning many salutations. Not a merrier joke passed the lips of professional jester than those to which they gave utterance, and no heartier laughs were heard among that vast assemblage than those which responded to them.

and altogether there was an air of sleek comfortableness about them, which made me think their fasts and vigils agreed with them.

Yet all these various classes were but detachments of the great human army which filled the streets and boulevards of Caen; the main body was formed of the landed proprietors and peasantry of that and the neighbouring communes. To look on them, one scarce could believe himself in the middle of the nineteenth century, so unlike was their attire to what has been generally worn for so many generations. It was not so much the habiliments of the men that attracted attention, though the blue blouse of the peasant is the direct descendant of the garment usually worn by their class in the middle ages; it was the fair sex who shone, as they are sure to do in some way, the cynosure of all eyes. And as if the universal short-skirted, short-waisted dress, with the indispensable apron and bib, and the kerchief hanging primly from the shoulders were not remarkable enough, their heads were surmounted by the most extraordinary headgears ever beheld.

There was no monotony on this point, for each varied according to its wearer's commune, but only to some other form of ugliness, and yet with but little modification all these have descended from remote antiquity, and been worn in olden times by queens, and dames of high degree. Some of these head dresses are fan bordered, others rise in a cone, sometimes ornamented with huge butterfly wings fluttering behind, or long lappets drooping from the apex—the relic of the ancient veil—while others still boast a towering superstructure; and in all cases these head tires were adorned, in honour of the festival, with an abundance of flowers, ribbons, or jewellery.

It was really amusing to see one of these dames leaning on the arm of some exceedingly fine gentleman whose yet more fine lady wife followed, under the escort of one whose appearance suggests the probable truth that his clothes were bought ready made. Such parties are constantly to be met, and sometimes we have fancied the fashionables felt embarrassed at exhibiting such guests, but they had at all events the satisfaction of knowing they were not singular. Moreover, these guests were their own equals in station and circumstances, there being but one difference between them, that while the city belle follows each passing fashion, the rich proprietor's wife, looked up to by all around her, retains the costume which has descended to her through long generations, and never thinks of changing it for a newer.

And now having noted all the prominent objects of the Great Fair—except the beggars, whose name was legion—and bought ourselves no end of fairings, like every one else, we take our leave of it, when leisurely as they had risen, these wooden streets and theatres disappeared, and the boulevards once more became a quiet and airy promenade.

SYMBOLISM OF THE MOSAIC WORSHIP.

A PROFOUND thinker and able writer contributes essays and reviews from time to time, under the pseudonym of "Atticus" in the columns of our excellent contemporary the Critic. A new work by Dr. Bähr, of Heidelberg, "Symbolik des Mosaischen Cultus" has been taken by "Atticus" as the foundation of a recent paper, which we think of sufficient interest and value to the brethren to warrant our reproducing it in these pages almost entire. The article in question is certainly marked by some peculiarities, among which may be noticed the somewhat eccentric mode of expression adopted, which savours of the German school, and an unnecessary use of Greek and Latin words cruelly Anglicised, where plain Saxon would probably have expressed the writer's meaning more clearly, if not more elegantly. This, however, is matter of taste; but as illustrating a great point in Masonry, we think this essay well worthy to be studied by the thoughtful craftsman, independently of the attention which the research and learning which it displayed must of themselves command.

"An exaggerated, fantastic, and radically false typology has prevented men from seeing the profound symbolical import of Mosaism. Granting that Mosaism prepared, foreshadowed a grander, more spiritual dispensation than itself, it would by no means follow that the whole of Mosaic ceremonial down to the minutest point was intended only to typify a future doctrine or event. Yet this is exactly what many theologians persist in declaring. The theory of the typologists is unsupported by a tittle of evidence or argument. The only acceptable evidence, the only convincing argument, would be the unremitting and elaborate endeavour of the New Testament throughout to show that everything in Christianity was the correspondence to a Mosaic rite or the completion thereof. But neither on the part of Christ nor of his apostles do we find the faintest trace of such an endeavour. On the contrary, while there is an intense and incessant anxiety to prove that Christ is the predicted, there is an obvious desire in the master to escape from the pressure of ritual gorgeousness into life divine, and of the disciples to escape from it into grace divine. Yet it would surely be preposterous to believe in the antagonism, and in the typical application of Mosaism too. Indeed, whenever the Mosaic rites are alluded to, it is simply in the way of illustration. Considering also that the professed intention of the gospel was to achieve a regeneration, in which the invisible Deity was to deal mysteriously and miraculously with the invisible soul, it would have been cumbering and complicating, nay neutralizing and contradicting the process, if the soul had been for ever summoned from its ecstatic commune with the unseen to an arid investigation regarding types and antitypes. In truth, though Christianity sprang from Mosaism, and though it is unnatural to break, as Baden Powell and others have attempted, this bond of filiation, yet Mosaism had eminently its own work and its own mission, and therefore must be studied first of all with reference to the Israelites for whom it was intended.

"A mistake wherewith the orthodox and heterodox are equally chargeable is that of supposing that faith assumed in the religions of antiquity the same dogmatic shape as in those of our own day. Dogmatism in religion belongs entirely to modern times. With that which the worshipper at present deems the only or the chief thing—the creed—the worshipper of old did not trouble himself. Religion spoke in forms, and in forms the worshipper replied. But so much the less religious were they logical, so much the more were they metaphysical. The farther back we can trace the development of a religion, the clearer are the indications of the metaphysical principle, which shows the absurdity of what Comte and his followers have uttered on a matter they so little understand. For instance, the veneration for certain numbers—three, four, five, seven, ten, twelve—a veneration so conspicuous in all organized religions, demanded a long metaphysical training. Age after age must men have brooded on the unspeakable and unfathomable abyss of Deity before they could venture to declare that there was one absolute God. Age after age must they further have brooded before they could fruitfully behold him in that threefold manifestation of his character and power to which rationalistic schemes have such bitter hatred. Then how many ages more ere seven become the most sacred of all numbers as symbolizing both the universe and its Creator. Symbol in religion is a metaphysical product, though phantasy crowns and clothes it.

"Now what distinguishes Mosaic symbolism is the ethical intention. Moses wished to make the Hebrews a people of prophets. But this was not to be achieved simply by rejecting everything in heathenism. What Moses sought was that the symbol should never be convertible into the image or the idol. Many theologians have represented a fanatical antipathy to heathenism as the primordial motive of Moses. There was scarcely a symbol instituted by Moses which had not its parallel in heathen modes and instruments of adoration. Suppose it could be proved that Moses had borrowed the whole of his symbols from Egypt, this would leave the main design of the Mosaic legislation and worship unaffected. The true witnessing to the Divine is to turn things the most unholy to holy uses. A religious reformation never arises for the mere purpose of inventing a new machinery. This would be puerile; it would condemn it as being not of heaven, but of earth. The grandeur of Mosaism was not in setting up something entirely alien and apart; it was in transfiguring what men universally honoured and revered, but had ceased to discern and feel the essential meaning of.

"Bishop Berkeley, with whom, it is to be feared, our pulpit declaimers are not very familiar, has observed that there is no Atheism if a presiding mind is in any fashion whatever recognized—an assertion the force of which would range from extreme anthropomorphism to extreme pantheism. Berkeley is the most eminent philosopher his Church has had, and he is here as wise as he is charitable. The tendency of paganism was never to deny God; it was not, perhaps, even to identify God and the Universe, neither were the ethical attributes of Deity entirely disregarded. What paganism bowed down to was life intense and immense, without any pedantic severance between the material and the spiritual. Of materialism in the ordinary sense the pagans had no conception. Now in Mosaism the ethical attributes of Deity swallow up the rest. Jehovah is the inexorable and omnipotent avenger; his wrath is kindled against the workers of iniquity; if he pardons, it is not to penitence alone, there must also be purification. The people are in covenant with Jehovah through purity: and by the slightest offences, by offences involuntary and accidental, the purity can be lost, and must by sacrifice and self-denial be regained. If, however, purity and purification had been inculcated with dogmatic curtness and legal aridity, few would have listened or obeyed. But symbol intertwining with symbol from the tabernacle, the sublime centre of the symbolic, compelled at the same time that it adorned obedience. If the foremost and fervent aim of Mosaism had been to proclaim and vindicate the unity and spirituality of God, it would have dispensed as completely with symbols as Mahometanism long afterwards. A naked dogma, with a naked scimitar behind as argument; such was Mahometanism. But for good and for evil such simplicity of faith and such directness of propagandism were unexampled. Mosaism has often been treated, and especially by its best friends, as if it had been only a Mahometanism of an earlier and grander kind. But besides that Mahometanism was in its very essence a proselytising force, while Mosaism strove exclusively to bulwark its existence from the contagion of foreign and fatal customs and ideas, an honest glance convinces us that, though the unity and spirituality of God were implied in an exalted estimate of God's ethical attributes, they never held the chief place in the Mosaic precepts and delineations. The guiding thought of Moses was as lofty as it was persistently pursued. He saw that it is what is godlike in the worshipper that renders the worship godlike. He, therefore, began from below, where others had begun from above. The worshipper consecrating the worship communicated to the object of worship a transcendent elevation and an ineffable holiness.

"That morality, even the most heroic and unstained, signally differs from holiness, is a consoling truth to many a humble believer. But what the humble believer seldom suspects is, that while morality is always the straightest line between two points, holiness demands a vast array of symbolical instruments. A symbol must mark every step in his path toward ideal perfection. Words are so often used carelessly, and indiscriminately, that it is difficult to convince men how completely are religion, piety, and holiness unlike. Religion is deeper than piety and holiness, and for the most part more comprehensive. Piety is the feeling of awe extending to all human relations. Holiness is the abhorrence of sin and pollution, with the perpetual yearning and the strenuous attempt to grow into the image of the Highest. Egypt of old and Europe in the middle ages were religious; Rome in its early centuries was pious. Till recently the great Protestant nations were moral. The Hebrews alone have been holy; and well, therefore, has Palestine been called the Holy Land. As the name indicates, holiness clamours for continual healing; it is the attainment of strong, passionate, imaginative natures, that have a tragic and overwhelming consciousness of guilt. For these the purgatorial pang, to be salutary, must be accompanied by outward atonement. But what will even the outward atonement avail unless, towering higher and higher, the dwelling of the archangels seems ever far off to the pilgrim of God, yet near enough to tempt him on?

"Moses had not to deal with a dull or docile race. The race was gifted, had fiery passions, was prompt to anger, but prompter to tenderness; above all, it was fiercely turbulent. In the anguish of its remorse, however, Moses had a mighty engine, and to this mighty engine he brought vigour as mighty. He compelled the Hebrews to tremble at the fury of Jehovah's anger before revealing to them the oracles of Sinai. Yet fear can seldom be more than a momentary restraint. After fear came hope: the hope of that home for the children which had been the home of the fathers. To raise that home when conquered into the state, Moses offered laws marvellous for their wisdom, still more marvellous for their abounding pity. But the state to be gained by the toils and sufferings of the desert was to be sacred to God as its giver, its creator. Still this was not enough; there was to be something much more than what has loosely been called theocratical ordinance and connection; as indeed, when we have said that a state is theocratical, we have said absolutely nothing. God had been the leader of the Hebrews, and, after having led them victoriously through every peril, he was to sojourn in their midst. The heaven was his abode, and above its remotest sphere was his sanctuary. Yet, if the sky was his throne, the tabernacle was to be his shrine, whereto the Israelites were to draw near with bowed heads and contrite hearts. The tabernacle, however, would have lost its most pregnant meaning if it had not reminded each Israelite that he was also himself to be a tabernacle of the Lord—a tabernacle in which there was to be a court for hallowing every day duties, a holy place for adoration and sacrifice, and a most holy place, for something infinitely diviner than either sacrifice or adoration.

"In the symbolism of the Mosaic worship it is only ignorance that can find the details trifling or the prescriptions minute. Swedenborgian silliness and Rabbinical subtlety may indispose us to symbolism altogether. But if we recognize the worth and beauty of symbolism, we shall in vain seek in the Mosaic symbols for one superfluous enactment or one superstitious idea. If this seems a bold statement, we ask the sceptic what the solemn and majestic architecture of the middle ages would have been without symbolical inspiration, and what its remains would now be without symbolical interpretation? The Cross introduced a new symbolism, with which, however, it incorporated the old. If the temple assumed the form of a cross, there was still the same fidelity to sacred numbers, to certain sacred principles and features, as in the temples of antiquity. It was from the cloisters that the great brotherhoods of artists in the middle ages came forth, and the secrets which they held so strictly were mainly symbolical traditions. Some of these, in somewhat dilettante mode, Freemasonry treasures and transmits. Few have suspected, when gazing at a Masonic procession, how much, strangely transfigured, of the grey foreworld was there; few have known that the homage to Solomon among Freemasons is a tribute to the symbolism embodied in his temple, and thereby to a more ancient symbolism, the history of which can never be written. But, dilettante as Freemasonry may seem, or may really be, we owe it gratitude if it is the sanctuary, or can be the hermeneut, of a single symbol that ever deepened man's reverence for the universe and for things divine. The gratitude will perhaps grow warmer when we reflect that the symbolism of the middle ages corresponded to a symbolism vaster, richer, nearer the dawn of civilization, than that of Greece and Rome. The symbolism of the Papal Church had always the lineaments of that Church's Roman ancestry. Commanding as Rome itself when Rome was greatest was the Church's ceremonial; but the symbolism, if impressive and suggestive, was not opulent or sublime. Outside of the Church, however—at least, apart from it as an organized institution—the fecund and profound Oriental symbolism survived. In mystical sects, in illuministic fraternities, in astrological phantasies, we discover its presence; but what prodigious labyrinths of the undiscovered are behind, into which, if we enter, we hear no voice and behold no form, yet feel the warm breath of the Holy Spirit.

"Truly, the symbolism of the middle ages, as a grand Oriental fact, is as much unknown and unregarded as that of the Mosaic worship, with which it has such intimate and living affinity. Symbolism is as eternal as it is necessary. It is not altogether from moral causes, though perhaps chiefly from these, that a particular system of symbolism decays. But what, after long travail of the soul, assumes a religious shape finally becomes a simple artistic feat and phenomenon, whereupon it loses its meaning, art having no vitality in itself, and being wholly worthless when divorced from religion. In the Mosaic worship symbolism degenerated rapidly, from the very predominance of the ethical idea and purpose. The thought that every Hebrew was to be a tabernacle of the Lord was too stupendous for human weakness. The chosen land of the Holiest and of Holiness madened into a scene of scarlet harlotries. And when Sorrow had rebuked the abomination and the iniquity, Pharisaism ruled where holiness had once flourished. But what Hebraic symbolism could not accomplish Hebraic prophetism achieved. And let us be cheered by the faith that, if symbols change and die, the prophets of God are invincible. Well for the world when symbols the most poetic and prophets the most earnest are harmonies."

BRO. F. STRANGE (well known as the contractor for the supply of refreshments at the Crystal Palace) has announced a benefit festival at that gigantic establishment, on the 28th instant. We understand that he has invited the children of both our schools to enjoy a day's recreation at his expense, and we have little doubt that so liberal an offer will be accepted.

ARCHÆOLOGY.

THE BRITISH ARCHÆOLOGICAL ASSOCIATION.

THE clean, quiet, thriving, and historically famed town of Newbury has just been put into an agreeable state of excitement by the visit of the British Archæological Association. Here, on Monday, began their annual congress, which is to be limited exclusively to the antiquities of Berkshire,—“a virgin mine,” as the Earl of Carnarvon aptly expressed it, for their labours; for in truth there is scarcely any English county which abounds more in interesting relics of the past than it, and yet strange enough scarcely anything has been done by antiquarians to bring them to light. The programme of the week's operations embraces a treat of a very recherche character, and is ample enough to satisfy the appetite of the most insatiable archæologist. On Monday, there was a grand inauguration meeting at the Mansion House, which had been fitted up with mediæval furniture, and ornamented with many valuable pictures by Vandyke, Lely, and other celebrated authors, chiefly lent by Col. Vernon, M.P., rare specimens of ancient armour, swords, and muskets, and other remarkable memorials of past centuries. The whole élite of the neighbourhood attended, and the fair sex almost outnumbering their lords and masters. The Earl of Carnarvon, who presided, delivered an eloquent and powerful address, evincing a truly astonishing amount of knowledge with regard to the antiquities of the county, and nearly exhausted the whole subject; but he unfortunately committed the mistake, too common, alas, even among experienced orators, of extending it over nearly two hours; three quarters ought to have been the outside. However, it was a most successful effort and tends to strengthen the opinion entertained by many as to the versatility of his talent, and the prospect he has of some day playing an important part in public life. The Bishop of Oxford, who followed the earl eulogised the essay in most glowing terms, and entered into a warm defence of Archæology. At a quarter past six o'clock there was a table-d'hôte in a marquee at the Pelican, attended by both their lordships, and afterwards a meeting at the Mansion House for reading papers, and for discussion. Mr. Pettigrew discoursed on the history and contiguities of Wiltshire, and Mr. James Heywood, M.P., read a curious paper by Mr. Halliwell on the celebrated “Jack of Newbury,” who was a broad cloth weaver in the town in the reign of Henry VIII., whom, with Queen Katharine, he entertained here with great splendour. It is also said that he fought at Flodden Field, at the head of one hundred of his workmen, clothed and equipped at his own expense, but all this may be apocryphal. Since Monday, the practice has been to start on an excursion to different places of interest in the neighbourhood, to return to dinner at half-past six, and to hold a meeting at the Mansion House about two hours afterwards. The cavalcade has a very pretty effect as it leaves the town, consisting as it does of many vehicles of every imaginable description, preceded by equestrians. The excursionists have already visited the fields of the two battles fought here during the parliamentary wars, several fine specimens of Norman churches, Shaw House, the beautiful Elizabethan mansion where Charles I. rested on his westward journeys (Mr. H. R. Eyre, the proprietor, provided for them a splendid luncheon), Doddington Castle where Chaucer was born and it is said died, the mounds in the Countess of Craven's park, and the Roman statuary at Silchester. They had yet many other places to see—Highclere Castle, the beautiful seat of the Earl of Carnarvon, and Reading, the Vale of the White Horse, &c., &c. I should mention that a very interesting paper was read by Mr. Pettigrew, to show that Sir Robert Dudley, the Earl of Leicester, was wholly innocent of having been a party to the murder of his wife Amy Robsart, as Ashmolin has asserted, and as Sir Walter Scott, on his authority, has graphically pictured in “Kenilworth.” The eminent antiquarian Mr. Thomas Wright expressed his entire concurrence in the opinion expressed by Mr. Pettigrew, as did also some other members, but Mr. Blundell stoutly contended for the accuracy of Sir Walter's fiction, and enthusiastically espoused the cause of the injured wife, much to the delight of his fair listeners, who did not seem disposed to believe that the great Northern Wizard could be wrong, or that Leicester be right. Mr. Planché ingeniously contrived to soften down these striking differences, by supposing that Leicester's innocence might be consistent with his wishing for poor Amy's death, but this did not appear to be acceptable to either side, and, probably, if there was not already too much other work for the savans, this verata questio might have well occupied the remainder of the week, so determinedly did each side adhere to their opinions.

THE WROXETER EXCAVATIONS.

DURING the last fortnight considerable progress has been made in the discoveries at Wroxeter. An elegantly formed vase or urn, made of Upchurch pottery, has been dug up almost in an entire state. It is more than ten inches high, and thirty-one inches in circumference, and stands upon a flat base only four inches wide. It contained, besides the common soil with which it was filled, a single iron nail, and some bones, not human. It is not likely to have been used for funeral purposes, as the Romans did not allow burying within their city walls. It is very satisfactory to find an article of pottery so nearly entire as this is, for hitherto almost only fragments have been met with.

Two very fine antlers of a red deer have also been dug up, nearly two feet in length, and one of which measured eight and a half inches in circumference at the base. It is curious that one of these had been cut with a saw, and the other had been hacked with an axe, or perhaps with such a tool as the little adze, mentioned in a former communication; for the cut does not look straight like that of an axe, but somewhat curved. The number of pieces of bone and horn found fashioned on a lathe, and having the marks of a saw or other tool upon them, is quite extraordinary, unless there was somewhat very near no artificer in bone, and probably a turner.

A very pretty yellow brass bracelet, quite entire, has just been brought from Wroxeter. It is very elegantly twisted, and the two ends fasten with a small hook and eye. It must have belonged to a lady, as it will easily fit a lady's wrist, but is too small for that of a gentleman.

Another portion of a wide column has also been brought to light. It is two feet eight inches in diameter, and one foot ten inches in height, with the usual hole or mark of the “Louis” at each end. Upwards of two hundred feet of subterranean wall have also been laid bare within a few days. One wall has been traced running eastwards from the square building which of late has been supposed to have been a market place. Another wall, sixty-one feet long, has been seen to run parallel with the south side of the quadrangle above mentioned. A broad road or street has also been laid bare a little to the south of the wall just described.

INTERESTING DISCOVERIES IN APETHORPE PARK.

IN the spring of the present year, some workmen were employed in digging a drain in Apethorpe Park, a few hundred yards south of the seat of the Earl of Westmoreland, when it was found that they were throwing out some Roman mortar. This circumstance induced his lordship, who (with Mr. Blashfield, of Stamford) happened to be present, to give orders for the excavation of the pasture land in the vicinity, and in a short time a hypocaust was bared, and subsequently tessellated pavements, baths, various rooms, and a great extent of stone walls showing the “herring bone” work. His lordship being desirous of personally watching the progress of the excavations, caused them to be stopped on his sojourning in town during the season, having, previous to his departure, given orders for the strict preservation of those remains of antiquity that had been found.

Lord Westmoreland has recently returned to Apethorpe, and on the men being again employed to excavate the site of the Roman villa, they soon exposed to view another beautiful tessellated pavement, a drawing of which was taken by Lady Westmoreland on Friday last. Walls extending about 120 yards from north to south have now been bared, and although sufficient progress has not yet been made with the excavations to show the general ground plan of the building, the discoveries prove it to be the site of a Roman structure of very considerable extent—probably the hunting seat of a family the head of which held an important post at the neighbouring station of Castor, the Durobrivæ of Antonine's Itinerary.

The labours of the workmen, for some time after the discovery was made, were directed in baring the hypocaust and adjacent chambers. The concrete floor over the former was destroyed, but all the pillars that supported it remained: these range in rows from east to west and north to south, there being five in that number of rows eastward of two thick pillars of the same height, and four in each of three rows on the flue side. The pillars (consisting of tiles cemented together) are eight inches square, the cap and base tile of each pillar being larger. The pillars are 16 inches high, and that distance apart. The floor is of concrete, and when found was covered with black sooty matter. The “herring bone” stone wall near the flue is red from the effects of fire. A flue tile, quite perfect, was found here: it is 14 inches long, 7 wide, and 4 deep: it has a wavy ornament, probably made with a comb like instrument. It is conjectured that these tiles were used for p ing the metal pipe through which was carried hot water to the baths, a use adopted by the Romans to keep the water warm.

On the east side of the hypocaust are the baths, and on the south and west sides are chambers, the floors of which are on a level with the floor of the hypocaust. On the north side is a portion of a tessellated pavement, the tesserae (of various colours) of the other parts having been disturbed by the root of a fine oak tree, the spreading branches of which apparently hang over the whole of the Balneum. This tree is said to be about one hundred and seventy years old. The two compartments or rooms westward of the flue are each eight feet wide, and nearly square: the chamber on the south side of the hypocaust, from which it is divided by a wall two feet four inches thick, is rectangular. Eastward of the baths are other rooms, which extend to the eastern wall. This portion of the exterior wall extends seventy feet, the south end terminating by a corner stone. The walls of several small chambers have been laid bare to this point.

The architectural and archaeological societies of Northampton and Lincoln made an excursion to Apethorpe on Wednesday week. The visitors were received by the Earl of Westmoreland in the long gallery, and conducted to the stone hall, where a sumptuous luncheon was provided for upwards of two hundred guests. The repast concluded, the company repaired to the site of the Roman villa in the park. A temporary platform had here been erected, on which the Rev. E. Trollope took his stand, and with the excavations before him, surrounded by a large audience, including very many ladies, he proceeded to describe the interesting remains which had drawn them thither. There were present the Earl of Westmoreland; Lord Lyveden; the Hon. Fitzpatrick Vernon; the Rev. Sir G. S. Robinson; T. Tyron, Esq.; Geo. Ward Hunt, Esq., M.P.; W. Smyth, Esq.; the Rev. Christopher Smyth; the Rev. H. J. Bigge; the Rev. Thos. James; the Rev. Lord Alwyne Compton; W. B. Stopford, Esq.; John Yorke, Esq., and many others. Mr. Trollope said the first object to which he should direct their attention was, a coin found on this spot of the Emperor Constantine, who lived upwards of one thousand five hundred years ago. It had an interesting reverse—a figure of Apollo, holding in his hand an orb representing the earth. The great town of Durobrivæ, now represented by Castor and Water Newton, and the great Roman road, the Ermine-street, were the two main attractions of that period which this part of the country presented to colonists, and these, he conceived, were the reasons which induced the owner of this house to fix himself on this site. Roman villas were largely scattered around Durobrivæ. Remains had been found at Sibson, Tixover, Stibbington, Sutton, Wansford, King's Cliffe, Bulwick, Weldon, Cotterstock, and many other neighbouring places. The Romans were probably induced to settle numerously in these parts, because at that time there was an abundance of wood, of water, and also of iron stone. There was clear evidence of the Romans having worked the iron in this district. The country was well wooded, and plenty of fuel for smelting was to be had on the spot. Masses of iron slag, intermixed with undoubted Roman remains, had been found in the adjoining parish of King's Cliffe, in the church-yard at Lordley Well, and Redford, in numerous places. In Bulwick parish there is a remarkable district called Blacklands, from the colour of the soil, occasioned by the immense quantities of charcoal there intermixed with iron slag, the refuse of Roman furnaces. In this very district of Blacklands was found a large number of Roman coins mixed up with the scoræ. And it would be remembered that the Roman colonists who occupied these villas were not like the English gentlemen of the present time. They were persons intent on earning a livelihood, and he had little doubt that the owner of the house before them was a person connected with trade—probably the iron trade. With respect to the date of this house, he felt quite certain that it was built between the years 79 and 410, because the year 79 was the first in which any Roman colonist dared to settle in any unfortified situation, and in the year 410 Honorius gave up all claim to dominion in Britain. It was near to the Ermine-street, but nearer to the via vicinalis. There was clear evidence that the villa was destroyed by fire, in the colour of the stones and brickwork. The construction of the walls was in the usual herring-bone style. The building had not open colonnades. The Romans were far too wise to introduce their own architecture into this ungenial country—the colonnades, flat roofs, and rows of walls pierced with holes, which were now advocated by their would-be imitators of the nineteenth century. The villa before them presented nothing like the character of a southern villa. It had no court. It was a large straggling villa, with the baths tailing back towards the river. He took that well which had been supposed to be an impluvium to be simply a dipping well. He now turned to the interesting portion of the remains containing the bathing establishment, and he would begin by warning his hearers that every hypocaust, or room supported by pilæ, was not necessarily a bath. In this cold climate it might indicate merely a warm room. One little apartment he took to be the place where the charcoal was kept. The other adjoining it he took to be the furnace. The heat went through the passage and the hypocaust. Unfortunately, the concrete which was once over the pilæ was destroyed, and had been removed. The hypocaust was divided in two parts, and he had no doubt those two piles of larger bricks, which are four times the size of the others, formed a divisional wall, and perhaps supported a labrum or hot water bath. Over the hypocaust, first came the caldarium, then the tepidarium, and beyond was the cold plunging bath, lined with a coating of cement. They might still see the drain for letting off the water. In this particular hypocaust there are sixteen small pilæ in the first, and twenty-five in the second compartment. The two rooms at the side were the dressing rooms—the apodyteria. And now he came to the pavement before them. It was composed of plain, coarse tessellæ of terra cotta, the materials for which were found on the spot. In the centre, however, is a square compartment of that superior mosaic known as opus vermiculatum. On examining the restored plan, they would see something uncommonly like a cross, and at first he was disposed to think that the builder of this house might have been a Christian. But the cross is so simple an ornament that they could not be surprised to find it without being indicative of any connexion with Christianity. Something like a cross ornamented the centre of the Roman pavement found at Cotterstock. Near this pavement is a carefully smoothed plaster floor painted red—very rare in this country. He only knew of two instances. Traces of wall plaster had also been found. Next, they came to the covering. For the most part the roof was formed of flat tiles, called tegulæ, with a flange and semicircular tiles or umbrices, which were placed over the flanged ends of the flat ones. Heaps of these were found. They might still see the holes with which they were fastened to the roof, and in some instances the iron nails remained in them. Many pieces of Collyweston slate, with holes and the nails in them, had been found. There was one very good specimen of a fine tile scored with the usual wavy ornaments. He was sorry to say this villa had not been so productive of beautiful pottery as they might have hoped. There was a fragment of what is commonly called Samian ware, erroneously supposed to have been manufactured at Samos, but really at Arezzo—Aretium—in Italy. There was also a specimen of Durobrivan pottery, two other specimens of cream-coloured pottery, pieces of kitchen mortars, roughed inside with little bits of iron scoræ. There was also a great quantity of bones, which, as usual, taught them nothing, and a large number of oyster shells, showing that the proprietor, like the rest of his countrymen, was very fond of the oysters of Britain. Some of these were still closed. There were some specimens of Roman glass—not of any particular quality. A very few small coins were found—one a third brass of Constantine the Great. Two small altars, very rude, one plain and the other having Pan on one side and a tripod apparently on the other, and two lumps of wood in the dipping well. With a well-deserved compliment to the Earl of Westmoreland for the care with which he had prosecuted these researches, Mr. Trollope closed his address. The Rev. H. Elwin of Norwich moved a vote of thanks to the reverend gentleman, which was seconded by Lord Alwyne Compton. On leaving the park, the excursionists visited Apethorpe Church, and then proceeded to King's Cliffe, where, from the pulpit steps, the Rev. C. Nevinston gave a brief history of the parish. Returning to Stamford, there was an evening meeting in the Assembly Room, where, Lord Alwyne Compton presiding, the Rev. Edward Trollope read a paper on "The Roman House at Apethorpe," filling up the outline he had sketched at the spot. With an explanation of the contents of the museum got together for the occasion, the meeting was brought to a close.

The Roman villas consisted of three parts, one called the Urbanæ, where the master and his family dwelt; another the Rusticæ, destined for the uses of husbandry; and the third, the Fructuaria, or receptacles for the fruits of the earth. In the choice of situation and aspect the Romans were very particular, the latter requiring peculiar attention, as only by the aspect of the buildings and rooms could they be rendered conveniently habitable in bad weather, glass for windows being then only little known, and its substitutes costly and not in general use. Vitruvius, an architect in the reign of Augustus (who died A.D. 14), has given us the following rules:—The winter triclinium (dining-room) and bath should look to the winter's delining sun, because the afternoon light is there useful; besides, the western sun shining therein produces heat, and makes that aspect warm and pleasant in the evening. Bed-chambers and libraries should look to the east, for in these the morning light is required: it is also proper that the books in the libraries may not decay, for in those that look to the south and west they will be damaged by damps and worms, which the humid winds generate and nourish. The spring and autumn tricinia should look to the east, for the windows being then turned from the sun, proceeding westward, render those places temperate at the time they are generally used. The summer tricinium should look to the north, because this aspect is not, like the others, rendered hot at the summer solstice; for being turned from the course of the sun, it remains always cool, and when used is salubrious and pleasant. To the same aspect also should be disposed Pinacotheca (picture rooms), as well as embroidering and painting-rooms, that the colours used in the works, on account of the inequality of the light, may remain unchanged.

A stream having its rise at Weldon passes through the valley in which the villa at Apethorpe was situate, the water of the present day putting in motion a Roman introduction into this country—a primitive-looking water-mill in the adjoining village of Wood Newton, a sketch of which some of our artists would readily obtain did they know of its existence. Views from this villa would not be extensive, the land on the east and west sides being very high, and the great forest of the Coritani extended from the north side of the Nene as far as Stamford. In these immense woods the wild bull, bear, and wolf roamed, the hunting of which afforded exciting but frequently dangerous sport: bones of wild animals have just been found amongst the long-buried debris at Apethorpe. It is asserted that the Anglo-Norman Earl Warren was the originator of the bull-running at Stamford; but it was the Romans who first practised it in this country, and probably in this neighbourhood.

MASONIC NOTES AND QUERIES.

HERTFORD MASONIC LODGE.

THE following notice of the foundation of the above Lodge, extracted from Turnour's History of the Ancient Town and Borough of Hertford, 8vo., Hertford, 1830, may be interesting to some of our Hertfordshire brethren, and worthy of a place among the "Masonic Notes and Queries." In section 6, page 33, headed Hertford Masonic Lodge, Mr. Turnour makes a note, in which he states "A very strong desire having been expressed by several of the subscribers to this work, that some account should be given of the Hertford Masonic Lodge, an institution which has been established in the town within the last few weeks, the author presents them with the following very able and interesting article from the pen of Alfred S. Dowling, Esq., Senior Warden of the Lodge, whose kindness and attention in providing him with the means of gratifying so general a wish, he takes this opportunity to acknowledge." The article then commences as follows:—"Among the public institutions of this town, perhaps none is more interesting than the subject of the present article, namely, the Hertford Masonic Lodge. This opinion we are led to form, not merely from the unprecedented celerity with which its numbers have increased or the highly respected names attached to it, but from a view of the beneficial effects it is likely to produce in the county; and a perfect conviction that the more the principles of the royal art are disseminated, the greater will be those beneficial effects. Before we proceed to give an account of the Lodge and its formation, our readers may perhaps not consider a short historical sketch of Masonry uninteresting. In doing this it will not be necessary to write a defence of the Craft against the absurd or wicked aspersions which ignorance or superstition may have cast upon it, for no rational being can conceive anything objectionable in an institution cherished and supported by all that is great, illustrious, or good, in this country." The writer then goes on to give the history and tradition of the Craft and tracing the same down to the union in 1813, continues thus:—"According to the constitution thus formed, the Hertford Lodge has been established. Although we have made a diligent search in the existing records of Masonry, and carefully examined its traditions, no trace can be discovered of a Masonic Lodge ever having existed in Hertfordshire previous to the erection of the present. A strong wish having been expressed by several of the leading gentlemen of Hertford and Ware, that a Lodge should be formed in the county town, an application for the purpose of attaining that object was made to a brother of the Grand Master's Lodge. The signatures of seven Masons resident in Hertford and Ware having been procured, a petition in the usual form was presented to H.R.H. the Duke of Sussex, the M.W. Grand Master, for a warrant of constitution. This H.R.H. was pleased to grant, and by it appointed Bro. Crew (P.M. of the Grand Masters' Lodge) as the first Master; Bro. Dowling, of the same Lodge, as the first S.W., and Bro. Rogers, I.G. of the same Lodge, as the first J.W. The number from the present state of the list is No. 849 (now No. 578). The Lodge was opened in due form on the 8th of last September, by the V.W. Bro. Bott, P.G.D., assisted by installed Masters. The V.W. brother then installed the new Master in antient form. The latter afterwards appointed his officers, and in the course of that day fifteen candidates were admitted to the mysteries and privileges of Freemasonry. After three other meetings, no less than fifty subscribing members had been enrolled in the books of the Lodge; thirty-four of these had been initiated at Hertford; and we are happy to state that they include a portion of the nobility, clergy, and gentlemen of the county, several members of the corporation, and many of the most respectable inhabitants of the borough. This rapid success, the oldest Mason in the Craft, R.W. Bro. Harper, P.D.G.M., states from his experience and reading, to be unprecedented in Masonic history. However, it is probable from what we can learn, that the Lodge will continue to increase. Although we fear the length of this article must have nearly exhausted the patience of our readers, we cannot conclude without expressing our confidence that if this Lodge continues to preserve, and no doubt it will, the zeal, unanimity, and kind feeling which have hitherto characterized the meetings, it will become an ornament of the Craft to which it belongs, and a blessing to the county in which it is established." May I venture to add a word of advice to the brethren of the various Lodges, and to request that any such notices as the foregoing, with which they may happen to be acquainted, should be communicated to "Masonic Notes and Queries," where they would be preserved, and in time will be of great value in writing a Lodge history, a task that sooner or later must be accomplished.—PETER DE VALENCE.

WAS THE LATE DUKE OF WELLINGTON A FREEMASON?

DEAR SIR AND BROTHER,—The enclosed was communicated about the year 1835, it may be interesting at the present moment.—Yours fraternally, WILLIAM LLOYD, Birmingham.

"This distinguished brother, when colonel in the 33rd regiment of foot, was initiated into Freemasonry in Lodge No. 494, which was at the time held in the castle of Dangan, county Meath, the late Earl of Mornington, his grace's father, being Master of the Lodge at the time. He was duly passed after the usual examination, and (in the phraseology of the Lodge) entered at the southern gate, and afterwards raised.

"The following brethren, being members, were present, many of them (in the words of the Irish bard) 'have been famous in story':—Bros. Sir James Somerville, Bart.; Sir Benjamin Chapman, Bart.; Ham. Georges, M.P.; Delvin (late) Earl of Westmeath; Robert Uniacke, M.P.; Richard Boyle, M.P.; John Pomeroy; William Forster; George Lowther, M.P.; the Earl of Mornington; the Marquess Wellesley; F. North (late) Earl of Guildford; Robert Percival; Robert Waller; Richard Lesley; Arthur Wellesley.

"The Lodge has for many years been in abeyance, but has never surrendered its warrant. The venerable Bro. Christopher Carleton, through whose fraternal kindness the above interesting particulars have been communicated, filled the offices of Master and Secretary for several years, and finding at length that he could not succeed in effecting a sufficient gathering of the Craft to work the Lodge, he prudently took the warrant into his personal charge, and, in order to preserve its reputation and Masonic honour he enrolled the above names, and maintained the credit of the Lodge by paying half-yearly dues from his private purse, as though it were working in prosperity."

BÜHEIM'S COLLECTION OF MASONIC SONGS.

In the Musical Times for the present month, p. 109, reference is made to "the rich collection of Masonic songs, published in 1794, by Büheim, of Berlin." Is the work known in this country, and have the songs ever been translated? A good collection of English Masonic songs is a great desideratum—the only work of the kind of which I am aware, and of which I possess a copy, is "The Musical Mason," without date on the title page, but which appeared in 1791, according to Bro. Matthew Cooke.—WILLIAM KELLY, Leicester.

MASONIC ANTIQUITIES.

In the Court Journal of February, 1852, in an article on Freemasonry, after recording the proceedings in England in 1425 and 1561, in France in 1757, and in Russia, is the following sentence:—"We find in England the most ancient traces of the Masonic Order, organized nearly in its present form. In 1327 all Peers were Masons. In 1502 Henry VIII. declared himself protector of the Order, and held a Lodge in his own palace."—R. E. X.

Poetry.

PERSIAN SONG.

TRANSLATED BY SIR WILLIAM JONES.

SWEET maid, if thou would'st charm my sight,
And bid these arms my neck infold;
That rosy cheek, that lily hand
Would give the poet more delight
Than all Bokhara's vaunted gold,
Than all the gems of Samarcand.

Boy, let yon liquid ruby flow,
And bid thy pensive heart be glad,
Whate'er the frowning zealots say,
Tell them their Eden cannot show
A stream so clear as Roenabad,
A bower so sweet as Mosellay.

Oh! when these fair, perfidious maids,
Whose eyes our secret haunts infest,
Their dear destructive charms display,
Each glance my tender breast invades,
And robs my wounded soul of rest,
As Tartars seek their destined prey.

In vain with love our bosoms glow;
Can all our tears, can all our sighs,
New lustre to those charms impart,
Can cheeks where living roses blow,
Where nature spreads her richest dyes,
Require the borrow'd gloss of art.

Speak not of fate—ah! change the theme,
And talk of odours, talk of wine,
Talk of the flowers that round us bloom,
'Tis all a cloud, 'tis all a dream;
To love and joy thy thoughts confine,
Nor hope to pierce the sacred gloom.

But, ah! sweet maid, my counsel hear,
(Youth should attend when those advise, Whom long experiences render sage.)
While music charms the ravished ear,
While sparkling cups delight our eyes,
Be gay, and scorn the frowns of age.

What cruel answer have I heard!
And yet, by heaven, I love thee still,
Can aught be cruel from thy lip!
Yet say how fell that bitter word,
From lips which streams of sweetness fill,
Which nought but drops of honey sip.

Go boldly forth my simple lay,
Whose accents flow with artless ease,
Like orient pearls at random strung,
Thy notes are sweet the damsels say,
But, oh! far sweeter if they please,
The nymphs for whom these notes are sung.

MOONRISE.

'Twas at the close of a long summer's day
As we were standing on a grassy slope
The sunset hung before us like a dream,
That shakes a demon in his fiery lair.
The clouds were standing round the setting sun
Like gaping caves, fantastic pinnacles!
Tall towers that went and came like spires of flame,
Cliffs quivering with fire-snow, and sunset peaks
Of piled gorgeousness and rocks of flame
Atilt and poised, bare beaches, crimson seas
All these were huddled in that dreadful west.
All shook and trembled in the unsteady light,
And from the centre glared the angry sun.
Stern as the unlash'd eye of God. A glare
O'er evening city with its boom of sin:
(Dost thou remember as we journeyed home,
That dreadful sunset burnt into our brain.)
With what a soothing came the naked moon,
She, like a swimmer that has found his ground
Came rippling up a silver strand of stars—
And plung'd from th' other side into the night.

HOPE.

BY L. E. LONDON.

OH! never another dream can be
Like that early dream of ours,
When Hope, like a child, laid down to sleep,
Amid the folded flowers.

But Hope has awakened since and wept
Itself like a rainbow away;
And the flowers have faded and fallen around,
We have none for a wreath to-day.
Now Truth has taken the place of Hope,
And our hearts are like winter hours;
Little has after life been worth,
That early dream of ours.
